

BERKELEY, CALIFORNIA

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2022 with funding from Kahle/Austin Foundation

https://archive.org/details/gtu_32400002586851

THE INDEX:

—A—

WEEKLY PAPER,

DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

VOLUME II.

TOLEDO, OHIO:

INDEX ASSOCIATION, 90 ST. CLAIR STREET.

1871.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

ESSAYS AND LEADING ARTICLES.

	PAGE.
Modern Principles, A Synopsis of Free Religion.....	1, 9, 17
Christianity and Civilization.....	2, 10, 18
The Imitation of Jesus, Rev. O. B. Frothingham.....	25
The Battle Fields of Science, Hon. Andrew D. White.....	33
Pillars of Salt.....	41
Fear, Knowledge, Love, in the Development of Religion. Wm. J. Potter.....	49
The Ethics of Pulpit Instruction.....	57
Christianity versus Free Religion, Rev. Dr. Powers.....	65
Growing Old.....	73
Emmanuel Swedenborg.....	81
Radical Christianity, Thos. M. Clonlock.....	89
Religion and Science, O. B. Frothingham.....	97
False and Genuine Sanctities, O. B. Frothingham.....	105
The Intentional and Scientific Schools of Free Religion.....	113
Intuition and Science, John Wetherbee.....	121
The Warmth of Free Education.....	129, 137
The Theological Works of Thomas Paine.....	145
Popular Amusements.....	153
The Farewells of Jesus, O. B. Frothingham.....	161
The Battle for Free Education.....	169
Religious Curiosities of London.....	177
Love and Justice, or the Christian and Radical Rules of Life.....	185
Home.....	193
The Voysey Case, Rev. Moncure D. Conway.....	201
Jonah.....	209
The Clergy.....	217
The Radical Idea of Prayer.....	225
The So-Called "Reformation," S. B. McCracken.....	233
Trifles.....	241
Fear of the Living God, O. B. Frothingham.....	249
Crete and the Cretians.....	257
Lecture on the Bible, Rev. Charles Voysey.....	265, 273
The Voices of the Sea.....	281
A Fortnight in a Dutch Town.....	289
The Work in Hand.....	297
Christian Propagandism.....	305, 313
Farewell Address of Rev. Chas. Voysey.....	321
Persons and Ideas.....	329
God in the Constitution, Arthur B. Bradford.....	337
Self Love, O. B. Frothingham.....	345
The Pharisee and the Publican.....	353
The True Temptation of Jesus, Prof. Francis W. New- man.....	361
Compulsory Education.....	369
The Present Heaven, O. B. Frothingham.....	377
The Divine Thirst.....	385
The Future of Germanism in America, C. Reemelin.....	393
Free Religion in a Free State.....	401
Scientific Materialism, Prof. John Tyndall.....	409

POETRY.

Rhymes, W. H. S.....	4
My Rose, Mignonette.....	12
Seventeen, Asterisk.....	28
The Child's Picture, Asterisk.....	36
The Ice King, Asterisk.....	44
1871, Cora Wilburn.....	52
Thanksgiving, Mignonette.....	60
Progress Eternal.....	68
Aspiration, M. B. W.....	76
After the War, Asterisk.....	84
The Rail Road Holocaust, W. M. Carleton.....	92
Doubt, Tennyson.....	100
The Peasant to the Lady, Asterisk.....	108
To keep a True Lent, Herrick.....	116
If at Last, Mignonette.....	124
God, Cora Wilburn.....	132
The Alchemist, Deere Hartle.....	140
The Mystery of Nature.....	148
Freedom, Burns.....	156
The Descent of Man.....	164
Superstition, Lessing.....	172
The Sea Shell, Asterisk.....	180
Retrospect, Asterisk.....	188
The One Religion, Lessing.....	196
Friendship, Asterisk.....	204
The Rainbow, Wordsworth.....	212
Ode, Asterisk.....	220
The Statue, Frederick R. Marvin.....	228
The Post's Step, M. B. W.....	236
Be Still and Wait, Frederick R. Marvin.....	244
The Folly of Human Pride, Pope.....	252
Green River, Bryant.....	260
Beyond the Veil, Whittier.....	268
My Prayer, W.....	276
The Difference, Cora Wilburn.....	284
My Hope, M. B. W.....	292
Dies Natalis, Asterisk.....	300
If, Mignonette.....	308
The Poem of Humanity, Whittier.....	316
To My Friends—A Poem, Cora Wilburn.....	324
I Remember, Thomas Hood.....	332
My Doctrines Make No Way, H. L. B. B.....	340
A Good Night Rhyme, Asterisk.....	348
Hannah Jane, D. R. Locke.....	356
Musings, Asterisk.....	364
Of the Immortality of the Soul, Sir John Davies.....	372
Old Things are Passed Away; Behold all Things are New, Jeannie G. Kinley.....	380
Alternatives, Matthew Arnold.....	388
Under One Roof, J. H. C.....	396
Cantor, John Alberger.....	404
In Limine, Helen Barron Bostwick.....	412

VOICES FROM THE PEOPLE. 3, 11, 27, 35, 43, 51,

67, 75, 83, 91, 99, 107, 115, 123, 131, 139, 147, 155, 163, 171, 179, 187, 195, 203, 211, 219, 227, 235, 243, 251, 259, 267, 275, 283, 291, 299, 307, 315, 323, 331, 339, 347, 355, 363, 371, 385, 403, 411.
EDITORIALS.
Volume First of The Index.....	4
Universities, Secular or Secular.....	4
Mr. Tilton's Withdrawal.....	4
Critical Counsel, O. B. F.....	5
The New Mystery, W. J. P.....	5
Volume First of The Index.....	12
Professional Appointments at Cornell University.....	12
A True Ecumenical Council, W. J. P.....	13
The Echo of an Old Cry, W. J. P.....	14
The Conflict Coming.....	20
The Hospitalities of Faith, O. B. F.....	21
Religion and Science, W. J. P.....	21
Truths for the Times.....	28
The Modern Inquisition.....	28

The Disappearance of the Clerical, T. W. H.....	29
The Spirit of Truth, W. H. S.....	29
Principles and Applications.....	36
The Religious Amendment to the Constitution, W. J. P.....	37
Mediatorial Religion, J. V. B.....	38
Outside of Christianity.....	44
The Call for Courage, O. B. F.....	45
More Liberal than Logical.....	52
Commercial Christianity.....	52
Letter from Wm. C. Gannett.....	53
Amenities of Faith, O. B. F.....	53
Inducements.....	60
Our Eastern Trip.....	60
"Credo" and "Crede," T. W. H.....	61
Theology, R. P. H.....	61
The Pyramid on its Apex.....	68
Utility of Doubt, W. H. S.....	69
Notes from the Field, P. P.....	69
Plutarch's "Morals,".....	76
A Letter from Dr. Bartol.....	77
"What's in a Name?" W. J. P.....	77
The Sin of Monotony, O. B. F.....	77
Personal Government.....	84
Who is to Blame?.....	84
The Chill of Radicalism, O. B. F.....	85
The Emancipation of Religion, W. J. P.....	85
Science and Intuition.....	92
Jesus and Free Thought.....	92
The Golden Age.....	93
The Doc le Mind, O. B. F.....	93
The Boston Lectures, W. J. P.....	94
"Infidels" and "Infidelity,".....	100
Standing Squarely outside of Christianity, E. P. H.....	101
Notes from the Field, P. P.....	101
Religion and Science.....	108
Letter from W. H. Channing, W. J. P.....	109
Counters and Culture, O. B. F.....	109
Announcement.....	116
Looking Science in the Face, T. W. H.....	117
Fellowship in Spirit, W. J. P.....	117
An Unexpected Attack.....	124
Harvard Divinity School, W. H. S.....	125
Abiogenesis.....	132
Sentimentalism.....	132
Active Piety, O. B. F.....	133
Sleep is an Opinion, T. W. H.....	133
Adverse Criticisms.....	140
An Irreconcilable Conflict, J. V. B.....	141
Radicalism and History, O. B. F.....	141
The Leaven Working.....	148
Debts to Man and Debts to God.....	148
Faith, Feeling, O. B. F.....	148
Intuition and Science, W. J. P.....	149
Miss Cobb's New Book.....	156
A Liberalist Victory.....	156
Free Religious Association Notice, W. J. P.....	157
"Ecclesiastical Continuity," W. J. P.....	157
Notes from the Field, P. P.....	158
"The Historical Existence of Jesus,".....	164
Churches and School Houses.....	164
Queries and Answers.....	165
Free Religious Association Notice.....	165
Bread Alone, T. W. H.....	165
A New Standard, O. B. F.....	165
Notes from the Field, P. P.....	166
The Leaven Working.....	173
Southern Reconstruction, W. J. P.....	173
Can Science Find God? W. H. S.....	173
Notes from the Field, P. P.....	174
God and Freedom.....	180
Our Contributors.....	181
A Symbol, O. B. F.....	181
Religious Selfishness, W. J. P.....	181
"American Religion,".....	188
A Note from Mr. Wasson.....	188
Free Religious Association, W. J. P.....	189
Notes from the Field, P. P.....	189
The Index Association.....	196
A Radical Convention, W. J. P.....	197
Letter from Wm. Henry Channing, W. J. P.....	197
Good and Bad Guides.....	205
A Predicted Fall, O. B. F.....	205
The Danger of i, T. W. H.....	205
Notes from the Field, P. P.....	206
"The Examiner,".....	212
Indians and Dogs.....	213
Pious Frauds, W. H. S.....	213
Spiritualism and Superstition, O. B. F.....	213
Christianity and Politics.....	220
What we need, O. B. F.....	221
Inspiration as a Human Gift, J. V. B.....	221
Notes from the Field, P. P.....	222
Universology.....	222
The Catholic Riot.....	228
The Conquest of Mexico.....	228
Authority and Discipleship, W. J. P.....	229
Pious Frauds Again, W. H. S.....	230
Notes from the Field, P. P.....	230
The Brewing Storm.....	236
Is Chivalry Dead?.....	236
Free Religious Association, W. J. P.....	236
Keshub Chunder Sen, W. J. P.....	237
Courage and Indifference, O. B. F.....	237
Notes from the Field, P. P.....	238
Spencer's "Psychology,".....	244
The New Treaty.....	244
Free Religious Association, W. J. P.....	245
No Middle Ground, T. W. H.....	245
"Guard!" W. H. S.....	245
Notes from the Field, P. P.....	246
Appeal of the Liberal Alliance.....	252
Mansel's "Metaphysics,".....	252
Sanctified Immoralities.....	253
A. R. Publications, W. J. P.....	253
Religion and Atheism, W. J. P.....	253
Galling Yokes.....	254
Coffee and Cockroaches.....	260
A Friend in England.....	260
Tyndall's "Light and Electricity,".....	261
Religion and Atheism, W. J. P.....	261
The Priest and the Prophet, J. V. B.....	262
Stockholders' Meeting.....	268
The Report of the Free Religious Association.....	268
A Great Point Gained, T. W. H.....	269
The Definition of Religion, W. J. P.....	269
Notes from the Field, P. P.....	270
The System of Foreign Missions.....	276
Non-Resistance.....	277
Free Thought not Indifference, W. J. P.....	277
The Priest and the Prophet, J. V. B.....	277

Notes from the Field, P. P.....	PAGE.
The Index to its Friends.....	278
The Priest and the Prophet, J. V. B.....	284
Scientific Solvents, W. H. S.....	285
A Simple Distinction.....	285
Gold and Blood.....	292
Corrections, W. J. Potter.....	292
Yea and Nay, J. V. B.....	293
Religion and Morality, W. J. P.....	293
A Radical Dark Lantern.....	294
Popularizing Science.....	300
Orthodox Criticism Gone to Seed.....	301
All Alike, T. W. H.....	301
False Proverbs, W. H. S.....	301
Notes from the Field, P. P.....	302
China and Christianity.....	308
Dr. Channing's Last Words, T. W. H.....	309
Theoretical-Practical, R. P. H.....	310
The "Incarnate Sinner," J. V. B.....	310
Treatment of Crime, W. J. P.....	317
A Gospel of Honesty, W. H. S.....	317
Charles Voysey.....	324
The Spirit of Science.....	324
An Apology.....	325
Religion in this World, W. J. P.....	325
Spiritual Freedom in Scotland, J. Vila Blake.....	325
"But the Lord was not in the Fire,".....	325
Funeral, J. V. B.....	332
Religion and Social Problems, W. J. P.....	333
The Mil in Resolutions.....	334
Christian Logic and Christian Religion.....	340
Divine Providence in the Chicago Fire, W. J. P.....	341
Too Early Sighted.....	342
Religion and Gentility, J. V. B.....	342
Success.....	348
The Good Cause, O. B. F.....	349
A Universal Bible, W. J. P.....	350
Notes from the Field, P. P.....	350
Book Notices.....	356
Heresy Crystallized, T. W. H.....	357
"Light Without Heat," W. H. S.....	357
Notes from the Field, P. P.....	358
"Unitarianism,".....	364
Conventions, Wm. J. Potter.....	365
The Rival Faiths, O. B. F.....	365
Tammany.....	365
F. R. A. Conventions, W. J. P.....	366
Types on the Rampage, W. J. P.....	366
Profitless Prayers.....	372
Progress.....	372
"Out of the Mouth of Babies and Sucklings,".....	373
Conventions, W. J. Potter.....	373
Labor Reform, A. P. H.....	373
An Answer Requested.....	380
Unitarianism Again.....	380
Conventions, Wm. J. Potter.....	381
Conversion and Perversion, O. B. F.....	381
A Word for the Conventions, W. J. P.....	381
Pulpit Demoralization.....	382
A Defence that Needs Defending.....	388
An Unfounded Charge, W. J. P.....	389
False Charity, O. B. F.....	390
A Friend in London.....	396
Only Half Waked Up.....	396
A Negative System, T. W. H.....	397
A Straw on the Stream, W. H. S.....	397
Another Gain.....	404
The Coming Empire of Science, A Letter from Mr. Darwin.....	404
Definitions of Religion, E. D. C.....	405
The Free Religious Conventions, W. J. P.....	405
Notes from the Field, P. P.....	412
The Boston Free Religious Lectures of 1872.....	412
Authority in Science and in Religion.....	412
The F. R. A. Conventions, W. J. P.....	413
A New View of the Fall of Man, P. P.....	414
The Radical Association.....	414
Hard to Suit.....	414

COMMUNICATIONS.

The Illiberalism of Sectarian Colleges, Peter H. Clark.....	4
Cornell University, R. H. Howard.....	6
Sacred and Profane, S. H. J.....	6
Character the Result of Organization, Henry Bronson.....	6
University Appointments, Andrew D. White.....	14
"The Index" too Orthodox, E. M. M.....	14
"Sabbath Desecration," H. L. Green.....	14
A Sample of Priestly Intolerance, N. Y. Friend.....	15
Spencer on Spontaneous Generation, John Chappell Smith.....	22
The Claims of the Heart in Religion, R. H. Howard.....	22
How We See, T. A. Bland.....	23
C. D. B. Mills, Syracuse.....	23
Total Depravity, Austin Kent.....	23
A Ladies' Conversational Club out West, M. N. A.....	30
Retrograde Reforms, Ira Smith.....	30
Spontaneous Generation, Morris Einstein.....	31
Correct from Wm. C. Tenney.....	35
The "Modern Principles," Thos. McClintock.....	35
The Critic's True Position, Thos. Barlow.....	46
Christianity and Education, R. H. H.....	46
The True Nature of Moral Freedom, J. E. S.....	46
Jephtha's Vow, E. L. Crane.....	47
Encouragement, C.....	47
Petty Persecutions, Jesse B. Barry.....	47
"A Correction" Corrected, Wm. Sharman.....	47
The Claims of the Heart in Religion, R. H. Howard.....	54
The "Word of God," Trumbel D. Thomas.....	55
Liberalism and Fanaticism, N. E. Doane.....	62
Credo, Law.....	62
The Irresponsibility of Man, Geo. H. Stevens.....	63
Ralph Waldo Emerson, L. T. I.....	70
Perishing Theologies, James Forbes.....	70
A Question to the Clergy, J. N. Osburn.....	70
The Human and Divine, Edw. S. Elder.....	70
Incomprehensibilities, La Ray Sunderlin.....	71
"The Imitation of Jesus," Morris Einstein.....	78
The Claims of the Heart in Religion, R. H. Howard.....	79
The Origin of Conscience, Lewis Kurtz.....	79
Counsel Wanted.....	86
The Independent Congregational Society of Salem, O. M. R. Robinson.....	87
Positivism, B. F. Stanley.....	87
Outside of Christianity, Thos. Barlow.....	94
Christ Worship, J. E. A.....	95
Old Fogysm vs. Radicalism, Friend of Progress.....	95
Natural Theology, P. Roosevelt Johnson.....	95
An Infidel, W. H. D.....	95
Questionings, S. Doolittle.....	102
Let Jesus Rest, Isaac Allen.....	102

9.11.05 B.R.A.G.

THE INDEX.

	PAGE.
A Word on the Other Side, D.	102
Huxley—Spontaneous Generation, John Chappell Smith	103
Escaping from Prison, Mrs. L. Reynolds	103
Broken Fetters, C. L. Morgan	103
The Complaint of Methodism against Free Religion, R. H. Howard	110
At Rest, J. W. G.	111
Undiluted Orthodoxy, Geo. H. Ford	111
The "Removal" of Charles Sumner, A. O.	118
The War of Words, Beza	118
Do Mankind Need a New Revelation? Geo. B. Smith	118
Four Questions to Mr. M. Clintoek, Austin Kent	119
A Correction, K. N.	119
Orthodoxy in a Nut Shell, F.	119
The Personality of God, L. Bristol	126
Words, Words, W. H. D.	126
Into the Church and Out Again, E. T. Wood	127
Mediumship, La Roy Sunderland	127
Science and Speculative Philosophy, Samuel H. Emery	134
Free Medicine, M. D.	134
Liberal Spiritualism, Geo. Lynn	135
The Need of Personal Development, Dyer D. Lum	135
Annexation of San Domingo, Edw. L. Crane	135
The Christian Era, Hannah J. Hunt	142
Prof. T. B. Taylor, B.	142
A Greeting from the old Dominion, J. M. Barnes	142
Sacred and Secular, S.	143
Cross-Examination of the Bible, Alex. Cole	143
"Infidels" and "Miscreants," B.	150
Dr. Bellows' Fifth Lecture	151
A Defence of Intuitionism, C. L. James	151
Science and Free Religion, J. E. S.	151
Rationalistic Methodism, R. H. Howard	159
Spiritualism as a Science, L. Bristol	159
Immortality how proved, B.	159
Intuition and Science	159
The Door to Certainty, P. Thompson	159
Historical Existence of Jesus, W. H. B.	167
"Free Medicine" Again, C. Pearson, M. D.	167
A Radical on Martyrdom, W. H. D.	174
Name or Nickname, J. T. Blakeney	174
The Rationalism of Jesus, S. H. A.	175
A Vindication of Mr. Sumner, Edw. M. MacGraw	175
The Religion of Humanity, T. K. P.	175
A Book to be Read by Free Religionists, Henry Blanchard	182
Justice to All, Wm. C. Russel	182
"Science the Savior," Dyer D. Lum	182
The Dawn of Hand, Charlotte G. Barber	183
The Argument of Hume, McCash and Kant, Jno. Chappell Smith	183
A Man-God, W. H. D.	190
Prayer and Law, T. A. Denison	190
Thomas Paine and Elias Hicks, C. Bonsall	190
The Retributions of Providence, Elizabeth Peckham	190
Sacrilege—A Correction— C.	191
Fulton on the Rampage, Not a Free Religionist	191
A Baptist on the Bible, Euclid	191
Protestant Persecution	191
Fulton Joy Factious, La Roy Sunderland	199
Christian Joy Factious, La Roy Sunderland	199
The Term Infidel, W. H. D.	199
"Worth of Religion," Charles R. White	199
Christianity—The Popular and the Real— K. N.	199
Pre-Natal Murder, Titus L. Brown	200
The Relation of Science and Intuition, Sarah M. Mills	206
The Historical Existence of Jesus, W. H. B.	207
Mr. Pillsbury in Florence, Seth Hunt	214
Two Letters— J. Sedgwick—R.	214
Let Us Have Peace, Morris Einstein	215
The Bible Not for the Children, J. T. D.	223
Rationalism Bewitched, R. H. Howard	223
A Plea For Love, E. L. Cane	223
Love and Justice as Motives, D.	223
Saml. J. May, Chas. D. B. Mills	230
From an Illinois Farm, C. W. Newton	231
God and Man, Phil P.	231
The Continued Existence of Mind After Death, Milton Sutcliffe	231
"Good and Bad Guides," W. H. B.	238
Spiritualism and Superstition, G. B. S.	239
Once More, Morris Einstein	246
Free Religion and Bigory, A. E. Giles	247
Saml. J. May's Christianity, H. L. G.	255
Superstition, Jno. Wetmore	255
A Note, G. B. Stebbins	263
The Tables Turned	263
Intuition—What It Is, and What It Is Not— S. F. Benson	263
To the Readers of The Index, Miss Cora Wilburn	270
Christian Demonology, A. A. B.	271
Opinions of Some Noted Free Thinkers, Fact	271
A Pithy Resolution, Chas. Bonsall	271
The New Dispensation, S. B. M. Cracken	271
Fulton on the Riot, Not a Free Religionist	279
Disusted, M. B. Cole	279
"In Memoriam," L. R. S.	279
Wanted—a Trustworthy Hand-Book of Radical Research, Walter F. Johnson	286
Franklin's Pretended Letter to Paine, Edw. M. MacGraw	286
The Intuist of Sunday Sabbath Laws, D.	287
The Scope of Free Religion, M.	287
Capital Punishment—Civilization	287
True Authority, D.	294
The Kick of the Gun, J. Wetmore	294

	PAGE.
Foreign Missions, Alfred Conkling	295
Remarks of Augusta Cooper Bristol	295
From a New England Farm, Ira Smith	295
Flee From the Wrath to Come, Medicus	302
The Index to Its Friends, H. L. Green	303
Intuition in the Light of Common Sense, E. L. Crane	303
The Sabbath and the Civil Law, R. H. Howard	311
Methodist Missions, R. H. Howard	311
A Legal Outrage, Rev. J. M. Barnes	311
Tinctured Orthodoxy, H. L. B. B.	318
The Probable Truths of Spiritualism, Morris Einstein	318
The Alleged Contradictions of the Bible, Rev. R. H. Howard	318
Blood, J. E. H.	327
Aaron M. Powell, Chas. D. B. Mills	327
The Natural Method in Education	327
The Christ-Principle, Phi Pi	335
The New Testament Jesus, W. H. D.	335
Jaccoliot's "Bible in India," P. Roosevelt Johnson	335
Observations Abroad, K.	335
Words to the Point from a Business Man, Lewis Kurtz	343
Intuition and its Authority, A. H.	343
Appeal to the Relief Committee	343
Observations Abroad, K.	343
Providence and Chicago, T. H. Callahan	351
A Defence of Spiritualism, Edw. M. MacGraw	351
The Mission Question, J. T. D.	353
Miss Wilburn, M. Cora Bland	359
My Religious Creed, Ignoramus	359
Parker Pillsbury, E. R. Brown	359
Fanaticism, H.	359
Carlyle's "Sartor Resartus," W. H. D.	359
The Chicago Confagration, A. C.	367
Unitarianism, Marmora De Vos	367
Can Philosophy be Established on an Objective Basis, Jno. Chappell Smith	367
Questions for the Orthodox, L. F. Gardner	367
Where is Heaven? Frederick R. Marvin	367
A Plea for Missions, R. H. Howard	374
A Story with a Moral, T. A. Bland	375
A Word for Work, H. L. Green	375
Jesus Overworked, A. J. Grover	382
A "Psychological Curiosity,"	382
Another Psychological Curiosity, Geo. A. Hammett	383
A Glimpse of Mr. Voysey	383
Is the Logical Outcome of Kant's Thesis Pure and Abso-	383
late Idealism? Jno. Chappell Smith	391
Evil Church Influences, Philo Beza	391
"Two Wonder Books to Sweep the Cobwebs from the Sky," C. W. S.	392
Aphorisms	392
"Harsh Language" and Personality, Chas. K. Whipple	398
Special Providence, J. E. H.	398
Intuition and Instinct, W.	398
"Questions for the Orthodox" Answered, R. H. Howard	398
Light and Darkness, One of your Friends	407
A Word of Encouragement, Samuel C. Eastman	407
A Plan, Leonard Church	407
The Spencerian Doctrine of Intuition, J. E. S.	407
Biblical Inspiration, P. Roosevelt Johnson	407
Unitarians, Authority, Reason and Freedom, Francis T. Washburn	415
Spiritualism Again, Morris Einstein	415

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Song of the Shirt, Gail Hamilton	8
Call for a National Suffrage Convention at Washington	6
Publications of the Free Religious Association	7
Quick Notoriety	27
Personal Privacy	31
Value of an Explanation	31
The Toledo Index Again	42
Tendency of Religious Belief in India	43
Modern Errors	46
Copernicus	50
The Boston Radical Club	50
Chit Chat	51
"Goethe's Conversation with Mueller,"	62
Modern Skepticism	62
The Duty of Free Utterance	63
Antediluvian Conscience	66
Theological Difficulties	66
A Determined Darwinian	66
Extract from the London Spectator	67
Extract from A. Hunker's Epistles	67
Extract from President Grant's Message	71
The Borgias	74
Labor in Vain	74
Simplicity of Signature	75
An Aesthetic View of Swearing	75
The Kind Conductor	75
Summary Statement of the Doctrines of the New Church	82
A New Phase of Ecclesiastical Dictation	82
The Car Conductor	83
A Story of Modern Herolism	83
The Visitation of God	83
Correspondence	99
The Disagreement of the Doctors	106
A Defence of Spiritualism, Cephas B. Lynn	106
The Theological Battle Ground	122

	PAGE.
Immortality	132
God and Immortality	132
The Stoppage of Advanced Thought	132
Intuitionism versus Science	132
Predestination Illustrated	132
Ernst Haeckel on the Mechanical Theory of Life and on Spontaneous Generation, E. R. S.	130
Toledo Evening Schools	133
Mr. Frothingham's Society	139
A New Patron for the Romish Church	139
A Good Drummer	143
God's Goodness	146
The Grace of Disinterestedness	146
Self-Support	154
A Wonderful Book	155
The Wrong Way	167
Does the Church Believe in God? Elizabeth Peckham	163
Our Public Schools	170
"No Admittance,"	176
The Religious Rationalists in Convocation	178
Warming the Cockles of the Heart, Miss Alcott	179
Thomas Wentworth Higginson	179
Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals	186
A Humane Work	186
Protection to Animals	187
A Touchstone for False Teachers, Chas. K. Whipple	187
Protestant Persecution	191
Pixy-Led	194
The Life of Christ, Beza	195
How War Interferes with Missions	200
God in the Constitution	200
The Late Decision of the Committee of Privy Council	202
Social Equality	207
Premises not well taken	210
Jesus Christ is God	211
Order and Progress	218
Clerical Nicknames	226
Mental Progress of Animals	227
Has German Freedom Gained by the War?	227
The Woman Question, Beza	234
Death by Lightning	235
The Original Mrs. Partington	235
Spiritualism not an Amusement but Religion	235
The Sunday Law Agitation	243
The Coolie Trade	243
The Clergy Still for Oppression	243
Characteristic Anecdote of Alex. Dumas	243
The Ignorance of the Clergy	250
The True Time of the Sabbath	251
The Cincinnati Sunday Agitation	251
Police Court	259
Progress of Science	267
A Fable, Theodore Parker	271
The Crusade Against Christianity	275
Bible Fortune Telling	275
Famine Stricken	283
Elizabeth Cady Stanton on Marriage and Maternity	283
"Doctors Dilem,"	283
Society of Natural Science—Correspondence	283
The Innocent Spectator	287
The Sunday Question in London	287
A Characteristic Prayer	288
Chinese Judicial Oath	288
The Sunday Question	291
A Sharp Encounter	293
Free Religion Maturing	293
Our Indian Troubles	297
How the Pagan Answered the Missionary	297
Progress of Free Thought in Scotland	311
Clerical Humbugs	311
The Yosemite Valley	319
Influence of Theodore Parker	322
Mrs. Stone on Marriage	323
Kings and Courtiers	331
Genuine Flesh and Blood	334
Free Logic and Free Religion	335
Thomas Carlyle's Mother	342
Gen. B. F. Butler	343
The Results of Repressive Education	347
The Belief in Miracles tends Logically to Atheism, Beza	354
Modern Girondins and Jacobins, Dyer D. Lum	355
The Meeting of German Physicians and Naturalists in Innsbruck	363
Motherhood by Deputy	371
The Bible a Scapegoat	371
Injustice in the Press	371
The Decision in the Dover Case, Francis E. Abbot	379
A Crooked Index	386
Free Religion in the West	387
Platform of the Massachusetts Labor Reform Party	387
Protestant Confessions Concerning the Sabbath	387
"Audi Alteram Partem," A. B. Bradford	394
A Strange Religion	395
Liberalism	399
Athanase Coquerel on Catholicism	399
The Area of the Chicago Fire	399
A Hindu Missionary to the Christians of England	402
Mr. Abbot's Lecture at the House of Correction, C. C. Foote	410
Mr. Abbot's Address as heard by another Auditor, E.	411
The Qualities of an Editor	411
The Decorum of Dishonesty	411
Physician, Heal Thyself	424

The Index.

VOL. 2.—No. 1.

TOLEDO, OHIO, JANUARY 7, 1871.

WHOLE No. 54.

The Index,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO
FREE RELIGION.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, EDITOR.

OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM,

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

RICHARD P. HALLOWELL,

EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTORS.

MODERN PRINCIPLES:

A SYNOPSIS OF FREE RELIGION.

[The following outline is offered as a purely individual interpretation of the free religious movement, it being proper to state that few, if any, of its other friends will wholly agree with it.—ED.]

I. CHRISTIANITY AS A SYSTEM.

1. Regarded as to its universal element, Christianity is a beautiful but imperfect presentation of natural morality.

2. Regarded as to its special element, Christianity is a great completed system of faith and life—a coherent body of doctrines logically developed and organized as an historical power by the Christian Church. It claims absolute control over the collective life of society and the outward and inward life of the individual. It rests this claim on the supernatural revelation of the will of God; that is, on the principle of DIVINE AUTHORITY.

3. The chief features of this system are the doctrines of the Fall of Adam, the Total Depravity of the human race, the Everlasting Punishment of the wicked, and Salvation by Christ alone. Through the transgression of the first man, all human beings lie under the consuming wrath of God, and are condemned to an everlasting hell, from which the only escape is by the Atonement of Christ.

4. This system demands absolute and unreasoning submission from the human mind. It teaches that doubt is sin, and that disbelief is damnation. It everywhere condemns freedom of thought, and persecutes it in proportion to its power. It is the worst enemy of liberty, science, and civilization, because it is organized DESPAIR OF MAN.

II. FREE RELIGION AS A SYSTEM.

5. Free Religion is a great and growing system of ideas, hitherto very imperfectly developed, but destined to become embodied in a world-wide Commonwealth of Man. It will claim absolute control over the collective life of society and the outward and inward life of the individual. It will rest this claim on the natural perception of truth by the universal reason of the race; that is, on the principle of HUMAN FREEDOM.

6. The chief features of this system are the supremacy of liberty in all matters of government, the supremacy of science in all matters of belief, the supremacy of morality in all matters of conduct, and the supremacy of benevolence in all social and personal relations. It puts the Church on the level of all other institutions, the Bible on the level of all other books, the Christ on the level of all other men, leaving them to stand or fall by their intrinsic merits or demerits.

7. This system encourages the largest activity of the human mind, and asks no assent that can be withheld. It is the best friend of progress of every kind, because it is organized FAITH IN MAN.

III. ANTAGONISM OF THE TWO SYSTEMS.

8. Between these two great systems there exists an absolute conflict of principles, aims, and methods. The one ruled the world in the Dark Ages of the past. The other will rule the world in the Light Ages of the future. Their battle-ground is the Twilight Age of the present.

9. Free Religion emphasizes the Unity of the Universe, the Unity of Mankind, the Unity of the Person, and the Unity of the Unities.

IV. THE UNITY OF THE UNIVERSE.

10. Nature is an organic, living whole. All things are in harmony as parts of a perfect cosmos. All phenomena, physical and spiritual, are correlated in the unity of a perfect order.

11. The laws of Nature are elements of one underlying, all-permeating, all-comprehensive system of Law. Fixed and inviolable, from eternity to eternity they know no change. The belief in miracle is an infinite delusion.

12. The forces of Nature are modes of one omnipresent Energy, illimitable, uncreatable, indestructible—the cause of all metamorphoses and the life of all that lives.

13. Thus Nature is infinitely many in her phenomena, and absolutely one in her order, laws, and forces.

V. THE UNITY OF MANKIND.

14. The origin of the human race is one, in virtue of a common descent from inferior types of being.

15. The nature of the human race is one, in virtue of the universal possession, in varying degrees, of the same fundamental faculties.

16. The destiny of the human race is one, in virtue of a slow but constant progress towards a universal and perfect civilization.

17. The human race ought to be a political unit, as a universal Republic of Republics based on the principle that the liberty of the individual is absolute except as limited by the equal rights of all individuals.

18. The human race ought to be a social unit, as a universal Co-operative Union based on free industry and free commerce,—labor and capital being reconciled by the education of ignorance and the reformation of selfishness.

19. The human race ought to be a religious unit, as a universal Brotherhood of Man based on faith in human nature and love for all human beings.

20. Thus the human race is one in origin, nature, and destiny; and it ought to be one politically, socially, and religiously.

VI. THE UNITY OF THE PERSON.

21. Every human being is an independent consciousness, manifesting itself on the one hand in numerous unlike faculties (sensation, perception, locomotion, passion, affection, will, reason, conscience, etc.) and manifesting itself on the other hand in the absolute unity of personality (the I).

22. Every human being ought to develop the unity of personality into the unity of character, based on the principle that the liberty of every faculty is absolute in the exercise of its natural function.

23. The unity of character requires that the Intellect shall make experience its point of departure, reason its road, knowledge its goal, and the love of truth its inspiration and guide; that it shall count all questions open that are not shut by positive demonstration; that it shall reject all answers which have no better basis than ignorant assumption or dogmatic authority; and that it shall seek answers to all questions through the patient study of universal Nature according to the laws of scientific thought.

24. The unity of character requires that the Conscience shall govern all personal action by absolute and universal moral ideas (truthfulness, justice, benevolence, purity, honor, integrity, self-respect); that it shall speak in all places and at all times with the voice of absolute command; that it shall shine like a sun that never sets, flooding the soul with the light of an ever-beautiful ideal; that it shall unsparingly rebuke every betrayal of the right, encourage fidelity to it by approving smiles, and waken deathless aspiration towards it by unveiling the eternal possibility of virtue; and that it shall make the welfare of all a private duty to each, thus consecrating the private life to the public good.

25. The unity of character requires that the Affections shall irradiate life in all its relations with the splendor of unselfish love; that they shall make manhood more manly and womanhood more womanly by blending them in one pure and happy home; that they shall dignify existence with noble friendships; that they shall deepen the joy and lighten the grief of others by respectful and tender sympathy; that they shall reverence the good and pity the evil in every human soul, and broaden out into a mighty and self-forgetful love of universal man.

26. The unity of character requires that the Will shall serve the conscience and reason, and know no other law; that it shall master the passions, and confine them to their lawful functions; that it shall be incorruptible in this servanthip, and unconquerable in this mastership; and that thus, harmonizing the animal and the spiritual, it shall bring the entire man into harmony with the laws of Nature.

27. The unity of character requires that the Sentiments and Imagination shall soar to the beautiful and sublime, and never trail their wings in defiling mire; that they shall venerate the truly venerable, delight in the magnificence of universal Nature, and thrill to its mysterious life; that they shall recognize the infinitude of the unknown, and add to the clear insights of science the deep glow of poetry and the deeper reverence of worship.

28. Thus the individual is one in the unity of personality, and ought to be one in the unity of a free, powerful, and self-harmonized character.

VII. THE UNITY OF THE UNITIES.

29. The Unity of the Universe is repeated in miniature in the ideal Unity of Mankind; and the ideal Unity of Mankind is repeated in miniature in the ideal Unity of the Person. The macrocosm is mirrored in the microcosm.

30. The great inspiration of the nineteenth century is faith in these ideal unities as possible in fact. Its faith in Man is part of its faith in universal Nature; and its faith in universal Nature includes and necessitates its faith in Man.

31. The great endeavor, half-conscious though it be, of the nineteenth century is thus to reproduce the eternal harmony of Nature in the life of the race and the life of the individual,—to create a civilization grounded on universal reverence for freedom, truth, and the equal rights of all mankind.

32. The Universe is Many in One, and One in Many. Such also will be Humanity, when its ideals shall have been realized in the world and in the soul. The national motto of America has become the great watchword of the ages—

E PLURIBUS UNUM.

CHRISTIANITY AND CIVILIZATION.

[Read to the First Independent Society of Toledo in Gitskey's Opera House, Nov. 20, 1870.]

"At all times, in all countries, religion has assumed the glory of having civilized the people."

Guizot, History of Civilization, Vol. 1, p. 6.

"Above all these monarchical, aristocratical, and popular pretensions, rises the theocratical pretension of the Church, who affirms that in virtue of her very mission, of her divine title, society belonged to her; that she alone had the right to govern it; that she alone was the legitimate queen of the European world, won over by her labors to civilization and to truth."

Ibid. p. 45.

It has been stoutly maintained by many writers, as for instance by Archbishop Whately, that all savages are the degenerate descendants of civilized ancestors, and that it is absurd to suppose that any race of savages has ever raised itself without foreign aid from the barbarous condition. In fact, this conclusion is accepted by all who believe the Biblical traditions of the origin of man, which represent the parents of the human race, if not exactly as civilized in the modern use of the word, yet as having been created in an absolutely perfect or super-civilized state. To these fanciful illusions, Sir John Lubbock has replied in his recent book by an array of facts that seem abundantly to sustain the opposite conclusions, which he thus expresses:—

"That existing savages are not the descendants of civilized ancestors."

That the primitive condition of man was one of utter barbarism.

That from this condition several races have independently raised themselves." [The Origin of Civilization and the Primitive Condition of Man, p. 323.]

All the investigations and researches of the most distinguished archaeologists of modern times seem to point in the same direction. For instance, if the patient labors of such men as Busk, Lubbock, Wilson, Thompson, Steenstrup, and so forth, are entitled to credit, it is clear that the shores of the Baltic Sea were inhabited in the Stone Age by a race of savages, with no domestic animal but a small species of dog,—men who gnawed the flesh and dug out the marrow of wild beasts long since extinct in that country, fished in rude canoes for cod, flounders, and herring in the adjoining waters, and, in short, had the habits which mark the barbarous state the world over. Prof. Lesley thus condenses the results of these investigations:—

"In the sober judgment of well-informed men, this much may be considered settled; that a general advance in civilization is perceptible in the past history of man during what may be roughly stated as the Stone, the Bronze, and the Iron periods, or, if you prefer to call them so, the ages of the pine, the oak, and the beech woods,—that the men of the Stone age were savage hunters and fishermen, of small stature and low intellect,—that the men of the Bronze age came in from other lands, bringing with them the knowledge of metallurgy, a taste for beauty, and religious feelings which led them to burn their dead,—and that the men of the Iron age were of still another race and country, large of stature, long-headed, warriors, with iron swords and iron ploughs, builders of forts and ships, restless invaders, fond of state, accumulators of property, oppressors of the ancient peoples, and the natural progenitors of the Berserkers and Jarl kings who, in the years of written history, conquered the west and south of Europe, and laid the basis broad for the eminent civilization of our modern times." [Origin and Destiny of Man, p. 133.]

Thus we have strong reasons for believing that the early condition of mankind was everywhere that of barbarism,—a condition in which life was gross, brutal, and precarious, scarcely higher in degree than that of the wild beasts which howled on all sides. Nothing worthy to be called society existed. No family ties, no common interests, no public consciousness knit the savages together who lived in those dark days. They were doubtless gregarious, in the fashion of animals; but marriage—the basis of all genuine social life—was unknown in its modern meaning, and woman was alternately a victim of lust and a beast of burden. The only law was the will of the strongest, and nothing was of value that did not minister to the coarsest wants.

Out of this dark primitive savagery of the human race has shone forth in many parts of the globe the light of a partial civilization. I say partial civilization; for no one who at all reflects on the subject could venture to accord higher praise to the present state of man. A true civilization exists as yet only in the dreams and hopes of the idealist. It is a beggarly boast that cries up the semi-failures of the day as if they were success. See what will be gained when man is truly civilized.

1. The political system will be the federation of all nations of the earth, and the establishment of some commonly recognized power which shall make war thenceforth an impossibility. The American principle of national government for national purposes and local government for local purposes, will eventually create a fellowship of nations in the bonds of peace; and this vast Commonwealth of Man, grounded on absolute justice and respect for the equal rights of all its constituent republics (for there will be no kingdoms then) will be mirrored in all its subdivisions. Thus each Republic will recognize the local equality and independence of all its constituent States; each State that of all its constituent counties, each county that of all its constituent towns, each town that of all its constituent districts or wards, each ward that of all its constituent families, and each family that of all its constituent individuals. Thus the complete enfranchisement of woman is implied in this political ideal, no less than the utter impossibility of war. Nothing short of this political unity of the human race, based on the recognition of all human rights, will ever fulfil the demand of a true civilization.

2. The social system, if mankind are ever to be truly civilized, will be such that every individual shall have not only a free opportunity, but also a high inducement, to make the utmost of himself that his nature will permit. Inequalities of condition will doubtless continue; but pauperism will be done away, when the powers of every individual are utilized and an honorable career is opened to him. Crime will be reduced to cases of moral insanity, and these will be in great measure prevented. The substitution of friendly co-operation for hostile competition will civilize the public morals; and then work will ensure wealth, wealth leisure, and leisure a higher type of manhood and womanhood in the world. Universal education in the people will pave the way for the highest prosperity of science, art, and letters, and genius will be developed by finding itself in demand. All the social forces will favor, and not hinder, the free play of human powers, and thus will accomplish the true end of civilization—constant progress and higher evolution. When the social system is simply the universal organization of reason, justice, and brotherly love, these ends cannot fail to be achieved.

3. Lastly, the absolute value of humanity will be universally recognized in all its individuals. There will be no curling of the lip at honest but homely worth, when men are civilized; no aristocratic contempt for humble labor; no pharisaical—"Stand back, for I am holier than thou!" Far from it. There will be so profound a sense of the value of the individual, that all public energies will be concentrated on the work of educating and developing in all possible ways the highest capacity of every single member of society. For this truth should be graved indelibly on the heart of mankind—THERE CAN BE NO TRUE CIVILIZATION UNTIL ALL MEN ARE CIVILIZED. It is not civilization when a few spirits of brilliant gifts rise up far above their fellows, and by their own resplendence make doubly black the mass of benighted, imbruted humanity beneath them. Such minds are but rockets that leave a denser blackness than they found. No—civilization is only a mockery and a lie, when it offers side by side the palace and the hovel, vast knowledge and blank ignorance, saintly virtue and desperate wickedness,—when it establishes an aristocracy of wealth or rank, or of mental or spiritual greatness, on the necks of poor, degraded, despairing millions. The civilizing forces are all baffled, until they can reach and elevate the enormous mass of still barbarous humanity, and make men and women of those who today are mere units for the census-takers, counting as apparent zero when the question is raised of intrinsic values. This is the problem of civilization—how to convert the barbarous hordes of humanity into an orderly, progressive society of valuable men and women. When the present condition of the world is compared with this ideal of civilization, you will, I think, agree with me that the world is today scarcely semi-civilized. In Guizot's phrase—"Civilization is as yet very young."

At the same time, when we compare the world's present state with the sketch I gave at the outset of primeval man, it is clear that great gain has been made. If man is not yet civilized, he is at least civilizing. In Egypt, in China, in Greece, in Rome, in Mexico, in Peru, and in other early centres of human development, we find that man emerged slowly out of antecedent barbarism, and attained a certain degree of civilization. The process continues today. Western Europe exhibits a development of civilization which is higher than any reached in the ancient world, and which, having extended across the Atlantic Ocean, promises to unfold itself here in course of time to an extent hitherto unparalleled. There can be no doubt of the fact that European and American civilization far outruns in point of universality, that is, in point of general diffusion, the finest civilizations of antiquity. It may indeed be questioned whether the nineteenth century can boast a finer intellect than that of Socrates or Plato or Aristotle; but it cannot be questioned that the average culture of this age, the average development of its intelligence and character, is higher than that of the most flourishing periods of Greece or Rome. It is really by this general average of intellectual and moral development that civilization must be measured; for this inevitably determines its political, social, and industrial aspect. Judged, therefore, by this standard, I count it a safe assertion to say that Europe and America, notwithstanding their lingering barbarisms, are more highly civilized than was either Greece or Rome; and it is equally true that their barbarisms are slowly melting away, like icebergs that are drifting down towards tropical seas. In fact, civilization is essentially a movement, an advance, an orderly progress, with constant laws and constant causes; and the poet did but state a scientific fact, when he sang—

"For, I doubt not, through the ages one increasing purpose runs,
And the thoughts of men are widened with the process of the suns."

Now it is a question of no slight importance—what are the causes of civilization? It touches our practical duty at many points; for whatever is a cause of civilization has a direct claim upon us all. The question which I have proposed as the topic of thought tonight—Is Christianity the Cause of Civilization?—is by no means a purely speculative one; for upon the answer to be given will depend our duty towards Christianity as an organized institution in the world. I cannot expect tonight to do more than open my subject, leaving its further treatment to succeeding lectures; but I should be glad to remove any impression that it has no bearing upon the real interests and duties of our life. If, on the one hand, the claim of Christians is a true one, that Christianity is the great cause of civilization, then you and I ought to do our utmost to propagate it; whereas, if it hinders, or partially helps and partially hinders civilization, then our duty towards it will be correspondingly modified.

Now it is plain that Christianity cannot possibly be regarded as the cause of all civilization, since various well-marked civilizations came into being long before the rise of Christianity. The social developments of Egypt, Assyria, India, China, Greece, Rome, and so forth, which were very remarkable advances upon the barbarous state of surrounding nations, evidently owed nothing to a religion which had no existence until many centuries later. The vague claim, therefore, so frequently put forth in behalf of Christianity, that it is the "cause of civilization," must be at least restricted, and acknowledged to be groundless so far as these vast outlying developments of humanity are concerned. Leaving out of the question, therefore, the ancient civilizations of Asia, Africa, and Europe, and the modern civilizations of Asia and Africa, upon which Christianity has scarcely produced an impression, the claim is reduced to this—Christianity is the cause of modern European and American civilization. That is, in substance, Europe and America, having far outstripped Asia, Africa, and Oceania in the race of progress, are indebted for the vast superiority they enjoy in this respect to the Christian religion. It is really, therefore, only this preponderance of civilization, this higher degree of development as compared with that of the Orient, for which credit can possibly be given to Christianity. It is quite possible, nay, it is certainly a fact, that this supposed superiority of European and American civilization over that of China, Japan, Arabia, and other Oriental countries, has been over-estimated; but, admitting that the West has indeed a real superiority over the East in point of actual development, it could only be claimed for Christianity that it is the cause, not of Western civilization as a whole, but only of that higher degree by which the civilization of the West excels that of the East.

The advocates of Christianity, however, never observe these distinctions or recognize these limitations, but boldly claim for it, at least by implication, the sole credit of having raised Europe out of the abyss of anarchy and misery, in which it was plunged at the fall of the Roman Empire, up to the heights of power and importance it now enjoys. Hence what is called Christian civilization is tacitly referred to Christianity as its sole cause; and all other causes are virtually denied by being left wholly out of sight. This species of assumption, by which the Christian priesthood arrogate to their religion a glory not its own, is characteristic of their order, and is one of the methods by which they "magnify their office."

Starting with the magnificent claim that "Christianity is the cause of civilization," these partial judges are first confronted with the fact that civilization is immensely older than Christianity, and cannot be caused by it any more than a father can be begotten by his own child. The first modification of the claim is therefore this—"Christianity is the cause of modern European and American civilization."

But since civilization exists in other parts of the world than Europe and America, and in no contemptible forms, they are confronted with another fact, namely, that other religions seem to be as competent to create appropriate civilizations as Christianity itself, which therefore cannot, at least in civilizing power, claim to differ from them except in degree. If all religions civilize, then religion in general is the civilizing agency, and not any particular form of it exclusively. The second modification of the claim is therefore this—"Christianity is the cause of the superiority which the civilization of Europe and America manifests over that of Asia and Africa."

But even this twice-modified claim, shorn as it is of its sweeping and high-sounding universality, is still vastly larger than the facts will warrant. It is a great assumption to claim that religion (in the popular sense of that word) is the sole cause of civilization, or even sole cause of the superiority which it exhibits over the various forms of pagan civilization. May there not be other causes concurring with Christianity to produce the enlightenment and high development of Christendom? Nay, is it not even an open question whether Christianity may not have retarded the progress of civilization, and proved a hindrance rather than a help to it? How do we know that mankind would not today be more civilized than they are in Europe and America, if they had never even heard of Christianity? Must it be taken for granted that the influence of the Christian religion has been always and everywhere for good, never for evil? Is it not at least possible that something other than Christianity is the true cause, or combination of causes, why Europe and America stand today so much higher than Asia and Africa in point of civilization? These questions are not empty cavils, but serious inquiries forced upon honest and thoughtful minds by the study of facts; and they compel the proud claim with which we started to assume at last the form of this modest interrogatory—"What place, if any, does Christianity hold among the true causes of Western civilization?"

This question is entitled to a respectful hearing and a patient investigation. I propose next Sunday evening to see what answer I can give to it.

THE SONG OF THE SHIRT.

BY GAIL HAMILTON, IN THE NEW YORK INDEPENDENT.

There is the great army of sewing-women, who, beyond question, are wretchedly paid. Equally beyond question is the wretchedness of their sewing. A good seamstress is as scarce as a good cook, and as sure of good wages. How many of these women who make shirts at six cents apiece know how to fashion under-garments tastefully, to cut them economically, to sew them neatly and strongly? What they do is the coarsest and most mechanical kind of sewing. When it comes to what is called family sewing, they are utterly deficient. There are plenty of mothers who would be eager to engage their services, if their services were worth engaging. Women at the heads of households are put to great inconvenience and annoyance for want of competent help at the needle; and the help they get is often so clumsy, shabby, and ineffective that it is a question whether it ought not to be called a hindrance. Let all women who design or who are forced to earn their living by their needle become skilled needle-women. Let them learn how to cut and fit and make all manner of clothing, outer and inner, coarse and fine; and then let us see whether they will be obliged to work at six cents a shirt.

But it is said they have no opportunity to learn this. They are poor, and have neither time nor teachers for anything but the plainest work. Undoubtedly this may be true; but it has nothing whatever to do with the question. The world does not ask how its servants came to be ignorant; but, are they wise? It wants ability, not reasons for inability. It may not be a woman's fault that her work is poor; but she must not expect to get the same price for it as if it were good. This law is inexorable. Man did not make it, and man cannot unmake it.

Here, also, comes in the necessity of doing the work which society wants done. There is just so much serving to be done; so much family sewing that needs trained hands; so much slop-work sewing, that untrained hands can make shift to do. The trained hands are few, and they command the market. They are called fashionable milliners or dress-makers. They open shops; they set up clothing establishments; they ask great, perhaps exorbitant, prices; and they make fortunes. The untrained hands are many, and are at the mercy of the market. They must take what they can get. Because they are many, there is competition; and starvation wages follow. There being only so much coarse work to be done, the greater the number of workers the greater the subdivision of wages. There being so much fine work to do, the fewer the workmen the larger portion of wages to each one. If the woman is dissatisfied with making shirts at six cents apiece, let her make dresses at fifteen dollars. But she does not know how. What, then, is she complaining of? Must the employer who wants shirts and does not want dresses, pay for one and receive the other? No, it is said; but the employer who wants shirts made should pay a living price. Not in the least. Whether the price be living or dead is no affair of his. It is his solely to pay the sum necessary to get his work done. It is not a question of morality. It is a question of market price. You have no more right to demand of a man that he shall pay twelve cents for work which he can buy at six than he has to demand of you that you shall pay twelve dollars a barrel for flour when you can get it for five. Morality and philanthropy and sentimentality are entirely out of place here. They may come in to relieve individual suffering; but they contribute nothing to the solution of the problem. We pay for things what they are worth. Extra price for extra quality. Extra price for common quality may be charity or short-sightedness; but it is not trade. Trade is a law unto itself. It needs no outside interference. The fashionable dressmaker or the noted lawyer demands exorbitant prices. The remedy is at hand—you need not employ them. If they are really exorbitant, the withdrawal of patronage will speedily bring them to terms. If they are so skilful that you must employ them, then their terms are not exorbitant. For their signal skill they have a right to demand signal wages; and you have no more right to say that they shall bring their style and their sagacity to a cheaper market than you have to demand that the owner of a coal-mine shall distribute his coal round among the poor, or sell it to workmen at half price.

The suit lately brought by a dressmaker to recover the amount of her bill from a customer exactly illustrates my meaning. I know nothing of either party to the suit. Both may be innocent of any wrong intent toward each other. Two thousand dollars seems a large sum for a dressmaking bill; but I, for one, am heartily glad when any woman is so skilful in any honorable calling that she controls the market, and dares charge high prices. She has precisely the same right to do it that the great lawyer has to charge high fees. He does not necessarily bestow more thought on his cases than his lowlier brother; but he is paid for his ability to do more work with less thought. The city dressmaker puts no more stitches into her gown than the country dressmaker; but she charges for the je-ne-sais-quoi—which is born, not made. Of course she may abuse her gift, and make fraudulent charges; she may want an extra fifty dollars on Saturday night, glance over her account-book, and assess that sum upon two or three of her rich and careless customers. That is simple dishonesty. So the hotel-keeper charges carriage-hire to guests who have ordered no carriage. If they protest, he says it was a mistake, and remits the fine. If they do not notice it, he gains his five or ten dollars. It is only a mode of theft. But it is not theft for a woman to put upon her work as high a valuation as it will bear. It is, public as well as personal service. Every woman who demands a high price on what she has to sell, and gets it, benefits every other woman who has anything to sell. Nor does she injure any one. For the women who cannot afford to buy their dresses and bonnets can make their own. Style is a luxury, not a necessity. A woman is under no obligation to wear a Worth gown, nor is there real bitterness to the pain of going through life without it.

The Harvard Advocate popularizes science in this poetic fashion:—

TO PUPILS IN ELOCUTION.
The human lungs reverberate sometimes with great velocity,
When windy individuals indulge in much verbosity.
They have to twirl the glottis sixty thousand times a minute,
And push and punch the diaphragm as though the dance was in it.

CHORUS.
The pharynx now goes up;
The larynx, with a slam,
Ejects a note
From out the throat,
Pushed by the diaphragm.

At a club of which Jerrold was a member, a fierce Jacobite, and a friend as fierce of the cause of William the Third, were arguing noisily, and disturbing less excitable conversationalists. At length the Jacobite, a brawny Scot, brought his fist down heavily upon the table, and roared at his adversary: "I tell you what it is, sir, I spit upon your King William!"

The friend of the Prince of Orange was not to be out-mustered by mere lungs. He rose and roared back to the Jacobite:

"And I, sir, spit upon your James the Second!"

Jerrold, who had been listening to the uproar in silence, hereupon rung the bell, and shouted:

"Waiter, spittoons for two!"

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"Being a young man of infidel parentage, and reared in hearing distance of orthodox pleadings for the redemption of souls—to be damned or saved—conscience has long since revolted against such ideas of religion of older manufacture. Today we comprise a fair body of free-thinkers, organizable at any time; and feeling an interest in the cause of Free Religion, it has been my mission to encourage as much as possible an organization in—. We have in our midst a number of Atheists who would not object to joining a Free Religious Association, and these, with many Deists and luke-warm church adherents, in time might become a power for the removal of superstition and bigotry, root and branch. We look forward to this end, having already consulted the means in our possession, which are ample for the construction of a suitable building and the purchase of a good library. And, at a time when an interest should be awakened more fully, would it be possible for you to visit our district, and give us a series of lectures, directing and encouraging our movements towards the completion of such an organization? Furthermore, we have no house in which to hold a meeting, save a tolerably large-sized school-house; and this circumstance suggests the postponement of our meeting until next summer, when we shall think of meeting in the grove near—. It is my conviction that the feeling for the welfare of our cause will never ensure much good for it until some active movement is made. All the numbers of THE INDEX received, with the ten copies containing your lecture on War and Free Religion, have been circulated. And now we are soliciting subscribers upon their knowledge of what THE INDEX is. Suffice it to say it is well appreciated."

"Find enclosed fifty cents, for which I wish you to send me as many numbers of THE INDEX containing the report of the Cincinnati Convention as you can afford to. Your essay on the Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition I consider a God-send. It contains more unvarnished truth than it has been my good fortune ever to see embodied in one discourse. I wish there were enough bombshells, such as attended that Convention, to have one explode every day in a year, and every year in a century, in every town and hamlet on the continent; in that time, I am inclined to think, superstition would be somewhat crippled."

"I got into quite a scrape some time since by simply giving an INDEX to an ex-Judge of our county. He was my attorney, and expressed liberal views to me in private conversation; so I handed him an INDEX,—the one with a comment on the European war,—whereupon he went and told my moneyed friends that I was an Infidel, had given him a Western paper that surprised him very much, and further told them that all my projects would fail me on that account. So I find I must keep quiet just now, but if I had a little help financially, I would blow my horn as loud as I choose."

"I am a Spiritualist, and wish you God-speed in your undertaking in trying to free humanity from the blighting curse of ecclesiastical bondage."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—Regular meetings of this Society will be held during the winter on Sunday forenoons, at 10½ o'clock, in Daniels' Block, corner of Jefferson and Summit Streets, in the hall over the U. S. Express Office. The public are cordially invited.

RADICAL CLUB.—The Club will meet regularly on Sunday evenings, at 7½ o'clock, in the same place. Subject of discussion:—"What practical good is promised by radicalism in religion?"

FREE EVENING SCHOOLS.—The school for men and boys is held Monday, Wednesday, and Friday Evenings, from 7 to 9, in the hall over the U. S. Express Office, Daniels' Block. The schools for women and girls are held at the same time in Scott's Block, Cherry street; in Campbell's Block, St. Clair street; and at the Oliver House.

RECEIVED.

A CATALOGUE OF THE OFFICERS AND STUDENTS OF HARVARD UNIVERSITY, for the Academic Year, 1870—1871. Cambridge: RIVERSIDE PRESS. 1870. pp. 116.

THE YEAR BOOK OF THE UNITARIAN CONGREGATIONAL CHURCHES FOR 1871. With Calendar Adapted for Use throughout the Country. Boston: AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION. 42 Chauncey Street. pp., 72.

PUCK'S NIGHTLY PRANKS. Illustrated by PAUL KONEWKA. Translated from the German of LUDWIG BUND, by CHARLES T. BROOKS. Boston: ROBERTS BROTHERS. 1871.

THE YOUNG PILOT. An Original Monthly Magazine for Young People in their Teens. January, 1871. $1.00 per annum. Single Copy, 10 cents. Chicago: THE YOUNG PILOT PUBLISHING COMPANY.

Poetry.

RHYMES.

BY W. H. S., IN THE WASHINGTON (D. C.) ICONOCLAST.

You cannot see to-day, dear friend,
As I, no more than I as you:
Our ways were different, and the end
They followed quite as different too.

One of us grew an Infidel,
And one a Presbyterian grew;
But wherefore quarrel? Who can tell,
Unless we reason, which is true?

But for the accident of birth
We might be now Mohammedan;
Then why not, on this pleasant earth,
Be kind and tolerant, man to man?

Am I a dead, unfeeling clod,
Because I honestly may doubt?
Or you, because of "serving God,"
A bigot blind with prayer and shout?

Ah! we have human hearts the same,
And honesty of intellect;
It therefore were vain pride and shame,
To claim all false we now reject.

Then let us each our views exchange,
Desiring nought but truth be found;
Each with the other's thoughts, 'twere strange,
If then we reached no common ground.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 12, 1870.

The Index.

JANUARY 7, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

Contributors are requested to write on only one side of each sheet.

VOLUME FIRST OF THE INDEX.

The republication of our missing numbers is now completed, and the papers are in the hands of the binder. It is expected that the bound volumes will be ready for distribution within three weeks. Copies subscribed for, but not paid for at that time, will be regarded as no longer desired; and they will be held subject to new orders, which are rapidly coming in, and will be filled in the order of their reception. In every case, the present address in full—post-office, county, and State—should accompany the remittance ($2.50).

We commence in the present number of THE INDEX a series of three lectures on the relation of Christianity to Civilization.

"THE poorest education," says Sterling, "that teaches self-control is better than the best that neglects it."

In accordance with our request, large numbers of names have been kindly forwarded to us to which THE INDEX will be sent FREE for the month of January. Persons thus receiving the paper will please give it a candid examination, which is all we ask. If they like it, we shall be gratified to receive their subscriptions for the year 1871. If not, the paper will be promptly stopped at the end of the month. No one is expected to pay for these four numbers; and we shall be glad to receive as many lists of names for this purpose as our friends can find leisure to transmit. We cannot help expressing here the great pleasure it gives us to read so many words of hearty encouragement as our old subscribers send with their renewed subscriptions. If it were possible, we would make a personal response in each and every case; but the pressure of unavoidable work compels us to express in this general way a gratitude which we hope will be visible in the improvement of THE INDEX.

UNIVERSITIES—SECTARIAN OR SECULAR?

Our readers will, we think, be interested by a communication in the present issue of THE INDEX from Rev. Mr. Howard, with whose name they are already acquainted as the writer of several well-written articles in these columns. The present article is a fair and dispassionate criticism of what we have recently said concerning the relation of Cornell University to Christianity. In compliance with the courteous request at its close, we proceed to consider the points raised by our correspondent.

1. Mr. Howard avows himself in favor of "denominational," as opposed to "secular," colleges; although, if we understand him aright, he would not object to "absolutely impartial" criticism of Christianity even in these. In the case of a "full-fledged university," however, he would not insist that it should be denominational.

Now impartial criticism of Christianity would be simply impossible in denominational or sectarian colleges. Consider the necessities of the case. No college would be denominational which should appoint professors without regard to their religious opinions. From its very nature as a denominational institution, every such college must be supposed to appoint only Christian professors—men who are already pledged to the private and public support of Christianity. Very likely men thus pledged could be found who would criticise Christianity from an inside point of view, as Guizot has done in his great "History of Civilization." But no man thus pledged could be found who would criticise it except under the influence and bias of his previous committal to its cause. Is not this a self-evident fact? What Roman Catholic ever criticised Romanism in an "absolutely impartial" manner? What Protestant ever thus criticised Protestantism? Or, in general, what Christian ever thus criticised Christianity? It is our profound conviction that a criticism of Christianity truly impartial is only possible from an outside point of view. Whoever would be free from the secret bias referred to must pay the price of freedom, and come to the critic's work uninfluenced by the necessity of reconciling his criticism with his own publicly avowed adhesion to Christianity. The unconscious working of this bias, even in extremely radical minds, has so frequently and so plainly appeared to us, that a stand unequivocally outside of Christianity is, in our opinion, the absolutely necessary condition of an impartial estimate of it. Hence the practical impossibility of securing such criticism in any denominational college. The necessity of securing it, however, in any institution devoted to the study of all truth and the acquisition of all knowledge, is evident to every clear and unprejudiced thinker, and becomes the unanswerable objection, not only to denominational colleges, but even to the position assumed by Cornell University, which forbids all free instruction on this subject. The grand promise of Mr. Cornell to found a university "in which any person may find instruction in any study," will remain unredeemed so long as the scientific study of Christianity is virtually prohibited.

The point incidentally raised by Mr. Howard, that Christianity must not be held responsible for the doings of the Church, we cannot now pause to consider. We must content ourselves at present with simply stating our own conviction, that the only true method of studying the real spirit and tendencies of Christianity or any other religion is to study them in the actual working of the institutions it creates, and that to adopt any other than this, the historical method, is to be unscholarly, unphilosophical, and unscientific.

2. Mr. Howard thinks it unjust to regard Christianity as an oppressive superstition merely because its vast and wide-spread influence prevents even State universities from being consistently secular; and he holds that any other religion, though universally conceded to be the absolute truth, would involve the same result.

To this we must reply that any religion, Free Religion included, that should produce this result, would be an oppressive superstition, and could not be the absolute truth. Christianity cannot secularize education, that is, render it entirely free, as is shown by Mr. Howard's preference for denominational colleges; and that is why we count it both oppressive and superstitious. But it is the direct object of Free Religion to educate mankind, not in colleges alone, but in every walk and phase of life, in absolute freedom; and it is not a supposable case that Free Religion could ever hinder that complete secularization of education at which it directly aims. Any religion that hinders it is superstitious and oppressive; and if it can be shown that this is the tendency of Free Religion, we will unhesitatingly drop the "Religion," and cleave to the "Free."

The trouble is that Christianity does not dare to put itself on an absolute equality with other faiths, and leave science and philosophy to decide between them. Hence it always wants control of educational institutions. Catholicism shows this desire most strongly; Protestantism somewhat more feebly, as is natural. Even Mr. Howard, liberal and fair-minded as he is, shows it to some extent, in his predilection in favor of denominational colleges. Now in calling Christianity "superstitious," we mean that educated or "half-rationalized superstition" which we have elsewhere described as the essence of dogmatism; for we do not agree with Mr. Howard that superstition is "always ignorant, malignant and soulless." On the contrary, it is often cultivated, well-intentioned, and very earnest; as in the case of very many Roman Catholics. In fact, it is this more polished form of it which is most dangerous to liberty in these modern days; it is the devil disguising himself as a child of light. Superstition is thus a potent enemy in America to all that promises a thorough secularization or emancipation of our universities; and if we have ventured to give it its true name, CHRISTIANITY, it has not been in mockery or defiance, but in a deep desire to benefit our fellow-men.

MR. TILTON'S WITHDRAWAL.

To the surprise of the public, Mr. Theodore Tilton has announced his retirement from the editorship of the New York Independent, which is assumed by the proprietor of the paper. Conjectures as to the meaning of this change are useless, though the rumored offering of the vacant post to Rev. Gilbert Haven, of Boston, seems to point to a backward lurch in the Independent's career. If Mr. Bowen contemplates retrogression towards a more stringent orthodoxy (perhaps we should drop the adjective, for the Independent's orthodoxy has been of late an imaginany quantity), we suspect the change will prove a financial failure. It ought to. Mr. Tilton has made the paper under his charge progressive and liberal, and we regret his retirement from a post of such wide and salutary influence. In fact, the fresh and bold tone of his editorials has contrasted favorably with the stifled utterance of papers whose theology is professedly more "liberal;" and for a long time we have regarded the Independent as the truest representative in America of "Liberal Christianity." Its whole attitude towards "heresy," even in its extremest forms, has been far more generous than that of any other "orthodox," and even any Unitarian or Universalist, sheet. THE INDEX, in particular, takes this opportunity to express its warm and grateful appreciation of the treatment it has received from the Independent, and to wish Mr. Tilton better "friends" than Mr. Bowen and a better position than the one he now leaves.

Since the above was in type, we learn that Mr. Johnson likewise retires with Mr. Tilton. Is there to be a general weeding-out of all that is living, earnest, and able from the editorial corps? It will be hard, indeed, to supply the loss of such a man as Oliver Johnson. The Independent bids fair to become a squeezed orange.

CRITICAL COUNSEL.

It is ungracious to decline good advice, but the measure of the ungraciousness must be determined in some degree by the pertinency of the advice. One who is conscious of rather dreading than otherwise the extreme principles of individualism is guilty of no disrespect, if he pays little heed to the censor who warns him against them. And one who abhors the theory of free passion, may be excused from lending an ear to the moralist who bids him beware of promulgating it. Our friends are taking great pains to induce us "to see ourselves as others see us." But if others do not see us as we see ourselves, their effort must result in a corresponding effort on our part to bring about this very important preliminary understanding. The Liberal Christian is at present exercising itself to tell us what we think and propose, or rather what it is incumbent on us to think and propose, in the Free Religious Association, and on what conditions we can gain the public respect and justify our claim to exist. This it does, in two articles entitled "American Secularism and its Opportunity," which appeared in the issues of December 10th and 17th. The papers are kindly in temper, and well written; that they are not encouraging in tone is owing to the vast difference existing between its estimate of the work assigned us, and its judgment of our ability to perform it. We should be discouraged, too, if, accepting its opinion of our capacity, we shared its opinion of our mission. Fortunately for the Free Religious Association, which is the subject of the articles in question, it is not compelled to accept the position so heroically assigned to it.

The members of that Association are simply not Secularists, nor in any sense representatives of Secularism; and consequently they are not responsible for discharging the special tasks which Secularism undertakes. The Free Religious Association is, as its name implies, a RELIGIOUS organization; exactly what Secularism is not. As its name implies, Secularism declines all concern about religion. It professes no belief in God, in a spiritual world, in a spiritual nature, in a spiritual development, culture, or destiny. It aims at the discovery of no religious truth, at the maintenance of no religious worship, at the institution of no religious instruction or discipline. It is avowedly secular in intention and purpose, concerned with this world only, and with the arrangements of this world. Its studies are in social science, the laws of health and wealth and well-being. The problems it tries to solve are the problems that concern the working man, industry, capital, economy and such like. These it regards as the only problems that should interest truly earnest people. It declares that it knows nothing about the soul or its destinies; and it does not concern itself with matters it cannot fairly lay hold on. Dwellers in time must attend to the affairs of time. Inhabitants of the earth will find enough to do to make the earth a decent place to live in, by abolishing intemperance, profligacy, prodigality, licentiousness, and the other forms of social iniquity, that hinder the progress of mankind in comfort, prosperity and temporal felicity.

The Free Religious Association, instituted for "the scientific study of theology" and for the promotion of "fellowship in the spirit," having very different beliefs, has also very different intentions. Its business is to cultivate the religious sentiment, develop the religious nature, and deepen, extend, and beautify the religious life. Its general purpose is essentially the same with that professed by all churches, namely, to make religious men; and its sole peculiarity consists in the more elastic, comprehensive, and, it thinks, the more rational methods it adopts to fulfil this great end. It aims at the restatement of religious truths, the revision of beliefs, the enlargement of rational and spiritual views, the removal of dogmatical and sectarian scales from "Christian" and other eyes. Surely, this is a legitimate occupation, one of sufficient magnitude to employ a much greater number of men, and one of sufficient importance to justify the existence of a much larger association.

The Free Religious Association has no more concern with intemperance, prostitution, pauperism, education, than other religious organizations have, and cannot fairly be held committed to more successful operations than theirs. Should its efforts at making men more self-respecting, earnest, aspiring, kind, humane, prosper better on account of its better system of culture, the blessing will be felt throughout society, even among the passionate, the foolish, the weak. But beyond that, their immediate responsibility as an Association does not necessarily extend. Members of the Association, being less interested in ecclesiastical work, will naturally concern themselves more with human want, suffering, disease, and sorrow. The freer movement of their minds, the wider sweep of their sympathies, will help them to devise more sensible and scientific plans for the remedy of social evils. But the Association as such does not undertake the labors of philanthropy or reform.

Long, sad, and bitter experience suggests doubt in regard to the ability of any religious organizations to do such work as this well. The writer in the Liberal Christian is of opinion that philanthropic and charitable work, work of social reform, ought to be done by the Church; and thinks that the failure of the Church to do it is owing to the clumsiness of ecclesiastical machinery. May it not be due to the fact that the Church is really trying to do something else, namely, develop the spiritual nature of man? The failure of the Church to deal successfully with practical social problems, is signal and fearful to consider. The Church of Rome has not only hugely increased the evils to be removed, but by its disastrous methods has made the problems all but insoluble, and even done much to demoralize the working powers of sympathy and reason. Protestantism has, on the whole, done not much better, being unable to release itself from the traditions of Romanism in this business, and having devised no system of its own.

The muddle has at length become so inextricable, that sensible people are looking now to social science, political economy, civilizing forces, secularism, to take up and carry on the tasks which religion has tried its 'prentice hand on so long and with such lamentable results. The "free religionist" is willing to admit his incapacity, as a religionist, to deal with these complicated and difficult matters. His confidence is in economical and social science, and he looks encouragingly, applaudingly and eagerly on while these new ministries attempt the noble task of building up society on natural principles.

Is not this statement plain? Is there the least need of misunderstanding it? Is there the slightest necessity for misrepresenting it? Is there any call for the remark that we "are playing with what they call Free Religion"? Is there any justification for the demand that we shall "make a very great change in our attitude and methods of work?" Is there any propriety in solemnly reminding us of "the incalculable toil and hardship and sacrifice required for apostleship in a cause" that we never professed and do not pledge ourselves to adopt? The charge of "great recklessness of statement" may or may not be justly brought against the Free Religionists. It certainly lies heavily against those who first fasten on them ideas they repudiate, and then hold them committed to duties they decline.

It is to be hoped that the time will come in the religious history of the world, when criticism and judgment will be synonymous terms; when passing verdicts will be the same thing with telling the truth. That time is very remote indeed. And, unhappily, the people who, from their ability, intelligence, and position, should hasten it, seem to be lending their influence to keep it back.

O. B. F.

THE NEW MYSTERY.

Paul, in his Epistles, has a good deal to say about a certain "mystery" connected with the introduction of Christianity. This mystery was the inclusion of the Gentiles in the fellowship of the new religion. To the Jews, proud of their ecclesiastical traditions, educated to believe that they were the peculiar people of God, and that God had revealed himself specially to them, and that all the rest of the world were idolaters, this doctrine of Paul was, indeed, a mystery. The main body of the Jews could not comprehend it and refused to accept it. It seemed to them directly contrary to the whole tenor of their religion.

And this doctrine, that the separating wall between Jews and Gentiles was to be removed and that all were to come together in the unity of one faith (without the Gentiles being required to accept the obligations of Judaism), was, in fact, to the Hebrew religion a proclamation of revolution. It was hardly less than this to nascent Christianity. For the evidence is very strong, that, before Paul, the Christian movement was in danger of being confined to the formation of a new Jewish sect; that it was little more than a reformed and liberal Judaism. It has been truly said that with Paul Christianity effected "a change of base." This revolt from the exclusive authority of the Hebrew faith, this declaration that God had been working out his purposes among the Gentiles also, and that Jew and Gentile were through Christ to be brought together upon common and equal ground,—this to the Jew was the "mystery" of Paul's preaching.

We have come in this day, in the history of religious progress, to a similar mystery. Looking at Christendom alone, there are many persons who are beginning to see that God has not confined his revelation and activity during these eighteen last centuries among Christians; that, before the Christian era and since, he has been working out his thought and purposes also through religions and nations called heathen; that there is no people who can claim that God is peculiarly their God and has spoken through them his special authoritative word for all mankind; and that the various peoples and faiths of the earth, abandoning their notion of possessing an exclusive revelation from God, are gradually to be drawn together on the common and equal ground of their humanity. The Christian finds that not only the Jew, but the Mohammedan, the Parsee, the Buddhist, make precisely the same claim which he makes,—that God has made a special revelation in his religion. And, on comparing the revelations, it is found that God has been speaking all round, and that the words uttered have been everywhere essentially the same; and that there is really no wall separating the religions, but only a wall between nations and races,—a wall, however, which divine truth and love are free to pass, and which religion, when left free, must gradually wear away, until mankind shall be brought into one fellowship. But this doctrine is a great mystery to one who still believes that Christians have an exclusive knowledge of the true God, and that to them has been given the one way of salvation for man. It is a doctrine that revolutionizes all claims to specific authority that are made for any religion. It is the "mystery" of this new era of religious freedom,

W. J. P.

CALL FOR A NATIONAL SUFFRAGE CONVENTION AT WASHINGTON.

[We cheerfully comply with the request of the Revolution to "friendly Editors," and print this call.—Ed.]

We, the undersigned, desiring to secure a full discussion of the question of the enfranchisement of women during the present session of Congress, with a view to the speedy passage of a sixteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution, invite all men and women desiring this change in the Constitution to meet us in convention for that purpose in the city of Washington on the 11th and 12th of January next. Eminent speakers will be present from all parts of the country, including several members of Congress, and plans of work will be presented and discussed.

We earnestly urge you, dear friends, to come together at this time in a spirit of unselfishness and of hard work, and let us take one another by the hand and move onward as never before.

PAULINA W. DAVIS,
JOSEPHINE S. GRIFFING,
ISABELLA B. HOOKER.

N. B.—All letters concerning this convention may be addressed to

MRS. ISABELLA B. HOOKER,
Hartford, Conn.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

THE ILLIBERALISM OF SECTARIAN COLLEGES.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 22, 1870.

MR. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—Please find enclosed two dollars to pay for one year's subscription to THE INDEX. I am much pleased with the paper, and especially with your refusal to be classed as a Christian. If religion be natural to man, the religious element of the Mohammedan or Buddhist faith is just as precious and just as much to be commended as the same element in the Christian faith. Refusing to confine your sympathies to one class of good men, you ascend to the higher plane where are found those noble sons of humanity who, though differing in form, are one in the substance of their faith. Though I am inclined to think that the religions are a temporary phase of humanity, I honor you for your ability to rise above the prejudices of race and creed.

In a momentary conversation which I had with you recently, I referred to the rejection of my name by the authorities of Berea College, because of my position on the Bible question last spring. I declined having any publication made until I was more assured of the facts. My statement was substantially true. My name was proposed for the Chair of Physics, but withdrawn when a statement was made that I had delivered an anti-Bible speech.

The statement was not true, for I made no speech on the subject. If I had, however, it would certainly have been anti-Bible. The matter is of small importance, and I seek no notoriety in connection with it, but send it to you to add to the thousands of points of evidence which show that our higher schools are all in the hands of the clergy, and are controlled in the interests of ecclesiasticism. How important it then becomes to guard the common schools!

Very truly yours,

PETER H. CLARK.

CORNELL UNIVERSITY.

MR. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—Logically I think you have somewhat the advantage of your friend and correspondent, Prof. Russel. I think you have made it plain:—

1. That Cornell University is in a measure committed in favor of Religion, and—
2. Somewhat committed in favor of the Christian Religion.

My differences with you would be two:—

1. I am in favor of denominational colleges, as against State institutions, which must in the very nature of the case be secular. And yet, in the case of a full-fledged university, I would not be so strenuous on this point. In the meantime, however, permit me to say that, provided always we could obtain a critic and teacher of absolute impartiality, nothing would please me better than that he should be left at perfect liberty (if in the department of history or ethics, for example, as you suggest) to point out the errors, if any, as well as the excellences—the evil as well as the beneficent results—of Christianity to the world; satisfied, as I am, that, thus treated, Christianity would most abundantly and gloriously vindicate itself. If it could not, then I should certainly say, let it fall! It would deserve to. All we ask on behalf of Christianity, at the hands of critics, is exact and equal justice. We are proud of its record, and have reason to be. Associated as its progress has always been with that of science, civilization and law, the impartial interpreter of history could afford, in this field in particular, a most complete refutation of the aspersions that from time to time have been made upon it,—a refutation, meantime, that would be victorious and unanswerable, of course, just in proportion as it was understood that it was the result of inquiries conducted with a perfectly judicial spirit. No one denies that the Church has been responsible in times past for gross evils—for intolerance, oppression, and nameless wrongs; but the Church and Christianity are by no means necessarily identical. Christianity can in justice, be no more held accountable for all the abuses that lie justly at the door of the Church, than the American doctrine of Freedom can be held accountable for all the iniquities and political heresies of the Slave Power.

2. Can you justly charge that, because the religion of the country has so entered into, and so controls, the organic life of American society as to render it practically impossible for even a State institution of learning to be absolutely secular,—absolutely neutral with regard to the matter of religion,—can you on that account justly charge that that religion is necessarily a vast, oppressive, and crushing "superstition"? Any religion, though the perfection of truth by universal consent, in case it had gained any such ascendancy over the minds of the people as Christianity has in this country, would involve the same results. You may say, if you please, (as indeed you do, and prove), that the authorities of our would-be, and ostensibly secular institutions are guilty of inconsistency. But when you come still further to infer that, because this state of things exists, the dominant religion of the land which necessitates this state of things is a vast superstition, I should certainly plead—non sequitur. In behalf of this religion, or of those who believe in it, and of the University that is compelled in some measure to yield to its vast influence, let me say—the very people who own that institution are, by an overwhelming majority, Christian. That is, they are at least Christian, as against Non-Christianity. And not only so. They conceive, from what they see and hear and learn from history and experience, that the most important vital results to the nation and the world are depending upon the final issue between Christianity and Non-Christianity. They consider,—nay, it is not a matter of mere opinion; they deeply feel,—that with Christianity goes everything; that it is indeed the hope of the world. Now then, holding these views, can they be justly charged with being the victims of superstition (which, you know, is always ignorant, malignant and soulless), because they provide and insist that in an institution which is their own property, no man shall be employed as instructor who is so committed to Non-Christianity as to render it morally certain that he will give his influence—"use his position," as Prof. Russel says, "as a point of attack against Christianity?"

Many readers, I am sure, would like to have you review the foregoing positions.

R. H. HOWARD.

SACRED AND PROFANE.

MR. EDITOR:—What is sacred? Everything which Orthodox theology teaches as true is held by them as sacred. We hear of the sacred Bible, the sacred Sabbath, the sacred Church, the sacred offices; in fact, everything relating to church polity or belief is held above scrutiny, and he who speaks disparagingly of their truth or dares to cast a doubt, is a base wretch unworthy of the respect of honorable men. But what in relation to the truths of the universe, in which our whole existence is enveloped, for weal or woe as we are in harmony with them? Nothing sacred here—all this is only profane. If Nature shows a universal and progressive material development, hiss it down, club it down, ridicule it down—any way to get it down; it is not according to our belief and "has no rights which we are bound to respect." What in relation to the truths of history, as they exhibit the age of the world and man's existence? All profane. They do not belong to our doctrine. Smother them down, hold them down; they shall not be tolerated when we have the power. What in relation to a man's sacred word and honor, a man's sacred character and reputation? There is no such thing. Only a Christian can possess such attributes, and he who does not wear them thus labelled is a base impostor and a hypocrite,—kick him down, keep him down. He is the most dangerous spirit of the times; and they wail:—

"—The times have been,
That, when the brains were out, the man would die,
And then an end; but now they rise again,
And push us from our stools. This is more strange
Than such a murder is."

And "this is the unkindest cut of all." To be pushed from their stools as undoubted teachers of the truth, to be deprived of authority over the minds and purses of men, is what starts their cry against the sacrilegious spirit of the age; and whoever questions their hereditary title always to rule men's consciences is branded as a defamer of all that is good. How can men who search for truth without the hope of a future reward or the fear of an endless hell respect an adversary who thus meets them, or listen to the statements of one whose daily bread depends upon maintaining his dogmas safe behind the sacred battlements of superstition? Superstition is sacred. Knowledge is profane.

ADEL, IOWA.

S. H. J.

CHARACTER THE RESULT OF ORGANIZATION.

LAWRENCE, KANSAS, Dec. 20, 1870.

MR. ABBOT:—A kind sister, who a few years ago was much concerned about my heretical opinions, has had sent to me for the last six months THE INDEX—the first intelligence that I had of her transition from the "freedom wherewith Christ had made her free" to that real freedom that dares to think and to reason.

Well, I like it; and although it is small, yet I can say for it what I cannot for any other paper that I know, namely, that it contains nothing but what is worth reading,—and herewith you will find the subscription price for another year. While American slavery existed, I deemed that the all-engrossing question that required our attention. But now that physical slavery is abolished, I feel that mental slavery is the next great foe of the human race. Our priestly "would-be" masters that fasten their shackles upon the human mind—bribe it with heaven and castigate it with hell, to do their bidding, feed, clothe, and endow them with power—must be deposed; and while I live, "Necessity" is laid upon me to do what I can towards this end.

And here let me say that I am glad that THE INDEX has grappled with the question of "Necessity." I consider it the great question of the time. It underlies the entire structure of society, our laws, and jurisprudence. Could we believe that mankind are as much the subjects of circumstances and surroundings as they are of choice, what a lesson of charity would it teach us,—what a different animus it would impart to our efforts of reform! The question of moral freedom is one that I have thought much about, and my convictions are that our moral freedom exists only in imagination. We may canvass motives, but are just as much subject to the force of the strongest motives as the germ is to the force of heat and moisture. Now I have read what you have written upon the subject, and by no means undervalue your arguments. The "conscience" you speak of (which is but a creature of education) I consider but a witness of the struggle between right and wrong. The fact that my conscience disapproves of my acts does not prove to my mind that I could have acted differently. Our moral natures may be overborne and subjugated by our evil natures, just as good men are overborne by bad, though conscience stands by and protests; or our moral feelings may be latent and undeveloped. Do you not believe that men may be so completely under the control of the passion for strong drink, that nothing within them can resist the appetite? That frequently, although they know and deplore their condition, with all the outside assistance that can be rendered, they cannot help themselves? May not other vices and passions be as strong,—such as love of money, revenge, hate, and so forth? If the acts of individuals in a state of intoxication are not justly considered their own, why may we not so consider the acts of excited passions? One seems to me as much intoxicated as the other. We well know that when the mind is unduly excited, it has lost its balance, and is not in a normal condition, frequently falling into real insanity; and as wild, incoherent acts are evidence of mental derangement, so is crime evidence of moral malformation of the soul. Can a man be perfectly balanced in his mental and moral faculties, and be a criminal? Could you, Mr. Abbot, commit any of the great crimes that are being perpetrated daily? You may reply that you could, if you were disposed to; but just there is the rub. You could not be disposed to; and now, by the same logic, may we not infer that the criminal could not be otherwise disposed? If I had never used my right hand, my left would take its place. So with man. If his moral nature has not been developed and educated, his evil nature usurps the power. Many criminals evince no appreciation of their crimes, which is evidence of a moral obliquity. If crime be a possibility with the perfect man, then nothing is on a secure basis; then man possesses the elements of self-destruction that may forever negate all our efforts for his redemption from sin.

I think you believe that the physical world is under the laws of causation. Now is not the moral world just as much subject to law and order as the physical? Is that left to an erratic and hap-hazard course? I see no occasion to make a break in the chain. The idea that human feelings and actions are without a compelling cause, savors too much of the extraordinary acts of that being that created the universe out of nothing. I believe in an unbroken chain of cause and effect, as far back as the mind can penetrate; and any attempt to master the original cause will be like a man trying to lift himself off the ground by his collar. I believe also that mind and moral feeling is a "thing," just as much "matter" as the hand or the foot, but in a highly attenuated and sublimated form—perhaps the ultimate form of matter. Not only do I come to this conclusion by many analogies in nature, but also from the development of Spiritualism and Mesmerism. With me this is the key that unlocks their mysteries. I cannot believe in such a "thing" as "no-thing," and any "soul" or "spirit" that is not matter is as near "no-thing" as my imagination can get at it. It is just as impossible for men to be comely within as without; there must and will be just as much difference of mind as feature. The great error of theology and the Christian system has been in assuming that all men could think and believe alike; and hence it erected its iron bedstead whereon all men were to be laid, the long to be cut off and the short to be stretched out with theological knives and pulleys. We may yet find that it is just as wrong to hold men accountable for what they inherit morally as for what they inherit physically.

But, you will ask, does not all this tend to exculpate crime and abolish pains and penalties? Not a jot. It only teaches that the punishments society inflicts should be an expression of its abhorrence of crime, and not a gloating vengeance,—its conviction that the criminal is as great a misfortune to himself as he is to the community. Society exhibits nothing better in its treatment of criminals than they exhibit in themselves. Scaffolds and jails will stand until we teach the coming man that Truth and Righteousness is his God and his Salvation. There are those born into the world so deformed in body that the attendants are justified in destroying them. So there are those in the world so deformed in soul that society is justified—not in destroying them—but in protecting itself in the most humane manner that shall be sufficient. I do think there are some things in the New Testament which, if our vindictive clergy who follow Jesus (yet follow so far behind him that they can't hear a word he says) will not heed in any other way, should be branded into them with an iron heated in their own hell,—especially what Christ said to the adulterous woman, and Stephen's prayer. What a pitiful sight to see the disciples of the great Teacher, who pitied the infirmities of man, and abrogated the doctrine of "eye for eye," and so forth, glorifying and upholding the scaffold, and, when they have prayed away the sins of the culprit, got his robes washed white in the blood of the Lamb, complacently sending him to God, when it is just such saints as he we need here on earth—to say nothing of the injustice of hanging a "saint!" Oh, that doctrine of "forgiveness of sins!" It has brought a flood-tide of evil and crime.

I am sorry this article is so long. I know how you are crowded for room; but so important do I consider the subject, that had I but one last word to say to the world, I would say,—"Dear friends, you must study the first principles of man's being before you will ever succeed in redeeming him from sin and sorrow."

HENRY BRONSON.

PUBLICATIONS OF THE FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, on "The Idea of the Free Religious Association;" DAVID A. WASSON, on "The Nature of Religion;" MRS. E. D. CHENEY, on "Religion as a Social Force;" F. E. ABBOT, on "The Future of Religious Organization as affected by the Spirit of the Age;" S. JOHNSON, on "The Natural Sympathy of Religions;" RABBI WISE, on "The Universal Elements in Judaism;" COL. T. W. HIGGINSON, on "Mohammedanism;" WM. H. CHANNING, on "The Religions of China;" W. J. POTTER, on "The Religions of India;" and an abstract of a discussion on the "Relation of Religion to the Public School System of the United States." This Report is specially representative of the principles of the Association. Price 50 cents. In packages of five or more 30 cents each. Also CHANNING'S Address on "THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA," (a careful and instructive essay, of particular interest at this time to Americans) in a separate pamphlet for 20 cents.

The ANNUAL REPORT for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cents respectively), Rev. Samuel Johnson's essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cents), and an essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by WM. J. POTTER (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained by applying to the Secretary.

The Report for 1868 contains a letter from the celebrated Hindu Theist, KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, on the "Origin and Aims of the Brahmo Somaj," also an address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, on "Religion and Social Science;" a letter by M. D. CONWAY, on "Religious Movements in England," and speeches by JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLIER, CHARLES H. MALCOLM, JOHN WEISS, and others. The Report for 1869 has addresses by RALPH WALDO EMERSON, D. A. WASSON, JULIA WARD HOWE, C. A. BARTOL, PROF. DENTON, HORACE SEAVER, LUCY STONE, and others.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

SINGLE COPIES

OF

THE INDEX for 1870

Containing the following

ESSAYS,

Will be mailed from THE INDEX office (post-paid) on receipt of

FIVE CENTS:

	No.
The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion,	1
What is Free Religion?	3
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Corner-Stones,	4
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Institutions,	5
Terms of Fellowship, Social Ideal, Moral Ideal, and Essential spirit,	6
The Practical Work of Free Religion,	7
Unitarianism versus Freedom,	8
Sunday Schools,	9
Friendship,	10
The Miracle Question,	11
Grief and its Compensation,	12
The Hebrew Prophets,	13
Capital Punishment,	14
Human Ideals,	15
The Essence of Religion,	16
The Management of Children,	17
A Quaker's Letter to a Presbyterian, R. S. D.,	18
Comparison of Jesus and Socrates. (Report from the N. Y. Tribune),	19
The Candle of the Lord,	20
Public Opinion,	21
Conscience,	22
The Religion of Man,	23
"Following Christ,"	24
The "Fountain,"	25
The "Golden Age,"	26
What is Truth?	27
The Last Battle on the Creed Question,	28
Observance of the Sabbath, Rev. W. W. Williams,	29
The Sunday Question,	30
Motes and Beams,	31
The Dove's Departure,	32
The Bible in the Public Schools,	33
Religious Freedom,	34
A Plain Talk to Young Men,	35
Noise,	36
The Inability of Free Religion,	37
Chaos and Cosmos,	38
An Oration on Alexander Von Humboldt,	39
Relation of Spiritualism to Free Religion,	40
War and Free Religion,	41
Religious Revivals,	42
War and Martyr,	43
The Ministry of Free Religion,	44
"Repentance" and "Forgiveness,"	45
Spiritual Beauty,	46
The Book of Daniel,	47
The Unity of Spiritual Freedom and the Opportunity which America offers for its Development. W. J. Potter,	48
The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition,	49
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? Chas. Reemelin,	50
The Work of Radicalism in Indiana. J. O. Martin,	51
Religion in the Light of Reason and Common Sense. Isaac M. Wise,	52
Sunday—Its Uses and Abuses. Thomas Vickers,	53
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? E. Peckham,	54
Parties and Party Spirit,	55
The Future of Religious Organization, as Affected by the Spirit of the Age,	56
The Incarnation. A Christmas Discourse,	57
Transient and Permanent,	58

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Nature's Gifts, SCIENTIFICALLY DEVELOPED.

As mankind, from indiscretion or other causes, have been doomed to suffer from disease, so also has remedy for disease been provided. Our hills and valleys abound with roots and herbs, which if scientifically prepared and compounded, will restore health and vigor to the invalid. To find such a remedy we should seek one that has stood the test of age.

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

Sure Cure for Liver Complaint, Sure Cure for Dyspepsia, Sure Cure for Debility, Sure Cure for Jaundice, Sure Cure for Marasmus.
And all affections arising from weakness or want of action in the Liver or Digestive Organs. The great remedy for

IMPURE BLOOD, FEVER AND AGUE!

It is an impossibility for any one to have fever and ague, if they will use a few bottles of this remedy each spring and fall.

$100 $100 $100

Will be given for any case of this disease that occurs to any one that uses the Bitters or Tonic as a preventive.

Those who have the Fever and Ague will find, after the chills have stopped, that by using a few bottles of the Bitters or Tonic, the disease will not return.

These remedies will rebuild their Constitution faster than any other known remedy.

The remedies were placed before the public thirty years ago with all the prejudices of so-called "patent medicine" operating against them, but gradually their virtues became known and now, to day, they stand at the head of all preparations of their class, with the endorsement of eminent judges, lawyers, clergymen and physicians.

Read the following symptoms and if you find that your system is affected by any of them, you may rest assured that disease has commenced its attack on the most important organs of your body, and unless soon checked by the use of powerful remedies, a miserable life, soon terminating in death, will be the result.

Constipation, Flatulence, Inward Piles, Fullness of Blood to the Head, Acidity of the Stomach, Nausea, Heartburn, Disquiet for Food, Fullness or Weight in the Stomach, Sour Eructations, Sinking or Fluttering at the Pit of the Stomach, Swimming of the Head, Harried or Difficult Breathing, Fluttering at the Heart, Choking or Suffocating Sensations when in a lying posture, Dimness of Vision, Dots or Webs before the Sight, Dull Pain in the Head, Deficiency of Perspiration, Yellowness of the Skin and Eyes, Pain in the Side, Back, Chest, Limbs, etc., Sudden Flashes of Heat, Burning of the Flesh, Constant Imagining of Evil and Great Depression of Spirits

All indicate disease of the Liver or Digestive Organs, combined with impure blood.

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

is entirely vegetable and contains no liquor. It is a compound of Fluid Extracts. The Roots, Herbs and Barks from which these extracts are made, are gathered in Germany, all the medicinal virtues are extracted from them by a scientific chemist. These extracts are then forwarded to this country to be used expressly for the manufacture of this Bitters. There is no alcoholic substance of any kind used in compounding the Bitters; hence it is free from all the objections incident to the use of a liquor preparation.

Hooiland's German Tonic

Is a combination of all the Ingredients of the Bitters with the purest quality of Santa Cruz Rum, Oranges, &c. It is used for the same disease as the Bitters, in cases where some pure alcoholic stimulus is required.

TESTIMONY

Like the following was never before offered in behalf of any medical preparation:

HON. G. W. WOODWARD,
Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, writes

I find "Hooiland's German Bitters" is a good Tonic, useful in diseases of the digestive organs, and of great benefit in cases of debility and want of nervous action in the system.

Yours, truly,
GEORGE W. WOODWARD.

HON. JAMES THOMPSON,
Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, writes

I consider "Hooiland's German Bitters" a valuable medicine in cases of attacks of indigestion or Dyspepsia. I can certify this from my experience of it.

Yours, with respect,
JAMES THOMPSON.

HON. GEO. SIARSWOOD,
Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, writes

I have found by experience that "Hooiland's German Bitters" is a very good tonic, relieving dyspeptic symptoms almost directly.

Yours, truly,
GEO. SIARSWOOD.

HON. WM. F. ROGERS,
Mayor of the City of Buffalo, N. Y., writes

I have used "Hooiland's German Bitters and Tonic" in my family during the past year, and can recommend them as an excellent tonic, imparting tone and vigor to the system. Their use has been productive of decidedly beneficial effects.

WM. F. ROGERS.

HON. JAMES M. WOOD,
Ex-Mayor of Williamsport, Pennsylvania, writes

I take great pleasure in recommending "Hooiland's German Tonic" to any one who may be afflicted with dyspepsia. I had the dyspepsia so badly that it was impossible to keep any food on my stomach, and I became so weak as not to be able to walk half a mile. Two bottles of Tonic effected a perfect cure.

JAMES M. WOOD.

JOHN EUTERMARKS, ESQ.,
Law Partner of Judge Maynard, Williamsport, Pennsylvania, writes

This is to certify that I have used "Hooiland's German Bitters" for dyspepsia, and found it an invaluable remedy.

CAUTION.—Hooiland's German Bitters are counterfeited. See the signature of C. M. JACKSON is on the wrapper of each bottle. All others are counterfeit.

Principal Office and Manufactory at the German Medicine Store, No. 631 ARCH STREET, Philadelphia, Pa.

CHAS. M. EVANS, Prop'r.

(Formerly of C. M. JACKSON & CO.)

Prices.—Hooiland's German Bitters, per bottle, $1; Hooiland's German Bitters, half doz., $5; Hooiland's German Tonic, put up in qt. bottles, $1.50 per bottle, or half doz. for $7.50.

Do not forget to examine well the article you buy in order to get the genuine. For sale by all druggists and dealers in Medicines everywhere.

24—cowly

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX
PROSPECTUS FOR 1871.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1 69, and is just closing its first yearly volume.

We deem it proper, therefore, to submit the following Pros-PECTUS of Volume II for 1871, and ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if the matter was properly presented to them, and especially if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor. We cannot afford to send out travelling agents, nor would they succeed so well in getting names as persons of local influence. We therefore have determined to use the funds it would cost to get our paper before the people, in another way, namely, in the purchase of articles of value to be given as premiums to those who make up lists of subscribers; thus presenting to the friends of free thought and pure religion the double motive of doing good and getting paid for it.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two DOL-LARS a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

PREMIUMS.

For Fifty Names, we will give one of PRINCE & Co's four Octave Melodeons (price $65,) or a complete copy of CHAMBERS' Encyclopædia of Universal Knowledge, in ten volumes (price $50).

For Forty Names, we will give a Wilson's Family
Sewing Machine, one of the best Machines made.

For Twenty-Five Names, Webster's Royal Quarto
Unabridged Pictorial Dictionary (price $12), or one of the following Chromos:

The Three Tom-Boys (Prang's), price..... $15.00
Winter in the Forest, 20x28..... 12.00
Watering the Horses, 21x29..... 12.00

For Ten Names, one of the following Chromos:

WHITTIER'S Barefooted Boy, (Prang's) price..... $5.00
The Uncon- cious Sleeper, 11x17..... 6.50
Mt. Blanc, 20x26..... 7.50
Or a copy of LECKY'S History of European Morals, 2 vols 6.00
MAX MUELLER'S Chips from a German Work-Shop, 2 vols 5.00
EMERSON'S Prose Works, 2 vols..... 5.00
WEISS'S Life and Correspondence of THEODORE PARKER,
2 volumes..... 6.00

For Five Names, a bound volume of THE INDEX, for 1870. (Price $2.50.) Or a copy of one of the following works, (post paid):

DARWIN'S Origin of Species, price..... $2.00
LUBBOCK'S Origin of Civilization, price..... 2.00
Essays in Criticism, by MATTHEW ARNOLD, price..... 2.00
Tablets, by A. BRONSON ALCOTT, with portrait, price..... 2.00
Any volume of the writings of THEODORE PARKER or HEN-
RY D. THOREAU, each..... 2.00
On the Heights, AUERBACH..... 2.00

For Four Names, a copy of THE INDEX for 1871, or one of the following books (post paid):

EMERSON'S Society and Solitude, price..... $1.75
Nathan the Wise, a dramatic poem translated from LESSING by ELLEN FROTHINGHAM, price..... 1.75
HUXLEY'S Lay Sermons and Addresses..... 1.75
Speeches and Lectures, by WENDELL PHILLIPS..... 1.50
Historic Americans, by THEODORE PARKER, price..... 1.50
A copy of The Revolution..... 2.00
Or The Woman's Journal..... 2.00

CASH PREMIUMS.

For 75 Names,.....50 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 50 Names,.....25 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 25 Names,.....15 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 10 Names,.....5 Dollars in Greenbacks
For less than 10 Names, a Cash Commission of Twenty per Cent.

Any book in the above list will be sent by us post-paid upon the receipt of price.

N. B.—Names need not all come from one post office. We will send the paper wherever directed, and let the names count as clubs. Specimen Copies sent to all who enclose a three cent postage stamp. Address

F. E. ABBOT, Editor,
DRAWER 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Guardian Mutual Life Ins. Co.,

ORGANIZED A. D. 1859.

M. O. Waggoner, Gen. Supt. for Ohio, Mich. & Ind.

Jno. H. Hood, Assistant Genl. Superintendent.

Office No. 154 Summit Street,

E. F. MUNGER, } General Agents.
CHAS. M. LANG, }

WALTER C. SCOTT, Local Agent, 152 Summit St.

Special Agents—Kelly Bros., 22 Summit Street.
Office Hours—From 7 in the morning till 9 at night.
Medical Examiners—Drs. Samuel S. Thorn and T. J. Eaton Toledo, O. [18y1]

H. M. EDSON, A. TERRY.

EDSON & TERRY,
DENTISTS,

ROOMS 8 & 9 GRADOLPH BLOCK,

TOLEDO, OHIO.

ap16 1y

IMPORTER

Fine Chemicals, Drugs, and Toilet Articles.

Brandies, Wines & Liquors for medicinal purposes only. Also Proprietor of

Toledo Tonic Bitters,

Greatest Remedy known for general debility.

L. E. MULFORD,

23 Summit Street, Corner Perry, Toledo, Ohio

18-1y

THE CELEBRATED
CRAIG
MICROSCOPE

is an optical wonder; reveals thousands of the hidden Wonders of Nature; is of permanent use and practical availability, combining instruction with amusement, and never losing its interest. It magnifies

TEN THOUSAND TIMES,

a power equal to other Microscopes of many times its cost. Reveals countless little worlds all around us, teeming with life, which to the naked eye must forever remain a sealed book—as Bells in Vinegar, Animals in Water, Cheese Mites, Sugar and Ich Insects, Milk Globules, Claws and Hairs of Insects, Hundreds of eyes in a single eye of a Fly, Dust of a Butterfly's Wings to be perfectly formed Feathers, the much talked of Trichina Spiralis, or Pork Worm, which was first discovered in America with this Microscope.

It is of infinite value to professional men, to teachers, and to students, but NOWHERE IS IT OF GREATER VALUE THAN AT THE FAMILY TABLE, within the reach of every member. It will delight yourself, your children, and your friends during the long winter evenings. It will show you adulterations or un-cleanness of various kinds in food, as sugar, tea, bread, meat, etc.

It is of Inestimable Value to the Farmer in examining insects which prey upon his crops. The power of a $50 Microscope, and so simple in its construction that any child can use it understandingly, and with appreciation.

A Beautiful Present—Elegant, Instructive, Amusing, and Cheap. Over 60,000 sold.

During the past six years its worth has been testified to by thousands of Scientific Men, Farmers, School Teachers, Students, Physicians, Heads of Families, and others.

PRICE, $3.00—Sent by Mail Post-paid.

Every instrument is neatly boxed, and handsomely labelled with full directions for use. Thousands have been sent by mail.
Address, W. J. LINESS & CO, CHICAGO.

FREE! FREE!

"THE MICROSCOPE," a Monthly Journal of Information for the People—the mysteries of Nature explained—interesting information on the wonders of Creation—stories, sketches, etc.
Terms $1.00 per year. This Journal will be sent FREE for one year to any one purchasing a Craig Microscope at the regular Price, $3.00. (Craig Microscope will be sent post-paid.)
For sample copy, and our beautifully illustrated and descriptive circulars, and eight pages of testimonials of Craig Microscope, send six cents for postage to

W. J. LINESS & CO.,

Opticians, and Sole Proprietors of Craig and Novelty Microscope, CHICAGO, ILL.

AGENTS and DEALERS, this Microscope sells in every family on its merits, when exhibited. LARGE PROFITS. Send for terms. 53t:6

SERMONS

By Rev. O. B. Frothingham

Forwarded free on receipt of five cents for each.

What is it to be a Christian?
Taking God's Name in Vain.
The Issue with Superstition.
Infernal and Celestial Love.
The Sin Against the Holy Ghost.
Pilate and Jesus.
The Dying and the Living God.
The Foes of Society.
The Living Spring of Water.
Elective Affinity.
Religious Irreligion.
Experience and Hope.
The Radical Belief.
The Eternal Gospel.

DAVID G. FRANCIS,

17 Astor Place, NEW YORK.

49t3]

WORK!

Profitable and useful employment in canvassing for the Monthly and Weekly editions of the Christian at Work.
Rev. Stephen H. Tyng, Jr., Editor in Chief. NOT DE-NOMINATIONAL. Address
5214 H. W. ADAMS, 27 Beekman St., New York.

THE FIRST VOLUME OF THE RADICAL.

Persons wishing to complete their sets of THE RADICAL by adding the First VOLUME, which has been for some time out of print, can do so by at once sending me their orders. By reprinting this volume in part, I can supply 100 copies. To be able to do this, I am obliged to fix the price at $5.00. This will secure a copy, sent to any address post paid.

Volume 2, 3, 4, and 5, will be sent, post paid, for $3.50 each.
Single copies of THE RADICAL 35 cts.

The May number contains Mr. Wasson's review of Mr. Ab-bot's Religion.

The June number contains Mr. Frothingham's article on "What is Religion for?"

Address S. H. MORSE, office of "The Radical," Boston, Mass.

WANTED—AGENTS. ($20 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE.
Has the under-feed, makes the "lock-stitch" (alike on both sides, and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest Family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Boston, Mass., Pittsburg, Pa., Chicago, Ill., or St. Louis, Mo. 38y1

Ministers and Singers will find these particularly Adapted to the Voice.
They contain no Cubes, are very palatable, and act like a charm. Superior to all others for

Colds, Sore Throat, Bronchial and all Lung Difficulties.

RUSHTON'S (F. V.) COD LIVER OIL, for Consumption and Scrofula; the first introduced; fresh and pure. Sold by Druggists generally. 48m3.

A. J. GROVER,
Attorney at Law.

AND

WESTERN COLLECTOR,

EARLVILLE, LA SALLE CO., ILL.

Refers by Permission to

HAUGHTON, PERKINS & CO., BOSTON, MASS.
H. B. CLAPLIN & CO., NEW YORK
J. J. DONALDSON, NATIONAL BANK OF NORTH AMERICA
NEW YORK
JOHN V. FARWELL & CO., CHICAGO.
WILLIAM R. HAIGHT, BANKER, EARLVILLE, ILL.
44-56.

Agents Wanted For

THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD
Containing Fleetwood's "Life of Christ," "Lives of the Apostles, Evangelists and Martyrs," "Doddridge's "Evidences of Christianity," "History of the Jews," by Josephus; "A History of all Religious Denominations," with treatises and tables relating to events connected with Bible History, containing many fine Engravings. The whole forming a complete Treasury of Christian Knowledge.
W. FLINT & CO., No. 26 S. 7th St., Phila., 5 Custom House
Place, Chicago, and 176 W. 4th St., Cincinnati. [48m3.]

THE INDEX,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION

Published by the

Index Association, at TOLEDO OHIO.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

Terms, Two Dollars a Year.

Advertisements taken for THE INDEX by all responsible Advertising Agents.

Address,

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,

Lock Box 38, Toledo, Ohio.

AGENTS:—

TOLEDO, O., HENRY S. STEBBINS, 115 Summit St.
TOLEDO, O., JULIUS T. FREY, 47 Summit St.
NEW YORK, N. Y., DION THOMAS, 142 Nassau St.
BOSTON, MASS., CROSBY & DAMRELL, 100 Washington St.
CINCINNATI, O., HAWLEY'S NEWS DEPOT, 164 Vine St.
ST. LOUIS, MO., WARREN CHASE, 601 North Fifth St.
DETROIT, MICH., WM. E. TUNIS, 86 Woodward Av.
SYRACUSE, N. Y., LEWIS & WHELAN, 7 Granger Block.

The Index.

VOL. 2.—No. 2.

TOLEDO, OHIO, JANUARY 14, 1871.

WHOLE No. 55.

The Index,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO
FREE RELIGION.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, EDITOR.

OCTAVIUS BROOKS PROTHINGHAM,

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

RICHARD P. HALLOWELL,

EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTORS.

MODERN PRINCIPLES:

A SYNOPSIS OF FREE RELIGION.

[The following outline is offered as a purely individual interpretation of the free religious movement, it being proper to state that few, if any, of its other friends will wholly agree with it.—Ed.]

I. CHRISTIANITY AS A SYSTEM.

1. Regarded as to its universal element, Christianity is a beautiful but imperfect presentation of natural morality.

2. Regarded as to its special element, Christianity is a great completed system of faith and life—a coherent body of doctrines logically developed and organized as an historical power by the Christian Church. It claims absolute control over the collective life of society and the outward and inward life of the individual. It rests this claim on the supernatural revelation of the will of God; that is, on the principle of DIVINE AUTHORITY.

3. The chief features of this system are the doctrines of the Fall of Adam, the Total Depravity of the human race, the Everlasting Punishment of the wicked, and Salvation by Christ alone. Through the transgression of the first man, all human beings lie under the consuming wrath of God, and are condemned to an everlasting hell, from which the only escape is by the Atonement of Christ.

4. This system demands absolute and unreasoning submission from the human mind. It teaches that doubt is sin, and that disbelief is damnation. It everywhere condemns freedom of thought, and persecutes it in proportion to its power. It is the worst enemy of liberty, science, and civilization, because it is organized DESPAIR OF MAN.

II. FREE RELIGION AS A SYSTEM.

5. Free Religion is a great and growing system of ideas, hitherto very imperfectly developed, but destined to become embodied in a world-wide Commonwealth of Man. It will claim absolute control over the collective life of society and the outward and inward life of the individual. It will rest this claim on the natural perception of truth by the universal reason of the race; that is, on the principle of HUMAN FREEDOM.

6. The chief features of this system are the supremacy of liberty in all matters of government, the supremacy of science in all matters of belief, the supremacy of morality in all matters of conduct, and the supremacy of benevolence in all social and personal relations. It puts the Church on the level of all other institutions, the Bible on the level of all other books, the Christ on the level of all other men, leaving them to stand or fall by their intrinsic merits or demerits.

7. This system encourages the largest activity of the human mind, and asks no assent that can be withheld. It is the best friend of progress of every kind, because it is organized FAITH IN MAN.

III. ANTAGONISM OF THE TWO SYSTEMS.

8. Between these two great systems there exists an absolute conflict of principles, aims, and methods. The one ruled the world in the Dark Ages of the past. The other will rule the world in the Light Ages of the future. Their battle-ground is the Twilight Age of the present.

9. Free Religion emphasizes the Unity of the Universe, the Unity of Mankind, the Unity of the Person, and the Unity of the Unities.

IV. THE UNITY OF THE UNIVERSE.

10. Nature is an organic, living whole. All things are in harmony as parts of a perfect cosmos. All phenomena, physical and spiritual, are correlated in the unity of a perfect order.

11. The laws of Nature are elements of one underlying, all-permeating, all-comprehensive system of Law. Fixed and inviolable, from eternity to eternity they know no change. The belief in miracle is an infinite delusion.

12. The forces of Nature are modes of one omnipresent Energy, illimitable, uncreatable, indestructible—the cause of all metamorphoses and the life of all that lives.

13. Thus Nature is infinitely many in her phenomena, and absolutely one in her order, laws, and forces.

V. THE UNITY OF MANKIND.

14. The origin of the human race is one, in virtue of a common descent from inferior types of being.

15. The nature of the human race is one, in virtue of the universal possession, in varying degrees, of the same fundamental faculties.

16. The destiny of the human race is one, in virtue of a slow but constant progress towards a universal and perfect civilization.

17. The human race ought to be a political unit, as a universal Republic of Republics based on the principle that the liberty of the individual is absolute except as limited by the equal rights of all individuals.

18. The human race ought to be a social unit, as a universal Co-operative Union based on free industry and free commerce,—labor and capital being reconciled by the education of ignorance and the reformation of selfishness.

19. The human race ought to be a religious unit, as a universal Brotherhood of Man based on faith in human nature and love for all human beings.

20. Thus the human race is one in origin, nature, and destiny; and it ought to be one politically, socially, and religiously.

VI. THE UNITY OF THE PERSON.

21. Every human being is an independent consciousness, manifesting itself on the one hand in numerous unlike faculties (sensation, perception, locomotion, passion, affection, will, reason, conscience, etc.,) and manifesting itself on the other hand in the absolute unity of personality (the I).

22. Every human being ought to develop the unity of personality into the unity of character, based on the principle that the liberty of every faculty is absolute in the exercise of its natural function.

23. The unity of character requires that the Intellect shall make experience its point of departure, reason its road, knowledge its goal, and the love of truth its inspiration and guide; that it shall count all questions open that are not shut by positive demonstration; that it shall reject all answers which have no better basis than ignorant assumption or dogmatic authority; and that it shall seek answers to all questions through the patient study of universal Nature according to the laws of scientific thought.

24. The unity of character requires that the Conscience shall govern all personal action by absolute and universal moral ideas (truthfulness, justice, benevolence, purity, honor, integrity, self-respect); that it shall speak in all places and at all times with the voice of absolute command; that it shall shine like a sun that never sets, flooding the soul with the light of an ever-beautiful ideal; that it shall unsparingly rebuke every betrayal of the right, encourage fidelity to it by approving smiles, and waken deathless aspiration towards it by unveiling the eternal possibility of virtue; and that it shall make the welfare of all a private duty to each, thus consecrating the private life to the public good.

25. The unity of character requires that the Affections shall irradiate life in all its relations with the splendor of unselfish love; that they shall make manhood more manly and womanhood more womanly by blending them in one pure and happy home; that they shall dignify existence with noble friendships; that they shall deepen the joy and lighten the grief of others by respectful and tender sympathy; that they shall reverence the good and pity the evil in every human soul, and broaden out into a mighty and self-forgetful love of universal man.

26. The unity of character requires that the Will shall serve the conscience and reason, and know no other law; that it shall master the passions, and confine them to their lawful functions; that it shall be incorruptible in this servanthip, and unconquerable in this mastership; and that thus, harmonizing the animal and the spiritual, it shall bring the entire man into harmony with the laws of Nature.

27. The unity of character requires that the Sentiments and Imagination shall soar to the beautiful and sublime, and never trail their wings in defiling mire; that they shall venerate the truly venerable, delight in the magnificence of universal Nature, and thrill to its mysterious life; that they shall recognize the infinitude of the unknown, and add to the clear insights of science the deep glow of poetry and the deeper reverence of worship.

28. Thus the individual is one in the unity of personality, and ought to be one in the unity of a free, powerful, and self-harmonized character.

VII. THE UNITY OF THE UNITIES.

29. The Unity of the Universe is repeated in miniature in the ideal Unity of Mankind; and the ideal Unity of Mankind is repeated in miniature in the ideal Unity of the Person. The macrocosm is mirrored in the microcosm.

30. The great inspiration of the nineteenth century is faith in these ideal unities as possible in fact. Its faith in Man is part of its faith in universal Nature; and its faith in universal Nature includes and necessitates its faith in Man.

31. The great endeavor, half-conscious though it be, of the nineteenth century is thus to reproduce the eternal harmony of Nature in the life of the race and the life of the individual,—to create a civilization grounded on universal reverence for freedom, truth, and the equal rights of all mankind.

32. The Universe is Many in One, and One in Many. Such also will be Humanity, when its ideals shall have been realized in the world and in the soul. The national motto of America has become the great watchword of the ages—

E PLURIBUS UNUM.

CHRISTIANITY AND CIVILIZATION.

[Read to the First Independent Society of Toledo in Gitskey's Opera House, Nov. 27, 1870.]

"Many persons have been led into the singular error of ascribing all modern enlightenment to the influence of Protestantism, overlooking the important fact that, until the enlightenment had begun, Protestantism was never required."

BUCKLE, History of Civilization in England, Vol. 1, p. 190.

"The characteristics of the creed are overpowered by the characteristics of the people; and the national faith is, in the most important points, altogether inoperative, because it does not harmonize with the civilization of the country in which it is established. How idle, then, it is to ascribe the civilization to the creed, and how worse than foolish are the attempts of government to protect a religion which, if suited to the people, will need no protection, and, if unsuited to them, will work no good!"

Ibid. p. 193.

"The adoption of fraud and sophistry in the defence of Revelation too often reminds us of the injudicious conduct of those poets who load their invulnerable heroes with a useless weight of cumbersome and brittle armor."

GIBSON, History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. Vol. 1, p. 588.

"The Greek was a political being in the strictest sense of the term. Citizenship and political freedom, consisting in a participation in the supreme power of the State, was his highest good. A complete dependence on the State, and the absolute surrender of the individual member to the body, was the sentiment that had grown with his growth, and formed the groundwork of his moral being. The sum of his duties was to merge his personality in the State, and to have no will of his own distinct from that of the State. What position an individual was to occupy in the community was not left to his good pleasure, but was traced out beforehand for him. And, properly speaking, there was no department in which a Greek could be justified, according to his judgment, in free action merely as a man; and wherever the good of the individual clashed, or seemed to clash, with the welfare of the whole, in that case he must yield and fall a sacrifice; he and his rights were trampled under foot. Hence ostracism in Athens, Megara, Miletus, and Argos, and petalism in Syracuse."

DOELLINGER, Gentile and Jew in the Courts of the Temple of Christ. Vol. II, p. 217.

In my last lecture I referred to the fact, established almost beyond dispute by the researches of modern science, that man had his origin, not in the super-civilization of a fabulous garden of Eden, but in a state of utter barbarism. I then sketched, as it were in chalk, a few leading features of a social state which would indeed deserve the high praise of the epithet civilized, and pointed out that, although it is as yet nowhere an existent reality, the world had nevertheless made hopeful advances towards this ideal social state. Lastly, in investigating the causes of this slow but actual process of social amelioration, I found that Christianity, notwithstanding the extravagant claims made for it, could not possibly be taken as the sole and sufficient cause of civilization in general, nor even of that superiority which is asserted of so-called "Christian" nations over the other nations of the globe; and I closed by announcing the following question as the subject of this evening's lecture,— "What place, if any, does Christianity hold among the true causes of Western Civilization?"

It would, of course, be the height of presumption to expect that I could exhaust a subject which might well be the study of a long life passed in its patient and exclusive investigation. What I have to offer will be necessarily what I have been able to glean from others more highly favored than myself with opportunities of research, together with such independent conclusions as I have reached by looking at the subject from a standpoint in some respects peculiar. If I am able to throw any new light upon it, it will be because, in the old but apt metaphor, a dwarf on a giant's shoulder can see farther than the giant.

What, then, are the causes of modern civilization, and what place among them should be assigned to Christianity?

If we inquire in what parts of the earth the human race first emerged out of the total darkness of primitive barbarism, we find that they are Egypt, India, and China, in the Old World, and Central America, Mexico, and Peru, in the New World. If, on the other hand, we inquire in what parts of the earth the human race has made the greatest progress towards a real enlightenment, we shall find that they are the countries of middle and southern Europe and the corresponding regions of America. In other words, the earliest civilizations arose in the tropics, the highest in the temperate zone. Is this fact an accidental one?

A very brief reflection will show us that there can be no accident in this fact, but that great laws determine it.

Wherever the entire energies of mankind are exhausted in the effort to provide for the elementary wants of human existence, food, clothing, and shelter, no civilization has ever independently arisen or will ever arise. The hard fate that obliges men to expend all their powers in the service of their stomachs and their backs forbids them to expend anything in the service of their minds. The uncivilized races are chiefly those which are doomed to a perpetual battle with external Nature, in order simply to live,

The uncivilized portions of civilized communities illustrate the same law. Before a race or an individual can make any real upward progress, the dead weight of poverty must be lifted off. The first condition of civilization is wealth,—that is, an accumulated store of the necessities of life or the means of acquiring them, freeing the hands from endless labor, and giving the mind leisure to occupy itself with higher interests. Without wealth there can be no leisure; without leisure there can be no knowledge; without knowledge there can be no civilization. A surplus of the products of labor above what is immediately consumed must be realized, before the first steps can be taken in the development of the savage into the civilized man. If, therefore, outward Nature is anywhere so unpropitious that labor cannot outrun want, there it is evident that progress is impossible.

For this reason, the inhabitants of the Arctic regions, and those parts of the temperate and torrid zones in which no permanent wealth can be acquired, remain still in the barbarous state. What is commonly attributed to inherent characteristics of race is in large measure due to the unfavorable conditions of climate or soil; for it is these which must be regarded as the ultimate causes of race-characteristics. Wherever Nature supplies the materials of wealth, we have a right to expect civilization; wherever she denies them, we have no right to expect anything but barbarism. The hordes of Mongolians and Tartars, for instance, who in their own barren plains remain to this day in their primitive savagery, no sooner conquer the fertile China, India, or Persia, than they found flourishing empires, and belie all the expectations based on their supposed race-characteristics. So the Arabs, who in their own deserts are wandering tribes of barbarians, become the founders of refined and luxurious States in Spain, in Persia, and in the Punjab. There is nothing surprising, therefore, in the fact that the earliest civilizations are found in the most fertile portions of the tropics, where human wants are the most easily supplied, where Nature showers her gifts with the most lavish hand, and where the elements of wealth are thus with least difficulty converted into permanent capital.

But this very prodigality of Nature in the tropics, which as by a forcing-process develops prematurely the seeds of civilization, operates to prevent their development into the richest forms. It has been found that wherever food is obtained in great abundance with but little labor, there the population increases with the greatest rapidity. The effect of this increase is to make labor superabundant, and wages correspondingly low. Hence the wealth acquired is not evenly distributed throughout the people, but is monopolized by a minority; and the spectacle is presented of vast fortunes in the hands of the few, while the many are plunged into the most abject poverty. But the unequal distribution of wealth always causes the unequal distribution of power; and the inevitable consequence is the establishment of privileged classes on the ruins of public liberty. Thus we see how it happened that the early tropical civilizations came to a stand-still. The cheap and abundant rice of India and China, the dates and lots of Egypt, and the maize and banana of Mexico and Peru, produced the same effect which the potato produces in Ireland; that is, these countries all became centres of a teeming population. A glut of labor and consequent fall of wages ensued; and in each case followed the establishment of a most oppressive system of caste, which paralyzed the energies of the people, and prevented the development of a ripe civilization. For the principle I stated last Sunday is inexorable—THERE CAN BE NO TRUE CIVILIZATION UNTIL ALL MEN ARE CIVILIZED. Keep the people in ignorance, misery, and pauperism, and, although individuals may shine with all the radiance of wisdom and virtue, they do but make visible the hopeless darkness of the State. Thus the early civilizations of the tropics, leaving wholly out of account the supposed inferiority of their religions, were prevented by natural causes from maturing. Here again is exhibited the truth of the old maxim—"soon ripe, soon rotten."

In the temperate zone, however, Nature, although seemingly less bountiful than in the tropics, enhances the value of her gifts by the moderation with which she bestows them. Food must be here obtained by means of continuous labor; yet the climate is such that continuous labor rarely fails of its just reward. There being no superabundance of cheaply obtained food, population does not increase so fast as to reduce wages to the minimum which will barely support life; labor is encouraged by the prospect of earning more than will be consumed by immediate wants, and a moderate amount of wealth is thus placed within the reach of all. Further, man is obliged to put forth more exertion here, in order to live, than in the tropics; and the direct influence of outward Nature upon his development is consequently to call out and strengthen all his powers. Thus two causes co-operate in favoring the growth of civilization. On the one hand, the comparative scarcity of food and the resulting slow increase of population keeps wages at a point which rewards labor with the prospect of moderate wealth; while the comparatively even distribution of wealth prevents the formation of privileged classes possessed of such an enormous preponderance of power as is held by the high castes in tropical countries. On the other hand, the necessity of constant labor in order to win from Nature the means of supporting life tends directly to form a hardy and independent type of character, which in turn tends to make society tenacious of its gains and disposed continually to add to them. In other words, the civilizing forces are at the same time less overpowering and more continuous, in their action on man, in the temperate zone than in the torrid zone; and although civilization appears later, it nevertheless attains a higher and more progressive form.

Thus in the tropics we find a superabundance of food obtained almost without exertion, a consequent density of population, a consequent low rate of wages, a consequent unequal distribution of wealth, a consequent unequal distribution of power; and while the excess of cheap food thus directly tends to create a gigantic and oppressive caste-system, it also tends directly to create a weak, nerveless, and timid type of character, which indisposes the people to throw off the tyranny of the privileged classes. But in the temperate zone we find food comparatively scarce and difficult to obtain, population correspondingly limited, wages correspondingly high, wealth more evenly diffused, power less monopolized by the few; and while the difficulty of obtaining food tends directly to prevent the concentration of power in a few hands, it also tends directly to create a vigorous and energetic character which of itself is unfavorable to the establishment or perpetuity of despotism. Is it not plain, then, that, without at all resorting to any alleged inferiority or superiority of their respective religions, we find other and sufficient reasons for the superiority of the civilization of Europe and America over that of Asia and Africa? I am very far from denying the reaction of man on outward Nature; but I see in the influences of soil and climate an adequate cause for the phenomenon we have been studying—the early and arrested development of civilization in the tropics, its later and still continued development in the temperate zone. Whatever may have been the influence of Christianity in fostering and increasing this higher development of Western civilization, it seems to me indubitable that the West would have far surpassed the East in this respect, even if Christianity had never been born.

Passing now from the comparison of the civilizations developed in the tropics and in the temperate zone, I wish next to study the causes of what is very improperly termed "Christian civilization"—that is, the civilization of that part of the world in which Christianity is the prevailing religion.

Unless we keep clearly in mind the ideal end towards which all the forces of civilization are steadily working, we shall find ourselves utterly bewildered and lost in the labyrinth of phenomena, apparently so contradictory, which that term covers. Agriculture, manufactures, commerce, law, diplomacy, politics, literature, art, science, religion,—a host of dissimilar and equally clamorous interests force themselves upon our attention, and stun us by their conflicting claims. Large movements and counter-movements, advancing apparently at random, yet really under the operation of great laws which the actors comprehend as little as the private soldier comprehends the evolutions of the vast army of which he forms a part, overwhelm us by their multiplicity and seeming contrariety. Hence most persons are content to bury themselves in the details of their private business, and find abundant occupation for all their powers in the management of their own small and transient concerns. Not so the philosopher—not so the philanthropist. Whoever comes to live a larger life than that of pure absorption in his own selfish interests, sooner or later comes to feel the mighty attraction of that common life of the race which we are wont to designate as the march of progress, the growth of civilization. He begins to feel it a necessity of his being to identify his private aspirations with the universal consciousness of mankind, and to climb some ideal height from which he may behold the vast river of history, not in the petty segments seen from its banks, but in the grand sweep of its entire course, from its far-off fountain-head in the barbaric past to its entrance into that equally far off ocean of civilized futurity which at last bounds all human vision. Only by thus comprehending his own life in its large relations can he feel that he has lifted it out of a contemptible pettiness, and dignified it by association with the eternal and universal. For, I venture to say, no one who thus enlarges his own mental horizon will ever think meanly of man or despairingly of his destiny,—will ever contemplate without awe the vastness of that development which is so plainly a law of life to universal Nature,—will ever escape the conviction of the reality of eternal Thought as the secret of eternal Order and Beauty. From these pure heights of ideal contemplation, no one can return to the pursuits of daily duty without the consciousness of enlarged and invigorated being, or fail thenceforth to see new meanings in the otherwise trivial and wearisome details of existence.

Now I believe that philosophy is able to attain the high standpoint I have indicated. The ultimate end to which civilization is forever approximating can, I think, be determined with sufficient exactitude to furnish us with a standard by which to measure the actual progress made, and to appraise at their true value the various causes contributing to this progress. What this standpoint is, I briefly stated in my last lecture. The conception of Society as a perfect adjustment of the mutual relations between the Race and the Individual, realizing at the same time the absolute unity of the former and the absolute liberty of the latter, and combining these two principles as the law of an orderly and endless social development—this is the idea by which to estimate the true value of every historic civilization, and by which to determine the true nature of the influences at work in its evolution. By the light of this luminous idea, let us examine the causes and character of modern or Western civilization. So far as these causes tend to realize historically the social ideal just indicated, they have been beneficial,—so far as they have tended to defeat it, injurious; and the civilization produced by them is to be adjudged high or low according to the degree in which it has converted this social ideal into actual fact. Having thus the guidance of fixed principles to direct our inquiry, we may hope to attain results of value.

Now the social condition of modern Europe, of which American civilization is a direct outgrowth, has been derived from three great antecedent causes,—the Græco-Roman civilization of antiquity, the Germanic barbarism of the Northern conquerors of Rome, and the institution of the Christian Church. From each of these causes have flowed influences of the highest importance; and their combined action has produced the peculiar character by which European civilization is today distinguished from that of the Orient. I propose to analyze these (of course in the briefest and most general manner), in order to discriminate the various parts they played in the formation of modern society, and to determine how much they have contributed towards realizing a true civilization.

1. The most striking characteristic of Grecian society is its utter lack of unity. Greece itself, although its territory was exceedingly narrow, was split up into a multitude of petty States, among which jealousies and dissensions were perpetually breaking forth. Even the separate States were rent with hostile factions, as violent as those of the Italian cities of the Middle Ages. When at last Alexander the Great overpowered the whole of Greece, and, passing into Asia, established on the ruins of Persia a new and mighty Greek Empire, it would seem that this inveterate centrifugal tendency might be overcome, and a homogeneous civilization achieved. But no—immediately on the death of Alexander his empire fell to pieces, and disintegration resumed her sceptre. There was no element of coherence in the character of the Grecian people; and it may truly be said that Greece died from want of a public consciousness.

But quite as conspicuous as this indifference to a national existence was the Greek emphasis of individualism. Nowhere in the world have there been finer specimens of humanity than in Greece. Development, physical and intellectual, was the Greek's ruling passion; and its results are imperishable in those great names which the world still delights to honor, and in those great works of genius which to this day the world has been unable to surpass. Yet even in the grandest heroes and statesmen, poets and sages, an almost complete absence of that fine sense of a common humanity which is the glory of modern times makes itself painfully felt; and we must confess that the lack of it is a grave deficiency even in its noblest samples of individual greatness.

Thus the all-permeating principle of Greek civilization, the principle which entered as a powerful force into the subsequent history of mankind, was the idea of individual development, unrelieved and unaccompanied by any consciousness of the solidarity of the race.

2. On the other hand, the most striking feature of Roman society was its unitary character. Public spirit, patriotic devotion, is the typical Roman virtue, and illuminates every page of the history of Rome in its republican days. So strong is this characteristic, that the majesty of the republic always overshadows the greatness of the citizen. True, Roman history has no lack of distinguished names; but then it is always the history of Rome, not of Romans. There is no such thing as a history of Greece, except as a history of its petty fragments and colossal individuals. Hence Rome had no great poets, no great philosophers, no great artists; its best writers being imitators of the Greeks. But its distinguished names are those of warriors and statesmen, whose fame is that of the State. Had it not been for this intense public life of the Roman Commonwealth, there could have been no Roman Empire; for it was this subordination of self to a great State which gave to the Romans their genius for organization, for discipline, and for conquest. It was but a natural step, after all, from the Consul to the Emperor, since concentration of power was the manifest destiny written out on every feature of the Roman character.

In saying, therefore, that the great principle bequeathed to the world by Rome was that of imperialism, I mean something more than the despotism of a selfish tyrant reduced to a scientific theory; I mean the idea of a vast public life uniting the known world in organic relations,—the idea of a common system of jurisprudence based on recognized justice and political union. This idea, however, grand as it is, had the fatal defect of leaving out of sight the liberty of the individual, who was really lost and merged in the community at large.

3. If we now bring into relation the Greek and Roman principles, as they existed in the Roman Empire at the appearance of Christianity, we find the Greek idea of individual development co-existent with the Roman idea of imperial unity. Here, then, we seem to find both sides of our social ideal fully appreciated—on the one hand the unity of the race, on the other hand the liberty of the individual. How came it that ancient civilization failed?

Because neither the Greek nor the Roman idea really recognized the liberty of the individual. Roman imperialism was entirely indifferent to this, and only concerned itself with working out the problem of a thorough-going political union. Greek individualism, though seemingly implying personal freedom, failed to secure it from the very defect I pointed out in the Greek character. The Greek indifference to a great public consciousness, its blindness to the fundamental oneness of mankind, was yet consistent with devotion to a petty city or State. The Greek was a patriot; but his patriotism scarcely extended beyond the walls of the city he lived in. He had much to say of freedom; but the freeman of Greece was simply the citizen of a free city or State, that is, of a city or State unsubjected to any of its neighbors. In other words, the Greek love of liberty was not of a personal kind. It wanted the State to be free from foreign domination; but the Greek was as willing to sacrifice himself, even unwisely, to his own petty city as the Roman was to sacrifice himself to his larger republic or empire. A striking example of this is the refusal of Socrates, recorded by Plato in the "Crito," to escape from prison, out of regard for the laws of Athens, although these very laws unjustly condemned him to death. Another example of the same fact is to be found in the main argument used by Aristotle and the Greek law-givers against suicide—namely, that the State has a right to our services, and that to slay oneself is to defraud it of its due. Neither the Greek nor the Roman had any such passion for freedom as would make him refuse to bow beneath the legal tyranny of his own countrymen. If, therefore, no new element had been introduced, modern civilization would have failed to exhibit one of its most striking peculiarities—the passion for personal freedom, whether as against legal or as against illegal despotism. It is plain, consequently, that some new element must have been infused to account for civilization as it is.

4. This third element came with the barbarian invaders who overthrew the Roman Empire, and thenceforth took part in shaping the destinies of modern Europe. These fierce and hardy tribes, issuing from the sombre forests of the North, brought with them the traits of character naturally engendered by the scenes in which they lived. Accustomed to wrestle with outward Nature for their subsistence, trained to arms from early youth both in the chase and in warfare with each other, these tribes were pre-eminently distinguished for their wild love of freedom and personal independence. Each tribe governed itself by an assembly composed of the heads of families, where justice was rendered and public business transacted; and they were thus habituated to deliberate among themselves as free men, and to exercise their own minds independently. To be sure, these assemblies were rude and boisterous; nor is it likely that questions were discussed with much profundity or coolness. But they were nevertheless discussed; and here we may perceive the origin of that love of free debate, that insistence on the rights of free thought and free speech, by which all modern civilized nations are characterized. The barbarians thus contributed to plastic civilization the great and glorious principle of personal independence—freedom of thought, of speech, of action. It was a principle unknown to the ancient civilizations, wherever found,—unknown to the Christian Church; and yet it has played one of the most important parts in moulding the world as it is today. The debt we owe to it is unspeakable; and for it we are under obligation to the wild, ferocious, yet manly barbarian of Northern Europe.

Nor was this passion for personal independence the only element contributed by these barbarians to modern civilization. Although they invaded the dissolving and dissolute Roman Empire as hordes of freemen, they yet acknowledged the limited sway of favorite chieftains, elected by the free suffrage of their followers. Instead of attachment to cities or States, they thus exhibited a peculiar attachment to chosen leaders; and in this they differed widely both from the Romans and the Greeks. Out of this military clientship or clannishness arose eventually the great feudal system of the Middle Ages,—a peculiar institution of vast influence in the evolution of modern civilization, which nevertheless had its origin wholly outside of Græco-Roman or Christian influences. In fact, the feudal system was a foreshadowing of the very form of government under which we live here in America, so far, at least, as the principle of local government for local purposes, and national government for national purposes, is concerned. In the decay of all social ties occasioned by the fall of the Roman Empire, this feudal system (which Guizot well calls "the first-born of barbarism"), though based on conquest and defended by the sword alone, was yet an attempt at social re-organization. It preserved, at least, the right of forcible resistance to governmental encroachments, and, although at the expense of continual war and endless disorder, prevented the establishment of a great, crushing tyranny over the modern world. By degrees, the rise of organized kingdoms out of the chaos of mediæval society introduced some degree of order, and rendered possible a better state of things hereafter. For Europe is still in great measure under the domination of feudal ideas and institutions; and it will continue to be so, until the crude notion of independent nations, disconnected by any permanent ties, and liable at any moment to go to war with each other, is supplanted by the idea of a federal union of all the peoples of Europe. But the feudal system answered well its purpose in the Dark Ages, and, by creating chivalry, gave birth to generous sentiments, noble actions, and high ideals of justice and honor.

Thus the barbarians contributed to modern civilization the stern sense of independence and love of personal freedom which could so ill be spared today; and through the feudal system and its offspring, chivalry, they left a permanent legacy in noble sentiments and ideas to which the ancient world was almost a stranger.

To recapitulate,—the Greeks bequeathed to us the idea of individualism, or personal development; the Romans, the idea of imperialism or the unity of man; the barbarians, the idea of personal liberty and its affiliated sentiments. What the Christian Church contributed, I must ask your leave to present in my next lecture.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"Enclosed please find ten dollars—seven dollars for purposes before advised. And may I ask of you the favor to send the remaining three dollars to your correspondent Austin Kent, East Stockholm, N. Y. I learn his name and circumstances in THE INDEX of first of October. And will you please send this small amount to him without naming the donor, except to say that it is from God, through one of his feeblest instruments? If my purse were as full as my heart, it should be ten times the amount, but my pecuniary resources are far too limited to gratify all my wishes."

"Seeing your advertisement in the Blade, I determined to see your paper. Being born and raised in a land where the religion is not established by law, I claim a right such as you exercise in the publication of sentiments. I am opposed to the craftiness of a certain set of men. Send me a copy and a catalogue of books—deistical, if you deal in such. Times are dull, but I may be able to do something for an institution that promulgates reason and common-sense. None of your mysteries for me!"

"Please continue to send me your paper until it will balance amount enclosed. I dare say you are thinking of enlarging it next year. I hope you will, as I do not think there is quite enough room for all the good things you can say."

"I hope the liberal people of America will not let THE INDEX die for want of material aid. As long as it evinces its present spirit, you may consider me a permanent subscriber."

"I find many who are well pleased with THE INDEX, but who (it seems to me) are afraid of popular opinion."

"I am particularly interested in the scientific articles which you republish."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—Regular meetings of this Society will be held during the winter on Sunday forenoons, at 10½ o'clock, in Daniels' Block, corner of Jefferson and Summit Streets, in the hall over the U. S. Express Office. The public are cordially invited.

FREE EVENING SCHOOLS.—The school for men and boys is held Monday, Wednesday, and Friday Evenings, from 7 to 9, in the hall over the U. S. Express Office, Daniels' Block. The schools for women and girls are held at the same time in Scott's Block, Cherry Street, and in Campbell's Block, St. Clair Street.

DONATIONS.—The INDEX ASSOCIATION acknowledge gratefully the following donations lately received:—

CHAS. H. LUNT, West Roxbury, Mass.$1.00
WM. I. BOWDITCH, Boston, Mass. 8.00
CHAS. W. NEWTON, Castleton, Ill. 1.00
E. W. WEIR, La Grange, Ind.10.00
CHAS. RICHARDSON, Boston, Mass. 5.00
ASA K. BUTTS, New York City15.00
MRS J. J. BAGLEY, Detroit, Mich. 3.50
ALEX. COCHRAN, Franklin, Pa. 5.00

RECEIVED.

A CHILD'S BOOK OF RELIGION. For Sunday Schools and Homes. Compiled by O. B. FROTHINGHAM. New Edition. Revised. New York: Published by D. G. FRANCIS, No. 17, Astor Place. 1871. 12mo. pp. 273.

THE YOUNG FRIEND'S MANUAL: Containing a Statement of some of the Doctrines and Testimonies of Friends, and of the Principles of Truth professed by that Society. By BENJAMIN HALLOWELL. Second Edition. Published for a Number of Friends of Baltimore Yearly Meeting, by T. ELWOOD ZELL, Philadelphia, 1866. 12mo. pp. 174.

THE QUAKERS IN NEW ENGLAND. An Essay, by RICHARD P. HALLOWELL. (Published by Request.) Philadelphia: MERRIHUE & SON, Printers, 243 Arch Street. 1870. pp. 38. (With Appendix.)

PERSONAL INDEPENDENCE. A Sermon, by Rev. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, preached in Lyric Hall, October 30, 1870. New York: D. G. FRANCIS, 17 Astor Place. 1870. pp. 23.

ON MORAL EVIL. A Letter from a Friend. Published by THOMAS SCOTT, Mount Pleasant, Ramsgate. Price Sixpence. pp. 30.

PUBLIC LEDGER ALMANAC. GEORGE W. CHILDS. Philadelphia. 1871. pp. 56.

NABOTH'S VINEYARD. Speech of Hon. CHARLES SUMNER, of Massachusetts, on the proposed Annexation of "The Island of San Domingo;" Delivered in the Senate of the United States, December 21, 1870. Washington: F. & J. RIVES & GEO. A. BAILEY. Reporters and Printers of the Debates of Congress. 1870.

LETTER FROM GERRIT SMITH to Hon. Mr. CHURCHILL, on the San Domingo question.

NEW YORK STATE ANTI-SECRET SOCIETY CONVENTION, held in Syracuse, 15th, 16th, 17th November, 1870. Speech of GERRIT SMITH.

SCRIBNER'S MONTHLY, An Illustrated Magazine for the People, for January, 1871. Conducted by J. G. HOLLAND. SCRIBNER & Co., New York. $3.00 a year.

THE LADIES' OWN MAGAZINE for January, 1871. Edited by Mrs. M. CORA BLAND. $1.50 a year. Indianapolis.

THE WESTERN HOME for January, 1871. One Dollar a year. Published at 133 Dearborn Street, Chicago, by THE WESTERN HOME COMPANY.

Poetry.

MY ROSE.

[For THE INDEX.]

The wind is keen, the moon is ringed
With hazy prophecy of snow,
And frozen lies the outer world;
But in my heart is Summer's glow.

The fire burns low, the light is dim;
I hear late footsteps hurrying by;
And some one shouts, "The night is cold!"
Unhappy one—not blest as I!

I know not solitude or chill,
And all the dark and empty room
Melts into fragrant forest aisles,
And meadows honey-sweet with bloom.

Because—because I feel a rose,
Steeped in the sunlight of the South,
Red-petaled, sweet and velvet-soft,
Yet lingering upon my mouth!

And never solitude or chill
Can enter into humblest room,
Where such a rose but comes to touch
A life with its perpetual bloom.

MIGNONETTE.

The Index.

JANUARY 14, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

Contributors are requested to write on only one side of each sheet.

VOLUME FIRST OF THE INDEX.

The republication of our missing numbers is now completed, and the papers are in the hands of the binder. It is expected that the bound volumes will be ready for distribution within two weeks. Copies subscribed for, but not paid for at that time, will be regarded as no longer desired; and they will be held subject to new orders, which are rapidly coming in, and will be filled in the order of their reception. In every case, the present address in full—post-office, county, and State—should accompany the remittance ($2.50).

The "Modern Principles" are intended to appear in the first three numbers of our second volume.

"REV. R. H. HOWARD is engaged in teaching the Infidel INDEX, of Toledo, the doctrine of total depravity. He need not go far to illustrate it. 'Circumspice' is all he need to say, as he enters the columns. 'Look around you!'"

So says Zion's Herald, of Boston,—probably on the theory that calling names is a proof of total sanctity. We prefer total depravity.

Our readers will be very glad, we think, to learn that The Radical is to be resumed in February. May a prosperous wind fill its sails, as it starts on a new voyage!

THE RADICAL.—The publication of THE RADICAL is to be resumed, beginning with the February number, 1871. The full list of old contributors is retained, and new ones are to be added. It will endeavor to represent, as heretofore, the thoughtful, radical sentiment of the country on religious, social, scientific, and political questions. THE RADICAL is published in Boston, at Three Dollars a year. The present is the eighth volume.

Mr. A. J. Boyer, of Dayton, O., formerly editor of the Woman's Advocate, has voluntarily resigned his position as Western agent of the Woman's Journal, being dissatisfied with the action of the late Cleveland Convention. We should have no occasion to refer to the fact, were it not for an adroitly worded paragraph in the Journal which gives the impression that Mr. Boyer did not resign his place, but was discharged from it—thus doing injustice to a worthy man. We are very sorry to see that the Woman's Journal can stoop to such pettiness as this.

PROFESSORIAL APPOINTMENTS AT CORNELL UNIVERSITY.

Among the "Communications" published in our present issue will be found a letter from the Hon. Andrew D. White, President of Cornell University. Its object is to correct a statement recently made by us, which is supposed to be a mistaken one. With the utmost willingness we publish the letter, and shall be equally willing to publish any rejoinder that President White may desire to make. If our present opinion on the point raised is a misapprehension,—if there is any mistake in the grounds of this opinion,—we are ready honestly to admit the fact, and make what amends we can for unintended misrepresentation.

At the same time we feel great regret at being obliged to refer to facts which we have sought to avoid mentioning. We have not the slightest wish to make any attack on Cornell University or any of its officers. Our original allusion to it was prompted by no unfriendly spirit; and what we have now to say is equally free from any such spirit. But there is no escape now from alluding to facts about which we should greatly prefer to keep silence. Our statement has been very courteously but very directly challenged; and we are bound in honor either to prove it or withdraw it. We cannot withdraw it. It is therefore our duty to prove it.

In his late article in our columns, our kind friend, Prof. Russel, said:—

"The appointments made here under his [President White's] recommendation have never been influenced except by considerations of fitness for teaching and of personal character."

On this sentence we made the following comment:—

"The very last sentence of our friend's article is a mistake, to our own personal knowledge. It is not a fact that appointments have been always uninfluenced 'except by considerations of fitness for teaching and of personal character.' In at least one instance, we know that the contrary has been the fact; but we prefer not to particularize."

Referring to the above statement of ours, President White says:—

"That statement is, that you know of one case where a candidate for a Professorship was rejected on account of heterodox ideas."

Permit me to say, with entire courtesy, that you are mistaken—that you cannot know of any such case, simply because no such case has ever occurred in the history of this institution."

It will be noticed that President White presents, as our statement, his own inference from our statement. We did not say that we knew of a case of rejection on account of "heterodox ideas." We only said we knew of at least one instance of an appointment influenced by other considerations than those of "fitness for teaching and of personal character." This is all we are bound to prove; and we shall presently prove it by President White's own words.

Early in 1867, a young man who had become publicly identified with the extreme form of radical Unitarianism applied for the chair of metaphysics and moral philosophy in Cornell University. He submitted testimonials from John Stuart Mill; Rev. Henry Calderwood, LL.D., of Glasgow; Prof. John Veitch, of Glasgow; Mr. Ralph Waldo Emerson; Prof. Noah Porter, of Yale College; Prof. E. A. Park, of Andover Theological Seminary; Prof. A. P. Peabody, Prof. F. Bowen, and Prof. E. W. Gurney, of Harvard College; Mr. C. E. Norton, editor of the North American Review; Rev. Henry W. Bellows and Rev. Jos. H. Allen, editors of the Christian Examiner; Mr. Chauncey Wright, of Cambridge; Mr. George Ticknor Curtis, of New York; and Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes, of Boston. He failed to receive the appointment. In very kind letters dated Nov. 6 and Dec. 5, 1867, President White wrote to him:—

"It is with regret that I have to inform you that the choice of the Trustees seems decidedly taking a direction away from you. The feeling is that, as we have so many young men, an older man would better become the Professorship of Moral Philosophy, &c."

"I cannot return your testimonials without a word regarding them. They are such as may well make any man—young or old—proud. . . . It is not want of appreciation of your ability—it is not fear of any views you may entertain—it is no want of personal esteem, which has led us to hesitate to have you at present. But a College like ours makes certain demands upon the department at first, which would be more fully met by another candidate. Were the department that of metaphysics alone, there is no one whose claims would, I think, be preferred to yours; and should there be, as I trust may be the case, a division of the department within a few years, there is no one so likely as yourself to be urged to accept that position for which you have shown so remarkable a fitness."

In the above letters, the only reason stated for the rejection of this application is the youth of the applicant, who was thirty years of age. Unless considerations of age are also considerations of "fitness for teaching and of personal character," this alone would fully substantiate our controverted statement.

But it may be thought that considerations of age are considerations, if not of "personal character," at least of "fitness for teaching."

It appears, however, from the first of the above letters, that youth was perfectly compatible with "fitness for teaching" in other professorships than that of moral philosophy. In point of fact, many young men (many younger than this applicant, if we are not mistaken) were appointed to other chairs. The reason of this difference does not seem to us far to seek. Questions of moral philosophy unavoidably run into questions of religion. Any thorough discussion of the basis, the sanctions, the obligations of the moral law must necessarily touch on the profoundest questions of so-called theology. The regular instructions of a professor in moral philosophy, if not utterly superficial, would involve the discussion of many doubtful principles taught by Christianity. It would be a hazardous experiment, so far as the prosperity of Cornell University is concerned, to appoint to that chair a man who was young both in years and in belief. The public superstition which keeps such jealous watch over our educational institutions requires age—age in belief, if not in years—as a qualification for such a post. If there is any other reason for this discrimination between the professorship of moral philosophy and other professorships on the score of age, we cannot imagine it.

But we should never have dreamed of making the statement which has been called into question, without a better basis than the mere feebleness of our imagination.

A gentleman of Massachusetts, widely known in literary and scientific circles, who had interested himself in the success of this particular application, mentioned to us a conversation regarding it which he had had with President White. To his inquiries concerning the prospects of the applicant, President White, he said, had replied that they "wanted a Broad Church man for that place." This remark was reported to us at the time by the gentleman to whom it was addressed; and this is the ground of our personal knowledge.

Nothing is more natural than that President White should have entirely forgotten the circumstances attending one out of innumerable rejected applications; and it is with the extremest reluctance that we have found ourselves obliged to refer to them. That the interests of the University, moreover, which had been entrusted to his charge, should have been paramount to all other considerations, was both natural and right; and it is but just to the defeated applicant to say that he fully recognized this fact. His rejection was a disappointment, but in no sense a grievance. He took, it seems to us, the only sensible view of the matter. The young man had chosen his own course with eyes wide open; and when, as he expected, he found that his voluntarily incurred unpopularity with the religious public prevented his practical usefulness as a university professor, he had not a shadow of reason to complain of the university that declined to employ him. The only complaint he could justly bring was against the public bigotry and systematic superstition that tyrannizes over the entire community. That is the great enemy of all true freedom. Let that, not the universities that are struggling for liberty, be attacked and destroyed.

The "law" which President White quotes as governing all action concerning appointments to professorships at Cornell has, no doubt, been scrupulously observed; for it refers only to what views a man may or may not hold. What views a man may or may not teach, is a very different matter. On this point Prof. Russel explicitly says,—“No one could be appointed whose reputation as a non-Christian rendered it probable that he would use his situation as a point of attack against Christianity.” We presume that President White would not deny the existence of this limitation in the appointment of professors. And it is this limitation, recognized and admitted, which, as we showed last week, renders impossible a scientific study of the Christian religion within the walls of Cornell University.

One word more, and we have done. Towards President White we have nothing but kindly and respectful sentiments, regarding, as we do, his services in behalf of the higher education as thoroughly noble and self-sacrificing. If he really thinks we are “pandering” to anybody’s “bigotry” in what we have said, we are very sorry that he has read THE INDEX for a whole year with so little understanding of our character. If there is any “bigotry” or “sectarianism” in demanding absolute freedom, and refusing to be satisfied with any institution that falls short of it, it is all our own. We are the offending party, and we simply scorn to skulk behind anybody’s back. What we have said, we have said because we believe it—not because anybody expected us to say it; and if it be illiberal, bigoted, or sectarian, let the disgrace fall where it belongs—on our own head. We want no shields. Least of all do we wish that President White should acquit us at the expense of our friends. We count it no bigotry to demand absolute liberty of thought and speech for all, professors included, and to keep on demanding it till we get it; but if this is bigotry, then we are the bigot, and none beside.

“REV. F. E. ABBOT, in a sermon published in THE INDEX for December 24th, asks: ‘Is there not, after all, something noble and necessary in the honor paid by mankind to a life like that of Jesus?’ Well, yes, we think there is. We have long held that conviction, and all that the advocates of ‘Free Religion’ have yet urged in favor of their views has not caused us to change our mind.”

When the Liberal Christian (from which we clip the above) has learned to distinguish between the honor paid to a good man and the homage paid to a Lord and Master, to see that the former is the only thing “noble and necessary” in the latter, and to regret the slavishness of mind which makes common respect “slop over” into the follies of Unitarian Christolatry, it will have caught its first glimpse of the real “views” it tries to ridicule. The “advocates of ‘Free Religion’” are not the stupid or malevolent detractors of Jesus which the Liberal Christian insinuates that they are. We excuse the apparent dishonesty of the criticism on the ground of ignorance (not very excusable) of the thing criticised.

A TRUE ŒCUMENICAL COUNCIL.

The famous Œcumenical Council of the Roman Catholic Church, which began its sessions in Rome in December, 1869, and was dissolved last July after declaring the dogma of papal infallibility, has already almost slipped from men’s memory. The war between France and Germany has touched interests so much more immediate and universal that it has absorbed the thought which otherwise might have been given to the doings of the Catholic bishops at Rome. One of the mere incidental results of the war—the Pope’s loss of Rome and of the temporal power—has gone far, indeed, to neutralize the impression that would have been made upon the popular mind of Catholic Christendom by the proclamation of the Pope’s infallibility. It is a kind of practical logic that has more effect upon the multitude than has the most skilfully framed syllogistic argument. The common sense of people is sure to ask, of what use is the doctrine to infallibility of the Pope, if he is not able to maintain his power and prestige as a temporal sovereign against the pretentious claims of a rebellious Catholic king? It may not be strictly logical according to the books, but it is the logic of common sense; and at the bottom of the question there is a real logic, even if the form be faulty. There is something ludicrous in the situation,—that, almost before the bishops have left the Pope, having solemnly invested him with infallibility, he becomes a beggar in the Vatican and dependent for his very homestead upon the mere tolerance and good will of the fallible governments of Europe.

On account of this change in the Papal fortunes, and for other reasons, it is very doubtful whether another Œcumenical Council of the church of Rome will ever be appointed. Yet the idea of an Œcumenical Council is a very grand one. The idea of summoning together selected men from all parts of the earth to consider the highest interests of the church,—and according to the Roman Catholic theory the church and state, the spiritual and temporal interests of man, are one,—the idea of a universal council prepared to speak and advise on all matters pertaining to the well-being of humanity, is one of the finest conceptions that man has ever attempted to put into practice. The conception should not be suffered to die without some better fruit than it has yet yielded. The trouble with the Papal Council is that it has not been really universal,—that it has not been actually œcumenical, but sectarian, and has concerned itself with petty questions of dogma and ceremony that are of interest only to one church of one religion, and that have become obsolete in most parts of the civilized world. What the world now needs is a Council that shall be truly œcumenical,—that shall represent the rights and interests of all the nations and populations of the earth; a Council of the wisest and best men from all countries of the civilized world, and even from nations that have hardly been touched by the wave of modern civilization and may yet have something to contribute to the general welfare of the human race; a Council that shall not concern itself with the affairs of one sect alone, but with the interests of humanity, and that shall not attempt to determine disputed points of faith nor consider the theoretical merits of religious problems, but, leaving perfect freedom in these matters, shall be religious only in the sense of devising the best methods for bringing to bear on the practical conduct of nations and communities the universal principles of truth, justice, righteousness, and love. In fine, let the idea which the Roman Catholic church has embodied in its General Council, called œcumenical but really partial and sectarian, be transformed into a Universal Congress or Court;—an assembly in which the best persons of all nations shall consult together for the best good of all; shall settle disputes between nations; shall decide questions of international law; shall determine all “Alabama” questions and “Black Sea” questions and “French and German boundary” questions; shall confer on the great problems of commerce and emigration and equality of rights between nations, and on the greater matters of justice and freedom, the prevention of crime, and the promotion of knowledge and virtue, which must underlie all good government and all sure progress.

Such an International Congress, or Court, is, of course, no new idea; but the world is fast ripening for the organization of the idea. And this is the practical point towards which peace-societies and peace-movements should aim. Now is a most favorable time for pressing the idea to realization. Statesmen, philanthropists, religionists, should bend their energies in this direction. An International Congress is perfectly practicable. It might begin to-day, if there were only the will to begin it; might begin with two or three nations, to whose alliance others would gradually be drawn as the benefits of it should become apparent. In place of the rivalries and hostilities, the fortifications and standing armies, which now divide nations, a general Congress would seek to make clear and to strengthen those strong principles of community and reciprocity of interests that should bind the nations together and make strife between them impossible. Such a Congress would concentrate and express the moral public opinion of the world. If such a body had been in existence, the present war between France and Prussia would not have arisen. Louis Napoleon would not have dared to defy the concentrated moral sentiment of mankind by throwing down the challenge. Even our civil war, through the power of such a Congress, might have been averted; for the southern slaveholders, long before 1861, would have felt the moral opprobrium of the civilized world condemning their sin, and they never would have had the audacity to rise in rebellion for its defence. With such a central, representative, and really Œcumenical Council, nations would gradually learn to compete with each other in the honorable paths of science, of culture, of philanthropy, of conquest over nature, of advance in the arts, of solid progress in all that pertains to the welfare of man. Through this Council, not of a church nor of a religion, but of Humanity, the wisdom of all past civilizations and faiths would unite with the voice of the living inspiration of the present age, and a veritable step would be taken towards organizing the kingdom of heaven on earth. Let the believers in peace move at once for this Ecumenical Council of Humanity.

W. J. P.

THE ECHO OF AN OLD CRY.

Religious and theological reformers have always been met by the cry that reason is a blind and unsafe guide, and a great many arguments have been constructed to show that that faculty in man which makes the arguments is only a plausible decoy to human perdition. Perhaps no people have been fonder of argument, or have resorted to reason more readily for the defence of their doctrines, than those theologians who have been most ready to decry reason. Calvin's "Institutes" is regarded as a model of logic. Barclay's "Apology" has been studied in colleges purely for its logical ability. Yet Calvin and Barclay both wrote for the purpose of showing that it is unsafe to trust to reason, and that we must have a miraculously authenticated revelation. The same cry against reason is repeated to-day; and strange to say, we hear it not only from Evangelists, but from Liberal Christians, from Unitarians, who are nothing if they are not rationalists. In two or three instances, of late, have Unitarian writers criticized the believers in free religion as trusting too much to human reason, as thinking too much of intellect and science. It is the old cry of traditional ecclesiasticism against reform.

It is very easy among persons of ecclesiastical training to raise an alarm against reason; to defame it as blind, lawless, arrogant, and dangerous. But in point of fact, reason is the best governed faculty of the human mind; the least lawless, the least liable to run to excess and license. Reason is restrained at every step by the laws of its own nature. Nothing is more rigid than the processes of logic which rational thought must follow. So far from reason, if it be truly reason, being a mere rover at random and coming to such conclusions as may please the fancy, it is confined by its own functions to a path which must lead to certain results as inevitably as the locomotive, if no accident of switch or fracture befall, must bear your train of cars to the destined station. Logic is the iron track on which reason must travel. If the results come wrong, do not defame the engine, but see if there be not a defect in it, and clear the track. It is not the rationalists, but the ecclesiastic traditionalists, who are in danger of following blindly and wildly some unsubstantial fancy, some dream or individual caprice, some cotager's rush light or wandering will-o'-the-wisp, which they mistake for a fixed beacon on the shore or a star in the sky.

W. J. P.

"There are many things from which I might have derived good, by which I have not profited, I dare say," said Scrooge's nephew; "Christmas among the rest. But I am sure I have always thought of Christmas time, when it comes round, as a good time; a kind, forgiving, charitable, pleasant time; the only time I know of in the long calendar of the year, when men and women seem by one consent to open their long shut-up hearts freely, and to think of people below them as if they really were fellow-passengers to the grave, and not another race of creatures bound on other journeys."

"Are there any old families in New York?" asked in surprise a young Bostonian of a young New Yorker, the other day. The New Yorker was crushed, knowing within himself that his own great grandfather was a tallow-chandler, and not knowing that the questioner's great grandfather was a shoemaker.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

UNIVERSITY APPOINTMENTS.

CORNELL UNIVERSITY, ITHACA, N. Y.,
Dec. 20, 1870.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—Returning to my work here, I find a recent number of THE INDEX containing sundry articles and correspondence regarding this institution.

The general questions therein raised seem to need no further discussion; but I find imbedded among them one statement which ought to be answered.

That statement is—that you know of one case where a candidate for a Professorship was rejected on account of heterodox ideas.

Permit me to say, with entire courtesy, that you are mistaken—that you cannot know of any such case, simply because no such case has ever occurred in the history of this institution.

That many persons believe candidates to have been rejected on account of this or that form of belief or unbelief is not unlikely. I have known such instances of misapprehension. The friends of one gentleman evidently believe that he was not accepted because he is a Presbyterian; another insists that he stood no chance because he is a Methodist; another declared that there could be no reason for his non-election, save his belief as a Roman Catholic; and now it appears that some person thinks he was rejected on account of unbelief.

The simple and sufficient answer to these charges is found in the fact that men of all these forms and grades of belief and unbelief—and well known as such—have been elected to our Professorships.

Among the first to whom Professorships were tendered was a Roman Catholic; and two important Chairs have since been offered to gentlemen well known as Comtists, or, as the world at large would call them, "Materialists."

It is a simple fact, to which every member of our governing body will testify, that never have the religious or political views of any candidate been inquired into or even mentioned.

Our rule has been simply this,—to choose to every Professorship the man best fitted to discharge its duties. Our law from the first has been,—"And no person shall be accepted or rejected on account of any religious or political views which he may or may not hold;" and neither Mr. Cornell nor myself would remain in connection with the institution an hour after the infraction of this rule by the imposition of any test whatever.

The attacks, on this ground, have been furious and persistent. Many of the sectarian presses and pulpits, especially those connected with the denominational colleges, have been unsparing. The most absurd stories have been circulated, and very large numbers of young men have told me that kind and conscientious pastors warned them not to come. But in the midst of the howling and pelting of this storm, good and earnest and truly liberal men of various creeds have stood by us; and, judging from the number of young men who have come to us, the people have stood by us.

Permit me, then, as a reader of THE INDEX from its first number, to regret that its voice seems to swell this clamor with cries as thoroughly and essentially sectarian as those which have denounced our "want of evangelical teaching," or "lack of revival piety," or "non-churchmanship," or "godlessness." And, since you have mentioned me by name, allow me to follow your example, and say that—while I might have been forewarned by the fact that, after spending considerable portions of my life among devoted adherents of the Greek, Roman Catholic, Anglican, and New England Churches, I have found among so-called "liberal" men some of the most illiberal and thoroughly hard sectarians and bigots I have ever known,—it is a matter of deep regret that such a truly noble and self-sacrificing man as Francis E. Abbot should seem to think it necessary to pander to such. To use his own words,—"There are those who would not do this."

I remain, sir, very truly yours,

ANDREW D. WHITE.

"THE INDEX" TOO ORTHODOX.

PLYMOUTH, WIS., Dec. 28, 1870.

MR. ABBOT:—I send you herein two dollars for another year's reading of THE INDEX. As it seems to be a custom of your readers to give their opinions about your paper, I hope you will not be displeased if I, too, speak my mind upon it. I think, then, you have not yet cast off the priest and put on the man entirely! I do not blame you. The Puritan was so ingrained on the New England mind, that it will require untold generations to eradicate it! Among other things, your discourse in your issue of Dec. 24, on "The Incarnation," smacks wonderfully of the idolatry of Christianity! It is true you seem to deny the orthodox idea of the Deity of Jesus; and yet you wrap and envelope him in such a spiritual haze and mirage, that a common mind cannot but look upon him as more than human—as divine!

Now, sir, strip this man of his orthodox dressing, and I can see but little of him. He was, undoubtedly, a spiritual medium. Like such people of the present day, he said many pretty things, and his mouth seemed to be filled at times with love—at other times with cursing. It is said that he never persecuted. If this means that he did not burn heretics at the stake, it is true, for he never had the power; but I cannot but look upon one who could say,—"Depart from me, ye cursed!"—and—"He that believeth not shall be damned," in any other light than as persecuting "already in his heart,"—as uttering prophecy of what he would do when "come unto the kingdom!"

These very expressions, as your correspondent, R. H. Howard, very justly remarks, are the cause now of all persecution by Christians toward their unbelieving brethren, and are the fountain whence have flowed all the told and untold rivers of blood shed by the followers of Jesus in the propagation of his religion! Why, then, are we advised by free religionists to join with his worshippers to celebrate his natal day? What new moral did he teach? What great work did he do? I am aware that priests ascribe all the discoveries and improvements of the civilized world to the doctrines taught by this man; but you are aware that his followers and their creeds have hitherto stood in the way of human improvement, and I must think that the perpetuation of Christian Sabbath, and Christian holidays generally, is a partial acknowledgment of the truth of Christian theology, and will be a hindrance to progress in the future.

EDW. M. MACGRAW.

P. S.—I think you do Voltaire some injustice in the manner you quote a remark of his when on his death-bed. He was about to die, and the followers of Jesus, he knew, would not permit him to be buried in Christian ground, unless he professed a belief in Christ. In those days this was considered a disgrace for which his living friends would suffer; and at their entreaty he was weak enough to make an indefinite sort of acknowledgment of his belief in the efficacy of atonement.

His confession did not suit his priestly attendants, and they persecuted him in his sore affliction with threats and denunciations, if he failed to make it fuller. It was in reply to a question in regard to this, when racked with pain and pressed for time to adjust his own business, that he turned, perhaps "petulantly," as you say, and made the remark,—"In the name of God, sir, leave me to die in peace, and say no more to me about that man!"

E. M. M.

[Salt is a good thing; and we are pleased to print the above saline criticism. We do not think, however, that the orthodoxy of THE INDEX will kill it.]

Mr. MacGraw is probably right about Voltaire, and we regret any inferential injustice in our allusion to him. "Petulance" would be certainly excusable under such circumstances as are above described. But we wish to avoid being petulant in cold blood. If it is proper to "give the devil his due," it seems quite as proper to give his due to Jesus. We mean to give him that—no more, no less.—ED.]

"SABBATH DESECRATION."

EDITOR INDEX:—Inclosed I send you an article on "Sabbath Desecration" that I cut from to-day's Watchman and Reflector, of Boston. I hope you will find room for it, or a portion of it, in THE INDEX. It gives evidence that Orthodoxy is becoming conscious of the impending crisis. The Rev. Dr. Gardner asserts that "the resurrection of Jesus furnishes the basis of our Christian Sabbath." Is not this a retreat from the old position heretofore occupied by the Christian forces, that "God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it; because that in it he had rested from all his work which God created and made?" Then in another point I must charge the Watchman and Reflector with laxness in the "faith once delivered to the saints."

In those days when orthodoxy was a power in the land, the stake and the prison were the penalties for "Sabbath desecration;" but now this professed organ of the most Calvinistic sect proscribes the mild homœopathic dose of refusing "all patronage to lecture courses, or to lecturers themselves, chargeable with thus defiling the day of Christ." This will be alarming intelligence to Miss Anna Dickinson and George William Curtis, who are two of the prisoners at the bar under this indictment. This withdrawing of "patronage" is about the only weapon the spirit of the nineteenth century has left in the hands of these bigots; but this weapon is used with great dexterity, as many poor heretics have found to their pecuniary discomfort. Dr. Gardner and other ministerial "friends of Christ and his day" consider the withdrawal of "patronage" about the most severe thing that could happen to their profession, and the one thing more than all others that would induce them to abandon it; but possibly these "secular" preachers may be governed by other motives.

The rules these "Doctors" desire to lay down seem to be these:—

1st. None but ministers of Christ shall be permitted to address the people on the first day of the week; and—

2nd. If any persons, not such ministers, shall be permitted to speak on the "Sabbath," they must do it without compensation.

It is encouraging to learn that the "Dr." and his friends have determined "to arouse for the defence of this Gibraltar." Slavery never was much in danger of being abolished, until the South arose in its defence; and nothing is so encouraging to the friends of religious freedom, as to perceive that bigotry is becoming alarmed. But, friend Abbot, I have said much more than I intended to in relation to this article. I leave it for your consideration.

Last Sunday evening the Radical Club of this city was addressed by one of its members, Mr. George Hinman, upon "The Origin of Man." Mr. Hinman is a mechanic in our city who makes no pretensions to public speaking; but he has read much, and he gave a lecture worthy to be repeated before a much larger audience. After the lecture, the Club was highly entertained by a short speech from Col. J. O. Martin, of Indianapolis. He stated that a Radical Club had just been organized in that city, and that such organizations were springing up throughout the West. The Colonel is an earnest, eloquent young man, and seems to have dedicated himself to the cause of progress. It would be well for the world if there were more such. Our meetings are so largely attended, that the Club are making arrangements for larger rooms. It commenced with five members, and now has about seventy. Much interest is being awakened here. Rev. S. M. Calthrop, of the Unitarian Church, visits the Club every Sunday evening after his service, and takes part in the discussions. And he is a very valuable accession. Rev. Mr. Mundy also often takes part in the meetings. Next Sunday evening, the Rev. F. Arnold, an able M. E. Minister of this city, has agreed to address the Club on "The New Birth." Other ministers have also consented to address the Club soon.

The Club is provided with an organ, and we have good music at our meetings.

We hope to have a long list of subscribers for THE INDEX, the coming year. A lady, a member of the Club, is getting up a subscription list; and she is resolved to get at least fifty names, so as to get the prize offered. She informed me to-day that she had obtained about half that number. I see you are to be in Boston in February. You must stop once and give us a lecture in Syracuse.

Yours Truly, H. L. GREEN.

[As we published quite lately an article from Zion's Herald similar in character to the one enclosed by Mr. Green, we are obliged to be content with that. It would be pleasant to have more space at our command; and if all our friends should be as energetic as the lady above referred to, we should be able to increase it.—Ed.]

"A SAMPLE OF PRIESTLY INTOLERANCE."

NEW YORK, Dec. 30, 1870.

F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir:—I enclose slips from the New York Times of yesterday, regarding a matter in which I hope you will take great interest, editorially and otherwise.

I think the Times article a good Free Religious production, and worthy to be immortalized in the columns of THE INDEX.

Can there not be a Church where actors may be consistently welcomed in life as well as in death?

Do they not sometimes teach moral lessons, or is everything connected with the stage false and hollow? Shall we treat the good and bad alike, or take the narrow Church view, and condemn them all alike?

I am, sir, respectfully,

"A NEW YORK FRIEND."

"There is a clergyman in this city who, when lately asked to read the burial service over a dead man, declined, on account of the profession which the deceased had followed in his lifetime. Most people may have supposed that this kind of intolerance—perhaps the most revolting and indecent that the human mind can conceive—was a thing of the past. But human bigotry and stupidity never become obsolete—they are only held in check by public opinion. There are Jesuits who would gladly revive all the horrors of the Inquisition, and would have a better relish for their dinners if they could send a few unbelievers to the stake for the good of their souls. We do not hear of so many cases of priestly intolerance as formerly, not because the appetite for intolerance has died out, but because people are a little more afraid of public exposure than they used to be. But, as we have said, New York can boast of one clergyman who does not fear to provoke the indignation and contempt of his fellow-men. A certain friend of a dead man went to him the other day, and asked him to perform the last offices of the Church over the body. The minister declined, because of the calling the deceased had pursued.

The name of this minister is Rev. William T. Sabine, and the dead man over whom he refused to read the funeral service was the late George Holland, the actor. The deceased had borne through life an excellent character,—he had, among other things, earned his living honestly, had brought up his children honorably, had tried as well as he could to do credit to the calling which he followed. None of us can do much more than that, no matter what we may call ourselves,—and not all of us do so much. But Mr. Holland had committed an unpardonable sin in the eyes of Rev. William T. Sabine,—he had earned his living by trying to please the public on the stage. For this offence, in the eyes of a Christian minister, he was fit only to be burned like a dog, and his surviving relatives were to be denied those last consolations of religion which we are accustomed to think even murderers, standing at the foot of the gallows, have a right to ask. We may think what we please of any man's profession during life,—but to follow him with resentment after death on account of it, to pronounce a decree that he is fit only for the bottomless pit, and that no word of a Redeemer's love or of the Resurrection should be pronounced over his grave,—there is something so horrible in all this that we can scarcely believe it has really occurred in our own day and our own city. It is like the insolent profanity of a priest of the Middle Ages. Who is it that has a right to pronounce a judgment on his brother's soul? Rev. Mr. Sabine comes forward in answer to that question and tells us that he is the man. He can tell by a man's occupation whether he is entitled to Christian burial or not. He stands wrapped in a cloak of bigotry, which he mistakes for the mantle of infallibility, and presumes to anticipate the unerring judgment to be pronounced at that bar before which he, as well as the "wicked actor," must one day be arraigned. Mr. Sabine is an anachronism. He should have lived in the days when no harm was thought of using the rack and the thumb-screw as stimulants to men's religious faith. As it is his lot to live in the nineteenth century, he ought either to accommodate himself to its tone of thought, or at least retire from a church upon which he brings discredit. The son of the late Mr. Holland might well have addressed him in the words of Laertes, slightly modified—written by a man who was an actor, and lies buried within a Christian church, a fact which Mr. Sabine has doubtless often reflected upon with a shudder:—

"I tell thee, churchly priest,
A ministering angel shall my 'father' be,
When thou liest howling."

"A representative of the Times called on Rev. Mr. Sabine yesterday, with a view of ascertaining his version of his refusal to read the service for the burial of the dead, in Mr. Holland's case. The following conversation ensued:—

Reporter—Will you please furnish me with your statement in regard to a request for your attendance as a clergyman at the funeral of the late Mr. George Holland, of Wallack's Theatre?

Mr. Sabine—A gentleman visited me on Thursday last, I think, and desired to have me officiate at a burial. He mentioned the name of one of my lady parishioners as a sort of introduction to me. I told him that I was willing to officiate at the funeral. The gentleman subsequently said that it was fair that I should know all the circumstances, as he understood that some clergymen objected to taking part at the obsequies of a play-actor. He said that the deceased was a play-actor.

Reporter—What answer did you make, Mr. Sabine?

Mr. Sabine—I said that I had a distaste for officiating at such a funeral, and that I did not care to be mixed up in it. I said to the gentleman that I was willing to bury the deceased from his house, but that I objected to having the funeral solemnized at church.

Reporter—Did you recommend Mr. Jefferson to visit any other clergyman?

Mr. Sabine—Was it Mr. Jefferson who called on me?

Reporter—Yes, sir.

Mr. Sabine—He did not give me his name, but I thought that he was an actor. I told him that he might obtain the church around the corner from mine for the funeral service. I had read in the newspapers that funerals of actors had taken place at Mr. Houghton's church.

Reporter—Is it one of the laws of the Protestant Episcopal Church that a deceased theatrical performer shall not be buried from the church?

Mr. Sabine—It is not. But I have always warned the professing members of my congregation to keep away from theatres and not to have anything to do with them. I don't think that they teach moral lessons.

Reporter—Are Episcopal clergymen generally opposed to burying an actor from a church?

Mr. Sabine—I cannot speak for any except myself. I cannot tell whether Dr. Tyng or Dr. Sabine would object if they were asked. One clergyman told me yesterday that he would have refused, if he had been called on.

Reporter—Would you decline to bury an actor from your church, if you were asked to do so at the present time?

Mr. Sabine—I think I would.

Reporter—Did Mr. Jefferson, on hearing you announce that Rev. Dr. Houghton might officiate at the funeral, say,—"God bless that little church around the corner?"

Mr. Sabine—He did not. I think his remark was,—"All credit to that little church."

Rev. J. J. Lewis, of Boston, relates an anecdote of Father Taylor, who rebuked a Methodist brother who remarked that Theodore Parker was lost, by saying,—"Don't mention it, then, for if it is so, and the fact should become generally known, the tide of emigration would soon set in that direction."

The literary arena is evidently overthronged. The other day a gentleman sent a manuscript to a certain monthly magazine, and received in reply the following note,—"The editor will not be able to glance at your MS. for several years. It is now at my office awaiting your wishes."

"I have just had the exquisite pleasure," observes one Chinese father to another, "of beholding your pile-of-volumes-son and your string-of-rubies-daughter." "Nay," responds the other, with infinite humility, "dog-of-a-son have I none, though a bambooble-cat-of-a-daughter I have."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Mr. Frothingham's New Book.

CHILD'S BOOK OF RELIGION, for Sunday Schools and Homes. PART I., Worship; PART II., The Good Life; PART III., Truth. In one Volume. New and revised edition. Forwarded free on receipt of $1.00.

55-68

DAVID G. FRANCIS,
17 Astor Place, New York.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

Free Religious Association.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, on "The Idea of the Free Religious Association;" DAVID A. WASSON, on "The Nature of Religion;" MRS. E. D. CHENEY, on "Religion as a Social Force;" F. E. ABBOT, on "The Future of Religious Organization as affected by the Spirit of the Age;" R. B. JOHNSON, on "The Natural Sympathy of Religions;" RABBI WISE, on "The Universal Elements in Judaism;" COL. T. W. HIGGINSON, on "Mohammedanism;" WM. H. CHANNING, on "The Religions of China;" W. J. POTTER, on "The Religions of India;" and an abstract of a discussion on the "Relation of Religion to the Public School System of the United States." This Report is specially representative of the principles of the Association. Price 50 cents. In packages of five or more 30 cents each. Also CHANNING'S Address on "THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA," (a careful and instructive essay, of particular interest at this time to Americans) in a separate pamphlet for 20 cents.

The ANNUAL REPORT for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cents respectively), Rev. Samuel Johnson's essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cents), and an essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by WM. J. POTTER (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained by applying to the Secretary. The Report for 1868 contains a letter from the celebrated Hindu Theist, KESUB CHUNDER SEN, on the "Origin and Aims of the Brahmo Samaj," also an address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, on "Religion and Social Science;" a letter from M. D. CONWAY, on "Religious Movements in England," and speeches by JAS. FARMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLIER, CHAS. H. MALCOM, JOHN WEISS, and others. The Report for 1869 has addresses by RALPH WALDO EMERSON, D. A. WASSON, JULIA WARD HOWE, C. A. BARTOL, PROF. DENTON, HORACE SEEVER, LUCY STONE, and others.

SINGLE COPIES

OF

THE INDEX for 1870

Containing the following

ESSAYS,

Will be mailed from THE INDEX office (post-paid) on receipt of

FIVE CENTS:

	No.
The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion,.....	1
What is Free Religion?.....	2
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Corner-Stones,.....	3
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Institutions,.....	4
Terms of Fellowship, Social Ideal, Moral Ideal, and Essential spirit,.....	5
The Practical Work of Free Religion,.....	6
Unitarianism versus Freedom,.....	7
Sunday Schools,.....	8
Friendship,.....	9
The Miracle Question,.....	10
Grief and its Compensations,.....	11
The Hebrew Prophets,.....	12
Capital Punishment,.....	13
Human Ideals,.....	14
The Essence of Religion,.....	15
The Management of Children,.....	16
A Quaker's Letter to a Presbyterian, R. S. D.,.....	17
Comparison of Jesus and Socrates. (Report from the N. Y. Tribune),.....	18
The Candle of the Lord,.....	19
Public Opinion,.....	20
Conscience,.....	21
The Pedigree of Man,.....	22
"Following Christ,".....	23
The Tongue,.....	24
The Golden Age,.....	25
What is Truth?.....	26
The Last Battle on the Creed Question,.....	27
Observance of the Sabbath, Rev. W. W. Williams,.....	28
The Sunday Question,.....	29
Motes and Beams,.....	30
The Dove's Departure,.....	31
The Bible in the Public Schools,.....	32
Religious Freedom,.....	33
A Plain Talk to Young Men,.....	34
Noise,.....	35
The Humility of Free Religion,.....	36
Chaos and Cosmos,.....	37
An Oration on Alexander Von Humboldt,.....	38
Relation of Spiritualism to Free Religion,.....	39
War and Free Religion,.....	40
Religious Revivals,.....	41
Mary and Martha,.....	42
The Ministry of Free Religion,.....	43
Success,.....	44
"Repentance" and "Forgiveness,".....	45
Spiritual Beauty,.....	46
The Book of Daniel,.....	47
The Unity of Spiritual Freedom and the Opportunity which America offers for its Development. W. J. Potter,.....	48
The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition,.....	49
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? Chas. Reesman,.....	50
The Work of Radicalism in Indiana. J. O. Martin,.....	51
Religion in the Light of Reason and Common Sense. Isaac M. Wise,.....	52
Sunday—Its Uses and Abuses. Thomas Vickers,.....	53
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? E. Peckham,.....	54
Parties and Party Spirit,.....	55
The Future of Religious Organization, as Affected by the Spirit of the Age,.....	56
The Incarnation. A Christmas Discourse,.....	57
Transient and Permanent,.....	58

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX PROSPECTUS FOR 1871.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869, and is just closing its first yearly volume.

We deem it proper, therefore, to submit the following PROSPECTUS of Volume II for 1871, and ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if the matter was properly presented to them, and especially if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor. We cannot afford to send out travelling agents, nor would they succeed so well in getting names as persons of local influence. We therefore have determined to use the funds it would cost to get our paper before the people, in another way, namely, in the purchase of articles of value to be given as premiums to those who make up lists of subscribers; thus presenting to the friends of free thought and pure religion the double motive of doing good and getting paid for it.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two DOLLARS a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

PREMIUMS.

For Fifty Names, we will give one of PRINCE & Co's four Octave Melodeons (price $65,) or a complete copy of CHAMBERS' Encyclopedia of Universal Knowledge, in ten volumes (price $50).

For Forty Names, we will give a Wilson's Family Sewing Machine, one of the best Machines made.

For Twenty-Five Names, Webster's Royal Quarto Unabridged Pictorial Dictionary (price $12), or one of the following Chromos:

The Three Tom-Boys (Prang's), price $15.00
Winter in the Forest, 20x28..... 12.00
Watering the Horses, 21x29..... 12.00

For Ten Names, one of the following Chromos:

WHITTIER'S Barefooted Boy, (Prang's) price..... $5.00
The Unconscious Sleeper, 11x17..... 6.00
Mt. Blanc, 20x26..... 7.50
Or a copy of LECKY'S History of European Morals, 2 vols 6.00
MAX MUELLER'S Chips from a German Work-Shop, 2 vols 5.00
EMERSON'S Prose Works, 2 vols..... 5.00
Weiss's Life and Correspondence of THEODORE PARKER, 2 volumes..... 6.00

For Five Names, a bound volume of THE INDEX, for 1870. (Price $2.50.) Or a copy of one of the following works, (post paid):

DARWIN'S Origin of Species, price..... $2.00
LUBBOCK'S Origin of Civilization, price..... 2.00
Essays in Criticism, by MATTHEW ARNOLD, price..... 2.00
Tablets, by A. BRONSON ALCOCK, with portrait, price..... 2.00
Any volume of the writings of THEODORE PARKER or HENRY D. THOREAU, each..... 2.00
On the Heights, AUERBACH..... 2.00

For Four Names, a copy of THE INDEX for 1871, or one of the following books (post paid):

EMERSON'S Society and Solitude, price..... $1.75
Nathan the Wise, a dramatic poem translated from LESSING by ELLEN FROTHINGHAM, price..... 1.75
HUXLEY'S Lay Sermons and Addresses..... 1.75
Speeches and Lectures, by WENDELL PHILLIPS..... 1.50
Historic Americans, by THEODORE PARKER, price..... 1.50
A copy of The Revolution..... 2.00
Or The Woman's Journal..... 2.00

CASH PREMIUMS.

For 75 Names,.....50 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 50 Names,.....25 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 25 Names,.....15 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 10 Names,.....5 Dollars in Greenbacks
For less than 10 Names, a Cash Commission of Twenty per Cent.

Any book in the above list will be sent by us post-paid upon the receipt of price.

N. B.—Names need not all come from one post office. We will send the paper wherever directed, and let the names count as clubs. Specimen Copies sent to all who enclose a three cent postage stamp. Address

F. E. ABBOT, Editor,
DRAWER 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Guardian Mutual Life Ins. Co.,

ORGANIZED A. D. 1859.

M. G. Waggoner, Gen. Supt. for Ohio, Mich. & Ind.

John H. Hood, Assistant General Superintendent.

Office No. 154 Summit Street,

E. F. MUNGER, } General Agents.
CHAS. M. LANG, }

WALTER C. SCOTT, Local Agent, 152 Summit St.

Special Agents—Kelly Bros., 22 Summit Street.
Office Hours—From 7 in the morning till 9 at night.
Medical Examiners—Drs. Samuel S. Thorn and T. J. Eaton Toledo, O. [18y1]

H. M. EDSON,

A. TERRY.

EDSON & TERRY, DENTISTS,

ROOMS 8 & 9 GRADOLPH BLOCK,

TOLEDO, OHIO.

ap16 1y

IMPORTER

Fine Chemicals, Drugs, and Toilet Articles.

Brandies, Wines & Liquors for medicinal purposes only. Also Proprietor of

Toledo Tonic Bitters,

Greatest Remedy known for general debility.

L. E. MULFORD,

23 Summit Street, Corner Perry, Toledo, Ohio
18-1y

THE CELEBRATED CRAIG MICROSCOPE

is an optical wonder, reveals thousands of the hidden Wonders of Nature; is of permanent use and practical availability, combining instruction with amusement, and never losing its interest. It magnifies

TEN THOUSAND TIMES,

a power equal to other Microscopes of many times its cost. Reveals countless little worlds all around us, teeming with life, which to the naked eye must forever remain a sealed book—as Bells in Vinegar. Animals in Water, Cheese Mites, Sugar and Itch Insects, Milk Globules, Claws and Hairs of Insects. Hundreds of eyes in a single eye of a Fly, Dust of a Butterfly's Wings to be perfectly formed Feathers, the much talked of Trichina Spiralis, or Pork Worm, which was first discovered in America with this Microscope.

It is of infinite value to professional men, to teachers, and to students, but NOWHERE IS IT OF GREATER VALUE THAN AT THE FAMILY TABLE, within the reach of every member. It will delight yourself, your children, and your friends during the long winter evenings. It will show you adulterations or uncleanness of various kinds in food, as sugar, tea, bread, meat, etc.

It is of Inestimable Value to the Farmer

in examining insects which prey upon his crops. The power of a $50 Microscope, and so simple in its construction that any child can use it understandingly, and with appreciation.

A Beautiful Present—Elegant, Instructive, Amusing, and Cheap. Over 60,000 sold.

During the past six years its worth has been testified to by thousands of Scientific Men, Farmers, School Teachers, Students, Physicians, Heads of Families, and others.

PRICE, $3.00—Sent by Mail Post paid.

Every instrument is neatly boxed, and handsomely labelled with full directions for use. Thousands have been sent by mail. Address, W. J. LINESS & CO., CHICAGO.

FREE! FREE!

"THE MICROSCOPE," a Monthly Journal of Information for the People—the mysteries of Nature explained—interesting information on the wonders of Creation—stories, sketches, etc. Terms $1.00 per year. This Journal will be sent FREE for one year to any one purchasing a Craig Microscope at the regular price, $3.00. (Craig Microscope will be sent post-paid.)

For sample copy, and our beautifully illustrated and descriptive circulars, and eight pages of testimonials of Craig Microscope, send six cents for postage to

W. J. LINESS & CO.,

Opticians, and Sole Proprietors of Craig and Novelty Microscope, CHICAGO, ILL.

AGENTS and DEALERS, this Microscope sells in every family on its merits, when exhibited. LARGE PROFITS. Send for terms. 53t.6

SERMONS

By Rev. O. B. Frothingham

Forwarded free on receipt of five cents for each.

What is it to be a Christian?
Taking God's Name in Vain.
The Issue with Superstition.
Infernal and Celestial Love.
The Sin Against the Holy Ghost.
Pilate and Jesus.
The Dying and the Living God.
The Fees of Society.
The Living Spring of Water.
Elective Affinity.
Religious Irreligion.
Experience and Hope.
The Radical Belief.
The Eternal Gospel.

DAVID G. FRANCIS,
17 Astor Place, New York.

49t3]

WORK!

Profitable and useful employment in canvassing for the Monthly and Weekly editions of the Christian at Work. Rev. Stephen H. Tyng, Jr., Editor in Chief. NOT DENOMINATIONAL. Address 52t4 H. W. ADAMS, 27 Beekman St., New York.

THE FIRST VOLUME OF THE RADICAL.

Persons wishing to complete their sets of THE RADICAL by adding the First VOLUME, which has been for some time out of print, can do so by at once sending me their orders. By reprinting this volume in part, I can supply 100 copies. To be able to do this, I am obliged to fix the price at $5.00. This will secure a copy, sent to any address post paid.

Volume 2, 3, 4, and 5, will be sent, post paid, for $3.50 each. Single copies of THE RADICAL 35 cts. The May number contains Mr. Wasson's review of Mr. Abbot's Religion. The June number contains Mr. Frothingham's article on "What is Religion for?"

Address S. H. MORSE, office of "The Radical" Boston, Mass.

WANTED.—AGENTS. ($20 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock-stitch" (allike on both sides, and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest Family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Boston, Mass., Pittsburgh, Pa., Chicago, Ill., or St. Louis, Mo. 88y1

Ministers and Singers will find these particularly Adapted to the Voice. They contain no Cubebs, are very palatable, and act like a charm. Superior to all others for

Colds, Sore Throat, Bronchial and all Lung Difficulties.

RUSHTON'S (F. V.) COD LIVER OIL, for Consumption and Scrofula; the first introduced; fresh and pure. Sold by Druggists generally. 48m3.

A. J. GROVER,
Attorney at Law.

AND

WESTERN COLLECTOR,

EARLVILLE, LA SALLE CO., ILL.

Refers by Permission to

HAUGHTON, PERKINS & CO., BOSTON, MASS.
H. B. CLAPLIN & CO., NEW YORK.
J. J. DONALDSON, NATIONAL BANK OF NORTH AMERICA NEW YORK.
JOHN V. FARWELL & CO., CHICAGO.
WILLIAM R. HAIGHT, BANKER, EARLVILLE, ILL. 44-56.

Agents Wanted For

THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD Containing Fleetwood's "Life of Christ," "Lives of the Apostles, Evangelists and Martyrs," "Dodridge's" "Evidences of Christianity," "History of the Jews," by Josephus; "A History of all Religious Denominations," with treatises and tables relating to events connected with Bible History, containing many fine Engravings. The whole forming a complete Treasury of Christian Knowledge. W. FLINT & CO., No. 26 S. 7th St., Phila., & Custom House Place, Chicago, and 176 W. 4th St., Cincinnati. [48m3.]

THE INDEX,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION

Published by the

Index Association, at TOLEDO OHIO.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

Terms, Two Dollars a Year.

Advertisements taken for THE INDEX by all responsible Advertising Agents.

Address.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,

Lock Box 38, Toledo, Ohio.

AGENTS:—

TOLEDO, O., HENRY S. STEBBINS, 115 Summit St.
TOLEDO, O., JULIUS T. FREY, 47 Summit St.
NEW YORK, N. Y., DION THOMAS, 142 Nassau St.
BOSTON, MASS., CROSBY & DAMELL, 100 Washington St.
CINCINNATI, O., HAWLEY'S NEWS DEPOT, 164 Vine St.
ST. LOUIS, MO., WARREN CHASE, 601 North Fifth St.
DETROIT, MICH., WM. E. TUNNEY, 86 Woodward Av.
SYRACUSE, N. Y., LEWIS & WHELAN, 7 Granger Block.

The Index.

VOL. 2.—No. 3.

TOLEDO, OHIO, JANUARY 21, 1871.

WHOLE No. 56.

The Index,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO
FREE RELIGION.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, EDITOR.

OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM,

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON,

WILLIAM J. POTTER,

RICHARD P. HALLOWELL,

EDITORIAL CONTRIBUTORS.

MODERN PRINCIPLES:

A SYNOPSIS OF FREE RELIGION.

[The following outline is offered as a purely individual interpretation of the free religious movement, it being proper to state that few, if any, of its other friends will wholly agree with it.—Ed.]

I. CHRISTIANITY AS A SYSTEM.

1. Regarded as to its universal element, Christianity is a beautiful but imperfect presentation of natural morality.

2. Regarded as to its special element, Christianity is a great completed system of faith and life—a coherent body of doctrines logically developed and organized as an historical power by the Christian Church. It claims absolute control over the collective life of society and the outward and inward life of the individual. It rests this claim on the supernatural revelation of the will of God; that is, on the principle of DIVINE AUTHORITY.

3. The chief features of this system are the doctrines of the Fall of Adam, the Total Depravity of the human race, the Everlasting Punishment of the wicked, and Salvation by Christ alone. Through the transgression of the first man, all human beings lie under the consuming wrath of God, and are condemned to an everlasting hell, from which the only escape is by the Atonement of Christ.

4. This system demands absolute and unreasoning submission from the human mind. It teaches that doubt is sin, and that disbelief is damnation. It everywhere condemns freedom of thought, and persecutes it in proportion to its power. It is the worst enemy of liberty, science, and civilization, because it is organized DESPAIR OF MAN.

II. FREE RELIGION AS A SYSTEM.

5. Free Religion is a great and growing system of ideas, hitherto very imperfectly developed, but destined to become embodied in a world-wide Commonwealth of Man. It will claim absolute control over the collective life of society and the outward and inward life of the individual. It will rest this claim on the natural perception of truth by the universal reason of the race; that is, on the principle of HUMAN FREEDOM.

6. The chief features of this system are the supremacy of liberty in all matters of government, the supremacy of science in all matters of belief, the supremacy of morality in all matters of conduct, and the supremacy of benevolence in all social and personal relations. It puts the Church on the level of all other institutions, the Bible on the level of all other books, the Christ on the level of all other men, leaving them to stand or fall by their intrinsic merits or demerits.

7. This system encourages the largest activity of the human mind, and asks no assent that can be withheld. It is the best friend of progress of every kind, because it is organized FAITH IN MAN.

III. ANTAGONISM OF THE TWO SYSTEMS.

8. Between these two great systems there exists an absolute conflict of principles, aims, and methods. The one ruled the world in the Dark Ages of the past. The other will rule the world in the Light Ages of the future. Their battle-ground is the Twilight Age of the present.

9. Free Religion emphasizes the Unity of the Universe, the Unity of Mankind, the Unity of the Person, and the Unity of the Unities.

IV. THE UNITY OF THE UNIVERSE.

10. Nature is an organic, living whole. All things are in harmony as parts of a perfect cosmos. All phenomena, physical and spiritual, are correlated in the unity of a perfect order.

11. The laws of Nature are elements of one underlying, all-permeating, all-comprehensive system of Law. Fixed and inviolable, from eternity to eternity they know no change. The belief in miracle is an infinite delusion.

12. The forces of Nature are modes of one omnipresent Energy, illimitable, uncreatable, indestructible—the cause of all metamorphoses and the life of all that lives.

13. Thus Nature is infinitely many in her phenomena, and absolutely one in her order, laws, and forces.

V. THE UNITY OF MANKIND.

14. The origin of the human race is one, in virtue of a common descent from inferior types of being.

15. The nature of the human race is one, in virtue of the universal possession, in varying degrees, of the same fundamental faculties.

16. The destiny of the human race is one, in virtue of a slow but constant progress towards a universal and perfect civilization.

17. The human race ought to be a political unit, as a universal Republic of Republics based on the principle that the liberty of the individual is absolute except as limited by the equal rights of all individuals.

18. The human race ought to be a social unit, as a universal Co-operative Union based on free industry and free commerce,—labor and capital being reconciled by the education of ignorance and the reformation of selfishness.

19. The human race ought to be a religious unit, as a universal Brotherhood of Man based on faith in human nature and love for all human beings.

20. Thus the human race is one in origin, nature, and destiny; and it ought to be one politically, socially, and religiously.

VI. THE UNITY OF THE PERSON.

21. Every human being is an independent consciousness, manifesting itself on the one hand in numerous unlike faculties (sensation, perception, locomotion, passion, affection, will, reason, conscience, etc.,) and manifesting itself on the other hand in the absolute unity of personality (the I).

22. Every human being ought to develop the unity of personality into the unity of character, based on the principle that the liberty of every faculty is absolute in the exercise of its natural function.

23. The unity of character requires that the Intellect shall make experience its point of departure, reason its road, knowledge its goal, and the love of truth its inspiration and guide; that it shall count all questions open that are not shut by positive demonstration; that it shall reject all answers which have no better basis than ignorant assumption or dogmatic authority; and that it shall seek answers to all questions through the patient study of universal Nature according to the laws of scientific thought.

24. The unity of character requires that the Conscience shall govern all personal action by absolute and universal moral ideas (truthfulness, justice, benevolence, purity, honor, integrity, self-respect); that it shall speak in all places and at all times with the voice of absolute command; that it shall shine like a sun that never sets, flooding the soul with the light of an ever-beautiful ideal; that it shall unsparingly rebuke every betrayal of the right, encourage fidelity to it by approving smiles, and waken deathless aspiration towards it by unveiling the eternal possibility of virtue; and that it shall make the welfare of all a private duty to each, thus consecrating the private life to the public good.

25. The unity of character requires that the Affections shall irradiate life in all its relations with the splendor of unselfish love; that they shall make manhood more manly and womanhood more womanly by blending them in one pure and happy home; that they shall dignify existence with noble friendships; that they shall deepen the joy and lighten the grief of others by respectful and tender sympathy; that they shall reverence the good and pity the evil in every human soul, and broaden out into a mighty and self-forgetful love of universal man.

26. The unity of character requires that the Will shall serve the conscience and reason, and know no other law; that it shall master the passions, and confine them to their lawful functions; that it shall be incorruptible in this servanthip, and unconquerable in this mastership; and that thus, harmonizing the animal and the spiritual, it shall bring the entire man into harmony with the laws of Nature.

27. The unity of character requires that the Sentiments and Imagination shall soar to the beautiful and sublime, and never trail their wings in defiling mire; that they shall venerate the truly venerable, delight in the magnificence of universal Nature, and thrill to its mysterious life; that they shall recognize the infinitude of the unknown, and add to the clear insights of science the deep glow of poetry and the deeper reverence of worship.

28. Thus the individual is one in the unity of personality, and ought to be one in the unity of a free, powerful, and self-harmonized character.

VII. THE UNITY OF THE UNITIES.

29. The Unity of the Universe is repeated in miniature in the ideal Unity of Mankind; and the ideal Unity of Mankind is repeated in miniature in the ideal Unity of the Person. The macrocosm is mirrored in the microcosm.

30. The great inspiration of the nineteenth century is faith in these ideal unities as possible in fact. Its faith in Man is part of its faith in universal Nature; and its faith in universal Nature includes and necessitates its faith in Man.

31. The great endeavor, half-conscious though it be, of the nineteenth century is thus to reproduce the eternal harmony of Nature in the life of the race and the life of the individual,—to create a civilization grounded on universal reverence for freedom, truth, and the equal rights of all mankind.

32. The Universe is Many in One, and One in Many. Such also will be Humanity, when its ideals shall have been realized in the world and in the soul. The national motto of America has become the great watchword of the ages—

E PLURIBUS UNUM.

CHRISTIANITY AND CIVILIZATION.

[Read to the First Independent Society of Toledo, Dec. 18, 1870.]

"In the first two centuries of the Christian Church the moral elevation was extremely high, and was continually appealed to as a proof of the divinity of the creed. In the century before the conversion of Constantine, a marked depression was already manifest. The two centuries after Constantine are uniformly represented as a period of general and scandalous vice. The ecclesiastical civilization that followed, though not without its distinctive merits, assuredly supplies no justification of the common boast about the regeneration of society by the Church. That the civilization of the last three centuries has risen in most respects to a higher level than any that had preceded it, I at least firmly believe; but theological ethics, though very important, form but one of the many and complex elements of its excellence. Mechanical inventions, the habits of industrialism, the discoveries of physical science, the improvements of government, the expansion of literature, the traditions of Pagan antiquity, have all a distinguished place, while, the more fully history is investigated, the more clearly two capital truths are disclosed. The first is that the influence of theology having for centuries benumbed and paralyzed the whole intellect of Christian Europe, the revival, which forms the starting-point of our modern civilization, was mainly due to the fact that two spheres of intellect still remained uncontrolled by the sceptre of Catholicism. The Pagan literature of antiquity and the Mohammedan schools of science were the chief agencies in resuscitating the dormant energies of Christendom. The second fact, which I have elsewhere endeavored to establish in detail, is that during more than two centuries the decadence of theological influence has been one of the most invariable signs and measures of our progress. In medicine, physical science, commercial interests, politics, and even ethics, the reformer has been confronted with theological affirmations which barred his way, which were all defended as of vital importance, and were all in turn compelled to yield before the secularizing influence of civilization."

LECKY, History of European Morals, Vol. II, pp. 17, 18.

"The first Christian Emperor transferred his capital to a new city, uncontaminated by the traditions and the glories of Paganism; and he there founded an empire which derived all its ethics from Christian sources, and which continued in existence for about eleven hundred years. Of that Byzantine Empire the universal verdict of history is that it constitutes, without a single exception, the most thoroughly base and despicable form that civilization has yet assumed."

Ibid. Vol. II, p. 13.

"The condition of the Western Empire was somewhat different. Not quite a century after the conversion of Constantine, the Imperial City was captured by Alaric, and a long series of barbarian invasions at last dissolved the whole framework of Roman society, while the barbarians themselves, having adopted the Christian faith and submitted absolutely to the Christian priests, the Church, which remained the guardian of all the treasures of antiquity, was left with a virgin soil to realize her ideal of human excellence. Nor did she fall short of what might be expected. She exercised for many centuries an almost absolute empire over the thoughts and actions of mankind, and created a civilization which was permeated in every part with ecclesiastical influence. And the dark ages, as the period of Catholic ascendancy is justly called, do undoubtedly display many features of great and genuine excellence. In active benevolence, in the spirit of reverence, in loyalty, in co-operative habits, they far transcend the noblest ages of Pagan antiquity; while in that humanity which shrinks from the infliction of suffering they were superior to Rome, and in respect for chastity to Greek civilization. On the other hand, they rank immeasurably below the best Pagan civilizations in civic and patriotic virtues, in the love of liberty, in the number and splendor of the great characters they produced, in the dignity and beauty of the type of character they formed. They had their full share of tumult, anarchy, injustice, and war, and they should probably be placed, in all intellectual virtues, lower than any other period in the history of mankind. A boundless intolerance of all divergence of opinion was united with an equally boundless toleration of all falsehood and deliberate fraud that could favor received opinions. Credulity being taught as a virtue, and all conclusions dictated by authority, a deadly torpor sank upon the human mind, which for many centuries almost suspended its action, and was only broken by the scrutinizing, innovating, and free-thinking habits that accompanied the rise of the industrial republics of Italy. Few men who are not either priests or monks would not have preferred to live in the best days of the Athenian or of the Roman republics, in the age of Augustus or in the age of the Antonines, rather than in any period that elapsed between the triumph of Christianity and the fourteenth century."

Ibid. Vol. II, pp. 15, 16.

"The more carefully the Christian legislation of the Empire is examined, and the more fully it is compared with what had been done under the influence of Stoicism by the Pagan legislators, the more evident, I think, it will appear that the golden age of Roman law was not Christian but Pagan. Great works of codification were accomplished under the younger Theodosius and under Justinian; but it was in the reign of Pagan Emperors, and especially of Hadrian and Alexander Severus, that nearly all the most important measures were taken redressing injustice, elevating oppressed classes, and making the doctrine of the natural equality and fraternity of mankind the basis of legal enactments. Receiving the heritage of these laws, the Christians no doubt added something; but a careful examination will show that it was surprisingly little. In no respect is the greatness of the Stoic philosophers more conspicuous than in the contrast between the gigantic steps of legal reform made in a few years under their influence, and the almost insignificant steps taken when Christianity had obtained an ascendancy in the empire, not to speak of the long period of decrepitude that followed. . . . The most prominent evidence, indeed, of ecclesiastical influence in the Theodosian code, is that which must be most lamented. It is in the immense mass of legislation intended on the one hand to elevate the clergy into a separate and sacred caste, and on the other to persecute, in every form and with every degree of violence, all who deviated from the fine line of Catholic orthodoxy."

Ibid. Vol. II, pp. 44-46.

"Damascus had been the seat of empire under the Omniades; it was removed by the succeeding family to their new city of Bagdad. There are not any names in the long line of Khalifs, after the companions of Mahomet, more renowned in history than some of the earlier sovereigns who reigned in this capital, Almansor, Haroun Alraschid, and Almamun. Their splendid palaces, their numerous guards, their treasures of gold and silver, the populousness and wealth of their cities, formed a striking contrast to the rudeness and poverty of the western nations in the same age. In their court, learning, which the first Moslem had despised as unwelcome or rejected as profane, was held in honor. The Khalif Almamun, especially, was distinguished for his patronage of letters; the philosophical writings of Greece were eagerly sought and translated; the stars were numbered, the course of the planets was measured; the Arabians improved upon the science they borrowed, and returned it with abundant interest to Europe in the communication of numeral figures and the intellectual language of algebra."

HALLAM, View of the State of Europe during the Middle Ages, p. 252.

"I am very much disposed to believe, notwithstanding what seems to be the general opinion, that Mahomet had never read any part of the New Testament. His knowledge of Christianity appears to be wholly derived from the apocryphal gospels, and similar works. He admitted the miraculous conception and prophetic character of Jesus, but not his divinity or pre-existence."

Ibid. p. 250, (note).

"This, then, was the first and principal effect of the Crusades, a great step towards the enfranchisement of mind, great progress towards more extensive and liberal ideas. . . . They [the Crusaders] also found themselves in juxtaposition with two civilizations, not only different from their own, but more advanced—the Greek on the one hand, and the Mohammedan on the other. . . . It is curious to observe in the old chronicles the impression which the Crusaders made upon the Mussulmans; these latter regarded them at first as barbarians, as the rudest, most ferocious, and most stupid class of men they had ever seen. The Crusaders, on their part, were struck with the riches and elegance of manners of the Mussulmans."

GUIZOT, History of Civilization, Vol. I, p. 154.

"We know, indeed, that Bagdad and Cordova became celebrated for all graceful refinements, for letters, even for toleration. We know that Science, physical and metaphysical, became a distinctive mark of the Arabians."

F. D. MAURICE, Religions of the World, p. 13.

"He [the Khalif Almamun] was not ignorant that they are the elect of God, his best and most useful servants, whose lives are devoted to the improvement of their rational faculties. . . . The teachers of wisdom are the true luminaries and legislators of a world which, without their aid, would again sink in ignorance and barbarism."

ABULPHARAGIUS [the Arabian historian, born A. D. 1226], quoted in GIBBON'S Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, Vol. V, p. 301.

"There was formed at the same time, in the heart of the Roman society, a society of a very different nature, founded upon totally different principles, animated by different sentiments, a society which was about to infuse into modern European society elements of a character wholly different; I speak of the Christian Church. I say, the Christian Church, and not Christianity. At the end of the fourth and at the beginning of the fifth century, Christianity was no longer merely an individual belief—it was an institution; it was constituted; it had its government, a clergy, an hierarchy calculated for the different functions of the clergy, revenues, means of independent action, rallying points suited for a great society, provincial, national, and general councils, and the custom of debating in common upon the affairs of the society. In a word, Christianity, at this epoch, was not only a religion—it was also a Church."

Had it not been a Church, I cannot say what might have happened to it amid the fall of the Roman Empire. I confine myself to simply human considerations; I put aside every element which is foreign to the natural consequences of natural facts; had Christianity been, as in the earlier times, no more than a belief, a sentiment, an individual conviction, we may believe that it would have sunk amidst the dissolution of the Empire, and the invasion of the barbarians. In later times, in Asia and in all the north of Africa, it sunk under an invasion of the same nature, under the invasion of the Moslem barbarians; it sunk then, although it subsisted in the form of an institution, or constituted church. With much more reason might the same thing have happened at the moment of the fall of the Roman Empire. There existed, at that time, none of those means by which, in the present day, moral influences establish themselves or offer resistance, independently of institutions; none of those means whereby a pure truth, a pure idea obtains a great empire over minds, governs actions, and determines events. Nothing of the kind existed in the fourth century to give a like authority to ideas and to personal sentiments. It is clear that a society strongly organized and strongly governed was indispensable to struggle against such a disaster, and to issue victorious from such a storm. I do not think that I say more than the truth in affirming that at the end of the fourth and the commencement of the fifth centuries it was the Christian Church that saved Christianity; it was the Church with its institutions, its magistrates, and its power, that vigorously resisted the internal dissolution of the Empire and barbarism; that conquered the barbarians and became the bond, the medium, and the principle of civilization between the Roman and barbarian worlds. It is, then, the condition of the Church rather than that of religion, properly so called, that we must look to, in order to discover what Christianity has, since then, added to modern civilization, and what new elements it has introduced therein. What was the Christian church at that period?"

GUIZOT, History of Civilization, Vol. I, pp. 82-84.

In my last lecture, I referred to the fact that the earliest civilizations have been found in the tropics, the highest in the temperate zone; and found a sufficient cause for this fact in the superabundance of cheap food in tropical climates, which tends to create a premature and speedily arrested social development. A surplus of food stimulated population, and thereby reduced wages; and the wealth acquired, falling into few hands, became the foundation of social inequalities which destroyed the liberty of the people, and established a system of caste which rendered true civilization impossible. Having next defined true civilization as the practical reconciliation of the unity of the race with the liberty of the individual, so as to ensure at the same time universal progress and universal order, I endeavored to apply this standard in determining the character of the causes which have produced European and American civilization. Modern society being, as it were, twisted of three principal strands, Græco-Roman civilization, Germanic barbarism, and Christianity,—or rather being a stream flowing from these three fountain-heads,—I tried to sketch briefly what it has derived from each of these. Greek individualism, or the emphasis of the natural development of the individual, and Roman imperialism, or the emphasis of the public life of the race, I considered to be the great principles transmitted from Pagan antiquity; while a true conception of personal independence, irrespective of citizenship in a petty State or a vast Empire, seemed to be absent from it. This missing element, however, I found in the Northern barbarism which at last overflowed the exhausted civilization of Rome like an inundation of the Nile. Out of this sentiment of personal independence, combined with the peculiar clannishness of the barbarians, grew the great feudal system of the Middle Ages, which, however crudely, foreshadowed the true theory of political life as finally established in the American Republic.

It remains to-day, therefore, to discover the part played by Christianity in the slow development of Western civilization. Its influences have been and are so complex, that I cannot pretend to do more than give the barest outline of my thought, and must leave unstated most of the facts on which I base it. I will begin by emphasizing a distinction between the universal and special elements of Christianity which has been already made in the "Fifty Affirmations," but which has nevertheless failed to win the attention it must yet receive from philosophical students of religion.

By the universal element of Christianity, I mean the moral principles and spiritual aspirations, sentiments, and affections which all other religions share with it in greater or less degree. The conviction of a profound, underlying oneness among all the world's great religions is in these days growing very deep and strong; and while it tends to enlarge human sympathies, and dissipate the mean jealousies and harsh, false antagonisms which have embittered the relations of unlike believers, it also tends for the time being to obscure the perception of fundamental and ineffaceable differences. Christian ethics, so far as valid for all times and climes, belong to that universal element of Christianity which is not Christian, but human, and is found substantially the same in all the other great faiths which have divided the world's allegiance. The Golden Rule, for instance, belongs to universal man, and has no more organic connection with Christianity than with Confucianism or Judaism. The universal element of Christianity is that in it which re-appears wherever the human conscience has spoken its commanding word, or the human heart has loved, suffered, or burned with inextinguishable aspirations for a higher life. It belongs to the human race, not to any historical religion.

The special element of Christianity, however, is dogmatic and ecclesiastical,—on the one hand a series of doctrines to be mentally assented to, and on the other a great institution enforcing these, and demanding to be obeyed and maintained in power. These constitute the Christian system, which, administered by an ecclesiastical hierarchy, appears in history as the Christian Church. If Christianity had not been a Church, it could never have survived the wreck of ancient society. Its ethics would not have saved it, even if far more perfect than was the fact. To its special element it owes its very existence as a religion, not only in human society as an historical power, but also in the individual soul as a moral and spiritual power. I find a strange inappreciation of this truth in a certain class of radical thinkers, who sympathize with the universal element of Christianity, but, lacking the historical consciousness, discard its special element as unessential and accidental.

The connection, however, between the universal and special elements of Christianity is an absolutely vital one. To sever it is at once to destroy Christianity as a religion, and deprive its name of all significance. Subtract the universal element—eliminate from Christianity its morality and inward spirit, leaving only the hard exterior of dogma, form, and institution,—and the most devoted Christian would at once exclaim—"Away with the corpse under ground!" But subtract the special element,—overthrow the moss-grown edifice of Christian theology and Christian institutions,—and the universal element becomes a disembodied ghost, vanishing into thin air at the approach of light. A corpse or a ghost—such is Christianity, if once its universal and special elements are parted; in either case, dead beyond hope, so far as the living world of man is concerned. In truth, Christianity is a river, with definite sources, definite channel, definite mouth. What is a river? A lody of water, flowing ultimately into the sea between banks that determine its course. The universal element of Christianity is the water itself,—water, the same everywhere all over the globe, owing no allegiance to the banks it fertilizes, but passing onward to mingle with kindred drops in the depths of ocean, or to fall in showers upon the bosom of the earth. But the special element of Christianity is the banks that confine the water, and guide its course. What the river would be without its water or without its banks, such would be Christianity without its universal or its special element. Distinct yet inseparable, these two are equally essential to its existence as an active force in human history. Separate them—abolish either,—and only a memory will remain.

Now the influence of the universal element on civilization, so far as it can be isolated, has unquestionably been good; while the influence of the special element has been partly good and partly evil. The pure morality of the Church, although somewhat one-sided and incomplete, has been a blessing to mankind. Especially in the early ages of its history, it raised the character and conduct of the Christians so high as to excite the admiration even of their persecutors. From the time, however, that Christianity became the dominant religion of the world, this collective moral superiority ceased; and the day has long gone by when it was a prima facie proof of moral excellence to know that a man called himself a Christian. But it is impossible to consider the moral influence of Christianity as in fact separable from its special element. Christian morality is so indissolubly bound up with Christian doctrine, that it is always colored by it. Nay, more. The characters known in Christian history as the saintliest exhibitions of Christian morals have become such through the activity of specially Christian motives drawn from Christian theology. An impassioned love for Jesus, as Savior and Lord, lies at the root of their exceptional sanctity, and is, in Lecky's phrase, "the wellspring of whatever is best and purest in Christian life." There is, however, an embarrassing impropriety in speaking of "Christian morals." Morality is morality, universal and absolute; it deals with laws valid everywhere and always, and of unconditional obligation; it appeals solely to that which is universal in man, neither Christian nor extra-Christian, his moral nature; it lends itself to the service of no historical system. Hence the phrase "Christian morals" always implies that the command to do right is grounded on an appeal to motives drawn from the special element of Christianity, such, for instance, as the love of Jesus, the hope of heaven, or the fear of hell. In other words, morals can only become "Christian" by being filtered through Christian doctrine, and thus receiving from the latter a characteristic coloring.

The influence, therefore, of Christianity upon modern civilization has been neither purely moral nor purely theological, but a mixture of both. Christianity is not an abstraction, but has been a power in history BECAUSE IT HAS CAST UNIVERSAL MORALITY IN THE DEFINITE MOULD OF CHRISTIAN DOGMAS AND INSTITUTIONS. Our question thus resolves itself practically into the inquiry,—What has the CHRISTIAN CHURCH, the creation of the special element of Christianity, done for civilization?

At the period when Constantine assumed the imperial purple, the Christians numbered, according to Gibbon's estimate, only about one-twentieth of the population of the Roman Empire. But from that day the Christian Church aspired to the administration of the world. It soon achieved its end, and made the Emperors its tools. Guizot errs in imagining that the Church and the Empire had different principles. The dominant idea of Rome became the dominant idea of the Church, namely, the creation of a vast unity of the nations under one imperial government. Just as the minor kingdoms of the earth were swallowed up in the enormous Roman Empire, so were their jarring polytheisms swallowed up in the victorious Church. In fact, JESUS BECAME THE REAL EMPEROR OF ROME, AND HIS CHURCH THE REAL CUSTODIAN OF THE IDEA OF IMPERIALISM. The idea was all-inclusive; the fact, it is true, failed to embody it in completeness. Out of all the conflicting and heterogeneous elements of the Empire to construct an harmonious whole,—to create a public life consciously one and indivisible throughout the habitable globe,—this was the object of the Church, and it was also the object of the Empire. But while the Emperors aimed only at political unity, the Church aimed to add to this the unity of thought, of affection, and of will,—to complete the vast structure of political imperialism by creating, as its counterpart and fulfilment, a spiritual imperialism vaster still. True, the outward and the inward Empires were equally despotic; but if they had not corresponded to the wants of the time, neither could have existed. The point I wish to make clear and prominent is simply this, that the Roman Empire and the Roman Church were inspired by one and the same idea of absolute, universal imperialism; and that the Roman Church held it in a far higher and fuller and more thorough-going sense than the secular government. Though under the form of despotism, it seized and cherished with profound devotion the grand idea of the unity of man, and sought to mould human society throughout the world in accordance with it. The Church thus won its amazing victory over Paganism because in reality it expressed, far better than Paganism, the secret aspiration of the Pagan heart,—because it was really more Roman than Rome itself.

Now when the Northern barbarians came in conquering hordes, and at last annihilated the secular Empire, they submitted without resistance to the ecclesiastical Empire. They destroyed the visible unity of the Western world; but their swords were powerless against its invisible unity. They conquered Rome; they were conquered by Rome's idea. Imperialism, apparently extinguished in the dismemberment of the Roman dominion, survived in a subtler form in the Church; and in the course of centuries it re-appeared even in outward form in the temporal triumph of the Papacy. Here we find the secular and ecclesiastical Empires practically united under a single head; and although the temporal power of the Popedom never equalled that of the Roman Emperors, its spiritual power obtained so vast a development that the Pope, as an actual sovereign, wielded at last a mightier than the imperial sceptre. During the Dark Ages, therefore, when the very idea of public or national life seemed to have faded from the world's consciousness, and when the great truth of the unity of man appeared to be irrecoverably lost, the Church still preserved it, and transmitted to modern times this sublime principle, the greatest legacy of Rome. For this service, the special element of Christianity—the Christian Theology and Church—is entitled to the lasting gratitude of mankind.

The idea of Imperialism, thus preserved, still survives in its ancient form. The Northern barbarians submitted to the spiritual sway of Rome, although in their own turbulent fashion. Their much-vaunted conquest of Rome was, in fact, never accomplished. That passionate love of personal independence which I have mentioned as the great contribution of Germanic barbarism to modern civilization, for long struggled blindly and uneasily against the absolute domination of Rome; but ecclesiastical cunning and ambition were more than a match for it. For many centuries after the so-called downfall of the Roman Empire, Roman imperialism still governed Europe under the form of the Christian Church; and the pride of its pretensions, perpetuated in the great Papal pontificate and the feeble imitation of this by the various Protestant sects, remains unabated today. It is well to note, in passing, that the imperialism of Charlemagne and the later imperialism of the Bonapartes, which sought to revive under changed conditions the ancient Roman Empire, were simple monstrosities, and failed because the true Roman Empire still survived in the Catholic Church. The counterfeit was detected by mankind.

Let me state this most important truth exactly as it is, however strange the statement may appear. Until Christianity has ceased to be the great, dominant, universally recognized religion of the Western world, it is in vain to attempt to write the history of the "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire." The immortal work of Gibbon does but deal with the merest shell of the subject. THE ROMAN EMPIRE IS CHRISTIANITY. It is still a vast and powerful reality. It is not yet fallen. Its sway is somewhat weakened, but by no means destroyed. All the governments of the old world are still pledged to its support, and still maintain the clergy as the spiritual nobility of the Christian Church, the spiritual aristocracy in that invisible Roman Empire of which Jesus is the Emperor and the Head. Never was a blow aimed fairly at the roots of this enormous world-system of Christian Imperialism, until the government of the great American Republic was established on a purely secular basis. The American people dreamed not what they did. They builded better than they knew. The ultimate meaning of that fact is neither more nor less than the utter overthrow of Christianity as a great world-governing religion. That stern passion for freedom, not merely political but personal, which is the grandest trait of the Teutonic character, has fought with Rome from the earliest days of Christianity. Although it triumphed over Rome's political imperialism, it succumbed to her ecclesiastical imperialism, over which it won its first decisive victory in the founding of a purely secular government in the Western World. Here, friends, is the Roman Empire doomed to "decline and fall." We are the heirs of those old barbarians who but half did freedom's work. What they were too ignorant to do, the free-men of America, gradually educated by the influences of civil liberty, are destined to accomplish. Here is to be the tremendous death-struggle of Christian Imperialism with modern Republicanism; nor is the issue doubtful. And freedom's victory in America will be freedom's victory throughout the world.

To Protestants, and especially to Protestant liberals, I know that these statements must seem utterly and extravagantly wild. So completely habituated are they to look on Roman Catholicism as a corruption of Christianity rather than as a development of it, that, as Mr. Frothingham said last May in Boston,—“When Mr. Abbot says, Christianity culminates in Romanism, every Protestant nostril dilates with scorn.” So be it. For proof of my interpretation of Christianity, I appeal to the sober thought of posterity—to the enlarged experience of mankind. Compare with me the essential ideas of Roman Imperialism and of Christianity, and judge for yourselves how far I am right and how far Protestant nostrils are needlessly dilated.

The great ambition of Rome, during the later Commonwealth and the Empire, was to unite the known world under a single head. The union thus aimed at was purely political, nor was it ever absolutely realized. The conquest of the world was not so easily accomplished. But that was the aim steadily held in view and, so far as the wonderful military genius of Rome could avail, successfully carried out. To unite and govern a whole world by a single will—that was the clear, strong, stern ambition of the Cæsars, the great dominant idea of the Roman Empire.

Now in what did this idea differ from that of the Christian Church? Let history, not transcendental philosophy, reply. The gradually developed object of the Christian Church was simply to mount the imperial throne, wield the imperial power in its own interest, and extend the authority of the imperial sceptre over the affections and thoughts of all mankind. That is, it aimed to unite the whole world in obedience to the will of the Christ, of whom the Church stood as the visible vicegerent. Without in the least curtailing the absolutism of the Empire, it aspired to add to this an equally absolute control of human minds, consciences, hearts, and wills. It simply aimed to make the Roman Empire internal as well as external, and thus enlarge its boundaries by removing all limits to its sway even in the depths of the human soul. The gradual elevation of the bishopric of Rome to the universal Papacy was the inevitable result and outward expression of this ecclesiastical ambition, which was itself the natural consequence of the fundamental Christian idea of the Messiahship. The union of the temporal and spiritual powers in one Supreme Pontiff, whose will was the law of God to all Christendom,—what is this but the development of ancient Roman Imperialism into mediæval Catholic Imperialism? That this development took place, is the plainest fact of history. That it was the logical and necessary result of the Christian idea, is the equally plain conclusion of common sense.

Now it is the great merit of Imperialism, both under its Pagan and its Christian forms, that it held fast to the great truth of the unity of man. Rebellion was the greatest of crimes under the one—schism the greatest of crimes under the other. But it is the great demerit of both forms that they utterly sacrificed human liberty. Rome, ancient and modern, stands in history for the UNITY OF MAN ON THE BASIS OF AUTHORITY. Christianity did but complete and realize the ideal of Paganism. Its greatest merit and its greatest demerit, each the simple expansion of the corresponding merit and demerit of the Pagan Empire, give us a direct reply to our question concerning the influence of Christianity, and in particular its special element, on civilization. Bearing in mind our previously accepted test of true civilization,—namely, the practical reconciliation of the unity of the race with the liberty of the individual,—we can state this reply with precision. True civilization will secure the UNITY OF MAN ON THE BASIS OF FREEDOM. So far, therefore, as Christianity held firm, during the chaotic disorganization of the Middle Ages, to the sublime fact of the UNITY OF MAN, it rendered to the cause of civilization a service of unspeakable value. But so far as it insisted on the principle of AUTHORITY and trampled on the principle of FREEDOM, it dealt to this cause a most dangerous and ghastly wound. History contains indubitable proofs that it both rendered this service and dealt this wound; and both are to be attributed to its special—that is, its dogmatic and ecclesiastical—element. Allow me to point out a few great leading facts which sustain my conclusions.

In the period succeeding the decay of the ancient Pagan or Græco-Roman civilization, the utter dissolution of society was threatened. Anarchy of the most terrible character seemed almost universal. At that period, when lawlessness had taken the place of law, and disorder that of order, the great truth to which Imperialism held fast was most urgently required; and it was then that Christianity rendered to mankind its greatest service. Liberty is always impossible where there is no law; and what society most sorely needed was a deep conviction of the unity of man. This the Church not only taught, but by its powerful organization did the utmost possible to realize. Besides softening the fierce and cruel manners of the times, which it did in virtue of its universal or moral element, Christianity by its special element also held aloft the banner of an indivisible oneness of the race in the "kingdom of God"—the "Church of Christ." Without the development of this sense of a common interest, Europe might have remained what savage America once was, a wilderness inhabited only by disconnected and warring tribes or clans. The feudal system alone, if not reinforced by the influence of a universal Christian Church, would probably have failed to develop itself into a group of great nations. The social forces were all centrifugal; Christianity alone played the part of a centripetal force. In this influence which it then exerted lay a public benefit whose magnitude it would be difficult to over-estimate; and for its good results all credit should be yielded to historical Christianity.

The first great manifestation of a public European consciousness, which had been thus quietly developing in the mediæval society, was the outbreak of the crusading fever, which continued from the eleventh into the thirteenth century. The Crusades were a great and well-nigh universal uprising of the peoples of Europe to rescue the tomb of Jesus from the hands of the Moslem or "infidels." Their origin was, as you see, to be found in the special element of Christianity—in the superstitious adoration of the Head of the Church. To the special element of Christianity, therefore, must be attributed, directly or indirectly, both the good and the evil of this fanatical enterprise. The results of the Crusades were, on the one hand, untold misery and waste of treasure and blood,—on the other hand, the development of a great European consciousness, the consequent en-feeblerment of the feudal system, and a very beneficial contact with the superior Mohammedan civilization. Their general effect was to enlarge the activity, mental and otherwise, of the European populations, and pave the way for a brighter future.

The absolute supremacy of Christianity, in consequence of the Crusades, passed its zenith, and began to decline. The revival of learning by the discovery of the ancient literature of Greece and Rome gave an enormous impulse to the new spirit of the times; modern industry began to be developed; printing was invented; gunpowder and the compass became known; Vasco de Gama discovered the passage of the Cape of Good Hope; Columbus and the Cabots discovered America; commerce received a wonderful impetus; science and art and philosophy took a fresh start from a higher vantage-ground. In short, the world was waking from its long slumber, and modern civilization was born. But in all this Christianity had no part. The Church had outgrown its chief usefulness, and become a hindrance. Henceforth the world had to fight it at every step.

At last came the Reformation, with its great insurrection of the human mind against the authority of the Church,—a movement which owed its origin and success to that indomitable spirit of independence transmitted by the barbaric North to its posterity, and destined now to fight once more across the seas the battle of human progress against the still surviving Roman Imperialism. Without being aware of the fact, Luther and Calvin rose in rebellion against the very cardinal principle of Christianity, that of blind submission to Authority; and consequently their protest in behalf of freedom was incomplete. Yet, partial as it was, it achieved momentous gains for civilization, and did incalculable service to humanity. From that day to this, the cause of man has been gaining ground against the cause of Christian Imperialism; yet the battle still continues, and has hardly yet begun to be fought about the capital point. The conflict, however, is deepening. Mankind are beginning to be aware that the Christian Church, so far from being a friend to modern civilization, is today its most potent and deadly enemy; and when that conviction has once become firmly rooted in the human mind, the triumph of free humanity will be assured. Christianity the cause of civilization? Preposterous, audacious claim! For centuries it has been the great obstacle to progress and reform in every field of human activity; and while I would not, and do not, forget the good influence of its universal element, I believe most profoundly that the influence of its special element is growing daily more obstructive, and must be destroyed at any cost.

I have thus tried to deal fairly but frankly with the theme I had to discuss. Without going at all into details, I have shown that Christianity is the Roman Empire outliving its time, and embodying the same fundamental principle of Imperialism—the Unity of Man on the basis of Authority—which was the life and inspiration of Pagan Rome. I have shown that true civilization will be the final establishment of the Unity of Man on the basis of Freedom, and that this is the fundamental principle of American Republicanism. Between these two, Roman Imperialism and American Republicanism, which, when carried up to the spiritual plane, re-appear as Christianity and Free Religion, I have shown that an irrepressible conflict exists, which must go on till one or the other is annihilated. The world will yet find itself forced to choose between them.

What, then, has Christianity contributed to civilization?

By its universal element, it has exerted in no small degree a softening and purifying influence over manners and morals; though even this has not been unmixed good. Even a truth may become a practical falsehood by excess of emphasis or disproportion of development; and the many-sidedness of modern morality has not been brought out by Christianity, which underrates the virtues of maturity and holds up a "little child" as its ideal.

By its special element, it has always affirmed the great principle of the unity of man, but has miserably mutilated this by admitting only a fraction of the race to its fellowship. It has sought to bring all men within its fold and thus make the unity of man a fact; but it has exacted submission to impossible claims, sought to subjugate human reason and human conscience, and scrupled at no time to use violence and persecution when it had the power. In a period of universal anarchy, ignorance, and degradation, its very despotism had some compensating advantages. But that period has passed. Every year widens the gulf between civilization and the Christian religion. Humanity today demands freedom—political, social, mental, religious—as its first and highest good; and it is freedom which Christianity can never without suicide concede. The unity of man which it seeks to realize in the great empire of the "Christ of God" over all human society, is stultified and destroyed by its principle of Authority, which can never secure this unity. In the present age of the world, Christianity chiefly contributes to civilization great and terrible obstacles; and it becomes daily plainer that, in proportion as these obstacles are overcome and the Christian Church is enfeebled in power, the gray dawn of the Golden Age is brightening into day.

Gerrit Smith's letter to Mr. Churchill on the San Domingo question is timely, brave, and true.

The Index.

JANUARY 21, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

Contributors are requested to write on only one side of each sheet.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

THE CONFLICT COMING.

The proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States by which the American government is to be based on the Christian religion and robbed of its chief jewel, religious liberty, has been brought before Congress by Senator Yates, of Illinois, in the shape of a memorial. A National Convention for pushing this "reform" will probably have been held in Philadelphia before this issue of THE INDEX reaches its readers. Meetings are also held in the churches, as in the Reformed Presbyterian Church in Cincinnati last week, for the same purpose. The country is on the eve of a great agitation of this question. The present attempts will probably fail. But new ones, and more powerful ones, will be made. There is no escaping this issue. Christianity is mustering its forces for open war against republican liberty, and the sooner the fact is recognized, the better. Fortunately, notwithstanding some inconsistencies of practice (such as the illegal appointment of public "Thanksgiving Days" by the President, and the payment of salaries to Christian Chaplains in Congress, National Asylums, the army, etc.), the precedents are on the side of religious freedom. For instance, in a treaty with Tripoli, concluded by the administration of George Washington, November 4, 1796, there occurs the following notable declaration:—

"AS THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES IS NOT IN ANY SENSE FOUNDED ON THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION; as it has in itself no character of enmity against the laws, religion or tranquillity of Mussulmen [Mussulmans]; and as the said States never have entered into any war or act of hostility against any Mahometan nation, it is declared by the parties that no pretext arising from religious opinions shall ever produce an interruption of the harmony existing between the two countries."

Not this treaty alone, but the whole theory of our republican government as well, will be unsettled and destroyed, if these fanatical efforts are to succeed. Americans must watch such movements. "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty."

The names of persons to whom THE INDEX is desired to be sent during January are pouring in so fast—by fifties and even hundreds—that our editions of the early numbers of the second volume, though very large, cannot supply the demand. We shall be obliged to substitute other numbers in many cases, reserving enough copies of Nos. 54 and 55 to furnish to new subscribers. But we are glad to receive all the names that can be sent; and to each we will send four sample copies, including at least one number containing the "Modern Principles." If in any case our friends desire that four consecutive numbers of the present year should be sent to the addresses given, we will commence with the issue next succeeding our receipt of the order, and print enough extra copies to meet the demand. By all means let new names be sent in; for we regard this as one of the very best means of enlarging our circulation, and we renew our thanks to the friends who take the trouble of forwarding the names.

Mr. D. G. Francis, 17 Astor Place, New York, has issued a new and revised edition of Mr. Frothingham's "Child's Book of Religion." It is the product of a mind rich in religious sensibility. Poems of rare grace and beauty, selected or otherwise, abound in its pages. A whole cluster of charming legends, sure to interest children, sure also to require some judicious warnings against a too credulous acceptance, is given in the latter part of the book. A highly imaginative mind like Mr. Frothingham's, inclining always to seize the ideal truth and to disregard its wrappage, is apt to credit others with the same tendency, and to underrate the literalism of average childhood. Older readers, especially liberal people who are not bigoted in their liberality and who still enjoy the poetry of Christianity, will derive no little pleasure from these legends, and find them useful auxiliaries in cultivating the moral nature of children. The general influence of the book cannot fail to develop their religious sentiment, which we suppose to be one of the compiler's chief aims. There is time enough in later years for speculative thinking and exact science. Let childhood revel in its innocent dreams, and suck the honey of poetic fancies as freely from Christian mythology as from the "Arabian Nights;" but protect it in season from the germs of superstition. Fiction known to be such is food; fiction mistaken for truth is poison.

The "Science of Evil," by Mr. Joel Moody, of which advance sheets have been forwarded to us, is the work of an independent and original thinker, written in a trenchant and nervous style—in fact, more vigorous than accurate. The hasty glance which is all we have found leisure to give to it thus far has not qualified us to express an opinion on its merit as a whole; but we have seen enough to be convinced that the author has ideas worthy of very thoughtful consideration. Our attention has been especially arrested by the boldness with which he treats the subject of prostitution. This is the closing sentence:—"If prostitution must be struck, strike the man who patronizes in any manner the sale of woman's virtue." Published by Crane & Byron, Topeka, Kansas.

The free evening school for men and boys in Toledo is growing so rapidly that the number of teachers ought to be greatly increased. Beginning with seventy or eighty scholars, it had one hundred and eighty-two on the evening of Jan. 11. The attendance at the female schools is much less. An earnest appeal is made by the Committee to the public for more teachers. It is hoped that every competent person in the city who can give one evening a week to this greatly needed work will volunteer at once. It would be a shame to the community, if such an enterprise should languish for lack of instructors.

Mr. William Sharman, late minister of the Unitarian Society in Leavenworth, Kansas, has dropped the "Rev.," withdrawn from the Unitarian ministry on account of the action of the last National Conference, and assumed the editorship of the Leavenworth Times. We congratulate him on his manly protest, and wish him great success in his new line of labor. Before long, others will discover the impossibility of being free men in the Unitarian pulpit, so long as they entertain radical convictions. A little more non-conformity would invigorate the times.

THE HOSPITALITIES OF FAITH.

The critics of Free Religion meet its assertion of the universality of religious sentiments, ideas, and principles by urging the large hospitality which the Christian religion extends to them all. Yes, they say, religion is universal, and Christianity is the universal religion. Religious sentiments, ideas, principles, are diffused over the whole world; and Christianity proves itself to be the true religion because it contains them all. What true or good thing can be found elsewhere that is not found more justly stated in the faith of Christendom?

The Theist reads of the personal God, the Father "who maketh his sun to rise on the evil and the good, and sendeth his rain on the just and on the unjust." The Pantheist finds comfort in Paul's declaration that "In Him we live and move and have our being." The Transcendentalist reads with delight the eighth chapter of Romans. The Spiritualist can desire nothing better than the stories of transfiguration and resurrections, the accounts of opening heavens, visions of the departed, and voices from the invisible world. The Mystic has all he needs in the writings ascribed to the apostle John. The believer in the unity, the spirituality, the loving kindness, the careful providence of God, must be blind indeed if he misses in the New Testament an adequate expression of his persuasions. Immortality is there; recompense and retribution, justice and mercy are there. Confucius might find here his moral precepts; Zoroaster his conviction of the everlasting battle between light and darkness; Gautama Buddha his sense of the evil of animal desire, his passion for purity, and his aspiration after heaven. The Greek may feast his love of beauty on the vision of the Christ's unapproachable loveliness, and may satisfy his taste for speculation by the lofty reasonings of the fourth Gospel. The Roman finds an earnest affirmation of his reverence for law, both in its civil and its moral aspect. The Rationalist welcomes his principle in the injunction to "prove all things, and hold fast that which is good." The Calvinist is comforted with the promise of everlasting damnation. The Universalist rejoices in the Love that met death for all. The Naturalist and the Supernaturalist find, each, suitable text.

What hospitality could be larger? The Christ says the people from the East and the West, from the North and from the South, shall come into his kingdom. The shepherds and the sages, the kings and the peasantry, angels and brute beasts, met together in the stable, while the star stood in the heavens illuminating them all. There was room by the manger for all sorts and conditions of men,—for human and for seraphic beings. There is room in the Church for all sorts and conditions of souls,—for faiths rudimental and for faiths sublimated. The little child received all the gifts, the gold, frankincense and myrrh, and the field-flower which the shepherds may have stopped to pluck on their way. The Church receives all beliefs, the convictions of the most enlightened spirits, and the stammering confessions of the dark and doubting.

Now granting all this to be true, granting that Christianity opens its doors to all honest comers, and finds for them all entertainment in some parts of its large mansion, giving them straw or down to lie on, and a crust or something more succulent to eat, we do not perceive how the fact establishes the humanity or proves the genuine hospitality of the faith. Indeed another interpretation may be put on the fact which not only sets the claim of generosity aside, but justifies the old deep-seated suspicion of exclusiveness.

It is a custom with some of the English nobility, and of old was a custom with the proudest feudal barons, to make an occasional feast to which all the tenantry were invited. The lord welcomed them to the castle; the lady said gracious words in the porch. There were amusements for the old people, and sports for the young; games for the lads, and gayeties for the maidens, and dances on the green sward for both. Bountiful tables were spread on the lawns, at which all sat down together. The lowliest were waited on, and the lordliest waited. Every appetite was gratified, and every taste consulted. The manors and parks were free, and every visitor was made to feel at home. On the next day, however, the gates were shut, the villagers toiled on the land, and eat black bread in their huts, and were given to understand that the welcome of the day before was an act of condescension on the part of their liege lord. The liege lord never visited their homes, or sat down to their tables, or confessed that they had anything that he had not, or admitted that he owed anything to them or could derive from them either entertainment or instruction, or shared with them the lessons of common human experience. He had all they had, and a good deal more. He could give them many things they had not. But they could give nothing to him; and if they possessed anything in common with him, it was valueless because it was a mere fragment, a detached morsel, of no intrinsic worth.

It is somewhat so with Christianity. It is glad to have the other religions come as guests and admire the splendor of its courts, the vastness of its preserves, the luxuriance of its gardens, the wealth of its galleries, the bountifulness of its board, the richness and variety of the costumes displayed by those who accept its hospitality. It will take pains to collect and exhibit what each loves best to see, and to provide for each the viands and the delicacies which each particularly enjoys. But she never reciprocates. It is one thing to be visited, quite another thing to visit; one thing to dazzle the world with your own wealth, another thing to admire others' possessions; one thing to accept the tribute of worship, another thing to pay it when it is due.

Will the "Christian" acknowledge that other believers have the same things that he has? Will he confess that other believers may perhaps have some things in greater perfection than he has them? Will he consent to visit them in their own land and do justice to their own productions? Will he esteem at their full worth the theism of India, the spiritualism of Persia, the philosophical insight of Greece, the moral dignity of Rome, the catholicity of Egypt, the social completeness of China, the rational breadth of Judæa? Will he render due meed of praise to the immortal Buddha, to Confucius, the "superior man" to whom the people of China do reverence, and whom the Emperor of those millions worships with all his court? Will he place Socrates where he belongs, neither trying to disparage his character, nor diminish his fame? Will he respect the slave Epictetus and the Emperor Marcus Aurelius as cordially as he would have done, had no Jesus existed to share the glory of their goodness? Will he take staff and scrip and reverently go on a pilgrimage to foreign shrines, confessing, as he kneels at them, the equal omnipresence of the divine spirit? Will he candidly acknowledge his indebtedness to Alexandria and Babylon, to Antioch and Corinth, to Athens and Rome? Will he thank Buddhism for this, Zoroastrism for that, Mosaism for the other? Platonism for this idea, Mithraism for this symbol, Brahmanism for that form? Will he rejoice in finding everywhere the elements and the demonstrations of the spiritual life, and now and then will he put himself in the attitude of a receiver? Will he condescend even to be a suppliant for a blessing which has been more richly bestowed on his neighbors than on himself? If he will not, his claim to generosity cannot be allowed; his boasted hospitality is delusive. He is not to be credited either with sympathy or with fairness; and, instead of praise for his magnanimity, he must not be surprised if he meets with blame for his superciliousness and pride.

The emotions of the devotees of some strange old faith on recognising his ancestral beliefs adopted by Christianity, may be akin to those of Italians or Spaniards on seeing the master-pieces of native art displayed in the Louvre. There they are, undoubted originals. They are in excellent company and well preserved. But it is exasperating to remember how they came to be where they are, and to be invited to the privilege of viewing them.

O. B. F.

RELIGION AND SCIENCE.

Some dozen years ago, while I was in Germany, an anecdote was being circulated of Humboldt which well illustrates the relative positions of the church and science of this age. Humboldt had been very critically sick, and the greatest solicitude was manifested in Berlin and throughout Germany with regard to the issue of the disease. After days of anxious waiting the public were informed that he was convalescent. Just at this time an evangelical ecclesiastical convention was in session at Vienna; and the clerical delegates, hearing the good news of Humboldt's probable recovery, sent him a telegraphic dispatch congratulating him that by the grace of God he had been brought through his severe illness and was being restored to health. Humboldt said, when the message had been read to him, "Send a reply thanking the Convention for the interest shown in my condition, and say that, through the natural vigor of my constitution and the skill of my good physician, my health is now nearly restored."

Here in a nutshell are presented the two sides of the question in the modern conflict between "religion" and "science;" on the one side religion, as represented in a Protestant clerical Convention, appealing to and upholding the idea of a power directly and specially intervening in the affairs of men without regard to fixed methods and laws; on the other side science, in the person of its greatest modern representative, maintaining the regularity and inviolability of natural law, and resting upon man's capacity to discover the same as the true basis of all human faith and activity.

Now there should be no conflict between these two things. Religion in its essence and deepest reality is as much a study and observance of law as is science; and science, when it comes to the bottom of its problems, touches with awe the same ground out of which religion springs. The conflict comes from religion not throwing off the habits of thought and speech that have come down from primitive faiths and are now out of place in this rational and scientific age. Religion insists still upon saying (religion, that is, in its ecclesiastical forms) that Humboldt recovered from his sickness through some providential power specially superadded to the vital processes of his physical nature and the skill of his physician, which power it calls the "grace of God." Science says that the grace of God, the divine energy and power, whatever it be in essence, that restored him to health, worked through the vital processes and laws of his natural constitution and the physician's knowledge and vigilance. And one of the worst features of the conflict is, that probably a majority of the clergymen at Vienna in their secret thought agreed with the statement of Humboldt, but, from some supposed ecclesiastical exigency, felt it necessary to repeat in public the traditional statement of theology.

W. J. P.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

SPENCER ON SPONTANEOUS GENERATION.

MR. ABBOT:—You directed my attention some time ago to Herbert Spencer's reply to your review of his Principles of Biology, in his pamphlet entitled Spontaneous Generation. I have read the reply, and on that, in connection with your article on the same subject in THE INDEX of Nov. 5, I make the following remarks. Your affirmation that,—"Whoever rejects the miraculous-creation hypothesis is necessarily driven to accept some form of the evolution [of life] hypothesis, unless he stolidly refuses to think; and whatever evidence is sufficient to discredit the former, by that very fact establishes the latter,"—may be true, but only in regard to those who accept the Nebular hypothesis to explain the origin of the globe; it cannot apply to those who reject both the Nebular and the miraculous-creation hypothesis.

Hugh Miller, in his Footprints of the Creator, admitted that the old anti-atheistic arguments cannot be brought to bear against the atheistical assertions of an infinite or eternal series of beings. Metaphysical Theology, he said, in his latest work, furnishes no arguments against them. It is geology only that furnishes irrefutable arguments. It shows from demonstrable facts that the infinite series of the atheist can have no place in modern science, and that the development (evolution) hypothesis is a mere dream, unsupported by a shadow of evidence; but he made the great misstatement that geology showed that every species of plant and animal that now lives upon the earth began to be during the tertiary period, and that not any of the species existed in the secondary period. The progress of geology now shows that this statement is utterly false; it also shows that species now existing cannot be distinguished from species which existed in strata of the primary period. Twenty-five years ago Miller assumed that about the present time "geological history would assume a very extraordinary form." It has done so; the facts it has now furnished show the absurdity of any conclusions which involve the idea that the beginnings of life have been discovered. Geological facts do not yet interfere with the idea that the series of living beings is eternal.

Spencer's form of the evolution hypothesis is very fairly stated by Prof. Tyndall in his address to the British Association on the Scientific Use of the Imagination. He there said,—"All our philosophy, all our poetry, all our science, and all our art—Plato, Shakespeare, Newton, and Raphael potentially existed in the fires of the sun." But he admitted that the evolution hypothesis is founded on uncertain data; and that the Nebular hypothesis is only probable, though, he said, there are the strongest grounds for believing that the earth, at first, was in either a nebulous or molten state, probably nebulous, and unfitted for life; but, he said, the questions are, did creative energy pause until the nebulous matter was condensed, and the earth fitted to sustain life, and then send forth the fiat—"Let life be?"—or were all organisms, ignoble and noble emotion, intellect, and will latent in a fiery cloud? Does life belong to what we call matter, or is it an independent principle inserted into matter when physical conditions permitted the development of life? The notion, says Tyndall, that the consciousness of today is evolved out of unconscious primeval mist may be too monstrous to be held by any sane mind, but, he says, in the spirit of a Free Religionist, it is not to be contemptuously flouted, or denounced as wicked; it is compatible with a belief in all the Christian virtues, and leaves the mystery of the universe unsolved, for we know nothing of the reality of matter or spirit.

As Spencer assumes in his evolution hypothesis that the successive forms of existence are the result merely of re-distributions of matter and motion, it seemed to me to be a necessary inference from the hypothesis stated in his Principles of Biology, that he should accept some form of the doctrine of what is called spontaneous generation. His announcement of having no belief in the doctrine, taken in connection with the fact that he did not explain his idea of the genesis of organic matter, and of the germs of organized existences, but merely assumed their existence, did warrant your affirmation that he could not evade the admission of an absolute commencement of organic life or a first organism; and that in denying the doctrine of spontaneous generation he denied that the first organisms were evolved out of the inorganic world. Spencer replied to you that it is not necessary to suppose an absolute commencement of organic life, or of a first organism; that the conception of spontaneity is wholly incompatible with the conception of evolution; and that no form of evolution, inorganic or organic, can be spontaneous. I do not know whether his explanation of how inorganic matter has been gradually transformed into organic matter satisfies you as to his consistency, or if you think that his inductions from the experience of organic chemistry, and from the observations of biologists, enable us to conceive how organic compounds were evolved from inorganic matter, and how by a continuance of the process the nascent life displayed in these compounds became gradually more pronounced, having higher organic forms, and manifesting emotion, intellect, and will. Spencer thinks his explanation probable, though, he has said, that every assumption that can be made respecting the origin and nature of things inevitably commits us to alternate impossibilities of thought. Your reproach that the "very best English minds lose their reckoning, unless they feel demonstrable facts under their feet at every step," does not apply to Spencer. I think he relies too much on the German faith in "Vernunft."

Respectfully,

JOHN CHAPPELLESMITH.

NEW HARMONY, IND., Jan. 3, 1871.

[Not to discuss the question here whether the notion of an "azoic period" of the earth's history is a mere blunder of the geologists, we presume no one would dispute that there was once a time when the human species, at least, did not exist. Of two things, one. The human species must have appeared on the earth either gradually or suddenly—in the former case by slow changes of organic structure in successive generations of lower animals; in the latter case without parentage or any antecedents assignable by science. The one is the development theory, the other the theory of miraculous creation. The only logical way to escape admitting one of these two theories, with regard, at least, to the human species, is to assert the eternity of this species in the past. No one, we suspect, will be so hardy as to assert this.

Mr. Spencer's reply to our review of his "Principles of Biology" we consider very inconclusive and unsatisfactory. In fact, he has not correctly stated the points we made. But this is not the place to criticise his pamphlet.—ED.]

THE CLAIMS OF THE HEART IN RELIGION.

Is it not true that rationalists characteristically ignore sentiment, or the love-element, too much in religion—that, in exalting the authority of the head, they leave almost no room for the play of the fervors of the heart? Yet is it not to the heart, to the religious nature principally, that a religion properly addresses itself—to our hopes and fears, our loves, our aspirations, our ideals, our distinctively religious wants and intuitions? The intellect, the speculative faculty, may legitimately, nay, should, pronounce upon many of the testimonials a religion may present,—discuss its external or scientific "evidences," analyze and synthesize its doctrines. Yet the heart alone, properly inspired, can authoritatively pronounce upon the essential quality or character of what is called spiritual truth. Is the mathematical faculty ever employed within the domain of aesthetics? What man whose judgment is entitled to any respect, ever thinks of introducing his logical apparatus into this sphere? To what sort of consideration are the criticisms of that man entitled, all of whose opinions concerning art-matters are formed in accordance with certain dry rules, certain abstract theories, which, even if original, are yet simply the cool deductions of the brain? Every one admits at once that no art-criticism is of any value that is not made by one capable of loving and appreciating art; that the aesthetic value of any artistic performance is to be determined, not by the judicial, but by the aesthetic or beauty-loving faculty.

Again. What woman ever resorts to metaphysics or to logical forms in discussing the matter of love? What has love to do with speculation—with pure thought? What does a man who has never truly loved, even though he may be passably familiar with Aristotle's philosophy or Bacon's Novum Organum, know about sentiment? How can he know anything about it? His mathematical, philosophical, philological, and palaeontological attainments can avail him nothing here—can avail him nothing in interpreting the poets or in unlocking for him the subtle charm of the romance and the song of the race. The man who should attempt to speculate or discourse about the nature of sentiment or passion, while yet knowing nothing whatever about it by experience, would deservedly be laughed at,—his speculations on this subject would be ridiculed as the merest vagaries and fancies.

Coming now to the domain of religion, the same principle may evidently be applied. In dealing with that which addresses itself specially to the higher spiritual life, what use have we for the logical faculty or the logical reason? This is predominantly the empire of the moral reason. By what authority, then, shall the intellect intrude here? It is an impertinence. It is an unwarrantable trespass. It is invasion—an outrage. Let it keep to its figures and tables, and not undertake to dictate on the one hand any formal treatise to be accepted as an orthodox creed, nor on the other hand what is credible and rational, and what not, within the domain of experimental or spiritual religion. Does not the artist insist, and rightfully, that the only proof of beauty is the picture or the landscape? Does not the mother insist that the only satisfactory proof or demonstration of love is the sweet-lipped babe reposing upon her mother's heart? So who shall say that, in the soul's own sense of its eternal future, there lies not the chiefest, most satisfactory proof of its immortality—that, especially, in the felt presence of God, brooding over the soul, and in an uninterpretable language communing with it, we do not have the most conclusive of all possible proofs of the divine existence? Nothing so truly satisfies the soul of man as love, or life in the moral faculty. Let a man truly love, in the spiritual sense of that term—let him feel and exclaim with Paul,—"Nothing shall separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus," or with the poet,—

"How tedious and tasteless the hours,
When Jesus no longer I see,"— and that man has a peace that "passeth knowledge," i. e., that is beyond the power of the speculative reason either to comprehend or express. There is no longer distressing doubt in that man's mind; for, though he has not fathomed all mysteries, his heart is at rest, and when the heart finds repose, there is no more inward conflict. In consideration of the fact, first, that the intellect must in the very nature of the case insist on knowing the ground and reason of things; and, secondly, there must in the very nature of the case be, in the realm of the invisible, many facts whose ground and reason cannot at present be understood by finite minds, we can easily see how it is that to make our religion a matter of mere opinion or of speculative thought, to commit it almost altogether to the intellect, can never give the soul of man repose. The heart, however, when once it is satisfied, asks no questions. Hence it is that love alone can remove painful doubts. It not only casts out fear, but banishes all dread, uncertainty, anxious questionings, dreary, wearying, restless doubts. It is an interesting fact that that sceptic among the disciples, Thomas, (and I am glad that there was one, and that he was no less obstinate and exacting than he was) was finally lifted from his doubt, not so much, after all, by the unexpected and wonderful display of the Savior's person, as by the revelation of that Savior's love. Thomas's own heart was touched. It was not so much, I venture to think, the resurrected and palpable body of his Master, bearing though it did, in its bruised hands and wounded side, indubitably distinguishing signs, that effectually dissipated the unbelief of this apostolic sceptic,—not so much this as the unutterable tenderness, suffusing the countenance and warming the tone of that Master's voice. A miracle that should serve simply to perplex and confound the reason, without also touching and moving the moral nature, and opening up a way to the religious consciousness for God, would utterly come short, at least, of its immediate object. Jesus, in his interview with Thomas, as ever aforetime, seems to have kept this desired result constantly in view. Thomas had said,—"Unless I put my finger into the print of the nails," Jesus bids him,—"Reach hither thy finger, and behold my hand." Thomas had said,—"Unless I thrust my finger into his side," Jesus responds,—"Reach hither thy hand and thrust it into my side." Thomas had said,—"I will not believe." Jesus replies,—"Thomas, be not faithless, but believing." And so, in love, in pity, in those tender and well-known tones, the Master retorts upon the sceptic all his words of unbelief. Thomas could hold out no longer. Overcome, not so much, indeed, by wonder, as by gratitude for the fulness of such love, by the impulsive response of his own glowing heart rather than by the testimony of his senses or the verdict of his reason, refusing now to lay earthly touch on that sacred body, but raising his eyes above those wounded hands to the face beaming with unspeakable tenderness, Thomas utters the fullest, the most devout expression of faith that had yet found utterance,—"My Lord and my God!"

"Ah," says Pascal, "the heart has reasons of its own the reason knows not of." There is an unseen realm, a demonstration to the soul, to the conscience, no less essential in matters of faith than the one to the intellect in matters of pure thought. Let every religion, therefore, claiming to be the truth of God, understand that not only has it to be subjected to the scrutiny of reason, and withstand the criticism of scholarship, but it must still appear and answer for itself before this highest of all tribunals, the HUMAN HEART—the very highest evidence of its divinity being that it fully satisfies the soul of man. Is it no proper evidence that God intended that we should drink cold water, that it is calculated so completely to satisfy thirst? In like manner may we not conclude that a true religion will completely satisfy the wants, the religious wants, of our average humanity, —affording them what, if cordially embraced and loyally practised, will enable them in all the varied and shifting scenes and circumstances of human life, to be holy and happy, useful and spiritual, fervent and godly?

With the permission of the editor, I shall at some future time continue the foregoing train of thought.
R. H. HOWARD.

[It is but just that liberals should give due consideration to such reflections as the above. It would be a serious objection to liberalism, if it left any faculty of human nature to shrivel away by disuse. At some time we may touch on this point more at length, and show that Free Religion has higher objects than any "Savior" on which to concentrate human affection. It is to be borne in mind, however, that love unguided by reason is the root of countless miseries and follies. If reason forbears to direct love, character and happiness alike are at the mercy of the imagination—sometimes the most terrible of tyrants. All that Mr. Howard urges goes to justify the blind worship of the "Holy Virgin" as completely as that of Jesus.—ED.]

HOW WE SEE.

Dr. Clarke, in Hours at Home, speaks of the possibility that the sense of sight may reside in other than the visual nerves. He says:

"It is fully established that somnambulists go wherever they please without hesitation, read and write, and give ample evidence of a power of perception independent of the usual organs of vision. Persons subject to attacks of catalepsy frequently show the same peculiarity. M. Despine, late inspector of the mineral waters of Aix, in Savoy, mentions the following among many other cases: 'Not only could our patient hear by means of the palm of her hand, but we have seen her read without the assistance of the eyes, merely with the tips of the fingers, which she passed rapidly over the page that she wished to read. At other times we have seen her select from a parcel of more than thirty letters the one which she was required to pick out; also write several letters and correct on reading them over again, always with her finger ends, the mistakes she had made; copy one letter word for word reading it with her left elbow, while she wrote with her right hand. During these proceedings a thick pasteboard completely intercepted any visual ray that might have reached her eyes. The same phenomenon was manifested at the soles of her feet, on the epigastrium, and other parts of the body, where a sensation of pain was produced by a mere touch.' Persons who have become blind have also been known to acquire the same power, and Harriet Martineau tells of an old lady who had been blind from her birth, and yet saw in her sleep, and in her waking state described the color of the clothing of individuals correctly. In these cases, no doubt, perception is as usual in the brain; but either all the nerves of the surface have the power of conveying the impressions of light to that organ, or some special parts of the body, as the ends of the fingers, the occiput, or the epigastrium, assume the office of the eyes."

The learned Doctor does not give any explanation of this wonderful mystery; it therefore remains for us to attempt it. What Dr. Clarke speaks of as a possibility, namely, that the sense of sight does not reside in the nerves of the eye, we regard as a scientific and well-established fact. The eye with its complex and beautiful mechanism is but the organ or instrument of sight.

If one looks into the pupil of the eye of another person, he sees a picture of himself mirrored in the liquid depths. The picture is a miniature but perfect copy of himself. The person into whose eye he looks sees the same picture, but from a nearer and different stand-point; and this difference enables him to see you large as life. His eye is a camera obscura, one end of which points towards him, the other towards you. For him this camera throws the picture up; for you it concentrates the rays of light to a focus. 'Tis the spirit, the real man, that does the seeing in both cases, the eyes of each serving but as instruments of sight.

The great science of Phrenology gives the key to this wonderful mystery. Anatomy and physiology had long ago shown the structure and natural uses of the eye, but utterly failed to explain why a dead man could not see, inasmuch as the eye remains perfect for some time, at least.

Before this great mystery of seeing with one's eyes closed, as in Somnambulism or clairvoyance, the scientific world stands in wondering awe. Death is the resurrection or separation of the spirit from the body, the laying aside of the physical organs which have hitherto served as instruments for doing certain rough work, and for coming into contact with certain rough phases of life that have served a specific purpose in his development. While in the body, one feels with the nerves of touch, hears with the ears, tastes with the tongue and palate, smells with the nose, and sees with the eyes, if all the bodily functions are active. Should they from any cause (such as catalepsy, somnambulism, suspended animation, drowning, a sudden concussion of the brain, &c. &c.) become inactive, the spiritual powers assume independent functions at once, and the individual sees objects not photographed on the retina of the eye, and hears sounds that do not vibrate upon the tympanum of the ear.

Thus the science of Phrenology proves the immortality of the soul, and settles that vexed question over which priests and skeptics have quarrelled for ages.
T. A. BLAND.

["The sensation of light, it must be understood, is the work of the brain, not of the retina," says Prof. Huxley, in his Physiology; "for if an eye be destroyed, pinching, galvanizing, or otherwise irritating the optic nerve will still excite the sensation of light, because it throws the fibres of the optic nerve into activity; and their activity, however produced, brings about in the brain certain changes which give rise to the sensation of light."

Sight is simply a modification of the sense of touch.
—ED.]

C. D. B. MILLS.

EDITOR INDEX:—I am pleased to learn that Mr. C. D. B. Mills, of this city, the President of the Syracuse Radical Club, is soon to make a lecturing tour through the West; and I hope all Radical Clubs and Liberal Societies in that section of the country will engage his services for an evening, at least. Mr. Mills is a modest man, and has therefore never acquired the reputation that he is entitled to as a public lecturer. But I can promise any Society that may be so fortunate as to secure a lecture from him a spiritual and literary entertainment which it will long remember with pleasure.

During the last few years Mr. Mills has sedulously devoted himself to the study of the various religions of the world, and has stored his mind with an amount of information connected with these religions which is seldom to be found, and which, when presented in a lecture, will prove valuable to any thoughtful audience. He is an eloquent and impressive speaker, and one of the most earnest defenders of what he considers the truth that it has ever been my privilege to listen to. For many years he has been the presiding officer of the meetings of the Friends of Progress, held yearly at Watertown in this State; and the thousands who have listened to his eloquent appeals in favor of the various progressive movements that have come before that body will bear me out in what I am now saying of this brave Radical of the Radicals. He is as worthy a man as walks the earth anywhere, as all who know him intimately will affirm. Friends of humanity and of religious freedom in the West, give him a generous hearing.

It is with great reluctance that the successful Club in this city, over which he has presided since its organization, consents to dispense with his labors for a few weeks, and to forego the pleasure, each evening of their meeting, of listening to his short, stirring, closing speech.

SYRACUSE.

"TOTAL DEPRAVITY."

FRIEND ABBOT:—I see no objection to the idea of "Total Depravity," as Mr. R. H. Howard at last expresses it. I think it is more natural (and so more desirable) for the human race to develop socially and intellectually first, and religiously at a later period. But the doctrine that Jesus is the only direct source of life and power through which such development is possible is narrow and sectarian. Some have experienced the same necessary change—"conversion, regeneration,"—through faith in Confucius, Zoroaster and many others, and some through faith in the highest and best attributes of their own souls.

EAST STOCKHOLM, N. Y.

AUSTIN KENT.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Mr. Frothingham's New Book.

CHILD'S BOOK OF RELIGION, for Sunday Schools and Homes. PART I, Worship; PART II, The Good Life; PART III, Truth. In one Volume. New and revised edition. Forwarded free on receipt of $1.00.

55-68

DAVID G. FRANCIS,
17 Astor Place, New York.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

Free Religious Association.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, on "The Idea of the Free Religious Association;" DAVID A. WASSON, on "The Nature of Religion;" MRS. E. D. CHENEY, on "Religion as a Social Force;" F. E. ABBOT, on "The Future of the Religious Organization as affected by the Spirit of the Age;" S. JOHNSON, on "The Natural Sympathy of Religions;" RABBI WISE, on "The Universal Elements in Judaism;" COL. T. W. HIGGINS, on "Mohammedanism;" WM. H. CHANNING, on "The Religions of China;" W. J. POTTER, on "The Religions of India;" and an abstract of a discussion on the "Relation of Religion to the Public School System of the United States." This Report is specially representative of the principles of the Association. Price 50 cents. In packages of five or more 30 cents each. Also CHANNING'S Address on "THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA," (a careful and instructive essay, of particular interest at this time to Americans) in a separate pamphlet for 20 cents.

The ANNUAL REPORT for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cents respectively), Rev. Samuel Johnson's essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cents), and an essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by Wm. J. POTTER (40 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained by applying to the Secretary. The Report for 1868 contains a letter from the celebrated Hindu Theist, KESUB CHUNDER SEN, on the "Origin and Aims of the Brahma Somaj," also an address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, on "Religion and Social Science," a letter from M. D. CONWAY, on "Religious Movements in England," and speeches by JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHAS. H. MALCOM, JOHN WEISS, and others. The Report for 1869 has addresses by RALPH WALDO EMERSON, D. A. WASSON, JULIA WARD HOWE, C. A. BARTOL, PROF. DENTON, HORACE SEAYER, LUCY STONE, and others.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Nature's Gifts, SCIENTIFICALLY DEVELOPED.

As mankind, from indiscretion or other causes, have been doomed to suffer from disease, so also has remedy for disease been provided. Our hills and valleys abound with roots and herbs, which if scientifically prepared and compounded, will restore health and vigor to the invalid. To find such a remedy we should seek one that has stood the test of age.

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

A
Sure Cure for Liver Complaint, Sure Cure for Dyspepsia,
Sure Cure for Debility, Sure Cure for Jaundice,
Sure Cure for Marasmus,
And all affections arising from weakness or want of action in the Liver or Digestive Organs. The great remedy for

IMPURE BLOOD,
And all diseases arising from it. The great preventive of
FEVER AND AGUE!

It is an impossibility for any one to have fever and ague, if they will use a few bottles of this remedy each spring and fall.

$100 $100 $100
Will be given for any case of this disease that occurs to any one that uses the Bitters or Tonic as a preventive.

Those who have the Fever and Ague will find, after the chills have stopped, that by using a few bottles of the Bitters or Tonic, the disease will not return.

These remedies will rebuild their Constitution faster than any other known remedy.

The remedies were placed before the public thirty years ago with all the prejudices of so-called "patent medicine" operating against them, but gradually their virtues became known and now, to day, they stand at the head of all preparations of their class, with the indorsement of eminent judges, lawyers, clergymen and physicians.

Read the following symptoms and if you find that your system is affected by any of them, you may rest assured that disease has commenced its attack on the most important organs of your body, and unless soon checked by the use of powerful remedies, a miserable life, soon terminating in death, will be the result.

H
Constipation, Flatulence, Inward Piles,
Fullness of Blood to the Head, Acidity of the Stomach, Nausea, Heartburn, Disgust for Food, Fullness or Weight in the Stomach, Sour Eructations, Sinking or Fluttering at the Pit of the Stomach, Swimming of the Head, Hurried or Difficult Breathing, Fluttering at the Heart, Choking or Suffocating Sensations when in a lying posture, Dimness of Vision, Dots or Webs before the Sight, Dull Pain in the Head, Deficiency of Perspiration, Yellowness of the Skin and Eyes, Pain in the Side, Back, Chest, Limbs, etc., Sudden Flushes of Heat, Burning of the Flesh, Constant imagining of Evil and Great Depression of Spirits
All indicate disease of the Liver or Digestive Organs, combined with impure blood.

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

is entirely vegetable and contains no liquor. It is a compound of Fluid Extracts. The Roots, Herbs and Barks from which these extracts are made, are gathered in Germany, all the medicinal virtues are extracted from them by a scientific chemist. These extracts are then forwarded to this country to be used expressly for the manufacture of this Bitters. There is no alcoholic substance of any kind used in compounding the Bitters; hence it is free from all the objections incident to the use of a liquor preparation.

Hoofland's German Tonic

Is a combination of all the Ingredients of the Bitters with the purest quality of Santa Cruz Rum, Oranges, &c. It is used for the same disease as the Bitters, in cases where some pure alcoholic stimulus is required.

TESTIMONY

Like the following was never before offered in behalf of any medical preparation.

HON. G. W. WOODWARD,
Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, writes Philadelphia, March 16th, 1867.

I find "Hoofland's German Bitters" a good Tonic, useful in diseases of the digestive organs, and of great benefit in cases of debility and want

F
of nervous action in the system.
Yours, truly,
GEORGE W. WOODWARD.

HON. JAMES THOMPSON,
Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania.
Philadelphia, April 22d, 1866.

I consider "Hoofland's German Bitters" a valuable medicine in a case of attacks of Indigestion or Dyspepsia. I can certify this from my experience of it.

Yours, with respect,
JAMES THOMPSON.

HON. GEO. SHARSWOOD,
Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania.
Philadelphia, June 1st, 1868.

I have found by experience that "Hoofland's German Bitters" is a very good tonic, relieving dyspeptic symptoms almost directly.

HON. WM. F. ROGERS,
Mayor of the City of Buffalo, N. Y.
Mayor's Office, Buffalo, June 22d, 1869.

I have used "Hoofland's German Bitters and Tonic" in my family during the past year, and can recommend them as an excellent tonic, imparting tone and vigor to the system. Their use has been productive of decidedly beneficial effects.

HON. JAMES M. WOOD,
Ex-Mayor of Williamsport, Pennsylvania.

I take great pleasure in recommending "Hoofland's German Tonic" to any one who may be afflicted with dyspepsia. I had the dyspepsia so badly that it was impossible to keep any food on my stomach, and I became so weak as not to be able to walk half a mile. Two bottles of Tonic effected a perfect cure.

JAMES M. WOOD.

JOHN EUTERMARCK, ESQ.,
Law Partner of Judge Maynard, Williamsport, Pennsylvania.

This is to certify that I have used "Hoofland's German Bitters" for dyspepsia, and found it an invaluable remedy.

CAUTION.—Hoofland's German Bitters are counterfeited. See the signature of C. M. JACKSON on the wrapper of each bottle. All others are counterfeit.

Principal Office and Manufactory at the German Medicine Store, No. 631 ARCH STREET, Philadelphia, Pa.

CHAS. M. EVANS, Prop't.
(Formerly of C. M. JACKSON & CO.)

PRICES.—Hoofland's German Bitters, per bottle, $1; Hoofland's German Tonic, half doz., $5; Hoofland's German Tonic, put up in qt. bottles, $150 per bottle, or half doz. for $7 50. Do not forget to examine well the article you buy in order to get the genuine. For sale by all druggists and dealers in Medicines everywhere.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX PROSPECTUS FOR 1871.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869, and is just closing its first yearly volume.

We deem it proper, therefore, to submit the following PROSPECTUS of Volume II for 1871, and ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if the matter was properly presented to them, and especially if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor. We cannot afford to send out travelling agents, nor would they succeed so well in getting names as persons of local influence. We therefore have determined to use the funds it would cost to get our paper before the people, in another way, namely, in the purchase of articles of value to be given as premiums to those who make up lists of subscribers; thus presenting to the friends of free thought and pure religion the double motive of doing good and getting paid for it.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two Dollars a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

PREMIUMS.

For Fifty Names, we will give one of PRINCE & Co's four Octave Melodeons (price $65,) or a complete copy of CHAMBERS' Encyclopedia of Universal Knowledge, in ten volumes (price $50).

For Forty Names, we will give a Wilson's Family Sewing Machine, one of the best Machines made.

For Twenty-Five Names, Webster's Royal Quarto Unabridged Pictorial Dictionary (price $12), or one of the following Chromos:

The Three Tom-Boys (Prang's), price..... $15.00
Winter in the Forest, 20x28..... 12.00
Watering the Horses, 21x29..... 12.00

For Ten Names, one of the following Chromos:

WHITTIER's Barefooted Boy, (Prang's) price..... $5.00
The Unconscious Sleeper, 14x17..... 6.00
Mt. Blanc, 20x26..... 7.50
Or a copy of LECKY's History of European Morals, 2 vols 6.00
MAX MUELLER's Chips from a German Work-Shop, 2 vols 5.00
EMERSON's Prose Works, 2 vols..... 5.00
WEISS's Life and Correspondence of THEODORE PARKER, 2 volumes..... 6.00

For Five Names, a bound volume of THE INDEX, for 1870. (Price $2.50.) Or a copy of one of the following works, (post paid):

DARWIN's Origin of Species, price..... $3.00
LUBBOCK's Origin of Civilization, price..... 2.00
Essays in Criticism, by MATTHEW ARNOLD, price..... 2.00
Tablets, by A. BRONSON ALCOTT, with portrait, price..... 2.00
Any volume of the writings of THEODORE PARKER or HENRY D. THOREAU, each..... 2.00
On the Heights, AUERBACH..... 2.00

For Four Names, a copy of THE INDEX for 1871, or one of the following books (post paid):

EMERSON's Society and Solitude, price..... $1.75
Nathan the Wise, a dramatic poem translated from LESSING by ELLEN FROTHINGHAM, price..... 1.75
HUXLEY's Lay Sermons and Addresses..... 1.75
Speeches and Lectures, by WENDELL PHILLIPS..... 1.50
Historic Americans, by THEODORE PARKER, price..... 1.50
A copy of The Revolution..... 2.00
Or The Woman's Journal..... 2.00

CASH PREMIUMS.

For 75 Names,.....50 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 50 Names,.....25 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 25 Names,.....15 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 10 Names,.....5 Dollars in Greenbacks
For less than 10 Names, a Cash Commission of Twenty per Cent.

Any book in the above list will be sent by us post-paid upon the receipt of price.

N. B.—Names need not all come from one post office. We will send the paper wherever directed, and let the names count as clubs. Specimen Copies sent to all who enclose a three cent postage stamp. Address

F. E. ABBOT, Editor,
DRAWER 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Guardian Mutual Life Ins. Co.,

ORGANIZED A. D. 1859.

M. O. Waggoner, Gen. Supt. for Ohio, Mich. & Ind.

Jno. H. Hood, Assistant General Superintendent.

Office No. 154 Summit Street,

E. F. MUNGER, } General Agents.
CHAS. M. LANG, }

WALTER C. SCOTT, Local Agent, 152 Summit St.

Special Agents—Kelly Bros., 22 Summit Street.
Office Hours—From 7 in the morning till 9 at night.
Medical Examiners—Drs. Samuel S. Thorn and T. J. Eaton Toledo, O. [1871]

H. M. EDSON,

A. TERRY.

EDSON & TERRY, DENTISTS,

ROOMS 8 & 9 GRADOLPH BLOCK,

TOLEDO, OHIO.

ap16 1v

IMPORTER

Fine Chemicals, Drugs, and Toilet Articles.

Brandies, Wines & Liquors for medicinal purposes only. Also Proprietor of

Toledo Tonic Bitters,

Greatest Remedy known for general debility.

L. E. MULFORD,

23 Summit Street, Corner Perry, Toledo, Ohio
18-1y

THE CELEBRATED CRAIG MICROSCOPE

is an optical wonder; reveals thousands of the hidden Wonders of Nature; is of permanent use and practical availability, combining instruction with amusement, and never losing its interest. It magnifies

TEN THOUSAND TIMES,

a power equal to other Microscopes of many times its cost. Reveals countless little worlds all around us, teeming with life, which to the naked eye must forever remain a sealed book—as Eels in Vinegar, Animals in Water, Cheese Mites, Sugar and Itch Insects, Milk Globules, Claws and Hairs of Insects, Hundreds of eyes in a single eye of a Fly, Dust of a Butterfly's Wings to be perfectly formed Feathers, the much talked of Trichina Spiralis, or Pork Worm, which was first discovered in America with this Microscope.

It is of infinite value to professional men, to teachers, and to students, but NOWHERE IS IT OF GREATER VALUE THAN AT THE FAMILY TABLE, within the reach of every member. It will delight yourself, your children, and your friends during the long winter evenings. It will show you adulterations or uncleanness of various kinds in food, as sugar, tea, bread, meat, etc.

It is of Inestimable Value to the Farmer

in examining insects which prey upon his crops. The power of a $50 Microscope, and so simple in its construction that any child can use it understandingly, and with appreciation.

A Beautiful Present—Elegant, Instructive, Amusing, and Cheap. Over 60,000 sold.

During the past six years its worth has been testified to by thousands of Scientific Men, Farmers, School Teachers, Students, Physicians, Heads of Families, and others.

PRICE, $3.00—Sent by Mail Post paid.

Every instrument is neatly boxed, and handsomely labelled with full directions for use. Thousands have been sent by mail. Address, W. J. LINESS & CO., CHICAGO.

FREE! FREE!

"THE MICROSCOPE," a Monthly Journal of Information for the People—the mysteries of Nature explained—interesting information on the wonders of Creation—stories, sketches, etc. Terms $1.00 per year. This Journal will be sent FREE for one year to any one purchasing a Craig Microscope at the regular price, $3.00. (Craig Microscope will be sent post-paid.) For sample copy, and our beautifully illustrated and descriptive circulars, and eight pages of testimonials of Craig Microscope, send six cents for postage to

W. J. LINESS & CO.,

Opticians, and Sole Proprietors of Craig and Novelty Microscope, CHICAGO, ILL.

AGENTS and DEALERS, this Microscope sells in every family on its merits, when exhibited. LARGE PROFITS. Send for terms. 53t*6

SERMONS

By Rev. O. B. Frothingham

Forwarded free on receipt of five cents for each.

What is it to be a Christian?
Taking God's Name in Vain.
The Issue with Superstition.
Infernal and Celestial Love.
The Sin Against the Holy Ghost.
Pilate and Jesus.
The Dying and the Living God.
The Foes of Society.
The Living Spring of Water.
Elective Affinity.
Religious Irreligion.
Experience and Hope.
The Radical Belief.
The Eternal Gospel.

DAVID G. FRANCIS,
17 Astor Place, NEW YORK.

49t3]

AGENTS WANTED--($225 A MONTH.) BY THE
American Knitting Machine Co., BOSTON, MASS., or ST. LOUIS, MO. 56-68

THE FIRST VOLUME OF THE RADICAL.

Persons wishing to complete their sets of THE RADICAL by adding the FIRST VOLUME, which has been for some time out of print, can do so by at once sending me their orders. By reprinting this volume in part, I can supply 100 copies. To be able to do this, I am obliged to fix the price at $5.00. This will secure a copy, sent to any address post paid.

Volume 2, 3, 4, and 5, will be sent, post paid, for $3.50 each. Single copies of THE RADICAL 35 cts.

The May number contains Mr. Wasson's review of Mr. Abbot's Religion.

The June number contains Mr. Frothingham's article on "What is Religion?"

Address S. H. MORSE, office of "The Radical," Boston, Mass.

WANTED--AGENTS, ($20 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock-stitch" (alike on both sides, and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest Family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Boston, Mass., Pittsburgh, Pa., Chicago, Ill., or St. Louis, Mo. 38y1

Ministers and Singers will find these particularly Adapted to the Voice. They contain no Canebs, are very palatable, and act like a charm. Superior to all others for Colds, Sore Throat, Bronchial and all Lung Difficulties.

RUSHTON'S (F. V.) COD LIVER OIL, for Consumption and Scrofula; the first introduced; fresh and pure. Sold by Druggists generally. 48m3.

A. J. GROVER, Attorney at Law.

AND

WESTERN COLLECTOR,

EARLVILLE, LA SALLE CO., ILL.

Refers by Permission to

HAUGHTON, PERKINS & CO., BOSTON, MASS.
H. B. CLAFLIN & CO., NEW YORK.
J. J. DONALDSON, NATIONAL BANK OF NORTH AMERICA
NEW YORK.
JOHN V. FARWELL & CO., CHICAGO.
WILLIAM R. HAIGHT, BANKER, EARLVILLE, ILL.
44-56.

Agents Wanted For

THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD
Containing Fleetwood's "Life of Christ," "Lives of the Apostles, Evangelists and Martyrs," "Doddridge's "Evidences of Christianity," "History of the Jews," by Josephus; "A History of all Religious Denominations," with treatises and tables relating to events connected with Bible History, containing many fine Engravings. The whole forming a complete Treasury of Christian Knowledge. W. FLINT & CO., No. 26 S. 7th St., Phila., 5 Custom House Place, Chicago, and 176 W. 4th St., Cincinnati. [48m3.

THE INDEX,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO
FREE RELIGION

Published by the

Index Association, at TOLEDO OHIO.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

Terms, Two Dollars a Year.

Advertisements taken for THE INDEX by all responsible Advertising Agents.

Address,
FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
Lock Box 38, Toledo, Ohio.

AGENTS:—

TOLEDO, O., HENRY S. STEBBINS, 115 Summit St.
TOLEDO, O., JULIUS T. FREY, 47 Summit St.
NEW YORK, N. Y., DION THOMAS, 142 Nassau St.
BOSTON, MASS., CROSBY & DAMRELL, 100 Washington St.
CINCINNATI, O., HAWLEY'S NEWS DEPOT, 164 Vine St.
ST. LOUIS, MO., WARREN CHASE, 601 North Fifth St.
DETROIT, MICH., WM. E. TUNIS, 86 Woodward Av.
SYRACUSE, N. Y., LEWIS & WHELAN, 7 Granger Block.

The Index.

VOL. 2.—No. 4.

TOLEDO, OHIO, JANUARY 28, 1871.

WHOLE No. 57.

The Index,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, OHIO.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Editorial Contributors.

THE IMITATION OF JESUS.

[A sermon by Rev. O. B. Frothingham, delivered in Lyric Hall, New York, Sunday, June 12, 1870.]

My theme this morning is "The Imitation of Jesus."

It came to me in this way. After service last Sunday, one whom I had observed to be a very attentive listener came to me and said—"If I understood you aright, you seem to disbelieve in the possibility that men and women should be Christians after the primitive type." I said I did; and, without waiting to listen to my reasons, he turned sadly away. His question put me upon this thought in reply to it—though it would have been easy, at the moment, to give the reasons for my belief that the primitive type of Christians had disappeared.

That was an ideal time; a peculiar phase of thought and feeling. The first disciples were enthusiasts; we may even say that they were visionaries. They lived in a very near and dear memory, in a very near and tender hope,—out of the world of affairs, with no immediate interest in the common transactions of life, with no sympathy with men who were thinking, struggling, and trying to solve the daily problems of their own existence, or that of others. Believing, as they did, that the end of the world was near at hand, they lived as those who are preparing for the end of the world, withdrawing themselves, in thought, feeling, purpose and deed, as entirely as possible from all connections with the concerns of the society about them. This alone would make it impossible to copy the primitive type of Christianity, for in this world, that has no end, that goes on from year to year, increasing in power, wealth and resources, in the complication of its affairs, in the absorbing nature of its interests, it is altogether impossible that we should pattern our life on that of those charming visionaries who dreamed their blessed dream of an instant Heaven two thousand years ago.

And yet is it all a dream? Was there no soul in it, that has a meaning for us? Was there no conception of life that made that time to be what it was, and that is capable of springing up in the midst of our Western life, to make it sweeter and more beautiful than it is now? Grant that we cannot be believers after that early type, can we not be believers at all? Grant that we cannot copy that primitive form of social existence, is there nothing there that we can follow after, or aspire to?

I would not believe that; I have never believed that. I have always had a firm faith that at the bottom of that primitive faith, deeper in those simple hearts than they themselves knew, profounder than they had ever gauged themselves, was a principle, a faith, a hope, a trust, a feeling, a persuasion, which has lived ever since, which has been the best part of Christian life ever since, which has been the soul of all believing souls, which has kept churches mighty when they were mighty, and which, when it has disappeared, has left them powerless; and this was the personality of Jesus himself.

Every great religion forms itself about a person. Some towering figure appears in history, men group themselves round him, attach themselves to him, believe in him, imitate him; organizations are formed, with him for a soul; beliefs are fashioned out of his thoughts; a line of priests, or prophets, administrators, carry far into the future the principle which he just lived long enough to make intelligible to his generation. The religion may alter again and again, a hundred times; its features may be transformed, its characteristics may be so changed as not to be recognized from age to age; its rites and symbols may pass, reappear, and pass again; its dogmas, under the influence of growth, or of criticism and investigation, may take on so many shapes as not to be recognized, even by the men who profess to believe; but the power of that personality, the force of that genius, will still keep alive the faith from generation to generation, in different parts of the world, among the most diverse forms of civilization, among the most different types of mankind. And so I believe it has been with Jesus. He was such a person,—misunderstood, uncomprehended, covered over with all sorts of superstition, yet still so strong in the characteristic elements of his genius, that he has been able to sustain for two thousand years the spirit of those who have taken his name upon their lips.

The primitive church copied the externals of its Christ. The disciples drawn to him by love, cling to him with the profoundest faith. They lived only in him; they remembered nothing else, they looked forward to nothing else, than revisiting and rejoining him. He was ever present in their thoughts; if they met together, they felt he was among them; their communion supper was a communion with him; their life was laid out and patterned with a view of reproducing in themselves, and in society, the example that he set them. The Roman Church was an immense departure from this; so great that history is, as yet, unable entirely to bridge over that gulf between the one and the other. Now the religion is an empire, it sits on a throne, it carries a sceptre, it rules over the wealthiest part of the civilized globe. Could Jesus have revisited the earth at the time when the Roman Catholic faith was in all its glory, would he have known himself? Would he have recognized, by any trait, intellectual or spiritual, the ideal which he declared and exhibited? In these stolid priests, would he have seen any resemblance to his poor disciples? In this mired prince who sat on the throne, with his satellites around him, would he have confessed the successor to the fishermen whom he called away from their nets? In all this parade of sacrament, sign and rite, would he have seen the slightest remembrance of the simple supper to which he sat down with his disciples? What means all this magnificence in the name of him who was poverty itself? This splendid pomp and show in the name of him who had not where to lay his head? This dominion, compelling princes and emperors to kneel in the dust, and all in the name of him who said—"The son of man came to minister and to give his life a ransom for men?"

Protestantism was another immense departure. As compared with Romanism, Protestantism is a new faith; it is another religion. The old sacrament is all but abolished—the rite is so attenuated as to have very little significance left; the dogma so refined upon, so covered over with new incrustations, that it is another form of belief; the very principles altered, the drift of life changed, the hope of humanity shifted from the point where it was.

Pass now to Unitarianism, to the so-called liberal sects, and there is another faith still. Put Romanism, and Protestantism, and Unitarianism together, and you have three distinct religions; different almost in their basis, different in their tendency, in their temper, in their whole style of conceiving of the world. Yet one and all hold this divine figure distinctly in view; one and all bend the head before the Christ; Catholic, Protestant, Unitarian, Ecclesiastic, Philanthropist, Theologian, Moralist—all confess that here is the one thing which they have in common. It is the only thing. This life of Jesus is the silver thread that keeps Christendom strung upon the line of tradition.

Singularly enough, in all these ages, men have spoken of imitating Jesus. They have held him to be the second person in the Trinity—higher than the angels, or the archangels. Still they speak of imitating his life. One of the most celebrated books in the Christian World proceeded from the Roman Catholic Church—the Imitatio Christi—the "Imitation of Christ," a work that has been translated into many languages and has been reproduced in thousands of editions. It was mechanical in its tone. The author of this book took Christ's character to pieces, analysed it, separated all its elements carefully, told in what they consisted, showed their beauty and their truth, their fitness for life, and laid down the rules by which those qualities could be transferred to men and women, in his own name. "Entirely illogical," you will say, "men and women copy God!" And yet that idea of imitating Christ worked itself into the very heart of the Catholic world.

In the Protestant world it is still remarkable that the same irrational attempt was made. Horace Bushnell, one of the most eloquent and able of modern theologians, writes a chapter on the character of Christ, in which he describes it as being supernatural, something that could not have been produced out of the bosom of common human nature, something that could not have been thought of, or dreamed of. He speaks of an innocence that was absolute, a patience that was more than mortal, a dignity surpassing that of any self-respect, that was more than regal, a humility that was more than child-like; perfect sinlessness and piety, without the least touch of shame, remorse, or any experience of repentance; power to live serenely above the world, yet most intensely in the world; capacity of laying out more magnificent plans than were ever entertained by human mind, and yet of bearing himself with the utmost modesty and sweetness, as if he was of no account in the world,—qualities, he says, which must have come from above, and by inspiration. Yet, in the same breath, Horace Bushnell designates this as a perfect human character, complete in all human things, showing to men their own native idea, and presenting to mankind the most perfect specimen of what they ought to be themselves!

We come to the Unitarians, and find that, in proportion as Christ is brought down from the Heaven to the earth, and made a piece of simple humanity, the idea of copying him comes up with fresh significance. This is the great idea with Unitarians—the imitation of Jesus. We can imitate him, they say, as no other can. If he were an archangel, it would be impossible. Men of one order of creation cannot copy beings of another order of creation; mortals cannot copy seraphs; poor human creatures cannot imitate divinities. People who live in a world full of temptation and sin, who must fight their way through an unexplored and untrodden wilderness, cannot move on as serenely as a being can who knows no temptation, has no experience of care or fear, and has never felt what infirmity is. But make Jesus a man, they say, a simple man, a guide, friend, teacher, model, we understand him; we have the key to his thoughts and actions, and he has the key to our hearts. Now he is a warning to us, an inspiration, a consoler, a savior, by helping us to save ourselves.

So all through the Church, from the beginning to the end, from those who have gone farthest from primitive Christianity to those who have returned nearest to it, this idea of imitating Jesus is entertained.

It is an idea that in this generation many are unwilling to cherish. "Imitation! Why imitate anything? Copy another person! Nay, be yourself." See the infinite variety of the world. The naturalists say that there is no plant that precisely resembles any other; in every genus, in every species, there are such infinite differences that as yet we have no conception how large it is, and have only begun to explore it. No two leaves in a forest, some say, are precisely alike. Look at the animal world—how multifarious it is in style and kind, in shape, beauty and proportion! Look at the insect world. We are just beginning to guess how multitudinous it is. And shall the human world be less so? Consider the several types of mankind, all the variations upon those types, the blending of dispositions, the tempering of minds and spirits, the fine shadings which show in what very small respects men may differ from each other, and yet distinctly differ. Shakespeare had a perception of character all but superhuman. We read his plays, and they seem to us miracles of the creative imagination. He summons up men and women, boys and girls, from all ranks of society, of all grades of disposition; they live and breathe before us, each one perfectly distinct from the rest, and yet each one suggesting so many others. Shakespeare, it has been said, might have lived and written to this day, yet never repeated himself. But even he would have given us only the feeblest conception of the infinite varieties there are of human nature. There are not so many types, to be sure, but the variation upon those types is little short of infinite.

Charles Dickens—whose untimely death we mourn as we mourn the death of none of our own kindred—reigned in his sympathies over society with a freedom that very few have been able to obtain. He was a man of the world in a complete sense, a man who has touched many industries of the world, and come upon men in many of their peculiar experiences; a lawyer's clerk, a reporter, a traveller, a man of letters, a man of society, a writer, a speaker, a man who moved freely up and down through the interests of the generation in which he lived, the companion of the richest, the friend of the poorest; familiar with marble halls, equally familiar with the haunts of beggary and crime; honored by those whose honor was a crown, loved by those whose love was a benediction; observing wherever he went, noting everything that he saw, with a singularly delicate power to transfer to his canvass the figures that met his eye. You range through the circle of his novels, and humanity comes before you in every shape. It laughs; it cries; it struggles; it fights; it loses; it wins. It has sin and shame, honor and virtue in it. And yet Charles Dickens does but feebly indicate the marvellous richness of this humanity of ours, which is common to us all. Imitation! Why imitate? Is not the lesson of nature, and the lesson of literature, too, and the lesson of experience, this—that individuality is the one thing to cultivate; not to be like somebody else, but to be unlike anybody else? Has not God made you, and given you your own genius, as it were; given you your own bent of disposition, and said to you, in the dictates of your own nature,—go your own way, look into your own soul, consult your own needs, follow your own aspirations, and be truly a man or a woman, as He has made you to be? Imitation is disloyalty to one's personal genius; to copy another is to dishonor one's own mind. Is not this the current phraseology?

Turn from this teeming and bountiful nature of ours to any religious house. Enter a convent. See the men and women there all dressed exactly alike, walking alike, casting their eyes down to the ground in precisely the same fashion; the same expression on their features, the same want of light in their faces. Could you peer inside, you would see that they are thinking exactly the same thoughts, schooling themselves to the same duties, training themselves with the same mechanical discipline. There is an absolute monotony. Notice these men, these stolid monks and priests, in the street; how completely they have eliminated their humanity! Their study has been to crush themselves out, to kill their genius, to abolish everything that makes them individuals. This is what comes of copying Christ, of imitating Jesus—a poor caricature, blank and juiceless; a humanity without genius, a life without beauty, a future without any glow to its hope, a past without any vitality in its memory. It is a warning. We must not be monotonous, we must not copy, we must not be alike, we must be ourselves. We must cherish, more than we do, unlikeness and dissimilarity; we must do more justice than we have done to eccentricity. We must honor the people who dare to differ from their neighbors, to come out from the world, to take distinctive positions, to confess their own ideas, and live up to their own standards. We must honor them more and more, for the richness of the world depends upon it, and there can be no wholesome or long-lived society without it.

It is to be considered, however, that copying is not imitation. We need not make one a pattern, and yet we may make him an inspirer. It is not required of us, or of any, that we should simply transfer to ourselves thoughts, or deeds, or special traits of feature. But one thing that we all need is an atmosphere of sunlight. We may imitate a being, though we may not copy an individual. To imitate Jesus after the common, average sort, is not feasible. We cannot live as he did. He was an Oriental, a dweller in the East, a land of which we have hardly a conception. He had no home, no domestic ties; he wandered up and down, from town to town, supported, not by his own labor, but by the contributions of his friends; his life was what we should call a vagrant life; he had no business, no industry. It would appear that he discouraged business by calling men away from their industry. He told the tax-gatherer to leave his counter; he said to the fisherman,—"drop your nets"; one comes to him, saying—"Master, I will follow thee, but I must go bury my father." "Let the dead bury the dead; follow me." Another cries,—"I will go with thee, Master, but let me first put my house in order." "No man who takes his hand from the plough, or turns back, is worthy of the Kingdom of God." "Sell what you have and give alms"—is his perpetual demand. Can we do that? What would become of the modern world but for those interests which take up our time and strength and mind, which develop our faculties, and extend our civilization? Jesus never married; he had no wife, or child; he thought little of the domestic ties; he had but small concern with father or mother; the bonds of kindred, which to us are the holiest and the strongest, were to him apparently nothing. Nay, we must say more. He discouraged marriage; he seems to have made it a principle that those who joined his company should detach themselves from wife and children and parents, and render themselves socially untrammelled. Could we do that? Why, marriage is the pillar of our whole state; everything rests on that key-stone. We are so jealous of it that we will not allow anybody to criticise it, even with the hope of making it better; it is reckoned the holiest institution of society. We urge people, more and more, to enter upon it; we say the home is the beginning of the world; the rearing of children is the most sacred work in which men or women can be engaged; the training of future generations is the divine task that is laid upon us. We would protect marriage at both ends; we would see that the first conditions of it are better fulfilled than they are, and that it is continued with more strength, honor and vitality than it has. Here, then, it is utterly impossible for us to imitate Jesus. His position was exceptional, his doctrine was peculiar, and belonged to his time alone.

But, furthermore, take the policy of Jesus. They would make him a King, and he fled away. He took as much pains to avoid being crowned, as most men take to gain a crown. Many men have risked their lives in order to win a throne; he laid down his life in order that he might not gain one. We honor it as being heroic in him; and so it was. But can you make that a rule of life? We are trying, all the time, to induce good men to consent to bear the burden of public trusts; we rebuke those who run away when their fellow citizens would confer honors upon them. When honorable and capable men decline places of responsibility, we hold them chargeable with the evil and mischief that come from their desertion. We say,—"You have no right to shun trusts; you must go into political life; you must do your share; you must play your part in the game; you who are trained and experienced and worthy, must do all you can for the community in which you live; and if you run away, what becomes of society?"

Jesus marched straight to his death. There was, apparently, no need of it; he might have withdrawn; the way was open; he could have escaped his pursuers and avoided arrest; he could have retired into Galilee among his friends; he might have lived, taught, ministered there, and done worlds of good; his career might have gone on to old age, every year in all that time being available to instill his principles, and infuse his life into generations. Yet he quietly marched to the cross, and almost demanded to be put to death. We glorify him for it. We call his conduct heroic, saintly; for him, we say, it was the only thing to do; this was the only way in which he could bear his testimony; it would have killed his soul if he had eluded his fate. But can we do that? Is such a course any rule for the modern reformer? The modern reformer feels that he must live in the world to the last hour of his life, and use his strength all the time. What is he here for but to serve his generation, and not to abandon it? Has he a truth given him, he must not desert it; he must study the most fitting way to administer it; he must get his thought into the human mind little by little, must make it more and more persuasive; if he fails to make himself heard in one place, he must simply go to another. Our reformers do this; not by any means abandoning their cause, rather continuing more and more faithful to it, and showing their fidelity by living to serve it. Is not this the modern rule? Would not the rule that Jesus practised, if applied to us, simply defeat all our endeavors? Of course it would. Even John Brown would have lived if he could.

It is in vain, then, to imitate the outer life of Jesus. But does he cease to be imitable because we cannot copy him externally? A man is not his coat. A man is not his habits. A man is not his opinions. A man is not merely the ordinary range of his activities. The man is the soul of the man, the principle that inspires whatever he does, the spirit that moves him, holds him up, comforts him, makes him the personality he is. Get at that spirit, get at that seat of life, get at that law of character, and you have something that is imitable; that you can follow; that you can stand with. There is nothing incidental or temporary about that. Character is with no generation, no place. It is not Eastern or Western, Northern or Southern; it is not Semitic or Aryan; it is simply human.

Now, here is the point. It seems to me that Jesus exemplified a type of character so pure, sweet, true, original, that it has its force at this day by virtue of what it was. Take but one or two features of it. Jesus holds himself as a trust. His character, his conscience, his purity, truth, honor, justice, call it what you will, this interior sentiment that constitutes one most truly himself, Jesus honors as a trust. His soul is not his, it is God's. He is not so much an individual as a Child of Heaven; placed here for a purpose, endowed for a purpose, watched over and moved for a purpose; and so a singular dignity, a supreme loftiness, settles down upon him. Look at him. See how even, serene, smooth and content he was. The reason he declined the crown was that he could not accept it without forfeiting his convictions. The reason he moved straightway to the cross was that he could not elude the cross without losing something of his own self-respect. Before Caiaphas, the high priest, he bears a quiet demeanor; before Pilate, the representative of the empire, he stands unabashed, retracting nothing, asseverating nothing, not willing to betray himself, though willing to be betrayed. Nothing is of any value but truth to one's self; nothing but simple honor is of the least avail in the sight of Heaven. This characteristic, so lofty yet so tender, is his. "If thy right hand offend thee, cut it off and cast it from thee; if thy right eye cause thee to offend, pluck it out and cast it away." It was contagious; all those who followed him, who knew him, who were his friends, caught this spirit of his. Those early Christians, poor, innocent, simple, superstitious people as they were, nevertheless felt in themselves and in others the presence of this supreme dignity, which they dared not cast down. The slave, abject in his lot, the property of somebody else, nevertheless came to know that he was a person, that God loved him, that he was the brother of the Christ, that Jesus was his friend, that he, as one of the great family of sufferers and sorrowers, could get consolation from his regal word. He was baptized with the most privileged and the greatest; he sat down at the Communion Supper with women of dignity and men of wealth. While the gyves were on his wrist, he felt that there was something within him that could not be fettered or bound. He was a free man in Jesus. His soul, at least, was his own; he might be beaten and scourged with rods; but the sting never reached his heart. He might be slain; it opened the door to his Heaven. This was one reason, doubtless, why the slave, in the early Christian time, never was rebellious against his lord. He felt superior to his lot; he lived in an ideal world, and felt that by virtue of his kindred with Jesus, he was one of the great family of those who are God's freemen.

The condition of woman was degraded, yet she could feel the worth of her womanhood; she could not be made utterly vile; her body could be abused, but her soul could not be insulted. She could, at least, die, and in dying she could go to heaven with those who were noble and pure like herself.

This type of character, based on this profound personal dignity, has lasted all through the Christian generations until now. And with it there went a singular kindness of fellowship and respect for one another, based, not upon any modern sentiment of love, not upon any weak, poor sentimentalism, not upon any rose-water pity and compassion, but upon a profound belief that every human creature shared this dignity, and was, though ignorant of it himself, a partner of the sons of light. No one could be scorned whom Christ acknowledged as a brother; no one could be outraged whom he accepted as a friend; no one could be tortured or slain whom he allowed to sit at the feast of the Communion. And so pity and charity, combined with truth and justice, were manifested everywhere as the type of the Christian character. The great point was to build upon that, to make men feel their own worth, and to be worthy of it. Jesus himself exemplified this in his invective of the Pharisees. There was no scorn of their littleness, and much of it was a magnificent tribute to their power of becoming great. When the poor woman came and flung herself at his feet, he lifted her up, believing that in her was the same dignity, and that only pity, patience, and forbearance would help her to discover it.

The reformers have always loved Jesus. The men who have done the hardest battle for their kind have studied his character most profoundly. The philanthropists have pressed their hearts against his. He has been even the inspiring genius of the most beautiful literature. May I allude again to Charles Dickens? The soul of the beatitudes was in the genius of that man. He dramatized the Golden Rule; he illustrated the parables. He made living and moving before us in human form those delicious precepts of love which seemed to us too airy and fine to be put into practice. He was an apostle without calling himself one; no theologian, he told men to come heart-first to God; no philosopher, his one lesson of love opened the way to a better than many philosophies; no man of science, he disclosed that law of kindness, that law of human sympathy, which organizes communities; no preacher, his gracious words trickled like mountain streams through the parched meadow lands of society; a man who made no pretence to be a ruler among his kind, he pulled many thousands of heart-strings. What a magician he was! He made us all to be God's charity children; he spread his great feast, placed the Heavenly Charity at its head, and bid us all come in; and we came. Philosophers, critics, men of the world, fashionable ladies, high-born gentlemen, nobles, princes, peasants, beggars, orphans, thieves, people from the by-ways and the hedges, all were thankful to sit down at his board; and those who might quarrel again and again with the dear man's literary art blessed him for the banquet, and pronounced a benediction when it was done. Whose friend was not Charles Dickens? Who has not learned to love him? Who has not felt that gentle charity of his, so simple, unquestioning, so entirely of the heart? It was born of that spirit of Jesus, who was himself a little child, who opened his arms and said,—"Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

I do believe that the character of Jesus is of inestimable value to mankind. I do believe that the mere faith that such a character once existed, even if only once, is enough to tone up our manhood and keep it at a high pitch in influential quarters. Its domestication in history is an evidence that it was vital in history. The character of Jesus, there can be no doubt, has done more for the Church than the Church has done for it. For the Church, though doing its utmost to hide it behind altars and bury it beneath dignities, has owed to it all the hold it had on the sympathies of mankind. The official pomp and splendor have been ineffectual to suppress him. Even the bestialities and barbarities have failed to utterly disgust humanity with institutions that had even the savor of his dear name. That the image has survived the decorations of its friends is more wonderful than that it has outlived the attacks of its foes.

That image had been but partially created by the sketchy narratives of the New Testament. They furnished the hints, which the loving imagination worked upon. The foot-print betrayed the Apollo. The critics have torn the New Testament in pieces, but the scent of the roses hangs round the shattered vase. When the gospels were analyzed, the personality of Jesus was not discovered. The spirit had flown. It had its abode in the tender imagination of men. There it remains; and it will take something more than criticism to cast it out. Its presence is not one of commanding authority or power. Jesus is not a philosopher who gives the ultimate causes and reasons of things, as Plato. He is not like Socrates, a clear expounder of moral principles or a sturdy champion of moral laws. He has not the intellectual weight of a consummate preceptor, or the methodical exactness of a guide in conduct. He is rather a moral vision than a substantial person; but he is a vision of outline so firm that the glory haunts our midday hours.

Our revered friend, William H. Furness, who has spent his life in drawing out from obscurity the character of Jesus, is firmly persuaded that, if men could see him as he was, Christianity would become simple and pure again; the old ecclesiasticism would be done away, the old superstitions would be abolished, and there would be an immediate return to the worship of goodness under its divinest, that is, its practical human form. Alas! that is, I am persuaded, an amiable delusion. I do not anticipate that from any cause; certainly not from a cause so attenuated. Even were the person of Jesus to be recovered, the form must be too slight to overawe our modern world, and too pallid to charm it. But I do believe that by cherishing the vision of Jesus, and keeping those characteristics that are associated with him clear and bright in our minds, setting them before us as traits to imitate, as ideals to aspire to, as a standard of endeavor, much will be secured that would otherwise be lost. The quality of our nature will be refined, the cast of our hope will be ennobled, and we shall find it easier to live, in some respects, above the foolish and passionate world in which we are involved. All, then, may feel that they belong to a great family of noble and pure souls; that they are akin to spirits who have vindicated their humanity from slander and shame, and opened to them a heaven of pure thoughts and desires, where dwells the spirit that is greatest of all,—the spirit of a Heavenly Father.

The San Francisco News Letter thus satirizes the frequency of homicide from marital jealousy:—

"All men's wives who have hitherto enjoyed the advantage of our acquaintance are hereby notified that this ceases today, never to be renewed. It is with deep grief that we disrupt the social relations which promise so much, but we feel impelled thereto by the first law of nature. Our lady friends who have the misfortune to be married to other and inferior men will please stick like a leech to their legal protectors, and not recognize us on the street. We have taken considerable pleasure in their society—a pleasure which we flatter ourselves has been mutual—but this thing can no longer be permitted to go on. We trust that our motive—which is pure cowardice—will not be misconstrued. Somebody perishes ingloriously every day for being upon sneaking terms with married women, and we do not care to have our turn come round. Deeply grateful for the past forbearance of aggrieved husbands, we make our bow and retire. Hereafter our nods and smiles will be lavished upon girls and widows exclusively; no others need apply. Whosoever shall attempt to introduce us to his own wife, or that of another man, will be regarded as a conspirator against our precious life, and subjected to abuse in the columns of this journal. Nature is strong in us, and we do not wish to die. Whenever we shall feel a desire that way, we shall treat somebody's wife with common courtesy, get shot, and go quietly to our reward."

QUICK NOTORIETY.—Mr. McCreery, of Kentucky, was hardly known to the residents of Washington and the frequent visitors at the Capitol ten days ago; but he has got the eye and ear of the nation all at once. Rising in his place in the Senate, he offered a resolution providing for removing the remains of some 20,000 Union Soldiers who sleep in the consecrated Cemetery at Arlington Heights, for the purpose of putting the property into the possession of the family of the leading rebel General, Robert E. Lee, whom he eulogized most extravagantly. The astounding audacity of the proposal kept the floor and the galleries of the Senate silent and attentive for some time, through wonder and horror. But the reaction came promptly, and with only four dissenting votes, the Senate flung out the resolution, rebuked its author, and warned his sympathizers wherever they might be found. The Democratic members, who at first seemed pleased with the movement, found themselves obliged to disclaim all sympathy with it, as a means of relieving themselves from the suspicion of being ready to take the Rebellion to their bosoms and christen it patriotism. McCreery hoped to win a smile from the Senate for a rebel General; he succeeded only in getting an indignant rebuke from the whole loyal people for the Senator from Kentucky. Seeking to be reputable, he has only made himself notorious.—Morning Star.

DANIEL MANN AND JAMES DEACON, two Canadians, were executed in Kingston, on Wednesday, of last week. The two were hanged together, but met one another for the first time on their way to the scaffold, when a very affecting scene took place. They fell upon one another's necks and wept, and although one of them was then to undergo punishment for murdering his wife by a continued and persistent effort to poison her with strychnine in order that he might live more satisfactorily with an idiot paramour, and the other was to suffer for the crime of killing the guard of a prison where he had been atoning in some measure for a life of robbery and horse-thieving, the two expressed themselves as sure of a happy home beyond the skies. We know that the God of all is merciful, and that he saved a dying thief upon the cross, but if all murderers have such uniform and never-failing passports to heaven, capital punishment should be abolished as a penalty for murder.—New York Herald.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"I have been a casual reader of THE INDEX. Through the kindness of a friend I have been supplied with several copies of your paper. When I first read a notice of the prospectus of a paper to be devoted to the interests of religion outside of Christianity, I felt more than a passing curiosity to know how the subject would be discussed, and to learn why the editor had laid off the yoke of the Christian. I have read with much interest, though critically. It is 'vigorous and bracing,' but does not chill me with its region of 'perpetual snows.' On the contrary, I have perused its pages with a livelier interest in the subject of religion. If its sentiment or emotional religion has not borne me into the region of the 'Enthusiasm of Humanity,' where there is no temptation but a state of holiness, I have at least cherished strengthened convictions that religion is a real power in the soul, blessing and beautifying the life, that its sweeter graces are not dispelled by free thought and free inquiry. If a sentimental faith in the mysteries of Christianity are lost sight of in the earnest and critical search for rational truth, religion may still glow on the altar of the heart, and bring its possessor into nearer communion with the Infinite. I have unbounded faith in universal education and the harmonious development of humanity. My mind has been drifting away from creeds, ceremonials and church dogmas for years, and I have come to think that these with much else are only the rubbish which has, through ignorance, blindly attached itself to Christianity, but is really no necessary part or parcel of that holier religion which the lowly Jesus taught. In my humble view the great leader of Christianity, though not infallible, taught the absolute religion, by commandment, parable, and life. If Free Religion or Theism is to build a broader and better edifice for human faith and worship, its corner-stone must be laid in that diviner love and faith taught by Christ, and its superstructure raised in a broader obedience to the laws of Spiritual life."

"May your tribe increase.' Very much I thank you for THE INDEX. It seems to me that I get more pleasure, satisfaction, and good out of its columns (they are too short and too few) than all the reading I do beside. If you think this is 'rather late in the day' to acknowledge this fact, let me explain that, being a sort of 'Wandering Jew,' (I am neither Jew, Christian, nor Gentile, but hope I am getting the good of all classes), I was not settled enough to be able to subscribe for THE INDEX, but have bought copies when I could, and when in your city a few weeks since I bought all the numbers your clerk could furnish, and have been having a feast over them since. My friends tell me I am being spoiled by the ideas I read in THE INDEX; but I tell them I had just those ideas in my head before, in a crude form, and was not able to express them to my own satisfaction, a feat THE INDEX does for me, to perfection; so in my lack of words, I fall back on THE INDEX to tell them what I have been thinking—very imperfectly, of course—all along. When I was in your office, I was asked if I would not subscribe for a volume of THE INDEX bound. I replied that, if I could get all the numbers, I would not care for the bound volume; but since reading these I find I do want the volume in the most durable form. Why! I can't bear to think of it as ever wearing out. I want a copy printed in indelible ink, on leaves of steel, and bound in gold. Indeed, I cannot be content with a copy or single paper which my continual handling will so soon destroy. But I suppose I must be content with the perishable book, and my consolation is, that if these leaves pass away, the ideas are bound to LIVE, and spread throughout the West."

"I fervently trust THE INDEX may not go down. You are doing invaluable work for the incoming time. Some day its worth shall be better seen and known than now. I am very sure you have pointed out and are emphasizing some, at least, of what are to be the characteristic traits and features of the Church of the Future. Probably enough the liberal sects, and even the narrower ones for that matter, may have some elements of faith and worship, living and enduring, that the Free Religionists do not yet recognize, at least do not hold at their worth; but there is no occasion for fear that aught that is real and worthy shall by any chance be lost. You are uttering a most indispensable protest, and I bid you in that, God speed!"

"All people West seem to be selfish or jealous of Toledo. 'The paper, if it is good for anything, ought not to be published in such a country village as Toledo. Let him come to a city like Chicago.' Such stuff as this I hear on every side. Of course, there is in all the wide universe but one Chicago; so if you don't come right here, you're of 'no account,' as they say South. For my part, it surpasses my dull comprehension how Radicals can be so un-cosmopolitan. So we worship, I care not whether it be 'in Jerusalem or yet in this mountain.'"

"I herein suggest some names to you, that I think you might send a number of your paper to. There are others that are forming for a club. I loan my paper all the time, and know it is doing good work."

"I have been brought en rapport with you today, from reading your most admirable sermon on 'Noise.' This seems to introduce me to your inner self, and to bring afresh to my mind thoughts and experiences which I have had during some of the most precious seasons of my life, when I have seemed to hear 'the echoes of the eternal harmonies,' and to hold sweet communion with the Infinite. Unless one is awake to this 'expressive silence,' to 'the still small voice,' to this quiet meditation and communion, I think, with you, that they can make little progress in spiritual growth, and will fail to 'reach the normal stature of manhood and womanhood.' But now the great multitudes live only in the sensuous and external, and look upon the man or woman as visionary, or insane, who walks alone at eventide, or seeks the speaking solitudes of Nature, there to meditate and pray, as Jesus did when he went upon the mountain.

'That inner life,—oh, be it mine,
And mine to tread each sacred hall—
To enter in its silent courts,
And know the perfect Soul of All'

If you have another spare copy of THE INDEX containing the sermon I speak of, please send it to me, and find enclosed one dollar, for which enter my name upon your subscription books for six months. THE INDEX points in the right direction and breathes the true spirit. It is out on a 'Voyage of Discovery,' and does not claim, like the orthodox religionists, to have explored the entire religious arena of God's illimitable universe, saying there is nothing more to be learned in this department, and that they are 'determined to know nothing save Jesus Christ and him crucified.' Hence their everlasting 'ding-dong' about the blood of Christ, which is about as sensible as it would be for a people to stand up and repeat their A B C's till the last syllable of recorded time.'

"I saw a copy of THE INDEX lately. It contained the kind of mental food I have been craving for. I hope for the sake of free thought that your paper may prosper. It is encouraging to find men of ability publishing a paper who have the courage to investigate and pronounce upon all questions according to the dictates of truth, howsoever they may conflict with old established creeds or opinions. I was gratified, also, to find that you discussed the topics therein treated in a philosophical spirit, and without bigotry, for truth compels me to say that I have seen much bigotry exhibited even by free thinkers themselves. I herein enclose fifty cents for a copy for three months."

"I have done the little piece of friendly duty of getting you one subscriber beside myself. Enclosed find two dollars for the ensuing volume of THE INDEX, which is to be sent to Mrs. —, of this place. The lady is a fine thinker, and, after seeing a few numbers of the paper, said she would be willing to abstain from butter for six months, if she could in no other way raise the subscription money."

"Can't you make them fold THE INDEX square? Mine comes frightfully askew. Important criticism! Poor editor!" [We wish we could; but the folding is done by small boys over whom we cannot stand with a whip—the only means, we fear, of securing the object desired.—Ed.]

"I have been reading THE INDEX for the last four months, and think it the leading paper of the age. Your ideas of life have ever been mine."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—Regular meetings of this Society will be held during the winter on Sunday forenoons, at 10½ o'clock, in Daniels' Block, corner of Jefferson and Summit Streets, in the hall over the U. S. Express Office. The public are cordially invited.

FREE EVENING SCHOOLS.—The school for men and boys is held Monday, Wednesday, and Friday Evenings, from 7 to 9, in the hall over the U. S. Express Office, Daniels' Block. The schools for women and girls are held at the same time in Scott's Block, Cherry Street, and in Campbell's Block, St. Clair Street.

RECEIVED.

THE SCIENCE OF EVIL; OR FIRST PRINCIPLES OF HUMAN ACTION. Together with Three Lectures: Salvation and Damnation before Birth, or the Scientific and Theological Methods of Salvation Compared;—Sunday, Its History, Uses and Abuses;—Prayer, The True and False Methods Compared. By JOEL MOODY. Topeka, Kansas: CRANE & BYRON, Publishers. 1871. Royal 16mo. pp. 342. Price $1.75. Sent post-paid on receipt of price.

REASON THE ONLY ORACLE OF MAN; or a Compendious System of Natural Religion. By COL. ETHAN ALLEN. Boston: J. P. MENDUM, 84 Washington St. 1854. 12mo. pp. 171.

THE NEW YORK OBSERVER YEAR BOOK AND ALMANAC. 1871. SIDNEY E. MORSE, JR. & CO., 37 Park Row. Price One Dollar. Sent gratuitously on payment of one year's subscription in advance.

SUNDAY SCHOOLS: The Crime of the Christian Church. By E. F. RING. Price 10 cents. Published by the AMERICAN SPIRITUALIST PUBLISHING COMPANY, corner Prospect and Sheriff Streets, Cleveland, Ohio. pp. 15.

R. H. McDONALD & Co.'s ILLUSTRATED ANNUAL. 1871. Literature, Agriculture, Arts and Sciences. New York: R. H. McDONALD & Co., 32 and 34 Commerce St. Sent post-paid on receipt of Ten Cents.

EVERY BOY'S MAGAZINE. Devoted to Fiction, Travel, History, and Sport. Vol. 1, No. 1. WM. H. RIDEING, 4 Province Court, Boston, Publisher. 12-page monthly. Price, 50 cents a year.

Poetry.

[For THE INDEX.]

SEVENTEEN.

A BIRTHDAY REVERIE.

The bubble on the sparkling wave
Floats lightly on, and quickly dies;
Even so life hurries to the grave,
And so my boyhood perishes.

But pause—look back! On wasted years
My saddened eye perforce must rest,
On flattering hopes and idle fears,
On thoughts and words and deeds unblest.

Regrets are useless, tears are vain—
Then cease Time's falling sands to waste;
For folly's mark and error's stain
By good alone can be effaced.

The path of life, 'tis true, is rough,
Yet banish thy desponding fears;
Around thee there is woe enough
To claim thy sympathy and tears.

The Past owns not thy weak control;
The Future thou canst ill divine;
Then waste not life in tears, my soul,
But seize the Present while 'tis thine.

Trust not to those who coldly teach
That, since the course of Time began,
True virtue is beyond man's reach;
Have faith in God—have faith in man!

Though weak our strength, our temper frail,
Hope clingeth to the sons of men;
True courage is not ne'er to fail,
But, failing, to take heart again.

Oh grant me, in the hour of youth,
Ere, cooled by age, my zeal depart,
A sacred reverence for Truth,
A hopeful and undaunted heart;

A heart that feels for all mankind,
That ne'er shall cease for woe to beat;
A firm and independent mind,
Unconquered even by defeat;

A soul unprejudiced and free,
Whose faith in God shall ne'er abate,
Whose highest aim and wish shall be,
In conquering self, to conquer Fate!

1853.

ASTERISK.

The Index.

JANUARY 28, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

The bound volume of THE INDEX for 1870 will probably be sent by Express (to ensure safe delivery) next week. At the low price put upon it, we cannot afford to prepay Express charges, as we should gladly do if we could. There are still a few copies unsold, which we should like to be able to deposit in the leading libraries of the country. Through the liberality of Mr. James T. Dickinson, of Middlefield, Conn., and Mr. Asa K. Butts, of New York city, seven copies will be thus disposed of. If any wealthy friend of the paper thinks that THE INDEX will be of any value to the future historians of American religion, now is the time to secure it for them.

Persons to whom THE INDEX is sent for the month of January at the request of friends, and who may desire to subscribe, will confer a favor by doing so before their names are removed from our mail-list. It is hoped that many will promptly respond in this manner, and thus help to sustain a paper which can expect support only from the boldest and most thoughtful minds of the community.

A letter dated Plainwell, Mich., Jan. 16, and enclosing $2.00, but without any signature, has been received. Will the sender please forward his name?

To CORRESPONDENTS.—The Editor of THE INDEX will be absent at the East from Feb. 1 to Feb. 15.

We are glad to add the names of Messrs. J. Vila Blake and William H. Spencer to our list of Editorial Contributors.

"TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES."

The "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles" have been printed in a neat tract of sixteen pages with the above title—"TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES." Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The object of the tract is two-fold—to disseminate as widely as possible the ideas of Free Religion, and to make THE INDEX everywhere known as an organ of these ideas. We wish to scatter these tracts broadcast throughout the land, and thus make a frank appeal to the intelligence of the American public; and to this end we urgently request the co-operation of all earnest liberals.

Whoever is willing to lend his or her assistance in increasing the circulation of THE INDEX will find this tract exactly the thing to put into the hands of possible subscribers. Here in small compass are stated the grand principles of Free Religion, at least as the editor of THE INDEX conceives it; and whether those who read the statement subscribe for the paper or not, it is believed that they will at least be roused to new and profitable thought. With this hope, friends, earnestly appealing to you to help us distribute the "Truths for the Times," we make the following propositions:—

1. If you are able and willing to do so, send $1.00 for 100 copies—only one cent apiece.
2. If you cannot give so much as $1.00, send for as many copies as you will use, and they shall be forwarded on receipt of enough postage stamps to pay for mailing them to your address.

3. If you cannot even enclose stamps, but are willing to give a little time, name the number of copies wanted, and they shall be mailed free of all expense.

We should be glad to have the actual cost of these Twelve Thousand Tracts returned to us; but we want to distribute them at all events, and rely on the earnestness and goodwill of our subscribers to enable us to do this. Friends, will you not help in the work?

THE MODERN INQUISITION.

D. G. Ingraham, of Santa Cruz, California, writes to the Boston Investigator:—

"I have been preaching the gospel of Common Sense to the Unitarian Church on the platform of Radicalism for the past year and a quarter, but was driven out by a church clique."

Such has been the experience of nearly every man among the Unitarians who has followed the guidance of reason, and turned a deaf ear to the seductions of prudent conformity. Even men like A. W. Stevens, of Cambridgeport, Mass., than whom no minister could be more faithful to daily duty, more irreproachable in conduct, more considerate and inoffensive in speech, more deeply religious in spirit, are continually driven from their posts on a charge of "radicalism" by men whose souls would rattle noisily in a nutshell. Year after year young radicals full of enthusiasm for truth and humanity enter on the same path—some to share the same fate and be turned adrift, others to escape it by selling themselves for place. If there is any pretence more wickedly hypocritical than that of "Unitarian liberty," we have yet to hear of it. In boyhood we read somewhere of the statue of a beautiful Venus set up in the torture-chamber of the Spanish Inquisition. To this the victim of priestly fiendishness was lashed; the arms began gradually to embrace him, and, moving by invisible machinery, pierced him through and through with an infinity of sharp and slowly protruding knives. Such is the "Christian freedom" to which Unitarianism weds its unsuspecting dupes.

The INCORRUPTIBLE SENATOR—that is the fit title for Charles Sumner. His career is an epic poem of moral greatness in political life. Country is dear to him, but justice is dearer; and he sets his face like a flint against every attempt on her part to trample upon the weak. He is right in opposing the San Domingo annexation scheme, and it is time for the public conscience to make itself heard through the press in his support.

Gen. Grant is entering on dangerous paths. If he dares to repeat the folly of Andrew Johnson—presumes to foist on the country a "policy" when he promised to have no policy,—let him share Johnson's fate, and, notwithstanding his past services, learn by bitter experience that the American people are not worshippers of men. Let him beware of forcing an issue with the moral sentiment of mankind! His appointment of Commissioners, however, is most excellent. No better men could be named than Doctor Howe, President White, and "old Ben Wade." We earnestly hope the great fame of Gen. Grant may take no tarnish now.

The Watchman and Reflector (we "advertise" it on the same principle that makes a conscientious apothecary label a phial of sulphuric acid) takes up THE INDEX with a pair of tongs:—

"The editor of one of the extreme radical papers,—we will not advertise it or him by giving names,—says,—'If it is a fitting thing to honor the memory of Shakespeare, of Washington, of Humboldt, it is a fitting thing to honor Jesus also by celebrating his memorial day.' Will this wise person inform us why these men whom he makes equal with Christ have not also so impressed the world that millions rely upon them for eternal salvation?"

Because they were too well educated to imagine themselves "Saviors." If they had fallen into this delusion, there would have been no lack of babies to cry for their "salvation." The writer of the above paragraph can discover no higher greatness in Jesus than the power of "impressing millions." Mahomet "impressed" nearly as many. Buddha "impressed" more. Will the Watchman and Reflector please inform us why it puts Jesus below Buddha?

"WHATEVER IS, IS RIGHT"—is the awkward name of a new paper in Newburgh, N. Y., edited by L. Scott at $1.50 a year. Dr. A. B. Child contributes to it reports of Rev. W. H. H. Murray's sermons, which he rates much higher than we do. The paper is a cheerful attempt to extinguish evil by shutting the eyes to it. Playing ostrich is a poor game. "Whatever is, is right"—except what is wrong.

Persons remitting money for new subscriptions to THE INDEX, or for renewal of old subscriptions, will find their receipts in the printed slips attached to their papers. These indicate the date of expiration of the time paid for. If the dates are not changed at the end of a fortnight, subscribers will please notify us. But it frequently takes as long as that to get the necessary changes made on our mail-list; and no anxiety need be felt sooner concerning the receipt of letters.

THE DISAPPEARANCE OF THE CLERICAL.

It happened to me, not long since, to attend a committee-meeting of a benevolent organization in New York city, and to be the last at the rendez-vous. Entering a room full of tobacco-smoke, I made out with some difficulty my four or five associates, the most noticeable of whom was a big, heavily-bearded man, in a rough pea-jacket, who had a cigar in his mouth and kept his heels higher than his head. I was introduced to him as the Rev. Dr. X., a leading Presbyterian clergyman.

That figure will always linger in my memory as a symbol of that disappearance of "the clerical" which is now almost complete. It recalled images of my early youth,—clergymen who still wore gown and bands, and black silk gloves with the thumb and finger open that they might handle their manuscript the better. Finney, in that very lively work, "Lectures on Revivals," printed in 1835, says that when ministers gave up the wig, it seemed as if they had given up the Bible, and declares that, but a few years before the time of his writing, an old minister in New England had refused to let a young brother officiate in his pulpit, because the youth wore pantaloons instead of "small-clothes." When Finney himself, in 1827, wore a fur cap, people said that was "too bad for a minister." Even the round hat was then an innovation, and elderly people thought that anything beyond a round hat was "undignified," and not to be tolerated. "But reason has triumphed," as Finney justly remarks; and reason, or anything else that is secular, has certainly attained its perfect work in my friend the Rev. Dr. X.

Is the good Doctor the gainer? Probably he is, individually, for he is strong enough to meet the world's people on their own ground and lead them. Where nature has marked a man out for a leader, he does not need a uniform to show his rank. General Grant could afford to wear plain clothes,—and his were often very plain. But nine hundred and ninety-nine military officers out of a thousand need all the appliances of their rank to give them authority. What is true in war is true also of the church-militant. Where one strong man gains, the myriad weak lose. Not one young man out of a hundred who enter the ministry in these days, can make himself personally felt as the natural leader of his people without gown and bands, or a wig and small-clothes, to keep up the illusion. In my judgment the declining influence of the clergy is just as plainly written in the disuse of the clerical dress and manners, as would be the declining discipline of an army in the disuse of the symbols of rank. In both cases, it is hard to keep up the practice of authority without the aid of shoulder-straps.

One of the ablest clergymen of New England—a D. D. of great practical experience and of no radical tendencies—told me, not long ago, that in his opinion the clergy had been living for half a century on the inherited prestige of Puritan days. He added that this prestige was now almost worn out, and that in fifty years it would be impossible for a man of mediocre talent to sustain himself in the ministry. And, as it was admitted by all that the ablest young men were not now commonly attracted to the pulpit as a profession, it was really doubtful, he said, whether, a hundred years hence, there would be any clerical class at all.

I agree in the doubt. In the constant advance of popular education, and the substitution of practical interests for abstract dogmas, the authority of the ministry must go on declining. The absurdity is more and more visible of taking some young and inexperienced boy from a theological seminary and giving him the monopoly of the Sunday, to exhort men and women who know incomparably more than he does of life and even of books. Fifty years ago it was otherwise; and fifty years ago, as the college catalogues will show you, the ablest graduates chose the ministry as their career. This year the Harvard Divinity School (Unitarian) counts but nine college graduates among its thirty-seven pupils; the Episcopal School at Cambridge has but five among its twelve. Yet these are, or were till recently, the two most cultivated denominations in the land. "The American clergy have long since ceased to be a learned class; they are fast ceasing to be even a cultivated class." And without superiority given by superior education, on the one side, or that based on wigs and small-clothes, on the other, it is idle to suppose that their special authority can linger long. It is a comfort to think that, as old Fuller said, "there never was a good tongue that wanted ears to hear it," and that, with or without ordination, there will always be men to speak the truth.

T. W. H.

THE SPIRIT OF TRUTH.

Lessing said,—“The worth of man lies not in the truth which he possesses, or believes that he possesses, but in the honest endeavor which he puts forth to secure that truth;” and then follows that oft-quoted sentence,—“If God should hold in his right hand all truth, and in his left hand only the ever-active impulse after truth, . . . I would, with humility, turn to his left hand, and say,—‘Father, give me this; pure truth is for Thee alone.’” This spirit of Lessing was the spirit of truth, and is, if I mistake not, the characteristic spirit of this age.

Early Christianity was distinguished by a spirit of love, sympathy, and charity; mediæval Christianity by a spirit of chastity, which gave rise to monasticism and the celibacy of the clergy; but the spirit of truth, of fearless inquiry, has been suppressed rather than developed under historic Christianity. In fact, this spirit of truth is so much extra-Christian that it has been generally regarded as anti-Christian, and warred upon as the enemy of God and man. The spirit of love is prominent in the New Testament, but you will hardly find a passage that breathes the pure spirit of truth. Paul's "prove all things" is an exception. Christianity has been the fruitful mother of saints, but not of philosophers; she has bred loving and lovable men and women, but not independent thinkers; she has built asylums for the sick in body and the sick in mind, but she has also tried to strangle in its cradle every new science.

The physical sciences were not born of Christianity, but of humanity, and have advanced under the ban of the Christian Church. I do not mean to depreciate the spirit of love, which is so prominent in Christianity. God forbid! It is this spirit that forms the warp and woof of what is most charming and beautiful in the web of social life. Existence would be intolerable without it. We must have it, but we must also supplement it with this other, rarer, higher, more heroic, and more intellectual virtue, the spirit of truth. We ought not only to love men, but eternal principles. We ought to love to search out and serve our brothers, and also to search out the truth and serve it and love it supremely, simply because it is the truth.

These two spirits have been divorced too long. Religion has had one and science the other; and now Free Religion is trying to unite them. The reason that they have been divorced is obvious. The very essence of the spirit of truth is not only the love to think, but the liberty to think. This liberty must be absolute, unconditional. Now religion heretofore, including Christianity, has conditioned and limited this liberty by creeds. The schoolmen were free to reason within prescribed bounds. They must be loyal to the Catholic Church and Aristotle's logic. Luther and Calvin were at liberty to think as they pleased, bound only to be loyal to the Bible. Their followers enjoy the same liberty. They can roam at will, "full, free, and unconfined," throughout the vast extent of their binding creeds. Liberal Christianity believes in the boundless freedom of the "chainless mind," bound only to be loyal to the "gospel of Christ," whatever that may be. From Catholicism to Unitarian Christianity, as defined at the last Conference in New York, there is no room for the spirit of truth and perfect freedom to wed the spirit of love and charity. Head and Heart, Reason and Love, Science and Religion, are still divorced as they have been for ages. Between Catholicism and Unitarianism, included, you can not have perfect liberty of thought. One has the minimum of the spirit of truth with the maximum of obedience to authority, and the other vice versa. One shouts "Liberty and the Church," and the other shouts "Liberty and the Christ." One confines its activities, methods, and fellowship strictly to the limits which the Catholic Church prescribes, and the other confines "its activities and its methods and its fellowship strictly to Christian limits." (Secretary Lowe's letter on the Unitarian Position). Within this denomination, as I understand it, you are free to think as you please, provided you think with the majority. You may have what Lessing calls the "ever-acting impulse after truth," provided that impels you after Christ, not otherwise. You can have all the liberty you want, provided that you only want the liberty that is in Jesus Christ. You must call yourself a "follower of Christ," though you know not what that means, or you are not invited to their fellowship. No man who is bound to do that is free, though he may be unconscious of his chains. It matters not what binds me, whether it is a silken cord or a wrought-iron cable,—if I am bound, I am bound; and it breaks no chains to shout "liberty!" Any slave can do that.

Catholicism has a large creed, and Unitarianism has a creedlet. In each you must wear a dogmatic yoke as a condition of fellowship. This is incompatible with the perfect spirit of truth. As free men we must have this, and as good men we must keep with it the sweet spirit of love.

Many complain of radicals that they do not seem to have the latter. A correspondent writes,—“My foundation-principle is that of Free Religion, but somehow I don't altogether like the spirit or utterances of those who actually associate under that name.” For a similar reason it was, no doubt, that Crabbe Robinson said,—“I prefer Dissent to the Church; but like churchmen better than dissenters." Luther was not half so agreeable as Leo X. or Erasmus. Reformers must deal blows at error, and this presents the pugnacious side of character. A combative spirit is necessarily repulsive, and, as Herbert Spencer says,—"The toleration of abuses (or errors) seems amiable merely from its passivity." But we cannot sacrifice the spirit of truth for smiles and kisses. They are pleasant, but they have betrayed many since Jesus. We must look facts squarely in the face, and not call tweedle-dum tweedle-dee for the sake of harmony with our neighbors. We must not blink distinctions nor juggle with words. Language was made to convey ideas, and not to conceal them. The use of words of double meaning leads to double dealing. "If you practise dishonest speech, you soon lose the habit of thinking honestly." We cannot sacrifice honesty to amiability. The spirit of love we desire to preserve; but this is a cheap and common virtue compared with the spirit of truth. The latter is found only in the highest characters, and is the latest offspring of humanity. The former, beautiful as it is and equally desirable, we hold in common with the "mute" creation. Let Free Religion hold fast to both the old and the new. W. H. S.

Please remit two dollars at once, and secure THE INDEX for a year.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

A LADIES' CONVERSATIONAL CLUB OUT WEST.

[We have obtained permission to print the following remarkable letter from one sister to another, and think our readers owe us no little gratitude for the service. It is seldom so much wisdom gets uttered in equal space.—Ed.]

DUBUQUE, Oct. 26, 1870.

DEAR —,

You request me to tell you something of the organization of our literary and conversational clubs in Dubuque. The Round Table, of which A. is President or Chairman, is the only one which has had a furnished room, and has kept steadily on in pursuit of its object. The ladies' conversational class never had any very definite organization. Ten ladies decided to meet to compare their thoughts on different subjects, one subject being selected for one afternoon. The different schools of the Greek philosophers were selected by myself. Two of the ladies knew as much as I did, after I had studied very critically; but they knew so much of Grecian history, literature and mythology, that they were overloaded to silence. We could get nothing from them; they did not know where to begin. Our ignorance opened the vacuum needed, so that our two silent women got really eloquent.

It was brought about, not by direct questions, but by starting an open question. It is the meeting of minds that produces life and stimulates to thought. One must get warmed with her subject,—must have a view and love her view, but still desire to know the truth. "It is not knowing things, but knowing the relationship of things, which gives wisdom."

There are two currents in each mind which must be in active motion; then there must be a free play of opposite currents between people. But if you work directly for this end, you lose all. To gain pleasure, you know, you must not set out in quest of it, but throw your whole soul into some high work, and some one or accomplish something that is beneficial; and lo! your pleasure is thrown in gratis. Pleasure is the Spirit's pay for work well done, or thought for some good end. How irreligious are those who start out to be religious—who make it their business to "get religion!" All these spiritual treasures come not with observation.

I had an object, of course, in my questions and suggestions. For instance, I wanted these women to give us the history of Greece and its religion incidentally; so after I had called out what Mrs. R. thought of the Pythagoreans, as compared with the Eleatics and Sophists, I remarked something like this,—"If I remember rightly, the mythology of the people had advanced," (here I gave my views of how far it was believed and developed). I then asked Mrs. R. if she agreed with me. "Not at all," said she. Then she went on to show how certain wars had modified the belief of the Greeks; how certain philosophers had influenced them. "Do you agree with Mrs. R., Mrs. B.?" asked I of our most critical scholar. "Not entirely," she answered. "Do you think?" I said, "that new influence came to the Greeks from closer interchange of their own thoughts? Was it indigenous to Greece?" "Not entirely," Mrs. B. answered, (she is provokingly silent, but it was because her mind was collecting and arranging the facts; she has no idea of showing off). "Was the influence from Italy or Asia?" This provoked her to words. "Neither," said she, "but from Egypt." And here she started, and did not stop till we found out that she knew far more than any one else of the causes of Grecian civilization. As I was Secretary, I just made a note that Mrs. B. was to take up the Egyptian civilization for her topic, when it came round again.

For three afternoons I had the Grecian philosophers discussed. While studying, I kept a little note book to record suggestions and questions that I wished to have asked. Then at the Club I selected according to judgment. We all tried to be prepared on each subject that was suggested for consideration; but there was always some one selected to be responsible and lead in it. Sometimes the subject or the occasion took such a shape that it was almost wholly a monologue. When Mrs. B. took—"Egypt, her Literature and Civilization the Foundation of European Civilization"—it was almost entirely a monologue and a reference to authorities, because she is a person whom, when once warned and enlisted, one should keep silent and hear through. Though the class differed from her in her conclusions, most thinking that the Egyptians gained their best from Asia, still we did not disturb her till the next week.

You must study temperaments to find the correct method for work. I do not think it well to be bound to any one method. Earnestly seek for each one's thought, for the results of his or her study, and you will not fail of the mark. "Judge not that ye be not judged." Condemn not, though you may differ from another's conclusions and method of stating them. What is not food to you, may be to another.

N.'s leading was the most perfect of all; she had three afternoons. She had the three epochs of Italian art. She treated it very ably; but it was no conversation, rather parlor lectures. We all learned much. Her mind is like a steam engine—it will draw a heavy load on its track, but is floundered off it. A slight disturbance or interruption will throw it off. She requires some one to "prepare the way, making the path straight."

About every fourth meeting was miscellaneous. We brought up any recent subject of interest. The best furniture to save trouble and expense in houses, or children's Sundays—all sorts of subjects women need to take counsel together on. When house-cleaning came on, and we had to "dissolve," we had just commenced the investigation of Punishment, Prison Reform, Prevention of Crime, etc., etc.

Mrs. H.'s subject was the Influence of Climate and Food on Mankind: a study of Guyot. We devoted five afternoons to Finances and Banking. One took the financial system of Germany, another of France, of Holland, of England, of America. Then the history of Banking—its beneficial influences on civilization. We took Guizot's definition of civilization, that it is "the perfecting the relation between man and man." Then we compared American civilization with ancient (so-called) civilization. K. treated ably the causes of the Reformation of the sixteenth century, then the results gained by it. We compared English literature with American. We took a month to the conversation on the birth of our own nation, reading that splendid scripture, The Federalist, then tracing the great political questions that have agitated the country. E. took architecture, but N. had to help her out.

In our ladies' club we had stringent rules about interrupting, to check some of us who were famous for that sin, and fell whenever tempted. In the club I was a member of, where the gentlemen were admitted, it was entirely free, their cool, calm minds giving the equipoise. But when we were without the masculine element, we had to set up law. For myself, I prefer the way of nature, and to have the masculine element in its natural, rather than its disembodied, or artificial form. Don't expect life, if the members are all wise, talented, and noted. Even dry sand causes some soils to be fertile. Don't get too many minds who deal only in germ-thoughts. One Emerson is enough for one group. They say I do well with two styles of persons—with vacant but asking minds I "preach eloquently"—with the very rich and silent, I become a Socratic questioner. You want all styles; but they must have one aim, desire for culture by appreciating each other's worth, by aiding one another. Be civilized, and "perfect the relation between man and man." I have more interest in matters of social science and national topics than in history, but prefer something recorded. I believe in the divinity of to-day. I want to find out and honor the Christs of to-day,—those who, though they cannot raise the dead, do keep many from the grave. I love to study to-day, so to improve to-morrow. At family prayers I used to pray with a vim, "Thy Kingdom come on earth!" Somehow I want to work on the same thing I pray for.

I can only account for this long letter because it is a rainy day. My millionth aquatic ancestors make me more alive.

I think the study of biography one of the most useful. You will notice that the Round Table select the life of some one person to represent the subject investigated; then note that each person selects a department, and keeps it. I do not think this so well. I would not like to be confined to social science, nor to philosophy, nor any other one thing. When we find it convenient to meet again, Mrs. B. by her year's study will tell us much of the Nebular Hypothesis; Mrs. R. of Prussia's History, etc.

Some of our ladies always study in subjects, so they are prepared on a number of subjects. It is the only way to study to advantage. This newspaper reading and reading without an object in view is not very profitable. All young persons should be taught to read by subjects. A. thinks the advantage of selecting a biography for a text gives one something to commence on—gives a starting point. Then one who has not ability to discover the principle or the idea of a subject does not utterly fail, if he can fall back on a biography. He thinks to lead a conversation successfully requires a severe tension of the intellect, the finest appreciation of other's thought, with great charity towards those who do not succeed in appreciating the best. Alcott calls it "having hospitality for each other's thought." Margaret Fuller succeeded finely, because she "thought the object of life was to grow." So she aided all who wished to grow. She did not demand that they bring her fruit, but they must keep the currents of their nature in play—they must at least be sprouting, leaving, or blossoming.

It is deadening to attempt too much. Don't have your ideal tuned to a success every time. The perfect hours of life are few and far between. So are the heights of the earth. If all should happen to feel stupid—if you should happen to be out of tune—don't insist upon playing the tune appointed this time. Let stupidity reign; but enjoy it. That is a natural state of the mind, at times. If you do not cross the prevailing sentiment of the evening, it will set words to its own law. One evening our evening class met. No talk, no sympathy, no nothing. I thought. I mentally whistled to keep my courage up. Our President said,—"This has taught me a beautiful truth—how very happy we have been, just sitting together with our feet on the stove, silent." I have not sought your thought, nor you mine; yet we have recognized that this was all right—needed no excuse. We have found out that for our happiness undiminished brilliancy is not necessary—that genius is not necessary, nor thought, nor wisdom. We have found that we are happy, when we recognize a law and obey it. We were stupid; we did not put in its place artificial brilliancy. We did not stimulate ourselves into an unnatural state, but treated stupidity and ignorance as deferentially as we treat our other moods.

Then we stood in the door with our things on, and talked for twenty minutes. Those twenty minutes stand out clear, high, holy in my memory. As I tramped up the hill through the rain, I thought,—"There! That is somewhat as things will be when we are free from bodies, and don't have to keep up appearances." Heaven seemed possible; recognition without a body seemed possible. I have laughed to myself since, when one says,—"Our dear, blessed, stupid evening."

Wet, green wood, no draught to stove—ashes choking the damper—only one hope—such a state showing me heaven! But it did. I brought from the hill three sticks of fine dry wood wrapped in a newspaper. As I slid through the street, some thought them manuscripts, perhaps fine theories or historical notes. Nothing but common wood. But wood in its place at the right time was just the thing. Success comes from getting the right thing in the right place at the right time. Have some one in your club who can realize the value of trifling things. Love one another—on this hangs all success. "All true love is grounded on esteem." We do not esteem any who trample under foot proprieties or law. It is only a few years we have, any way, to aid or be aided by souls here. The time is short for souls' acquaintanceship. I desire to know enough of some rare, fine souls here, that I may be able to recognize them hereafter by their thought, their personality of soul.

This is all imperfectly written, and too long; but I have not the time to arrange or copy. I have been constantly interrupted. I do not doubt you think,—"Better this than nothing."

Ever your affectionate sister, M. N. A.

RETROGRADE REFORMS.

NORTH COLEBROOK, CONN., Dec. 5, 1870.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—Having been a subscriber and reader of THE INDEX the past year, I wish to present a few thoughts to you.

In your issue of Dec. 10, you speak of the "peaceful election of Abraham Lincoln to the Presidency of the Great Republic" as "the immediate cause of our own terrible civil war, which could have been indefinitely postponed by Northern submission to the Southern pro-slavery party."

Have the Southerners ever demanded of the North anything that was not guaranteed by the Constitution? If they have, please inform me what it was.

I had supposed the war was caused by withholding or preventing their enjoying their constitutional rights.

One article in the platform on which Lincoln was elected said that slavery should go no further in the Territories; but the Supreme Court had decided they had a Constitutional right to take their slaves into the Territories.

In good old Massachusetts, United States officers were mobbed while in the discharge of their duty in reclaiming fugitives who had escaped from their masters. Congress was petitioned year after year to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia; but such men as Daniel Webster, Henry Clay, Thomas Benton, and others that regarded their oaths, would not vote for it.

I well remember the prediction of Webster, made some twenty-one years before the war broke out. It was in these words,—“If these infernal Abolitionists get the control of the government, they will override the Constitution, make laws to suit themselves, deluge the land in blood, and bankrupt the nation.”

Sir, you are at liberty to publish the foregoing or throw it into the waste-basket.

I am well pleased with THE INDEX in most of the matter which the first volume contains.

In the effort now making to inaugurate female suffrage, I cannot acquiesce. If we undertake to make men of women, I think they will be women still. I think that, if every lady twenty-one years of age would express her mind on the subject, we should find a large majority against it.

IRA SMITH.

[We have no disposition to discuss dead issues, but are quite willing to let all sides be heard in THE INDEX.

If Mr. Smith wants a vote by women against their own right to vote, we fear he is helping to “inaugurate female suffrage.” To consult them at all is to endorse the principle in dispute.—ED.]

SPONTANEOUS GENERATION.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—By an accident which, perhaps, the Postmaster of our city may best be able to explain, I received No. 53 of THE INDEX (Dec. 31) but yesterday, a couple of days later than No. 1 of the new volume. Owing to this fatal accident, “K. N.’s” communication, “Spontaneous Generation,” came to my notice more than a week later than it ought to have come, and prevented thus my answer to it, which he so friendly requested. And though I do not consider myself bound to answer every article he may write, even if my answer is requested in a still kinder manner, yet I will, for the last time, gratify him once more, notwithstanding the sufficient answer you have already given him; an answer, by the way, which proves the correctness of the supposition in my former answer to his first article on the above subject, that he used the “we” in it without your consent and authority.

But let us come to “K. N.” and his queer questions and puzzles. I believe it does not require either a “younger and more scientific,” or an older and less scientific man, but merely a man of sound common sense to answer “K. N.’s” perplexing first question. Without going over the old ground of our controversy again, I will only state that “spontaneous generation” is no miraculous creation, but merely “the natural and gradual evolution of the lowest organic forms out of inorganic matter,” as you, in a few words as possible, told him. This, though “incomprehensible to us,” is at least intelligible and natural; for it is “an evolution” according to laws that, even if to some degree “incomprehensible,” are not unreasonable, not contrary to the laws and phenomena of Nature with which we are acquainted, and a great many of which we can and do comprehend. But “the miraculous conception and birth of Christ” is just the opposite of the former,—is merely a miraculous conception or birth; that is to say, it is no evolution out of any matter, nor according to any comprehensible or incomprehensible law, but is mere fiction, a miracle, i. e., an extraordinary event contrary to every law of Nature, contrary to all facts and phenomena with which we are acquainted, and consequently of that sort of “facts” which science ignores and rejects. Where, then, is the analogy between the two cases? And would it not be well for “K. N.,” also, to be a little “more scientific”? For even if spontaneous generation may be conceded to be a debatable theory for “more scientific men,” the miraculous conception and birth of Christ cannot be a debatable theory for men in the least degree scientific. It cannot belong to the category of scientific theories at all, but must be classed with other unscientific and superstitious matters of Faith! It may be believed in by the ignorant or fanatical, but it cannot be rated as a debatable scientific theory.

“K. N.” further asks,—“Why cannot the Professor (Huxley) go a little further,” etc. All the answer I (and even the Professor himself) can give him to that query is, because there is a limit to man’s investigations and knowledge. Science cannot penetrate all the mysteries of Nature, but it can discover some of her laws.

The further puzzles of “K. N.” are the result of his “perceiving so clearly that it is not a whit more illogical to assume that matter was made out of nothing than that intelligence results from organization of matter.” Now I will not, nor could I if I should, undertake satisfactorily to explain how matter originated; but I am very well satisfied, as is, I believe, every well-reasoning man, that it was not created out of nothing; that intelligence may and does result from the organization of matter; that “spirit” no more exists for itself, as an entity, than intelligence; that both are simply the result of organized matter. Hence the notion that “that which is born of the spirit is spirit, and that which is born of the flesh is flesh,” may do very well as a theological axiom; but it can find no recognition in natural philosophy as a scientific axiom, or even as a scientific theory.

Truly yours,

MORRIS EINHORN.

TITU-VILLE, PA., Jan. 10, 1871.

PERSONAL PRIVACY.

BY REV. C. W. BUCK, IN THE PORTLAND (ME.) DAILY PRESS.

It is only the rude uncivilized classes of men who sleep in huts, without doors. The barbarian has little regard for privacy. He cares for no secrets. He holds all things in common with his rude companions. With houses for habitations comes also some perception of the privilege of silence, and of choosing one’s own companions and confidants. But for some time yet will the latch-string hang out at the door, and every one will have the run of his neighbor’s house, and familiar acquaintance with his household secrets—not as a privilege of friendship, but as one of the rights of man.

As civilization advances, there springs up a sense of the sacredness of the person, extending even to all personal appointments and to things with which the person is intimately associated. The latch-string is then drawn in. Every man’s house becomes his castle; and if there is a skeleton in his closet, the door need not be closed. Apparel becomes personal apparel, each having his own; and the family dish, open to every greedy hand, is supplemented by the more private plate. Thus have sprung up in gradual growth all the ordinary delicacies and proprieties of our common life. They are the product of civilization, which—as if dimly discovering that man is the temple of God—hedges his person about with certain invisible barriers, making every man a king.

Now, the inward life feels even more directly the influence of civilization. The soul of man also learns to build a home of its own and to live in it privately. It learns to hold its deepest experiences in sacred silence, except as personal confiding friendship may unlock the lips. It learns to shrink from the official confessor, whether he be church-priest or only church-member; and if it discloses itself at all, it is only at the bidding of personal confidence and affection.

The religion of the primitive man is in a very slight degree private and personal. Chiefly it is a matter of public policy, affecting the prosperity of his tribe or nation. His religious sentiment is simply a presentiment of fear that the gods may send calamity to his people, or that they may not prosper him in his own outward affairs. His religion, then, is mainly a public religion; it consists in public offerings by which prosperity may be purchased from the gods. And if, upon his own personal account, he makes a votive or propitiatory offering, he disposes it in a public place.

When afterwards the private and personal nature of religion is privately apprehended, its exercises still continue for a long time to be formal and occasional. And it is clearly true that the occasional, infrequent exercises of the soul in matters of high concern, is likely to be a subject for self-gratulation, and so may make one garrulous; whereas habitual intercourse with serious and solemn themes begets humility and—silence. This also is to be noted; while religion is in any degree formal, that is, while it is ritualistic, creedal or in any other sense arbitrary, it must be in the same degree superficial; and its surface experiences will roll down in unconstrained eaves-droppings upon the next man’s territory. But when at last religion is understood to be habitual attention to God’s whisper in the soul, its real abiding-place is seen to be, not upon the lips in solemn forms of words, but in soul’s inner sanctuary; and respect is given to its sacred retirement.

Thus as advancing culture at once narrows and deepens the hospitality of the home, it also narrows and deepens the hospitality of the heart. It may be easy for the uncivilized man to expose the dearest secrets of his soul to the inspection of the first comer; but nothing is so difficult to him who has learned to respect the sacredness of private experience.

I need say no more to show that as in the progress of civilization man is outwardly individualized from the mass of humanity, and respect is given to the dignity of his person, so also his inward life is set apart in sacred privacy.

VALUE OF AN EXPLANATION.—A certain king, it is said, sent to another king, saying, “Send me a blue pig with a black tail, or else.” The other, in high dudgeon at the presumed insult, replied, “I have not got one; and if I had—” On this weighty cause, they went to war for many years. After a satiety of glories and miseries, they finally bethought them that, as their armies and resources were exhausted, and their kingdoms mutually laid waste, it might be well enough to consult about the preliminaries of peace; but before this could be concluded, a diplomatic explanation was first needed of the insulting language which formed the ground of the quarrel. “What could you mean,” asked the second king of the first, by saying, “Send me a blue pig with a black tail, or else—” “Why,” said the other, “I meant a blue pig with a black tail, or else some other color.” “But,” retorted he, “what could you mean by saying, ‘I have not got one, and if I had,—’” “Why of course, if I had, I should have sent it.” An explanation which was entirely satisfactory, and peace was concluded accordingly.

APROPOS OF INFALLIBILITY.—A waggy editor inquires if Peter, the first Pope, was fallible or infallible when he denied his Master; to which may be added, Where was his infallibility when his Lord said to him, “Get thee behind me, Satan?”

Hooper, the Mormon Delegate to Congress, says the reason our first parents did not practice polygamy was that their marriage was “exhaustive,” in other words, that Adam married “all the women in the world.”

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Mr. Frothingham’s New Book.

CHILD’S BOOK OF RELIGION, for Sunday Schools and Homes. PART I., Worship; PART II., The Good Life; PART III., Truth. In one Volume. New and revised edition. Forwarded free on receipt of $1.00.

55-68

DAVID G. FRANCIS,
17 Astor Place, New York.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

Free Religious Association.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, on “The Idea of the Free Religious Association;” DAVID A. WASSON, on “The Nature of Religion;” MRS. E. D. CHENEY, on “Religion as a Social Force;” F. E. ABBOT, on “The Future of Religious Organization as affected by the Spirit of the Age;” S. JOHNSON, on “The Natural Sympathy of Religions;” RABBI WISE, on “The Universal Elements in Judaism;” COL. T. W. HIGGINSON, on “Mohammedanism;” WM. H. CHANNING, on “The Religions of China;” W. J. POTTER, on “The Religions of India;” and an abstract of a discussion on the “Relation of Religion to the Public School System of the United States.” This Report is specially representative of the principles of the Association. Price 50 cents. In packages of five or more 30 cents each. Also CHANNING’S Address on “THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA,” (a careful and instructive essay, of particular interest at this time to Americans) in a separate pamphlet for 20 cents.

The ANNUAL REPORT for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cents respectively), Rev. Samuel Johnson’s essay on “THE WORSHIP OF JESUS” (50 cents), and an essay on “REASON AND REVELATION,” by WM. J. POTTER (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained by applying to the Secretary. The Report for 1868 contains a letter from the celebrated Hindu Theist, KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, on the “Origin and Aims of the Brahmo Somaj,” also an address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, on “Religion and Social Science;” a letter from M. D. CONWAY, on “Religious Movements in England,” and speeches by JAS. FREEMAN CHARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHAS. H. MALCOLM, JOHN WEISS, and others. The Report for 1869 has addresses by RALPH WALDO EMERSON, D. A. WASSON, JULIA WARD HOWE, C. A. BARTOL, PROF. DENTON, HORACE SEAYER, LUCY STONE, and others.

SINGLE COPIES

OF

THE INDEX for 1870

Containing the following

ESSAYS,

Will be mailed from THE INDEX office (post-paid) on receipt of

FIVE CENTS:

	No.
The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion,	1
What is Free Religion?	3
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Corner-Stones,	4
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Institutions,	5
Terms of Fellowship, Social Ideal, Moral Ideal, and Essential spirit,	6
The Practical Work of Free Religion,	6
Unitarianism versus Freedom,	7
Sunday Schools,	8
Friendship,	9
The Miracle Question,	10
Grief and its Compensations,	11
The Hebrew Prophets,	12
Capital Punishment,	13
Human Ideals,	14
The Essence of Religion,	15
The Management of Children,	16
A Quaker’s Letter to a Presbyterian, R. S. D.,	17
Comparison of Jesus and Socrates. (Report from the N. Y. Tribune),	17
The Candle of the Lord,	18
Public Opinion,	19
Conscience,	20
The Pedigree of Man,	21
“Following Christ,”	22
The Tongue,	23
The Golden Age,	24
What is Truth?	25
The Last Battle on the Creed Question,	26
Observance of the Sabbath, Rev. W. W. Williams,	27
The Sunday Question,	28
Motes and Beams,	29
The Dove’s Departure,	30
The Bible in the Public Schools,	31
Religious Freedom,	32
A Plain Talk to Young Men,	33
Noise,	34
The Humility of Free Religion,	35
Chaos and Cosmos,	36
An Oration on Alexander Von Humboldt,	37
Relation of Spiritualism to Free Religion,	38
War and Free Religion,	39
Religious Revivals,	40
Mary and Martha,	41
The Ministry of Free Religion,	42
Success,	43
“Repentance” and “Forgiveness,”	44
Spiritual Beauty,	45
The Book of Daniel,	46
The Unity of Spiritual Freedom and the Opportunity which America offers for its Development. W. J. Potter,	47
The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition,	47
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? Chas. Reemelin,	47
The Work of Radicalism in Indiana. J. O. Martin,	47
Religion in the Light of Reason and Common Sense. Isaac M. Wise,	47
Sunday—Its Uses and Abuses. Thomas Vickers,	48
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? E. Peckham,	49
Parties and Party Spirit,	50
The Future of Religious Organization, as Affected by the Spirit of the Age,	51
The Incarnation. A Christmas Discourse,	52
Transient and Permanent,	53

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX

PROSPECTUS FOR 1871.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1860, and has just closed its first yearly volume.

We deem it proper, therefore, to submit the following PROSPECTUS of Volume II for 1871, and ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if the matter was properly presented to them, and especially if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor. We cannot afford to send out travelling agents, nor would they succeed so well in getting names as persons of local influence. We therefore have determined to use the funds it would cost to get our paper before the people, in another way, namely, in the purchase of articles of value to be given as premiums to those who make up lists of subscribers; thus presenting to the friends of free thought and pure religion the double motive of doing good and getting paid for it.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two DOLLARS a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

- PREMIUMS.
- For Fifty Names, we will give one of PRINCE & Co's four Octave Melodeons (price $65,) or a complete copy of CHAMBERS' Encyclopedia of Universal Knowledge, in ten volumes (price $50).

For Forty Names, we will give a Wilson's Family Sewing Machine, one of the best Machines made.

For Twenty-Five Names, Webster's Royal Quarto Unabridged Pictorial Dictionary (price $12), or one of the following Chromos:

The Three Tom-Boys (Prang's), price.....	$15.00
Winter in the Forest, 20x28.....	12.00
Watering the Horses, 21x29.....	12.00

For Ten Names, one of the following Chromos:

WHITTIER's Barefooted Boy, (Prang's) price.....	$5.00
The Unconscious Sleeper, 14x17.....	6.00
Mt. Blanc, 20x26.....	7.50
Or a copy of LOCKY's History of European Morals, 2 vols	6.00
MAX MUELLER's Chips from a German Work-Shop, 2 vols	5.00
EMERSON's Prose Works, 2 vols.....	5.00
WEISS's Life and Correspondence of THEODORE PARKER, 2 volumes.....	6.00

- For Five Names, a bound volume of THE INDEX, for 1870. (Price $3.50.) Or a copy of one of the following works, (post paid):

DARWIN's Origin of Species, price.....	$3.00
LUBBOCK's Origin of Civilization, price.....	2.00
Essays in Criticism, by MATTHEW ARNOLD, price.....	2.00
Tablets, by A. BRONSON ALCOCK, with portrait, price.....	2.00
Any volume of the writings of THEODORE PARKER or HENRY D. THOREAU, each.....	2.00
On the Heights, AUERBACH.....	2.00

For Four Names, a copy of THE INDEX for 1871, or one of the following books (post paid):

EMERSON's Society and Solitude, price.....	$1.75
Nathan the Wise, a dramatic poem translated from LESSING by ELLEN FROTHINGHAM, price.....	1.75
HUXLEY's Lay Sermons and Addresses.....	1.75
Speeches and Lectures, by WENDELL PHILLIPS.....	1.50
Historic Americans, by THEODORE PARKER, price.....	1.50
A copy of The Revolution.....	2.00
Or The Woman's Journal.....	2.00

- CASH PREMIUMS.
- For 75 Names,.....50 Dollars in Greenbacks

For 50 Names,.....25 Dollars in Greenbacks

For 25 Names,.....15 Dollars in Greenbacks

For 10 Names,.....5 Dollars in Greenbacks

For less than 10 Names, a Cash Commission of Twenty per Cent.

Any book in the above list will be sent by us post-paid upon the receipt of price.

N. B.—Names need not all come from one post office. We will send the paper wherever directed, and let the names count as clubs. Specimen Copies sent to all who enclose a three cent postage stamp. Address

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
Lock Box 38, Toledo, Ohio.

Guardian Mutual Life Ins. Co.,

ORGANIZED A. D. 1859.

M. O. Waggoner, Gen. Supt. for Ohio, Mich. & Ind.

John H. Hood, Assistant General Superintendent.

Office No. 154 Summit Street,
E. F. MUNGER, }
CHAS. M. LANG, } General Agents.
WALTER C. SCOTT, Local Agent, 152 Summit St.
Special Agents—Kelly Bros., 22 Summit Street.
Office Hours—From 7 in the morning till 9 at night.
Medical Examiners—Drs. Samuel S. Thorn and T. J. Eaton Toledo, O. [1871]

H. M. EDSON, A. TERRY.

EDSON & TERRY,
DENTISTS,
ROOMS 8 & 9 GRADOLPH BLOCK,
TOLEDO, OHIO.
ap16 1y

IMPORTER
Fine Chemicals, Drugs, and Toilet Articles.
Brandies, Wines & Liquors for medicinal purposes only. Also Proprietor of
Toledo Tonic Bitters,
Greatest Remedy known for general debility.
L. E. MULFORD,
23 Summit Street, Corner Perry, Toledo, Ohio
18-1y

THE CELEBRATED
CRAIG
MICROSCOPE
is an optical wonder; reveals thousands of the hidden Wonders of Nature; is of permanent use and practical availability, combining instruction with amusement, and never losing its interest. It magnifies
TEN THOUSAND TIMES,

a power equal to other Microscopes of many times its cost. Reveals countless little worlds all around us, teeming with life, which to the naked eye must forever remain a sealed book—as Eels in Vinegar, Animals in Water, Cheese Mites, Sugar and Itch Insects, Milk Globules, Claws and Hairs of Insects, Hundreds of eyes in a single eye of a Fly, Dust of a Butterfly's Wings to be perfectly formed Feathers, the much talked of Trichina Spiralis, or Pork Worm, which was first discovered in America with this Microscope.
It is of infinite value to professional men, to teachers, and to students, but NOWHERE IS IT OF GREATER VALUE THAN AT THE FAMILY TABLE, within the reach of every member. It will delight yourself, your children, and your friends during the long winter evenings. It will show you adulterations or uncleanness of various kinds in food, as sugar, tea, bread, meat, etc.
It is of Inestimable Value to the Farmer
in examining insects which prey upon his crops. The power of a $50 Microscope, and so simple in its construction that any child can use it understandingly, and with appreciation.
A Beautiful Present—Elegant, Instructive, Amusing, and Cheap. Over 60,000 sold.
During the past six years its worth has been testified to by thousands of Scientific Men, Farmers, School Teachers, Students, Physicians, Heads of Families, and others.

PRICE, $3.00—Sent by Mail Post-paid.
Every instrument is neatly boxed, and handsomely labelled with full directions for use. Thousands have been sent by mail.
Address, W. J. LINESS & CO., CHICAGO.

FREE! FREE!

"THE MICROSCOPE," a Monthly Journal of Information for the People—the mysteries of Nature explained—interesting information on the wonders of Creation—stories, sketches, etc. Terms $1.00 per year. This Journal will be sent FREE for one year to any one purchasing a Craig Microscope at the regular price, $3.00. (Craig Microscope will be sent post-paid.) For sample copy, and our beautifully illustrated and descriptive circulars, and eight pages of testimonials of Craig Microscope, send six cents for postage to
W. J. LINESS & CO.,
Opticians, and Sole Proprietors of Craig and Novelty Microscope, CHICAGO, ILL.
AGENTS and DEALERS, this Microscope sells in every family on its merits, when exhibited. LARGE PROFITS. send for terms. 53x26

SERMONS

By Rev. O. B. Frothingham

Forwarded free on receipt of five cents for each.

What is it to be a Christian?
Taking God's Name in Vain.
The Issue with Superstition.
Infernal and Celestial Love.
The Sin Against the Holy Ghost.
Pilate and Jesus.
The Dying and the Living God.
The Foes of Society.
The Living Spring of Water.
Elective Affinity.
Religious Irreligion.
Experience and Hope.
The Radical Belief.
The Eternal Gospel.

DAVID G. FRANCIS,
49t3] 17 Astor Place, NEW YORK.

AGENTS WANTED--($225 A MONTH.) BY THE
Machine Co., BOSTON, MASS., or ST. LOUIS, MO. 56-63

THE FIRST VOLUME OF THE RADICAL.

Persons wishing to complete their sets of THE RADICAL by adding the FIRST VOLUME, which has been for some time out of print, can do so by at once sending me their orders. By reprinting this volume in part, I can supply 100 copies. To be able to do this, I am obliged to fix the price at $5.00. This will secure a copy, sent to any address post paid.

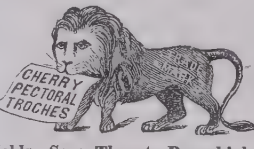

Volume 2, 3, 4, and 5, will be sent, post paid, for $3.50 each. Single copies of THE RADICAL 35 cts.

The May number contains Mr. Wasson's review of Mr. Abbot's Religion.

The June number contains Mr. Frothingham's article on "What is Religion for?"

Address S. H. MORSE, office of "The Radical," Boston, Mass.

WANTED—AGENTS, ($20 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock-stitch" (alike on both sides, and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest Family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Boston, Mass., Pittsburgh, Pa., Chicago, Ill., or St. Louis, Mo. 88y1

Ministers and Singers will find these particularly Adapted to the Voice. They contain no Cubebes, are very palatable, and act like a charm. Superior to all others for

Colds, Sore Throat, Bronchial and all Lung Difficulties.

RUSHTON'S (F. V.) COD LIVER OIL, for Consumption and Scrofula; the first introduced; fresh and pure. Sold by Druggists generally. 48m3.

READ "ETHAN ALLEN'S ORACLE OF REASON." The first formal attack upon the Christian Religion ever published in the United States,—thoroughly infidel, and just the Book for Free Religionists. Price, seventy-five cents, post-paid. Address, JEROME DAVIS, Ithaca, New York. 57t1

Agents Wanted For
THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD
Containing Fleetwood's "Life of Christ," "Lives of the Apostles, Evangelists and Martyrs;" Doddridge's "Evidences of Christianity;" "History of the Jews," by Josephus; "A History of all Religious Denominations," with treatises and tables relating to events connected with Bible History, containing many fine Engravings. The whole forming a complete Treasury of Christian Knowledge. W. FLINT & CO., No. 26 S. 7th St., Phila., 5 Custom House Place, Chicago, and 176 W. 4th St., Cincinnati. [48m3.

THE INDEX,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION

Published by the

Index Association, at TOLEDO OHIO.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

Terms, Two Dollars a Year.

Advertisements taken for THE INDEX by all responsible Advertising Agents. Address,

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
Lock Box 38, Toledo, Ohio.

AGENTS:—
TOLEDO, O., HENRY S. STEBBINS, 115 Summit St.
TOLEDO, O., JULIUS T. FREY, 47 Summit St.
NEW YORK, N. Y., DION THOMAS, 142 Nassau St.
BOSTON, MASS., CROSBY & DAMRELL, 100 Washington St.
CINCINNATI, O., HAWLEY'S NEWS DEPOT, 164 Vine St.
ST. LOUIS, MO., WARREN CHASE, 601 North Fifth St.
DETROIT, MICH., Wm. E. TUNIS, 86 Woodward Av.
SYRACUSE, N. Y., LEWIS & WHELAN, 7 Granger Block.

The Index.

VOL. 2.—No. 5.

TOLEDO, OHIO, FEBRUARY 4, 1871.

WHOLE No. 58.

The Index,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, OHIO.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.

OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Editorial Contributors.

THE BATTLE-FIELDS OF SCIENCE.

[A Scientific Lecture, delivered before the American Institute, in the hall of the Cooper Union, New York, by Hon. Andrew D. White, President of Cornell University. Reprinted from the New York Tribune of Dec. 18, 1869.]

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN:—In view of the fact that my studies have been rather in History than in Natural Science, it has seemed to me not unfit that I begin this series of lectures with an historical sketch bearing upon the great subject of your course. I propose, then, to present to you this evening an outline of the great sacred struggle for the liberty of Science—a struggle which has been going on for so many centuries. A tough contest this has been! A war continued longer—with battles fiercer, with sieges more persistent, with strategy more vigorous—than in any of the comparatively petty warfare of Alexander, or Cæsar, or Napoleon. I shall ask you to go with me through some of these most determined sieges, and over some of the hardest-fought battle-fields of this great war. We will look well at the combatants—we will listen to the battle-cries, we will note the strategy of leaders, the cut and thrust of champions, the weight of missiles, the temper of weapons.

My subject, then, shall be "THE WARFARE OF SCIENCE."

My thesis—which, by an historical study of this warfare, I expect to develop—is the following: In all modern history, interference with Science in the supposed interest of religion—no matter how conscientious such interference may have been—has resulted in the direst evils both to Religion and Science, and invariably. And on the other hand all untrammelled scientific investigation, no matter how dangerous to religion some of its stages may have seemed temporarily to be, has invariably resulted in the highest good of Religion and Science. I say invariably—I mean exactly that. It is a rule to which history shows not one exception. It would seem, logically, that this statement could not be gainsaid. God's truth must agree, whether discovered by looking within upon the soul or out upon the world. A truth written upon the human heart today in its full play of emotions or passions, cannot be at any real variance even with a truth written upon a fossil whose poor life was gone millions of years ago. And this being so, it would also seem a truth irrefragable, that the search for each of these kinds of truth must be followed out in its own lines, by its own methods, to its own results, without any interference from investigators along other lines by other methods. And it would also seem logically that we might work on in absolute confidence that whatever, at any moment, might seem to be the relative positions of the two different bands of workers, they must at last come together; for Truth is one. But Logic is not History. History is full of interferences which have cost the earth dear. Strangest of all, some of the most direful of them have been made by the best of men, actuated by the purest motives, seeking the noblest results. These interferences and the struggle against them make up the warfare of Science. One statement more to clear the ground. You will not understand me at all to say that religion has done nothing for science. It has done much for it. The work of Christianity has been mighty indeed. Through these 2,000 years it has undermined servitude, mitigated tyranny, given hope to the hopeless, comfort to the afflicted, light to the blind, bread to the starving, life to the dying; and all this work continues. And its work for science, too, has been great. It has fostered science often and developed it. It has given great minds to it, and but for the fears of the timid its record in this respect would have been as great as in the other. Unfortunately, religious men started centuries ago with the idea that purely scientific investigation is unsafe—that theology must intervene. So began this great modern war.

COSMOGRAPHY.

The first typical battle-field to which I call attention is that of Cosmography, the simplest elementary doctrine of the earth's shape, surface, and relations. Bear with me as I go over a field so well known to so many of you. We cannot overlook it, if we are to understand other battles which follow. Among the legacies of thought left by the ancient world to the modern were certain ideas of the rotundity of the earth. These ideas were vague; they were mixed with absurdities, but they were germ ideas, and, after the barbarian storm which ushered in the modern world had begun to clear away, these germ ideas began to bud and bloom in the minds of a few thinking men, and these men hazarded the suggestion that the earth is round—is a globe. The greatest and most earnest men of the earth took fright at once. To them the idea of the earth's rotundity seemed fraught with dangers to Scripture, by which, of course, they meant their interpretation of Scripture. Among the first attempts made was that of Eusebius. He endeavored to turn off these ideas by bringing science into contempt. He endeavored to make the innovators understand that he and the Fathers of the Church generally despised all such inquiries. Speaking of these innovators he said: "It is not through ignorance of the things admired by them, but through contempt of their useless labor that we think little of these matters—turning our souls to the exercise of better things." Lactantius asserted the new ideas to be "empty and false." But this attempt to "flank" the little phalanx of thinkers did not succeed, of course. Even such men as Lactantius and Eusebius cannot pooh-pooh down a great, new, scientific idea. The little band of thinkers went on, and the doctrine of the rotundity of the earth naturally led to consideration of the tenants of the earth's surface, and another old germ idea was warmed into life—the idea of the existence of Antipodes. At this the war commenced in bitter earnest. Those great and good men determined to fight. To all of them such doctrines seemed dangerous, to most of them they seemed damnable. Basil and Ambrose were tolerant enough to allow that a man might be saved who believed the earth to be round, and inhabited on its opposite sides; but the great majority of the Fathers of the Church utterly denied the possibility of salvation to such misbelievers. Lactantius asks: "Is it possible that men can be so absurd as to believe that the crops and trees on the other side of the earth hang downward, and that men have their feet higher than their heads? Do you ask how they defend these monstrosities? how things do not fall away from the earth on that side? They reply that the nature of things is such that heavy bodies tend toward the centre, like the spokes of a wheel; while light bodies, such as clouds, smoke, and fire, tend from the centre toward the heavens on all sides. Now I am really at a loss what to say of those who, when they have once gone wrong, steadily persevere in their folly, and defend one absurd opinion by another." Augustine seems inclined to yield a little regarding the rotundity of the earth; but fights the idea that men exist on the other side of the earth, because, he says, Scripture speaks of no such descendants of Adam. But this did not avail to check the idea. What might be called the flank movement, as represented by Eusebius, had failed—in the sixth century, therefore, the opponents of the new ideas built a great fortress and retired into that. It was well built and well braced. It was nothing less than a great complete theory of the world based upon the literal interpretation of texts of Scripture, and its architect was Cosmas. According to Cosmas the earth is a parallelogram, flat, and surrounded by four great seas. At the outer edges of these seas rise immense walls closing in the whole structure. These walls support the vault of the heavens, whose edges are cemented to the walls. Walls and vault shut in the earth and all the heavenly bodies. The whole of this theologic scientific fortress was built most carefully, and, as was then thought, most scripturally. Starting with the expression applied in the ninth chapter of Hebrews to the tabernacle in the desert, he insists with other interpreters of his time that the original Greek words mean—"made like the world." This gives a key to the whole construction. The universe is therefore made on the plan of the Jewish Tabernacle—box-like and oblong. Coming to details, he quotes those grand words of Isaiah,—"It is he that sitteth upon the circle of the earth . . . that stretcheth out the heavens like a curtain, and spreadeth them out like a tent to dwell in." And the passage in Job which speaks of the spreading out of the sky—he turns all that splendid and precious poetry into a prosaic statement, and gathers therefrom, as he thinks, treasures for science. To find the character of the surface of the earth, Cosmas studies the table of shew-bread in the Tabernacle. The dimensions of that table prove to him that the earth is flat and twice as long as broad. The four corners of the table symbolize the four seasons; the three loaves of shew-bread at each corner symbolize the three months in each season. This vast box is divided into two compartments, one above the other. In the first of these men live, and stars move, and it extends up to the first vault or firmament, where live the angels—a main part of whose business is to push and pull the sun and planets to and fro. Next he takes the text,—"Let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it divide the waters from the waters,"—and other texts from Genesis. To these he adds the texts from the Psalms,—"Praise him, ye heaven of heavens, and ye waters that be above the heavens;" turns that glorious outburst of poetry into his crucible with the other texts, and after subjecting them all to sundry curious processes, brings out the theory that over this first vault is a vast cistern containing the waters. He then takes the expression in Genesis regarding the "windows of heaven," and establishes a doctrine regarding the regulation of the rain, which is afterward supplemented by the doctrine that the angels not only push and pull the heavenly bodies to light the earth, but also open and close the windows of heaven to water it. To account for the movement of the sun, Cosmas asserts that to the north of the earth is a great mountain, and that at night the sun is carried behind this. Some of the commentators, however, ventured to express a doubt here. They thought that the sun was pushed into a great pit at night and pulled out in the morning. (Lectrone.)

Such was the great fortress built against human science in the sixth century by Cosmas, and it stood. The innovators attacked it in vain. The greatest minds in the Church devoted themselves to buttressing it with new texts, and throwing out new out-works of theological reasoning.

Columbus is the next warrior. The world has heard of his battles; how the Bishop of Ceuta worsted him in Portugal; how, at the Junta of Salamanca, the theologians overwhelmed him with quotations from the Psalms, from St. Paul, and from St. Augustine. But in 1519 comes a great victory. Magalhaens makes his great voyages. He has proved the earth to be round; for in these voyages and others he has virtually circumnavigated it. He has proved the doctrine of the antipodes, for he has seen the men of the antipodes. But even this does not end the war. Many earnest and good men oppose the doctrine for two hundred years longer. Then the French astronomers make their measurements of degrees in Equatorial and Polar regions, and add to other proofs that of the lengthened pendulum. When this was done; when the deductions of science were seen to be established by the simple test of measurement, beautifully, perfectly, then, and then only, this war of twelve centuries ended.

And now what was the result of this war? The efforts of Eusebius and Lactantius to deaden scientific modes of thought, the efforts of Augustine to combat it, the efforts of Cosmas to stop it by dogmatism, the efforts of Boniface, and Zachary, and others to stop it by force, conscientious as they all were, had resulted in what? Simply in forcing into many noble minds that most unfortunate conviction that science and religion are enemies—simply in drawing away from religion hosts of the best men in all those centuries. The result was wholly bad. No optimism can change that verdict. On the other hand, what was gained by the warriors of science for religion? Simply a far more ennobling conception of the world and a far truer conception and more devout reliance upon Him who made and sustained it. Which is the more consistent with a great, true religion, the cosmography of Cosmas or that of Isaac Newton?

ASTRONOMY.

The next great battles to which I ask your attention were fought on a question relating to the position of the earth among the heavenly bodies. The struggle regarding geography, which I have already presented, was entangled with this. Often on the same field the battle was fought for both; but I separate them that we may see each more clearly. On one side the great body of conscientious religious men planted themselves firmly on the Geocentric doctrine—the doctrine that the earth is the centre and that the sun and planets revolve about it. The doctrine was old and of the highest respectability. The very name, Ptolemaic theory, carried weight. It had been elaborated until it accounted well for the phenomena. Exact textual interpreters of Scripture cherished it, for it agreed with what they supposed the reading of sacred text. Still the germs of the Heliocentric theory had been planted long before, and well planted; it had seemed ready even to bloom forth in the mind of Cardinal de Cusa, but the chill of dogmatism was still over the earth, and up to the beginning of the sixteenth century there had come to this great truth neither bloom nor fruitage. Quietly, however, the soil was receiving enrichment and the air warmth. The processes of mathematics were constantly improved, the heavenly bodies were steadily though silently observed, and at length appeared—afar off from the centres of thought, on the borders of Poland—a plain, simple-minded scholar, who first fairly uttered to the world the truth now so commonplace—then so astounding—that the sun and planets do not revolve about the earth, but that the earth and planets revolve about the sun, and that man was Nicolas Kopernik. Kopernik had been a professor at Rome, but as this truth grew within him he seemed to feel that at Rome he was no longer safe. Returning to his own country, he found it wretchedly inhospitable; but he thought on, and that great central truth of Astronomy developed in his mind ever more and more. To publish it was dangerous indeed, and for thirty-six years it lay slumbering in the minds of Kopernik and the friends to whom he had privately intrusted it. At last he prepares his great work on the Revolution of the Heavenly Bodies, and dedicates it to the Pope himself. The work was intrusted to the scholar Osiander of Nuremberg to superintend its publication. But, at the last moment, the courage of Osiander failed him. He dared not launch the new thought boldly. He writes a grovelling preface—endeavors to excuse Kopernik for his novel idea. He inserts the apologetic lie that Kopernik propounds the doctrine of the movement of the earth, not as a fact, but as an hypothesis. He declares that it is lawful for an astronomer to indulge his imagination, and that this is what Kopernik has done. Thus was the greatest and most ennobling, perhaps, of scientific truths—a truth not less ennobling to Religion than to Science—forced, in coming into the world, to sneak and crawl.

On the 24th of May, 1543, the newly-printed book first arrived at the house of Kopernik. It was put into his hands, but he was on his death-bed. A few hours later, and he was beyond the reach of fanatics and bigots, whose consciences would have blotted his reputation, and perhaps have destroyed his life. Yet not wholly beyond their reach. Even death could not be trusted to shield him. There seems to have been fear of vengeance upon his corpse, for on his tombstone was placed no record of his life-long labors—no mention of his great discovery. There were graven upon it affecting words, which may be thus simply translated,—“I ask not the grace according to Paul; not that given to Peter. Give me only the favor which Thou didst show to the thief upon the cross.” Not till thirty years after did a friend dare write on his tombstone a memorial of his discovery. The book was taken in hand at once by the proper authorities. It was solemnly condemned—to read it was to risk salvation, and the world accepted the decree. Many minds had received this new truth; only one tongue dared utter it. The new warrior was that strange mortal, Giordano Bruno. He was hunted from land to land, until, at last, he turns on his pursuers and writes fearful satires on the Church. For this he is imprisoned six years, then burned alive, and then his ashes are scattered to the winds.

But the new truth lived. It would not be stifled. Within ten years after the execution of Bruno the truth of the doctrine of Kopernik was established by the telescope of Galileo. Herein was fulfilled one of the most touching of prophecies. Years before, the enemies of Kopernik had said to him,—“If your doctrine were true, Venus would show phases like the moon.” Kopernik answered,—“You are right; I know not what to say, but God is good, and will in time find an answer to this objection.” The God-given answer came when the rude telescope of Galileo showed the phases of Venus. On this new champion, Galileo, the attack was tremendous. The supporters of what was called “sound learning” declared his discoveries deceptions and his announcements blasphemy. Semi-scientific professors attacked him with sham science; earnest preachers attacked him with perverted Scripture.

ATHEIST AND INFIDEL.

The principal weapons in the combat are worth examining. They are very easily examined; you may pick them up on any of the battle-fields of Science; but on that field they were used with more effect than on almost any other. These weapons were two epithets—the epithets “Infidel” and “Atheist.” These can hardly be classed with civilized weapons; they are burning arrows; they set fire to great masses of popular prejudices. Smoke rises to obscure the real questions. Fire bursts out at times to destroy the attacked party. They are poisoned weapons. They go to the heart of loving women; they alienate dear children; they injure the man after life is ended, for they leave poisoned wounds in the hearts of those who loved him best—fears for his eternal happiness, dread of the Divine displeasure.

The battle-fields of Science are thickly strewn with these. They have been used against almost every man who has ever done anything for his fellow-men. The list of those who have been denounced as Infidel and Atheist includes almost all great men of Science—general scholars, inventors, philanthropists. The deepest Christian life, the most noble Christian character has not availed to shield combatants. Christians like Isaac Newton, and Pascal, and John Locke, and John Howard, have had these weapons hurled against them. Nay, in these very times we have seen a noted champion hurl these weapons against John Milton, and with it another missile which often appears on these battle-fields—the epithets of “blasphemer” and “hater of the Lord.” Of course, in these days these weapons, though often effective in disturbing the ease of good men, and though often powerful in scaring women, are somewhat blunted. Indeed, they not infrequently injure assailants more than assailed. So it was not in the days of Galileo. These weapons were then in all their sharpness and venom. The first champion who appears against him is Bellarmine, one of the greatest of theologians and one of the poorest of scientists. He was earnest, sincere, learned, but made the fearful mistake for the world of applying direct literal interpretation of Scripture to science. The consequences were sad, indeed. Could he with his vast powers have taken a different course, Humanity would have been spared the long and fearful war which ensued, and Religion would have saved to herself thousands on thousands of the best and brightest men in after ages. The weapons which men of Bellarmine's stamp used, were theological. They held up before the world the dreadful consequences which must result to Christian theology were the doctrine to prevail that the heavenly bodies revolve about the sun, and not about the earth.

SCIENCE AND THE BIBLE.

Their most tremendousologic engine against Galileo was the idea that his pretended discovery vitiated the whole Christian plan of salvation. Father Le Gazre declared that it cast suspicion on the doctrine of the Incarnation; others declared that it upset the whole basis of theology; that if the earth is a planet, and only one among several planets, it cannot be that any such great things have been done especially for it, as the Christian doctrine teaches. If there are other planets—since God makes nothing in vain—they must be inhabited; but how can these inhabitants be descended from Adam? how can they trace back their origin to Noah's ark? how can they have been redeemed by the Savior? In addition to this prodigious engine of war, there was kept up a terrific fire of smaller artillery in the shape of texts and Scriptural extracts. Some samples of these weapons may interest you. When Galileo had discovered the four satellites of Jupiter, it was denounced as impossible and impious. It was argued that the Bible clearly showed by all applicable types that there could be only seven planets; that this was proved by the seven golden candle-sticks of the Apocalypse; by the seven-branched candle-stick of the Tabernacle, and by the seven churches of Asia. In a letter to his friend Renieri, Galileo gives a sketch of some of the dealings of the Inquisition with him. He says: “The Father Commissary Lancio was zealous to have me make amends for the scandal I had caused in sustaining the idea of the movement of the earth. To all my mathematical and other reasons he responded nothing but the words of Scripture, Terra autem in aeternum stabit.” It was declared that the doctrine was proved false by the standing still of the sun for Joshua; by the declarations that “the foundations of the earth are fixed so firmly that they cannot be moved,” and that the sun “runneth about from one end of heaven to the other.” The Dominican Father Catticini preached a sermon from the text,—“Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven?” and this wretched pun was the beginning of a series of sharper weapons. For the final assault, the park of heavy artillery was at last wheeled into place. You see it on all the scientific battle-fields. It consists of general denunciation, and Father Melchior Inchofer of the Jesuits brought his artillery to bear well on Galileo with the declaration, that the opinion of the earth's motion is of all heresies the most abominable, the most pernicious, the most scandalous—that the immobility of the earth is thrice sacred—that arguments against the immortality of the soul, the creation, the incarnation, etc., should be tolerated sooner than an argument to prove that the earth moves. In vain did Galileo try to prove the existence of satellites by showing them to the doubters through his telescope; they either declared it impious to look, or, if they did see them, declared them illusions from the devil. In vain did he try to protect himself by his famous letter to the Duchess, in which he insisted that theological reasoning should not be applied to science. The rest of the story the world knows by heart. None of the recent attempts have succeeded in mystifying it. The whole world will remember forever how Galileo was subjected certainly to indignity and to imprisonment—possibly to physical torture; how he was at last forced to pronounce publicly and on his knees his recantation, as follows,—“I, Galileo, being in my 70th year—being a prisoner, and, on my knees and before your Eminences, having before my eyes the Holy Gospels, which I touch with my hands—abjure, curse, and detest the error and heresy of the movement of the earth.” He was vanquished, indeed, for he had been forced, in the face of all coming ages, to perjure himself. His books were condemned; (they remained on the Index until 1818); his friends not allowed to erect a monument over his bones; to all appearance his work was overthrown.

POSITION OF THE CHURCH—DESCARTES AND KEPLER.

Do not understand me here as casting blame on the Roman Church as such. It must in fairness be said that some of its best men tried to stop this great mistake, but the current was too strong. The whole of the civilized world was at fault, Protestant as well as Catholic, and not any particular part of it. Were there time, I would refer at length to some of the modern mystifications of the history of Galileo. One of the latest seems to have for its ground-work the theory that Galileo was condemned for a breach of good taste and etiquette. But those who make this defence make the matter infinitely worse for those who committed this great wrong. They deprive it of its only palliation—mistaken conscientiousness.

And then Kepler comes. He leads science on to greater victories. He throws out the minor errors of Kopernik. He thinks and speaks as one inspired. His battle is severe—Protestants in Styria and at Tuebingen, Catholics at Rome press upon him, but Newton, Huyghens, and the other great leaders follow, and to Science remains the victory. And yet the war did not wholly end. Toward the end of the seventeenth century even Bossuet—the Eagle of Meaux—most sublime of religious thinkers, declared for the Ptolemaic theory as the Scriptural theory, and in 1746 Boscovitch, the great mathematician of the Jesuits, used these words,—“As for me, full of respect for the Holy Scriptures and the decree of the Holy Inquisition, I regard the earth as immovable. Nevertheless, for simplicity in explanation, I will argue as if the earth moves, for it is proved that in the two hypotheses the appearances favor that idea.” Nor has the opposition failed even in our own time. On the 5th of May, 1829, a great multitude assembled at Thorn to commemorate the 300th anniversary of Kopernik and to unveil Thorwaldsen's statue of him.

APOTHEOSIS OF KOPERNIK.

Kopernik had lived a pious, Christian life. He was well known for unostentatious Christian charity. With his religious belief no fault had ever been found. He was a Canon of the Church of Frauenburg, and over his grave had been written the most touching of Christian epitaphs. Naturally, then, the people expected a religious service. All was understood to be arranged for it. The procession marched to the church and waited, the hour passed, no priest appeared, none could be induced to appear. Kopernik, simple, charitable, pious, one of the noblest gifts of God to the service of Religion as well as Science, was still held to be a reprobate. Seven years after that his book was still standing on the Index of books prohibited to Christians. Nor was this feeling confined merely to the more ancient church. Perhaps the most striking outcropping of the old feeling was seen in 1863 at Berlin. A large body of Protestants had assembled to protest against what they deemed dangerous science. In their midst stood up a clergyman of note, and declared against the Copernican theory as unscriptural.

SOME OF THE RESULTS.

And now, what was won by either party in this long and terrible war? The party which would subordinate the methods and aims of science to those of theology, though in general obedient to deep convictions, had given to Christianity a series of the worst blows it had ever received. They had made large numbers of the best men in Europe hate it. Why did Ricetto, and Bruno, and Vanini, when the crucifix was presented to them in their hour of martyrdom, turn from that blessed image with loathing? Simply because Christianity had been made to them identical with the most horrible oppression of the mind. Worse than that, these well-meaning defenders of the faith had wrought into the very fibre of the European heart that most unfortunate of all ideas—the idea that there is a necessary antagonism between science and religion. Like the landsman who lashes himself to the anchor of the sinking ship, in the sight of all men, by the strongest cords of logic which they could spin, they had attached the great fundamental doctrines of Christianity to these mistaken ideas in science, and the advance of knowledge had engulfed them. On the other hand, what had science done for religion? Simply this: Kopernik, escaping persecution only by death; Giordano Bruno, burned alive as a monster of impiety; Galileo, tortured and humiliated as the worst of misbelievers; Kepler, hunted alike by Protestants and Catholics, had given to religion great, new foundations, great, new, ennobling conceptions, a great, new revelation of the might of God. Under the old system we have that princely astronomer, Alphonso of Castile, seeing the poverty of the Ptolemaic system, yet knowing no other, startling Europe with the blasphemy, that if he had been present at creation, he could have suggested a better order of the heavenly bodies. Under the new system you have Kepler, filled with a religious spirit, exclaiming,—“I do think the thoughts of God.” The difference in religious spirit between these two men marks the conquest gained in this war by Science for Religion.

The next great series of battles to which I would turn with you were fought on those great fields occupied by such sciences as Chemistry and Natural Philosophy. Even before these sciences were out of their childhood—while yet they were tottering mainly toward childish objects and by childish steps—the champions of that same old mistaken conception of rigid Scriptural interpretation began the war. The catalogue of chemists and physicists persecuted or thwarted would fill volumes.

OTHER BATTLE-FIELDS.

There are many other battle-fields of Science for which we have no time. Interesting would it be to look over the field of Meteorology, beginning with the conception supposed to be Scriptural, of angels opening and shutting the windows of heaven, and letting out the waters above the firmament upon the earth, continuing through the battle of Fromundus and Bodin, down to the onslaught upon Lecky in our own time, for drawing a logical and purely scientific conclusion from the doctrine that Meteorology is obedient to laws.

ANATOMY AND MEDICINE.

But I pass to fields of more immediate importance to us—those of Anatomy and Medicine. It might be supposed that the votaries of sciences like these would have suffered to escape attack. Unfortunately, they have had to stand in the thickest of the battle. As far back as the latter part of the thirteenth century Arnold de Villa Nova was a noted physician and chemist. The missile usual in such cases was hurled at him. He was charged with sorcery and dealings with the devil. He was excommunicated and driven from Spain. Such seemed the fate of all men in that field, who gained even a glimmer of new scientific truth. Men even like Cardan, and Paracelsus, and Porta, who pandered to popular superstition, were at once set upon, if they ventured on any other than the path which the church thought sound, the insufficient path of Aristotelian investigation. We have seen that the weapons used against the astronomers were mainly the epithets Infidel and Atheist. We have also seen that the principal missiles against chemists and physicists were the epithets sorcerer and leaguer with the devil, and we have picked up on various battle-fields another effective weapon, the epithet Mahometan. On the heads of the anatomists and physicians were concentrated all these missiles. The charge of atheism ripened into a proverb,—“Ubi sunt tres medici, ibi sunt duo athei.” (Where you find three physicians, you find two atheists). Magic seemed so common a charge that many of the physicians seemed to believe it themselves. Mahometanism and Averroism became almost synonymous with medicine, and Petrarch stigmatized Averroists as men who denied genius and barked at Christ. Not to weary you with the details of earlier struggles, I will select a great benefactor of mankind and champion of scientific truth at the period of the Revival of Learning and the Reformation, Andreas Vesalius, the founder of the modern science of anatomy. The battle waged by this man is one of the glories of our race. The old methods were soon exhausted by his early fervor, and he sought to advance science by strictly scientific means, by patient investigation, and by careful recording of results. From the outset Vesalius proved himself a master. In the search for real knowledge he braved the most terrible dangers. Before his time the dissection of the human subject was thought akin to sacrilege. Occasionally some anatomist like Mundinus had given some little display with such a subject, but for purposes of investigation it was placed among things forbidden. Through this sacred conventionalism Vesalius broke without fear. Braving ecclesiastical censure and popular fury, he studied his science by the only method which could give useful results. No peril daunted him. He haunted gibbets and charnel-houses to secure the material for his investigations. In his search he risked alike the cruelty of the Inquisition and the virus of the plague. First of all men he began to place the great science of human anatomy on its solid modern foundations, on careful examination and observation of the human body. This was his first great sin, and it was soon aggravated by one considered even greater.

MISTAKES OF THE CHURCH.

Perhaps the most unfortunate thing that has ever been done for Christianity is the tying it to forms of science and systems of education which are doomed and gradually sinking. Just as in the time of Roger Bacon, excellent but mistaken men devoted all their energies to binding Christianity to Aristotle—just as in the time of Reuchlin and Erasmus they insisted on binding Christianity to Thomas Aquinas, so in the time of Vesalius such men gave all efforts to linking Christianity to Galen. The cry has been the same in all ages. It is the same which we hear in this age against scientific studies—the cry for what is called “sound learning.” Whether standing for Aristotle against Bacon, or Aquinas against Erasmus, or Galen against Vesalius, or making mechanical Greek verses at Eton, instead of studying the handiwork of the Almighty, or reading Euripides with translations instead of Lessing and Goethe in the original, the cry is always for “sound learning.” The idea always is that these studies are safe.

VESALIUS.

At 28 years of age Vesalius gave to the world his great work on Human Anatomy. With it ended the old and began the new. Its researches by their thoroughness formed a triumph of Science, its illustrations by their fidelity formed a triumph of Art. To shield himself as far as possible in the battle which he foresaw must come, Vesalius prefaced the work by a dedication to Emperor Charles V. In this dedicatory preface he argues for his method and against the parrot repetitions of the old medical text-books. He also condemns the wretched anatomical preparations and specimens made by physicians who utterly refused to advance beyond the ancient master. The parrot-like repeaters of Galen gave battle at once. After the manner of their time their first missiles were epithets, and the almost infinite magazine of these having been exhausted they began to use sharper weapons—weapons theologic. At first the theologic engine did not succeed. A conference of divines having been appealed to to decide whether dissection of the human body is sacrilege, gave a decision in his favor. The reason was simple. Emperor Charles V. had made Vesalius his physician, and could not spare him. But on the accession of Philip II. of Spain the whole scene changed. That most bitter of bigots must of course detest the great innovator. A new weapon was now forged. Vesalius was charged with dissecting living men—and either from direct persecution, as the great majority of authorities assert—or from indirect influences, as the few recent apologists for Philip II. allow, Vesalius became a wanderer. On a pilgrimage to the Holy Land to atone for his sin he is shipwrecked, and in the prime of his life and strength he is lost to this world. And yet not lost. In this century he again stands on earth. That noble painter Hanann has again given him to the world. By the magic of Hanann's pencil, we look once more into Vesalius's cell. Its windows and doors, bolted and barred by himself, betoken the storm of bigotry which raged without. The crucifix, toward which he casts his eye, symbolizes the spirit in which he labored. The corpse of the plague-stricken over which he bends ceases to be repulsive. His very soul seems to send forth rays from the canvas which strengthen us for the good fight in this age. He was hunted to death by men who conscientiously supposed that he was injuring religion. His poor blind foes destroyed one of religion's greatest apostles. What was his influence on religion? He substituted for repetition by rote of worn-out theories of dead men, conscientious and reverent searching into the works of the living God. He substituted for representations of the human structure, pitiful and unreal, truthful representations, revealing the Creator's power and goodness in every line.

ERRORS IN AMERICA.

Warfare of this sort against science seems petty indeed, but it is to be guarded against in Protestant countries not less than Catholic. It breaks out in America not less than in France. I have seen within this last year the most perverted statements of words uttered in the lecture-rooms of an American University, circulated by excellent men, who in their eagerness believed them. I have seen phrases used in lectures by Christian Professors at such an institution eked out and pieced out with prefixes and affixes, and substitutions and suppositions, until they became monstrous perversions, and then I have seen them used to prove that scientific education is unsafe, and that an unsectarian institution must be unchristian. Luckily the world has learned something since the days of Galileo and Vesalius.

AGRICULTURE AND POLITICAL ECONOMY.

Did time permit, we might go over other battle-fields no less instructive than these we have seen. We might go over the battle-fields of Agricultural progress, and note how by a most curious perversion of a text of Scripture great masses of the peasantry of Russia were prevented from raising and eating potatoes. We might go over the battle-fields of Technology, and note how the introduction of railways into France was declared by an earnest churchman an evidence of the Divine displeasure against country inn-keepers who set meat before their guests on fast days. We might go over the battle-fields of Political Economy, and note how a too literal interpretation of scriptural text regarding usance wrought fearful injury not only upon the material interests, but upon the moral character of hosts of enterprising and thrifty men.

GEOLOGY.

But I shall ask you to only one more of these battle-fields, and I select it because it shows more clearly than any others how Protestant nations, and in our own time, have suffered themselves to be led into the same errors that have wrought injury to religion and science in other times. We will look very briefly at the battle-fields of Geology. From the first lispsings of investigators in this science there was war. The only sound doctrine was that fossil remains were usus nature—freaks of nature—and in 1517 Fracastor was violently attacked because he thought them something more. No less a man than Bernard Palissy followed up the contest, on the right side, in France, but it required one hundred and fifty years to carry the day fairly against this single preposterous theory. The champion who dealt it the deadly blow was Scilla, and his weapons were facts obtained by examination of the fossils of Calabria (1670). But the advocates of tampering with scientific reasoning soon retired to a new position. It was strong, for it was apparently based on Scripture—though, as the whole world now knows, an utterly exploded interpretation of Scripture. The new position was that the fossils were produced by the deluge of Noah. In vain had it been shown by such devoted Christians as Bernard Palissy that this theory was utterly untenable; in vain did good men protest against the injury sure to result to religion by tying it to a scientific theory sure to be exploded—the doctrine that the fossils were remains of animals drowned at the Flood continued to be upheld by the great majority as “sound” doctrine. It took one hundred and twenty years for the searchers of God's truth, as revealed in nature—such men as Buffon, Linnaeus, Woodward, and Whitehurst—to run under these mighty fabrics of error, and, by statements which could not be resisted, to explode them.

Strange as it may at first seem, the war on geology was waged more fiercely in Protestant countries than Catholic, and of all countries England furnished the most bitter opponents. You have noted already that there are generally two sorts of attacks on a new science. First, there is the attack by pitting against science some great doctrine in theology. You saw this in astronomy, when Bellarmine and others insisted that the doctrine of the earth's revolving about the

[Continued on page 39.]

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—“I have just replied to an earnest appeal, from a very highly esteemed friend of the ‘orthodox’ faith and order, to return from my ‘wanderings’ and enter anew upon the glorious work of winning souls to Jesus, thus securing to myself peace now and a goodly heritage in the future, etc., etc. Having devoted several years to the work when faith impelled me, and having lost that faith in a broader and deeper type of belief—creedless, and with a God all in all in Himself,—I cannot take a step which to me would be a retrograde one. If, however, there was a King Jesus to be moved by his votaries, I might not long withstand the power, being a special subject of prayer in private as well as public circles. Surrounded by the orthodox element, and standing alone in my religious belief, you can imagine with what satisfaction your paper is read, and its ennobling truths reflected upon. Enclosed find two dollars to renew my subscription. Wishing you success in your labors and reward for your efforts to humanize Christians, etc.”

—“I was at church the other day—Christmas day. The subject was the resurrection of Christ in the body. Many points were made out very strong. Among the rest was one very strong argument made, that, if his body was stolen, why was any of the clothing left in the tomb?—as a thief in stealing the body would not have stopped to divest it of any of its clothing. Very good argument, I thought, as far as it went. If consistent, I wish you would say something respecting such an argument in THE INDEX.” [We want better testimony to the alleged facts on which the argument rests.—Ed.]

—“I see you are offering large premiums. I would rather continue to obtain subscribers for $1.50 than take a premium, for the less cost of the paper is an inducement to some to take it. My great desire is to get THE INDEX into the hands and heads of the people, and I count myself amply paid, if this is done, without caring for any premium. I hope THE INDEX will become one of the established papers that will flourish as long as Christianity exists, and be able to furnish a fitting obituary, when it goes the way of all other systems founded upon Original Sin and Miracles.”

—“I send you enclosed two dollars for your paper, and bid you God-speed in bringing the people from ‘darkness into light,’ and trust you may be spared in your good works many years. We have lived by the letter of the law long enough, and I hail the dawn of the true spirit with delight. Give us personal purity, and a clear understanding of the great laws that control us, and we shall truly advance.”

—“Please send me No's 29 and 44 of THE INDEX, which will complete my file. Yours is the only paper that I have ever taken that I wanted and intended to have bound.”

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—In the absence of Mr. Abbot at the East, Mr. Frank J. Scott has very kindly consented to read an essay before the Independent Society next Sunday, Feb. 5th, in the usual place and at the usual time. It is hoped that there will be the fullest possible attendance.

FREE EVENING SCHOOLS.—The school for men and boys is held Monday, Wednesday, and Friday Evenings, from 7 to 9, in the hall over the U. S. Express Office, Daniels' Block. The schools for women and girls are held at the same time in Scott's Block, Cherry Street, and in Campbell's Block, St. Clair Street.

RECEIVED.

SIX BOOKS OF THE ÆNEID OF VIRGIL. With Explanatory Notes and Vocabulary. By THOMAS CHASE, M. A., Professor of Philology in Haverford College, Member of the American Oriental and American Philological Societies, etc. Philadelphia: ELDERIDGE & BROTHER. Boston; J. L. HAMMETT. New York: J. W. SCHERMERHORN & Co. Cincinnati: GEO. E. STEVENS & Co. Chicago: W. B. KEEN & COOK. 1871. 12mo. pp. 338. (CHASE AND STUART'S Classical Series.)

THE LADIES' OWN MAGAZINE for 1870. Vol. II. pp. 408. (Paper.) Furnished on application at THE INDEX Office for Seventy Five Cents.

THE RADICAL, Published Monthly. Vol. VIII, No. 1: February. Boston: Office of Publication 55 Bromfield St. 1871. Price $3.00 a Year. Single Numbers 30 cents.

LIVING FAITH: A Sermon by Rev. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, preached in Lyric Hall. New York; D. G. FRANCIS, 17 Astor Place. 1871. pp. 22.

THE TRUTH-SEEKER. Edited by the Rev. JOHN PAGE HOPPS. January, 1871. London: TRUEBNER & Co., Paternoster Row.

THE RAPID WRITER. (Quarterly.) Devoted to the New System of Brief Writing. Vol. I, No. 6: January, 1871. Published by THE RAPID WRITER ASSOCIATION, Mendon, Mass. Fifty Cents per Annum.

PETERS' MUSICAL MONTHLY. February, 1871. J. L. PETERS, 509 Broadway, New York. $3 00 per Annum. Single copies, 30 cents.

Poetry.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

THE CHILD'S PICTURE :

WHAT IT SUNG TO A SORE HEART.

Little face, so sweet, so fair,
Pure as a star,
Through the wilderness of air
Twinkling afar !

With what melody divine,
Sweet as a psalm,
Sing those innocent eyes to mine
Out of their calm !

And what echoing chords in me
Wake from their sleep,
God in me to God in thee,
Deep unto deep !

Ah, my pain is not yet old ;
Aching I list,
And thy loveliness behold
Dim through a mist.

Thoughts unbid my spirit stir ;
Fresh in her charms,
Comes my tiny wanderer
Back to my arms—

Comes my little truant dove,
Seeking for rest,
Tired of airy wastes above,
Home to her nest—

Comes in her own nest to stay,
Joy in her eyes :
But the vision fades away
Into the skies.

Little face, so pure that art,
Dreamy and fair,
Sings thy beauty to my heart
Hope or despair ?

Is there meaning in thy song,
Sweet as a bird's ?
Shall my fear or faith grow strong ?
Hast thou no words ?

Canst thou mock my spirit so,
Giving no sign ?
Ah, thou singest clear and low—
" I am not thine !"

Nay, the beauty that was mine
Sleeps 'neath the sods .
Softly floats thy lay divine—
" Beauty is God's !"

Melts for aye the beautiful flake,
Child of the sky,
On the bosom of the lake.
" Spirit am I !"

Out of longing, loss, and pain,
Is there no gate ?
Shall I clasp my own again ?
" Silently wait !"

Little face, I list with awe ;
Though the storms come,
God is love, and God is law—
Let me be dumb !

1863 : Cambridge.

ASTERISK.

The Index.

FEBRUARY 4, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

Contributors are requested to write on only one side of each sheet.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

"TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES, OR REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX"—is the title of a neatly-printed tract of sixteen pages published by THE INDEX Association, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. One Hundred Copies will be sent for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate—one cent a copy. Packages will be sent free to those who will circulate them, but are unable to pay for them. Here is an excellent means of helping the cause of Free Religion and THE INDEX as an organ of it. Friends of Freedom, send for as many copies as you can use; and do your part in awakening an interest in ideas worthy of American institutions and the higher civilization of the future.

F. E. ABBOT.

PRINCIPLES AND APPLICATIONS.

Nothing could be finer, in respect of courtesy, kindness, and transparent love of truth, than the manner in which our conception of the free religious movement is criticised in another column. The questions raised are surely of great moment, and can be worthily discussed in no spirit less free from prejudice and prepossession. That these questions have been so fairly and so thoughtfully put, is a cause of no little satisfaction, giving us as they do an opportunity to explain our meaning more fully, and to answer some of the numerous objections we have already anticipated. Let us say here that any further criticism on the same subject will be cordially welcomed to the columns of THE INDEX; and we specially invite them.

The "Modern Principles" were not written in the spirit of dogmatism, which sets up finalities and frowns on all dissent. It was our great aim to state, in the fewest possible words and with the utmost possible clearness, certain leading ideas which are gradually developing themselves in the thought of the nineteenth century; to show that these ideas or nascent convictions, far from being incoherent and unrelated, fall into perfect order and mutual harmony as parts of a philosophical whole; and, by setting side by side the artificial system of Christianity and the natural system of Free Religion, to expedite that transition from one to the other which is actually taking place before our very eyes, and which promises to result at last in a true and universal civilization. If the age we live in needs one thing more than another, it is natural organization—the organization of society on the basis of reverence for the individual, and, as a necessary condition of this, the organization of human thought on the basis of reverence for truth and right. Unpopular as the statement is, especially among radicals (who are jealous of all organization because it has always been built hitherto on tyranny), mankind today need nothing so much as a true intellectual system, without which they can never enjoy a free social system. Warring individual convictions, unharmonized and unproved, are a necessary consequence of the decay of Christianity; but no homogeneous civilization can ever be built up except on well-established and universally recognized principles. The kind of intellectual unity which the world wants, as the condition of a genuine political, social, and religious unity, is like that which Science is creating in our knowledge of outward Nature—not a rigid creed incapable of adaptation to new truths, but an elastic system of principles universally recognized and capable of unlimited application. The unity which Science is thus creating in men's ideas of outward Nature must expand till it includes their ideas of society and the soul; that is, it must develop itself into a philosophy of Free Religion. Without this intellectual unity, there can never be a true unity of spirit and of fellowship, for which all noble men and women are today yearning unspeakably. Reason and conscience, private and individual as they are, must become universal, as the public law of all human life, before the race will ever enter upon its heritage of perfect mutual justice, freedom, and brotherhood.

With this aim, we have sketched in barest outline what we believe to be the intellectual framework of the social system that is to come. It is done modestly, as our merely private interpretation of the tendencies and spirit of this age. But it cannot be justly criticised except as a whole. The only question of importance is—does it really bring out, clearly and simply, the only half-suspected unity in the growing convictions of our time? Doubtless imperfect in detail, is it yet true in fundamental conception and plan? An esteemed correspondent recently wrote thus:—

"I think you err in ascribing to it [Free Religion] definite forms of interpretation, i. e., doctrines, etc., and forget that religion, when free, covers Christianity, Romanism [], Paganism, as well as Abbotism. No individual man is its prophet, or has a right to draw out its creed."

It is a little disappointing to find a highly intelligent mind failing so absolutely to catch our meaning. It is precisely to escape that tyranny of an individual's thought which characterizes Christianity, that we have tried to state universal principles of thinking. Mr. ——— complains because we have "drawn out a creed." But our critic whose communication we print today complains because we have not drawn out a creed—stated what we believe individually about God. The latter is nearer right than the former; but both fail to seize our main idea. We do not mean to dogmatize, having stated distinctly ("Modern Principles," Nos. 6 and 23) that all points of belief as such must be scientifically determined. To say that Science must govern the future beliefs of mankind, is not to dogmatize, but to state a universal principle or method of investigation. To say that Science must teach a belief in God would be indeed to dogmatize. To subordinate emphatically our individual thought to the final decisions of Science is exactly the reverse of setting up for an individual "prophet" or drawing out a "creed." No one who catches the faintest glimpse of our object will ever fancy us guilty of the ineffable absurdity of preaching "Abbotism."

Now it is because we are determined not to preach "Abbotism" that we refrained from including in the "Modern Principles" our private belief in God. Whoever has read our essays and editorials the last year should know by this time that we do believe in God—that we think Science will ultimately justify this belief in strict fidelity to its own methods—that in this conviction we find our deepest joy. But dear to us as is the great thought of God, the thought of loyalty to truth is dearer still. Our special conclusions we hold with the humility which is always born of unfettered thinking; and if loyalty to truth should ever demand that we surrender the thought of infinite and self-conscious Being, we mean still to be loyal to truth. We foster no voluntary delusions; but sweet and fair as delusion may be, we behold unutterably greater beauty in the hardest and homeliest truth. If Science can ever prove that in all this lovely universe there is no infinite Love, farewell to many a bright hope and secret joy; but we shall find no despair where truth is. There will still be left the grand possibility of faithfulness to truth, duty and virtue. If that is all, so be it. That is at least much. And if God be truth, duty, virtue, he must at least exist so long as one human heart is left to glow with deep, passionate love for these.

The reason why we did not include faith in God in the universal element of Christianity is connected with what we have said. The Christian notion of God is part of its special element—its system of dogmatic doctrines. The Christian God is the Trinity—a tripartite being whose moral attributes, leading to the damnation of the vast majority of the human race, are fitted to excite the loathing and indignation of every noble soul. Even the “Heavenly Father” of Jesus, if the Gospels are any record of his thought, intended to send the wicked into “everlasting punishment.” In such ideas there is nothing universal—nothing that will last. Why is it that radical thinkers mutilate the Christian Scriptures, keep what they like and fling away what they dislike, and label the fraction Christianity? Nothing more utterly arbitrary and unscientific can be conceived by the mind of man. What passes for “radicalism” today will be looked upon by posterity as a two-headed and five-legged calf. Until it ceases to blur distinctions and despise definitions based on historical facts,—until it winnows out the universal principles from the special conceptions of Christianity, and forbears to bewilder men’s minds by confounding terms,—it remains a muddy mixture of old and new. We hope for a general clearing-up and narrowing of the issue to its main points; and the means to this end must be a careful discrimination between what is special and universal in Christianity. While we may be in error in drawing just where we do the line between the two elements, we think there can be no error in the general distinction between them. According to our present belief, the Christian conception of God belongs to the special element of Christianity.

In calling the Christian system “coherent” and “logical,” we by no means call it rational. The theology of the Church is a master-piece of strict deduction; but its premises are untrue and absurd. We can admire its coherency, and the intellectual power that has been displayed in its construction, while deploring its false basis and pernicious influence. If we could not, we should feel incapacitated for justly criticising it. The terrible evil of dogmatism is that it logically organizes superstition; and the better the logic, the worse is the result.

There is something very touching in the earnestness with which the venerable Thomas M’Clintock deplores our omission to affirm God, and we profoundly respect it. But he has not perceived the reason of this reticence. If we had been drawing up our private creed, there would have been no such omission. The more we think and feel, the longer we live, so much the more do we believe in God. Science, as we understand it, but confirms our idea of him; the experience of life but intensifies our need of him. But attempting as we did to state facts and principles rather than results, we held our private applications of these principles in abeyance, out of respect for the free intelligence of universal man. If we are right in our idea of God, Science will most assuredly establish it; if not, so much the better that we forbore to dogmatize. There may be a deeper faith in silence than in speech. The secret questioning of the modern world will not be answered by any affirmation of ours; it must go on, till out of darkness is born the light. We are willing to trust the solution of this great question to the wisdom and experience of the race. For ourself, we have thought our way through many doubts, fairly met, never yet evaded in horror or in fear; and if others yet remain, it is because all thought is in some sense doubtful.

Every soul must fight its own battle through to the end. If God be himself the truth, the truth-loving soul will surely find him out.

THE RELIGIOUS AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Another Convention has been held of those who are moving to secure an amendment to the United States’ Constitution for the recognition of religion. This time, according to the reports, the Convention would be content with an amendment recognizing the existence of God. Perhaps it has been thought expedient not to press at present for an amendment in favor of Christianity. That would be a too glaring violation of the rights of some hundreds of thousands of Jewish citizens of the country, not to speak of many others who do not take the Christian name. And of course there are objections that might be urged against putting into the Constitution a clause recognizing the Christian religion, which would not hold against an amendment that should simply recognize the existence of a Supreme Being. Yet the fundamental principle which forbids the one, equally forbids the other. That absolute separation of church and state which is one of the corner-stones of the American government, would prohibit the latter amendment as soon as the former.

But, this vital objection aside, there is something mortifying in this attempt to get the Divine authority verbally acknowledged in the Constitution. It is one of those acts by which religion in its organized forms is fast losing its hold upon the strong common sense of mankind, and is making itself pitiable, not to say contemptible, to the scientific thought of the age. What mind that is both reverent and rational can read the telegrams in the daily papers, that there is to be a meeting in this or that city to take measures for getting inserted in the Constitution a recognition of the existence of God, without feeling that religion is belittled and degraded thereby? Is it not a very melancholy exhibition either of a superstitious regard for the mere phases of faith or of a Pharisaical affectation of faith? If the words had gone into the Constitution originally out of the living convictions and experience of the hour, as they did into the Declaration of Independence, the fact of their being there might then have raised little question. But to put them in now, looks as if we thought that by merely saying God we should somehow please God. It seems a good deal like the Harvard College Freshman, who, as the tradition runs, having accidentally “missed” college prayers and received a deduction therefor on the register of merit, petitioned the Faculty to be allowed to make them up privately before the President.

And suppose the Constitution had contained from the beginning some expressed recognition of God, does any rational man imagine the course of the nation would have been in any respect different from what it has actually been? Would the simple words written there have saved us from twenty years of the slave-trade and eighty years of slavery, and from the rebellion that slavery incited? Would the words have saved us from the mobs and outrages and massacres in the interest of oppression,—from fugitive slave laws and fugitive slave trials, that have disgraced our history and violated every professed principle of justice and religion? Why, even religion in its own appropriate organization, the church, has not saved us from this sin and shame. Some of those who involved us deepest in the shame have been the most pious professors of religion, and declared their belief in God in the longest and most sonorous phrases. Nay, it is the very sects that by their silent or open encouragement did most to shelter slavery, that are now foremost in this movement to go back and say “God” in the Constitution. Away with such cant and hypocrisy! When we emancipated the slaves, when we gave to them citizenship and opened to them the school house and the career of free enterprise, when we trusted them with the ballot and asked them to share with us the responsibility and privilege of government, then we declared our national belief in Divine authority more unmistakably than if we had emblazoned it in every line of the Constitution; for we wrote it in our history itself in letters of living light. And if the Philadelphia Convention had met to push progress still further in this direction; if its members had taken up the question of opening the public conveyances of the country, the schools, churches, hotels, courts, alike to all without distinction of race or color; if they had done something to break down the still powerful prejudice that remains to bar the negro’s path to his just rights, and had sought to bring into American society a truer feeling of fellowship and fraternity, then they would have proposed an amendment more effectually religious than would be the insertion of their entire creed in the Constitution.

And this is but an illustration of our national relation to religion in general. The Almighty cannot care, as if it were something that would add to his glory, that we should name him in our constitutions and laws, but he must desire that we should “do justice and love mercy,” and humbly strive to make our laws the embodiment of his. The only kind of religious recognition that can save a nation is practical righteousness. Injustice, oppression, intolerance, venal legislation, corrupt courts, voluntary or enforced ignorance, corrupt men in office—these make an atheistic government and draw down the sure retribution of Heaven. Equal laws and impartial administration of them, a fair opportunity to all, knowledge and labor free to all, faith, hope, charity for all, virtue and capacity the sole qualifications for public office,—let a government be established and worked on these principles, and it will give such constant and practical evidence of resting on eternal authority that no one will have to look into its Constitution to discover its faith or to learn whether it deserves the blessing of prosperity which it will most surely receive.

W. J. P.

The numerous calls for back numbers to complete files make it necessary to state again that we cannot furnish any copies of No. 2. All these have been used in the bound volumes.

MEDIATORIAL RELIGION.

'Tis most strange that, in the light of the common sense which in general distinguishes our time, men should so misuse the martyr death of Jesus that the instrument thereof, the cross,—which might be a radiant symbol of pure natural religion,—should be made into a dark emblem of mischievous significance, budding repulsively with divine injustice, and bristling all over with the creed partialities of mediatorial religion. It is set up everywhere as if intended to keep the earth and heavens apart; there can be no communication save by it; none can climb to the happy city save up its side and over its arms; and the divine wrath sits watching at the top by its minister, the Devil, to make sure that not too large a number accomplish the feat. Mediatorial religion, the idea that the human soul cannot go direct to God, the Father, but must find circuitous way through, or by the intervention of another, is probably the most thoroughly demoralizing notion that has ever assumed the name of religion. No rite has ever existed so abominable, no ceremony so degrading, no doctrine so abject, that it could equal the mediatorial scheme for direct, far-reaching, and long-abiding noxiousness. The indecencies which have sometimes passed for religious duties, the cruelties of primitive rites, the grotesque superstitions of untutored peoples, are but appendages and trappings altogether external, which drop away of themselves as experience instructs the mind and quickens the moral judgment. But there is a quality in all forms and degrees of the mediation doctrine which gives it a peculiar hold upon the soul, and enables it to keep alive the reptile forms of religion, when all else upon the earth has passed on to the beautiful shapes and serene life proper to the last and most perfect period of development. It is insidiously adapted to all laziness, whether of mind or conscience, and greatly comforts that indolence which some have supposed to be the original sin of human nature, into which all other iniquity may be resolved. It tends to foster a servile spirit; and by it religion is arrested in the stage of selfish propitiation of superior power, instead of developing naturally into pure worship of Infinite Holiness. It tends to invest itself with a "creed," as being easily formulated in words which the deeper realities of the spirit elude, and as implying also a central authority (the mediating subject) of religious obligation; and this it does while also tending to immorality, by reducing the sense of personal responsibility and lowering the ideal of human nature; whence result innumerable dishonesties of all kinds and degrees, a disingenuousness in the use of terms, a "wisdom of reticence," a distinction between "esoteric and exoteric," and cunning double-meanings,—whereby men hold to "the letter," by which nevertheless they profess to mean anything or nothing, as may suit any conscience unenlightened enough to dabble therewith.

And it is not only in the more gross forms of mediatorial religion that these effects are apparent. On the contrary, the more rude the type, the greater the assurance of simple honesty. When the "decretals" of Pope Clement declare that—"one drop of Christ's blood being sufficient to redeem the whole human race, the remaining quantity which was shed in the garden and on the cross was left as a legacy to the church, to be a treasure whence indulgences were to be drawn and administered by the Roman Pontiffs," the very grossness of the proposed traffic is, in some degree, a certificate of honesty. But when Unitarian Conventions, and the preachers therein, applaud liberty while they manufacture creeds, and rejoice that they have invented a formula which may include every one because capable of any meaning whatever, as each man may please; when distinguished theologians advise "wisdom of reticence," extol "poetic reserves" and "angelic silences," and require that "the positive truths and traditional requirements of the church shall seem more important in the preacher's estimation than his private speculations or his critical doubts,"—I think I can see the mental servility, I fear, also, the moral obtuseness, which are the natural progeny of mediatorial schemes. To me the life of Jesus is most uplifting, his name most dear; the cross upon a church does not offend me, and I love to place one in my room at Christmas time. But I feel no slightest taint of mediatorial ideas in looking upon that beautiful life; and I would tear it out of the world and fling it and all its symbols and records back into the obscurities of the skies from which they came, sooner than I would see the world bow before that or any name as a mediator and Lord. No spirit ever existed so exquisite, or could exist, but is opaque between me and the sun. We can better lose Jesus than lose ourselves in him, or abdicate the sovereignty of our reason before him.

But he who knows the exigencies of spiritual life will understand that we ought to lose nothing, but, in freedom, to avail ourselves of every avenue to God and turn the countenance up towards every descending ray of inspiration. God mediates between me and my companion. It is through him alone that the mystery of our consciousness of each other, and communication with each other, proceeds. But one being, animate or inanimate, is as good as another to mediate between me and the Infinite Spirit who is immediately the being of all beings; and I can conceive that, in some moods of mind, a tree, flower, book, the morning or evening sky, or some delightful awakening to the scientific comprehension of a great law of the universe, may be, nay, has been the agent of a more rapturous uplifting of spirit than ever the life of Jesus has chanced to be to us. It is related of Wordsworth that, on leaning down to listen for some approaching vehicle, with his ear pressed to the earth, he beheld, as he lifted his head to arise, a single star gleaming just over the incline of a little hill, as if resting on the slope; and he remarked to his companion, that the sudden sight of that one star aroused in him such a conception of the infinite as he had never experienced before.

J. V. B.

Rev. A. D. Mayo, Old School Unitarian, of Cincinnati, O., declares that—

"As a body, the Free Religionists are committed to the most extreme theories that prevail in relation to family life."

Thus insinuating that they are "free-lovers." The Rev. Mr. Abbot, of THE INDEX, accusing him very justly in this matter of a "most unwarrantable and slanderous charge," insists that "if Mr. Mayo is the Christian he professes to be, he will either withdraw the charge or bring his proofs to substantiate it." The fact—the very fact of his being a sectarian "Christian,"—tends rather against than for the correction. The term "Christian" is no longer a passport to position or a guarantee of honesty and integrity. If Mr. Mayo is an honorable gentleman, he will at once withdraw "the charge."—Amer. Spiritualist.

[It was Mr. Potter who noticed Mr. Mayo's slanderous accusation in THE INDEX. A marked copy of the paper was sent to Mr. Mayo, who has not yet seen fit to retract his false charge.—Ed.]

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

CORRECTION.

LAWRENCE, KANSAS, Jan. 23, 1871.

REV. F. E. ABBOT:—I notice the following in THE INDEX of the 21st inst:—

"Mr. William Sharman, late minister of the Unitarian Society in Leavenworth [Lawrence], Kansas, has dropped the 'Rev.' withdrawn from the Unitarian ministry on account of the action of the late National Conference, and assumed the editorship of the Leavenworth Times."

I write to state that not only did Mr. Sharman remain the minister of the Unitarian Society in this city for two months after the action of the late National Conference of Unitarian Churches, but that, before the offer to him, on the 12th of December, of a place on the editorial staff of the Leavenworth Times, he was willing, not to say desirous and apparently anxious, to continue to be our pastor after his engagement for a year (ending Dec. 31) should have terminated.

Yours truly,

WILLIAM C. TENNEY,
Clerk of the Unitarian Society in Lawrence.

[The above communication obliges us, in justification of our course in publishing the original paragraph referred to, to say that we wrote it on the direct, personal statement of Mr. Sharman. Further than this, we know nothing whatever of the circumstances. Our columns are open to Mr. Sharman, if he wishes to reply to the above.—Ed.]

THE "MODERN PRINCIPLES."

F. E. ABBOT:

My dear friend,—I have carefully read thy article in THE INDEX—"Modern Principles: A Synopsis of Free Religion." I have some fault to find with them, not so much for what they contain, as for what they do not contain. While most of the statements are faultless, beautiful, truthful and practically important, some of them strike me as obviously defective. But the great and vital defect that presents itself to me in the whole series of Principles, is that I do not find in them any definite or distinct recognition of Deity, as an element in any way essential to their practical application in the affairs of human life. Neither in "Christianity," considered as to its universal elements, nor in "Free Religion," as to what it is and is to be, do I find any place for the existence of God, as an object of adoration and love. The former is without "religion"—terminates in "morality." The religion of the latter is to be "embodied in a world-wide commonwealth of man." "It is organized faith in MAN." That seems to be all. "Nature is an organic, living whole." "The laws of Nature are elements of one underlying, all-permeating, all-comprehensive system of law." "The unity of character requires that the Will shall serve the conscience and reason, and know no other law. . . . harmonizing the animal and the spiritual, it shall bring the entire man into harmony with the laws of Nature." "The unity of character requires that the sentiments and imagination shall soar to the beautiful and sublime. . . . that they shall venerate the truly venerable, delight in the magnificence of universal Nature, and thrill to its mysterious life; that they shall recognize the infinitude of the unknown, and add to the clear insights of science the deep glow of poetry and the deeper reverence of worship." Taken in all its connections, this sounds very much like the worship of Nature. The "infinitude of the unknown" can only apply to the "magnificence of universal Nature," which to us is boundless, and in that respect infinite. Throughout the passages cited, we have law without any law-giver.

The following does not come within the same category: "The forces of Nature are modes of one omnipresent Energy, illimitable, uncreatable, indestructible—the cause of all metamorphoses and the life of all that lives." Here we have a distinct recognition of God. But of what kind of a God? "Energy"—a God of Power. Is this all our nature demands? Mine demands more. I want also in God the perfections of Wisdom and Goodness—a God of Love; all the parental affections in infinitude. A God in whose bosom I can nestle, and repose in every exigency,—an infinite Father and Mother, ever-loving and ever-present. But why, my valued friend, such a scarcity of this commodity in thy otherwise lucid propositions? Is not this palpably a defect?

Take, as another instance of defect, the 19th. "The human race ought to be a religious unit, as a universal Brotherhood of Man based on faith in human nature and love for all human beings." Here is an obvious omission. Permit me to say, the sentence should have read: "The human race ought to be a religious unit, as a universal Brotherhood of Man recognizing the universal Fatherhood of God, based on faith in the Divine and human natures, exemplified by supreme love to God and love for all human beings." This would have given us a rounded-out and most important truth.

I will now, in closing these remarks, revert to the first statement, which requires, I think, something more to be said. "Regarded as to its universal element, Christianity is a beautiful but imperfect presensation of natural morality." Does Christianity, then, in its universal element, not include religion as well as morality? Does it relate us only to our fellow beings and the universe of external nature? Have we no other duties but those which pertain to man and other terrestrial animated beings with which we find ourselves associated? Are we in no way, as conscious intelligences, related to Deity? Are we, as such, "without God in the world?" Is piety an unmeaning word? Has it not its sublime "delights" to beings capable of contemplating the infinite Wisdom, Goodness, Power, and endowed with an inherent sense of dependence and the need of such an Infinite? Is not "Religion," including in its constituents love and reverence of God, the tie which binds the finite to the Infinite? Can it be dispensed with by a rational human being, in his normal development? Certainly not, any more than breathing the air could be dispensed with in our physical development.

It is and will ever remain true, that morality, the fulfilment of our relative and social duties, is the only certain evidence of the genuineness of our religion, agreeably to the declaration,—"He that loves not his brother whom he has seen, how can he love God, whom he has not seen?" But to divest Christianity of Religion, is to take from it one of its most prominent characteristics, both as regards its universal elements, that is, its intuitive, immutable principles, and as uniformly taught by Jesus and his chosen apostles, whose sayings are reported to us. I need refer but to a single instance. When asked by one,—"What shall I do that I may inherit eternal life?" Jesus said to him,—"Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and thy neighbor as thyself. This do and thou shalt live." (Matt. 22:35, Luke 10:25.) However doubtful may be portions of the four Gospels, so-called, in reporting the sayings of Jesus, the substantial truth of this narrative is not likely to be questioned. But with him religion and morals appear to have gone hand in hand.

And so far from saying, as my friend does in his second proposition, that Christianity, as generally taught and "organized" by the so-called "Christian church," is "a coherent body of doctrines logically developed," I would say, they are a body of doctrines incoherent, incongruous, irrational, illogical, and absurd, of which any sensible, reflecting person should be ashamed. That they are all this and more, we have only to read thy correct statement of them in proposition 3. Why then, in any point of view, appropriate to such a monstrosity epithets of which they are so unworthy? Is not the application, by an opponent, of the terms coherent and logical to such a system, calculated to confirm its advocates in their blindness and bigotry, and so embolden them in continuing a conflict with reason, humanity and true religion, and with the enlightened and searching spirit of the age, which is fast exposing the deformity of their creed and sounding its death knell? Let it be buried without a shroud or patch to hide its ugliness.

In closing let me say, if in any thing I have not read thee aright, fail not to make it appear; that the highway of truth may be cleared, and that, impediments removed, the Sun of Righteousness may shine with increasing brightness, cheering with its light and beauty, and blessing all the families of the earth.

With high regard, thy friend,

THOS. M'CLINTOCK.

PHILADELPHIA, 1 mo. 16, 1871.

THE BATTLE-FIELDS OF SCIENCE.

[Concluded from page 35.]

sun is contrary to the doctrine of the Incarnation. So now against geology it was urged that the scientific doctrine that the fossils represented animals which died before Adam was contrary to the doctrine of Adam's fall, and that death entered the world by sin. Then there is the attack by the literal interpretation of texts, which serves a better purpose generally in rousing prejudice. It is difficult to realize it now, but within the memory of the majority of those before me, the battle was raging most fiercely in England, and both these kinds of artillery were in full play and filling the civilized world with their roar. Less than thirty years ago the Rev. J. Mellor Brown was hurling at all geologists alike, and especially at such Christian divines as Dr. Buckland, Dean Conybeare, and Pye Smith, and such religious scholars as Professor Sedgwick, the epithets of "Infidel," "Impugner of the Sacred Record," and "Assailant of the Volume of God." His favorite weapon was the charge that these men were "attacking the Truth of God," forgetting that they were simply opposing the mistaken interpretations of J. Mellor Brown. He declared geology "not a subject of lawful inquiry;" he speaks of it as "a dark art," as "dangerous and disreputable," as a "forbidden province." This attempt to scare men from the sciences having failed, various other means were taken.

To say nothing about England, it is humiliating to human nature to remember the trials to which the pettiest and narrowest of men subjected such Christian scholars in our own country as Benjamin Silliman and Edward Hitchcock. But it is a duty and a pleasure to state here that one great Christian scholar did honor to religion and to himself by standing up for the claims of science despite all these clamors. That man was Nicholas Wiseman, better known afterward as Cardinal Wiseman. The conduct of this pillar of the Roman Catholic Church contrasts nobly with that of timid Protestants who were filling England with shrieks and denunciations. Perhaps the most singular attempt against geology was that made by a fine specimen of the English Don, Dean Cockburn of York, to abuse its champions out of the field. Without apparently the simplest elementary knowledge of geology, he opened a battery of abuse. He gives it to the world at large by pulpit and press; he even inflicts it upon leading statesmen by private letters. But these weapons did not succeed. They were like Chinese gongs and dragon lanterns against rifled cannon. Buckland, Pye Smith, Lyell, Silliman, Hitchcock, Murchison, Agassiz, Dana, and a host of noble champions besides, pressed on till the battle for truth was won. And was it won merely for men of science? The whole civilized world declares that it was won for religion; that thereby was infinitely increased the knowledge of the power and goodness of God.

FEARS ABOUT RELIGION.

And now, in conclusion, I might allude to another battle-field in our own land and time. I might show how an attempt to meet the great want of this State for an institution providing scientific and modern instruction has been met with loud outcries from many excellent men who fear injury thereby to religion. I might picture to you the strategy which has been used to keep earnest young men from an institution which, it is declared, cannot be Christian because it is not sectarian. I might lay before you wonderful lines of arguments which have been made to show the dangerous tendencies of a plan which gives to scientific studies the same weight as classical studies, and which lays no less stress on modern history and literature than on ancient history and literature. I might show how it has been denounced from many pulpits, and in many sectarian journals, how the most preposterous charges have been made and believed by good men, how the epithets of "godless," "infidel," "irreligious," "unreligious," "atheistic," have been hurled against a body of Christian Trustees and Professors earnestly devoted to building up Christian civilization. I might show how, as the battle has waxed hotter, the honored founder of the institution, the man who has devoted the bulk of his fortune and all his efforts to building up such an institution as the State needs, and whose life has been one of the purest and noblest on American records, how this man has been charged with "swindling the colleges of the State," "self-seeking," "corruption," "seeking to erect a monument to himself."

CHEERFUL OMENS.

But, my friends, I will not weary you with so a recent a chapter in the history of the great warfare extending through the centuries. There are cheering omens. The greatest and best men in the churches—the men standing at centres of thought—are insisting with power, more and more, that religion shall no longer be tied to so injurious a policy—that searchers for truth, whether in Theology or Natural Science, shall work on as friends, sure that, no matter how much at variance they may at times seem to be, the truths they reach shall finally be fused into each other. No one need fear the result. No matter whether Science shall complete her demonstration that man has been on the earth six thousand years or six hundred thousand—no matter whether she reveal new ideas of the Creator or startling relations between his creatures—the result, when fully thought out, will serve and strengthen religion not less than science. The very finger of the Almighty has written on history that science must be studied by means proper to itself, and in no other way. That history is before us all. No one can gainsay it. It is decisive, for it is this: There has never been a scientific theory framed from the use of scriptural texts which has been made to stand. This fact alone shows that our wonderful volume of sacred literature was not given for any such purpose as that to which so many earnest men have endeavored to wrest it. The power of that volume has been mighty indeed. It has inspired the best deeds our world has known. Despite the crusts which men have formed about it—despite the fetters which they have placed upon it—Christianity has blessed age after age of the past, and will go on as a blessing through age after age of the future. Let the Warfare of Science, then, be changed. Let it be a warfare in which religion and science shall stand together as allies, not against each other as enemies. Let the fight be for truth of every kind against falsehood of every kind—for justice against injustice—for right against wrong—for beauty against deformity—for goodness against vice—and the great warfare which has brought so many sufferings shall bring to the earth God's richest blessings.

"A catalogue of accredited Unitarian clergymen omits the names of Rev. Edward C. Towne, of Chicago, and Rev. F. E. Abbot, of Toledo."

The above we clip from an exchange. We have a word only to say. First: The fact that Abbot and Towne have been dropped quietly from the catalogue of Unitarian clergymen, we should think, would grieve them immensely. It is cruel, indeed. Second. What business have the Unitarians to get rid of these two heretics in this style? It is a coward's way to do a thing. If Abbot and Towne have been guilty of un-Unitarian deeds and conduct, it would have been just and manly to have arraigned them before some solemn ecclesiastical tribunal, and, after thorough trial, struck out their names from the clerical catalogue. Is the Unitarian Church afraid of these two heretical gentlemen?—Chr. Radical.

[Of the reasons for omitting Mr. Towne's name we have not been informed. In our own case it should be said, in justice to the Unitarians, that we personally requested the omission of our name.—Ed.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Nature's Gifts, SCIENTIFICALLY DEVELOPED.

As mankind, from indiscretion or other causes, have been doomed to suffer from disease, so also has remedy for disease been provided. Our hills and valleys abound with roots and herbs, which if scientifically prepared and compounded, will restore health and vigor to the invalid. To find such a remedy we should seek one that has stood the test of age.

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

A
Sure Cure for Liver Complaint, Sure Cure for Dyspepsia,
Sure Cure for Debility, Sure Cure for Jaundice,
Sure Cure for Marasmus.

And all affections arising from weakness or want of action in the Liver or Digestive Organs. The great remedy for

IMPURE BLOOD,
And all diseases arising from it. The great preventive of
FEVER AND AGUE!

It is an impossibility for any one to have fever and ague, if they will use a few bottles of this remedy each spring and fall.

$100 $100 $100
Will be given for any case of this disease that occurs to any one that uses the Bitters or Tonic as a preventive.

Those who have the Fever and Ague will find, after the chills have stopped, that by using a few bottles of the Bitters or Tonic, the disease will not return.

These remedies will rebuild their Constitution faster than any other known remedy.

The remedies were placed before the public thirty years ago, with all the prejudices of so-called "patent medicine" operating against them, but gradually their virtues became known, and now, to day, they stand at the head of all preparations of their class, with the indorsement of eminent judges, lawyers, clergymen and physicians.

Read the following symptoms and if you find that your system is affected by any of them, you may rest assured that disease has commenced its attack on the most important organs of your body, and unless soon checked by the use of powerful remedies, a miserable life, soon terminating in death, will be the result.

H

Constipation, Flatulence, Inward Piles,
Fulness of Blood to the Head, Acidity of
the Stomach, Nausea, Heartburn, Disgust for Food, Fulness or Weight in the Stomach, Sour Eructions, Sinking or Fluttering at the Pit of the Stomach,
Swimming of the Head, Headache, or Difficult Breathing,
Fluttering at the Heart, Choking or Suffocating Sensations when in a lying posture, Dimness of Vision, Dots or Webs before the Sight, Dull Pain in the Head, Deficiency of Perspiration, Yellowness of the Skin and Eyes, Pain in the Side, Back, Chest, Limbs, etc., Sudden Flushes of Heat, Burning of the Flesh, Constant imagining of Evil and Great Depression of Spirits

All indicate disease of the Liver or Digestive Organs, combined with impure blood.

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

is entirely vegetable and contains no liquor. It is a compound of Fluid Extracts. The Roots, Herbs and Barks from which these extracts are made, are gathered in Germany, all the medicinal virtues are extracted from them by a scientific chemist. These extracts are then forwarded to this country to be used expressly for the manufacture of this Bitters. There is no alcoholic substance of any kind used in compounding the Bitters; hence it is free from all the objections incident to the use of a liquor preparation.

Hoofland's German Tonic

Is a combination of all the Ingredients of the Bitters with the purest quality of Santa Cruz Rum, Oranges, &c. It is used for the same disease as the Bitters, in cases where some pure alcoholic stimulus is required.

TESTIMONY

Like the following was never before offered in behalf of any medical preparation:

HON. G. W. WOODWARD,
Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, writes Philadelphia, March 16th, 1867.

I find "Hoofland's German Bitters" is a good Tonic, useful in diseases of the digestive organs, and of great benefit in cases of debility and want of nervous action in the system.

Yours, truly,
GEORGE W. WOODWARD.

HON. JAMES THOMPSON,
Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania,
Philadelphia, April 22d, 1866.

I consider "Hoofland's German Bitters" a valuable medicine in a case of attacks of Indigestion or Dyspepsia. I can certify this from my experience of it.

Yours, with respect,
JAMES THOMPSON.

HON. GEO. SHARSWOOD,
Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania,
Philadelphia, June 1st, 1868.

I have found by experience that "Hoofland's German Bitters" is a very good tonic, relieving dyspeptic symptoms almost directly.

HON. WM. F. ROGERS,
Mayor of the City of Buffalo, N. Y.,
Mayor's Office, Buffalo, June 22d, 1869.

I have used "Hoofland's German Bitters and Tonic" in my family during the past year, and can recommend them as an excellent tonic, imparting tone and vigor to the system. Their use has been productive of decidedly beneficial effects.

WM. F. ROGERS.

HON. JAMES M. WOOD,
Ex-Mayor of Williamsport, Pennsylvania,
I take great pleasure in recommending "Hoofland's German Tonic" to any one who may be afflicted with dyspepsia. I had the dyspepsia so badly that it was impossible to keep any food on my stomach, and I became so weak as not to be able to walk half a mile. Two bottles of Tonic effected a perfect cure.

JAMES M. WOOD.

JOHN EUTERMARCK, ESQ.,
Law Partner of Judge Maynard, Williamsport, Pennsylvania.
This is to certify that I have used "Hoofland's German Bitters" for dyspepsia, and found it an invaluable remedy.

CAUTION.—Hoofland's German Bitters are counterfeited. See the signature of C. M. JACKSON is on the wrapper of each bottle. All others are counterfeit.

Principal Office and Manufactory at the German Medicine Store, No. 631 ARCH STREET, Philadelphia, Pa.

CHAS. M. EVANS, Prop'r.
(Formerly of C. M. JACKSON & CO.)

PRICES.—Hoofland's German Bitters, per bottle, $1; Hoofland's German Tonic, half doz., $5; Hoofland's German Tonic, put up in qt. bottles, $1 50 per bottle, or half doz. for $7 50.

Do not forget to examine well the article you buy in order to get the genuine. For sale by all druggists and dealers in Medicines everywhere.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX
PROSPECTUS FOR 1871.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869, and has just closed its first yearly volume.

We deem it proper, therefore, to submit the following PROSPECTUS of Volume II for 1871, and ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if the matter was properly presented to them, and especially if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor. We cannot afford to send out travelling agents, nor would they succeed so well in getting names as persons of local influence. We therefore have determined to use the funds it would cost to get our paper before the people, in another way, namely, in the purchase of articles of value to be given as premiums to those who make up lists of subscribers; thus presenting to the friends of free thought and pure religion the double motive of doing good and getting paid for it.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two Dollars a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

PREMIUMS.

For Fifty Names, we will give one of PRINCE & Co's four Octave Melodeons (price $65,) or a complete copy of CHAMBERS' Encyclopædia of Universal Knowledge, in ten volumes (price $50).

For Forty Names, we will give a Wilson's Family Sewing Machine, one of the best Machines made.

For Twenty-Five Names, Webster's Royal Quarto Unabridged Pictorial Dictionary (price $12), or one of the following Chromos:

The Three Tom-Boys (Prang's), price..... $15.00
Winter in the Forest, 20x28..... 12.00
Watering the Horses, 21x29..... 12.00

For Ten Names, one of the following Chromos:
WHITTIER'S Barefooted Boy, (Prang's) price..... $5.00
The Unconscious Sleeper, 11x17..... 6.30
Mt. Blanc, 20x26..... 7.50
Or a copy of LECKY'S History of European Morals, 2 vols 6.00
MAX MUELLER'S Chips from a German Work-Shop, 2 vols 5.00
EMERSON'S Prose Works, 2 vols..... 5.00
WEISS'S Life and Correspondence of THEODORE PARKER, 2 volumes..... 6.00

For Five Names, a bound volume of THE INDEX, for 1870. (Price $2.50.) Or a copy of one of the following works, (post paid):
DARWIN'S Origin of Species, price..... $2.00
LUBBOCK'S Origin of Civilization, price..... 2.00
Essays in Criticism, by MATTHEW ARNOLD, price..... 2.00
Tablets, by A. BRONSON ALCOCK, with portrait, price..... 2.00
Any volume of the writings of THEODORE PARKER or HENRY D. THOREAU, each..... 2.00
On the Heights, AUERBACH..... 2.00

For Four Names, a copy of THE INDEX for 1871, or one of the following books (post paid):
EMERSON'S Society and Solitude, price..... $1.75
Nathan the Wise, a dramatic poem translated from LESSING by ELLEN FROTHINGHAM, price..... 1.75
HUXLEY'S Lay Sermons and Addresses..... 1.75
Speeches and Lectures, by WENDELL PHILLIPS..... 1.50
Historic Americans, by THEODORE PARKER, price..... 1.50
A copy of The Revolution..... 2.00
Or The Woman's Journal..... 2.00

CASH PREMIUMS.

For 75 Names,..... 50 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 50 Names,..... 25 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 25 Names,..... 15 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 10 Names,..... 5 Dollars in Greenbacks
For less than 10 Names, a Cash Commission of Twenty per Cent.

Any book in the above list will be sent by us post-paid upon the receipt of price.

N. B.—Names need not all come from one post office. We will send the paper wherever directed, and let the names count as clubs. Specimen Copies sent to all who enclose a three cent postage stamp. Address

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
Lock Box 38, Toledo, Ohio.

Guardian Mutual Life Ins. Co.,
ORGANIZED A. D. 1859.

Office No. 154 Summit Street,
E. F. MUNGER, } General Agents.
CHAS. M. LANG, }
WALTER C. SCOTT, Local Agent, 152 Summit St.

Special Agents—Kelly Bros., 22 Summit Street.
Office Hours—From 7 in the morning till 9 at night.
Medical Examiners—Drs. Samuel S. Thorn and T. J. Eaton Toledo, O. [18y1]

H. M. EDSON, A. TERRY.

EDSON & TERRY,
DENTISTS,
ROOMS 8 & 9 GRADOLPH BLOCK,
TOLEDO, OHIO.
ap16 1y

IMPORTER
Fine Chemicals, Drugs, and Toilet Articles.
Brandies, Wines & Liquors for medicinal purposes only. Also Proprietor of
Toledo Tonic Bitters,
Greatest Remedy known for general debility.
L. E. MULFORD,
23 Summit Street, Corner Perry, Toledo, Ohio
18-1y

THE CELEBRATED
CRAIG
MICROSCOPE

is an optical wonder. reveals thousands of the hidden Wonders of Nature; is of permanent use and practical availability, combining instruction with amusement, and never losing its interest. It magnifies

TEN THOUSAND TIMES,
a power equal to other Microscopes of many times its cost. Reveals countless little worlds all around us, teeming with life, which to the naked eye must forever remain a sealed book—as Eels in Vinegar, Animals in Water, Cheese Mites, Sugar and Itch Insects, Milk Globules, Claws and Hairs of Insects, Hundreds of eyes in a single eye of a Fly, Dust of a Butterfly's Wings to be perfectly formed Feathers, the much talked of Trichina Spiralis, or Pork Worm, which was first discovered in America with this Microscope.
It is of infinite value to professional men, to teachers, and to students, but NOWHERE is it of GREATER VALUE THAN AT THE FAMILY TABLE, within the reach of every member. It will delight yourself, your children, and your friends during the long winter evenings. It will show you adulterations or uncleanliness of various kinds in food, as sugar, tea, bread, meat, etc.

It is of Inestimable Value to the Farmer
in examining insects which prey upon his crops. The power of a $50 Microscope, and so simple in its construction that any child can use it understandingly, and with appreciation.
A Beautiful Present—Elegant, Instructive, Amusing, and Cheap. Over 60,000 sold.
During the past six years its worth has been testified to by thousands of Scientific Men, Farmers, School Teachers, Students, Physicians, Heads of Families, and others.

PRICE, $3.00—Sent by Mail Post paid.
Every instrument is neatly boxed, and handsomely labelled with full directions for use. Thousands have been sent by mail.
Address, W. J. LINESS & CO., CHICAGO.

FREE! FREE!
"THE MICROSCOPE," a Monthly Journal of Information for the People—the mysteries of Nature explained—interesting information on the wonders of Creation—stories, sketches, etc. Terms $1.00 per year. This Journal will be sent FREE for one year to any one purchasing a Craig Microscope at the regular price, $3.00. (Craig Microscope will be sent post-paid.)
For sample copy, and our beautifully illustrated and descriptive circulars, and eight pages of testimonials of Craig Microscope, send six cents for postage to
W. J. LINESS & CO.,
Opticians, and Sole Proprietors of Craig and Novelty Microscope, CHICAGO, ILL.
AGENTS and DEALERS, this Microscope sells in every family on its merits, when exhibited. LARGE PROFITS. Send for terms. 331:6

SERMONS

By Rev. O. B. Frothingham
Forwarded free on receipt of five cents for each.

What is it to be a Christian?
Taking God's Name in Vain.
The Issue with Superstition.
Infernal and Celestial Love.
The Sin Against the Holy Ghost.
Pilate and Jesus.
The Dying and the Living God.
The Foes of Society.
The Living Spring of Water.
Elective Affinity.
Religious Irreligion.
Experience and Hope.
The Radical Belief.
The Eternal Gospel.

49t3] DAVID G. FRANCIS,
17 Astor Place, New York.

AGENTS WANTED--($225 A MONTH.) BY THE
Machine Co., BOSTON, MASS., or ST. LOUIS, MO. 58-68

THE FIRST VOLUME OF THE RADICAL.

Persons wishing to complete their sets of THE RADICAL by adding the FIRST VOLUME, which has been for some time out of print, can do so by at once sending me their orders. By reprinting this volume in part, I can supply 100 copies. To be able to do this, I am obliged to fix the price at $5.00. This will secure a copy, sent to any address post paid.

Volume 2, 3, 4, and 5, will be sent, post paid, for $3.50 each. Single copies of THE RADICAL 35 cts.
The May number contains Mr. Wasson's review of Mr. Abbot's Religion.
The June number contains Mr. Frothingham's article on "What is Religion for?"
Address S. H. MORSE, office of "The Radical," Boston, Mass.

WANTED--AGENTS. ($20 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock-stitch" (alike on both sides, and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest Family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Boston, Mass., Pittsburgh, Pa., Chicago, Ill., or St. Louis, Mo. 38y1

Ministers and Singers will find these particularly Adapted to the Voice. They contain no Cubebs, are very palatable, and act like a charm. Superior to all others for

Colds, Sore Throat, Bronchial and all Lung Difficulties.
RUSHTON'S (F. V.) COD LIVER OIL, for Consumption and Scrofula; the first introduced; fresh and pure. Sold by Drug-gists generally. 48m3.

Mr. Frothingham's New Book.

CHILD'S BOOK OF RELIGION, for Sunday Schools and Homes. PART I., Worship; PART II., The Good Life; PART III., Truth. In one Volume. New and revised edition. Forwarded free on receipt of $1.40.

55-68 DAVID G. FRANCIS,
17 Astor Place, New York.

Agents Wanted For

THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD
Containing Fleetwood's "Life of Christ," "Lives of the Apostles, Evangelists and Martyrs," "Doddridge's "Evidences of Christianity," "History of the Jews," by Josephus; "A History of all Religious Denominations," with treatises and tables relating to events connected with Bible History, containing many fine Engravings. The whole forming a complete Treasury of Christian Knowledge. W. FLINT & CO., No. 26 S. 7th St., Phila., & Custom House Place, Chicago, and 176 W. 4th St., Cincinnati. [48m3.

THE INDEX,
A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO
FREE RELIGION

Published by the
Index Association, at TOLEDO OHIO.
FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

Terms, Two Dollars a Year.
Advertisements taken for THE INDEX by all responsible Advertising Agents. Address,

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
Lock Box 38, Toledo, Ohio.

AGENTS:—
TOLEDO, O., HENRY S. STEBBINS, 115 Summit St.
TOLEDO, O., JULIUS T. FREY, 47 Summit St.
NEW YORK, N. Y., DION THOMAS, 142 Nassau St.
BOSTON, MASS., CHORLEY & DANIELL, 100 Washington St.
CINCINNATI, O., HAWLEY & NEWS DEPOT, 164 Vine St.
ST. LOUIS, MO., WARREN CHASE, 601 North Fifth St.
DETROIT, MICH., WM. E. TUNIS, 86 Woodward Av.
SYRACUSE, N. Y., LEWIS & WHELAN, 7 Granger Block.

The Index.

VOL. 2.—No. 6.

TOLEDO, OHIO, FEBRUARY 11, 1871.

WHOLE No. 59.

The Index.

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, OHIO.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Editorial Contributors.

PILLARS OF SALT.

[Read to the Unitarian Society in Dover, N. H., April 28, 1867.]

"But Lot's wife looked back from behind him, and she became a pillar of salt."

GEN. 19: 26.

In the choice of this somewhat quaint motto for my morning's discourse, no one, I think, will misunderstand me. I merely avail myself of the common practice of drawing illustrations from mythology. To one who freely reads the picturesque stories of the Old Testament, and is emancipated from the bondage of the letter, these ancient legends and traditions possess an interest quite independent of any supposed historic value. Embodying, as they do, the imaginations of a remarkable oriental race concerning its own origin and early career, they appeal strongly to our imagination, and become a thesaurus of illustrative symbols. Apart from their interest as mere myths, this is the only interest they possess for me; and I take Lot's wife for my text to-day, simply because she stands as a quaint image of people still alive.

In the march of life, to halt is to petrify, and we see all around us hosts of human petrifications. We are sometimes tempted, perhaps, to regard the world as a sort of Barnum's museum, well stocked with statues and wax-figures, instead of a vast campaign-ground in which the army of humanity moves ever onward in obedience to orders. It is very easy to fill a niche, very hard to bear stoutly the sweat and toil of war.

For every hero, there are swarms of dawdlers. Yet what worse fate can befall us than to be stationary! What greater crime can we be guilty of, than omission to advance! The tree is dead, which adds not every year a new ring to its girth; and we are dead, if we add not perpetually to the quantity of our being. Development, progress, improvement,—that is the key-note of a life worth living. The one supreme command of Nature, which seems to me to include all other commands, may be summed up briefly in a single word—Develop! Ignorance, weakness, coldness of heart, are undevelopment,—prejudice, selfishness, all forms of moral evil, are misdevelopment. To develop freely and fully is to bring into activity, vigorous and well-balanced, all the powers with which God has endowed humanity; and it is clear that if we are meant to live eternally, our powers must be capable of eternal increase and unfolding. Hence it is that Longfellow's poem of "Excelsior" has taken so deep a hold on the popular heart; with all its artistic faults (and these are many), it strikes that grand chord of aspiration in the soul, which never emits its wild, passionate, pathetic tones, but Heaven itself might well stoop in rapt attention to catch every note of its divine music. "Friend, go up higher!" That is the perpetual summons of the Giver of life's feast. A phantasmal hand with ever-beckoning finger is the vision that fires each noble spirit with courage and hope in the steepest path. That goes before, and bids us follow. To pause and look back, is to repeat the old story,—the vision vanishes, and nothing remains but a pillar of salt.

In climbing a precipice or abrupt ascent of any kind, it is dangerous to look down; the head swims, the hands relax, and all is lost. So it is fatal, in the struggle after ideal excellence, to look back upon the past. "Let the dead past bury its dead,"—that is the voice of wisdom and courage. We must face many a great and terrible grief in the threescore years and ten of mortal existence; through weakness and folly we all plunge into many a sin. But though our past be ablaze with fires of anguish or remorse, a thousand-fold fiercer than the fabled flames that licked up the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah with ravenous haste, yet to look back is paralysis and petrification. It is not right nor wise to dwell morbidly on the losses, the disappointments, the griefs, the blunders, or the sins, which lie behind us in the pilgrimage of life. How many a wounded spirit exhausts in vain and piteous laments the strength which is all too little for the duties of the new day! There is such a thing as a selfish indulgence of sorrow, a luxury of pain and self-pity which makes us deaf to the appeal of others' misery, and blind to the opportunities of mercy that every hour brings. It is possible to become utterly absorbed in petting our own miseries, and thus to turn inevitable pain into an unnecessary curse. I have known such cases. People sometimes take advantage of sorrow to neglect their living duties, and, without intending it, become hard-hearted through excess of heart. How much nobler is it, not to forget our sorrows, but to remember them that others around us shall only find us more quick to soothe and sympathize, to help and bless,—more intent, because of the great pain in our own bosoms, to ease the pain of others, and thus, like bruised flowers, to shed a sweeter perfume because our own hopes are crushed! Such as these, too, have I known; and it is these who have convinced me, by something better than argument, that in every grief lies a wondrous opportunity of growth in spiritual beauty. Thus to suffer is to press onward and upward with fleetest steps, and to make no pause, no idle retrospect, in the flight from a burning past.

We have, in truth, no leisure to look behind us,—the hours come laden with duties too divine to be neglected, responsibilities too grave to be shirked, opportunities too precious to be lost. And if the steep we climb are stained by bleeding feet, the crimson drops are eloquent in the mute witness they bear to our fidelity. Be assured, that by steadfastly refusing to dwell morbidly on our own painful past, and by earnestly striving to alleviate the painful present of others about us, we travel with winged feet towards the true goal of human life.

If it is folly to look back upon a past of sorrow with eyes averted from our present tasks, it is precisely as foolish thus to look back upon a past of sin. There is no merit, but large demerit, in morbidly reflecting on our own misdeeds, and indulging a sickly, enervating remorse. Turn your eyes away—look to the golden duties of this very hour, and, instead of whining and sobbing over what neither whines nor sobs can change, devote every energy to making to-day better than yesterday, and a joy forever. The transgressions of yesterday should be warning beacon-lights for the future; but it is rank irreligion to make past sins a fountain of despair for all time to come. This accusing of ourselves as the chief of sinners is a voluntary self-torture with the whip of conscience, more ingenious than any Romish penance. It unnerves us for bold struggles with immediate enemies, and wastes in sentimental whining over yesterday's defeats the strength we need to make us victorious to-day. We have done grievous wrong, perhaps. Very well, then, let us be heartily ashamed of that,—and prove the sincerity of our shame by conquering new foes here and now. Friends, we cannot afford the time to be always crying over past sins; we have more urgent work, more important work, work that cannot be thrust aside without fresh criminality,—and that work is, to make the present moment beautiful in the sight of God. No fear that we shall not suffer enough for our misdoings; the law of retribution has a long memory. There is no need to give ourselves a little extra smarting. Blush inwardly at the recollection of sin,—you cannot help it; but do not sit down to wring your hands, or tear your hair, or heap your head with ashes. Let the rebound of conscience from the wrong set you on your feet after your fall, and impel you forward on the path of duty. Alas for those who turn to weep and wail overmuch at the flaming ruins of their Gomorrah! There is no virtue in becoming pillars of salt. "Forward!" is the word of command—let those alone who are faithless slink to the rear. For you and me, there is no time for retrospect, or sentimental wailing over dead mistakes. "Lost is lost, and gone is gone!" Let us spring to arms at the trumpet's call.

There are two types of character in the world, strongly marked and known by various names. The one is stationary, the other progressive; the one believes in rest, the other in motion. The one longs for cessation of effort, would keep things as they are, is content with what exists, hates change, dreads agitation, deprecates discussion, loves the customary, rejects every idea not familiar to Noah, and is shocked at the mere hint of innovation. The other is restless and unquiet, applauds every new thing, delights in revolution, advocates the last ism, believes in reconstructing creation in five minutes, despises the old, and would condemn to death every idea that dates earlier than yesterday. They represent the extremes of timidity and audacity, sluggishness and restlessness; and, like all extremes, require to be balanced by each other. They lay the whole emphasis on half-truths, and thus turn truth itself into falsity. Between the stolid rest of the pillar of salt, and the self-consuming rapidity of the meteor, there is not much to choose. Motion without rest is dying—rest without motion is death. I believe in the union of both,—in a calm motion which is living rest.

Look at this vast earth we inhabit, with its stable equipose in the gulf of infinite Space; who would suspect it of aught but absolute repose? Yet onward it speeds around the sun, in its orbit of two hundred million miles diameter, so gently and so peacefully that not even an aspen-leaf trembles at a motion too rapid to be conceived. Rest in motion, and motion in rest, is the soul's equilibrium,—the truest life according to the largest law. In other words, motion according to law is the soul's rest,—development into ideal good is at once its peace and progress. And in this idea of development is found the reconciliation of the new and the old. The law of development is old as humanity, and can never be hurried by the most hot-headed reformer. But the process of development is new as the latest breath we draw, and cannot be postponed by the most cold-blooded conservative. The law is without change from everlasting to everlasting,—no fear of innovation there; but the process itself is nothing but innovation from beginning to end, and every moment beholds a change. Thus in the true idea of Development, I see the reconciliation of these two apparently opposed ideas of Rest and Motion, Conservatism and Radicalism. The two are really one. We must preserve all that is good, develop all that is crude, and reform all that is bad; if this is done, a fair, natural growth takes place, and the old is married to the new.

Men are apt, however, to be too timid at the announcement of new truth. They fear the displacement of beliefs to which they are accustomed, and are too apt to suppose a belief true simply because they are familiar with it. But the great faiths of men, the deep, grand truths which feed their minds with light and their hearts with hope, undergo a change in form, from age to age, which ought not to alarm us. Let no one fear, because he finds it impossible to ride at anchor. There is no spiritual anchorage secure from wind and tide. Men have thought to anchor their faith in all soothing, helping, inspiring truths to the Bible alone. And when they find themselves with parted cables, and nothing else at hand to hold by, they exclaim in terror,—"We are adrift!"

No friends, not adrift, but only afloat. Nor are we without a compass in our own souls. The harbor is well, but the open sea is better. Shall we hope to make the voyage of life by hugging the shore? Let us not be so blind as to fancy that God has ceased to move upon the face of the waters. Even were we indeed adrift, could we be lost where God is?

"And so beside the Silent Sea
I wait the muffled oar:
No harm from Him can come to me
On ocean or on shore.

I know not where His islands lift
Their fringed palms in air;
I only know I cannot drift
Beyond His love and care."

WHITTIER.

I confess, this outcry that, unless the Bible is the anchor of our faith, we are all "adrift," seems to me in the last degree irreligious. On what, then, are we adrift? Is it not the ocean of Infinite Love? Has God only control of the shore? Is nothing but the land-breeze the "breath of his power"? Are not the tempest and the calm equally the servants of his wisdom? The vast ocean-currents that sweep round the globe and the winds that blow over the wide expanse of water—are not these also charged to do his bidding?

Friends, it is time for humanity to start on its voyage, time to weigh anchor and put out to sea. We can no longer cling to this venerable Book as the "sufficient rule of faith and practice;" but by the laws of God we must henceforth trust ourselves out upon the shoreless ocean of unfettered thought. Shall we therefore be smitten with terror, and lose the strong confidence that makes heroes of weaklings? Nay, not so. God is God of the sea as of the land; the compass he has given us in our own souls is a safe guide across the watery wilderness. And even if that should fail, and we know no path in our bewilderment, let us rest in the certainty that no ship that he himself has launched shall ever founder ere it reach the port. Like the Ancient Mariner, our souls are in safe keeping, our ships in unsuspected guidance.

"Till noon we quietly sailed on,
Yet never a breeze did breathe;
Slowly and smoothly went the ship,
Moved onward from beneath.
Under the keel, nine fathom deep,
From the land of mist and snow,
The Spirit slid, and it was he
That made the ship to go."

TRUE POLITENESS.—A poor Arab, in going through the desert, met with a sparkling spring. Accustomed to brackish water, a draught from this sweet well in the wilderness seemed to his simple mind a present fit to offer to the Caliph. So he filled his leathern bottle, and, after a weary tramp, laid his humble gift at his sovereign's feet. The monarch, with a magnanimity that may put many a Christian to the blush, called for a cup, and, filling it, drank freely; and, with a smile, thanked the Arab and presented him with a reward. The courtiers pressed eagerly around for a draught of the wonderful water, which was regarded as worthy of such a princely acknowledgement. To their surprise the Caliph forbade them to touch a drop. Then, after the simple-hearted giver left the royal presence, with a new spring of joy welling up in his heart, the monarch thus explained the motive for his prohibition:—"During this long journey, the water in this leathern bottle has become impure and distasteful; but it was an offering of love, and as such, I accepted it with pleasure. I feared, however, that if I allowed another to taste of it, he would not conceal his disgust. Therefore it was that I forbade you to partake, lest the heart of the poor man should be wounded."

Miscellaneous.

THE TOLEDO INDEX AGAIN.

[The following article, from the Milwaukee Index, we reprint verbatim et punctuatum in order to keep a rash and foolish promise in THE INDEX, No. 50.]

We have touched the sore place of our Toledo friend. In conducting a public journal, as in all other duties of life, we desire to follow peace with all men; and there is only one thing we prefer to peace and mutual amity in opinion and feeling, and that is truth; which means, of course, the Truth to our understanding—the Truth to us. And in saying this, we assume not what must be Truth to others. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind.

In a recent issue we took occasion, as a religious journalist, to animadvert in terms, as we then thought, and still think, meritedly severe, on an article published in the columns of our Toledo friend, on the grave orthodox subjects—Repentance and Forgiveness. We gave at the time the reason why we could not attempt to refute the positions and conclusions of the writer, namely—the coarse profanity and caricature employed in the presentation of these great subjects, and labeled "orthodoxy." To our strictures, our radical friend replies in his paper of the 10th inst., under the taking caption "Orthodoxy scared by its own image." Just where the scared comes in, we leave to the very lively fancy of our critic, and the modest critic (?) of orthodoxy. If our friend had written—"Orthodoxy shocked by our profane caricature of sacred subjects"—there would have been an element of truth in the sentence, not to be found in the caption as it stands. No friend, we aver it; we are not scared a bit at the image of orthodoxy, seen in her own radiant and attractive comeliness; we are becoming somewhat familiar with "her face divine;" and to our eyes, it "shines more and more." But when "that other fellow" puts in an appearance, we are moved to say—"Jesus we know, and Paul we know, but who art thou?" On the serious presentation—for we must credit our friend with sincerity—of ghosts and hobgoblins dressed up for the occasion, in the name of orthodoxy, we are hardly decided for the moment, whether to laugh at the folly, or weep over the profane temerity of such bungling trickery. No friend, you must excuse us; you may give us your rough daubs, and write under the performance, "This is orthodoxy;" but we prefer to trust our own eyes—if our "free religionist" friends will allow us.

We beg, then, to assure our Toledo friend, that we are neither scared at, nor ashamed of, our orthodoxy. Of orthodoxy as his fancy paints it, we wot not. But of one or two things in our friend's article, we are ashamed.

We are ashamed of the old trick of introducing the question of "grammar," and "his—(our) syntactical eccentricities, etc.," adding the stale, "we modestly confess ourselves unable to comprehend." No doubt, our friend is as great on grammar as on orthodoxy, if his modesty would allow him to appear to advantage, as the above specimen, will indicate. On referring to our brief article, we find the types "played us false" in one or two instances, but unimportant; and our friend is quite welcome to his small game.

Again, we are ashamed of the discourtesy of our radical friend, in calling in question the sincerity of our belief in the glorious old doctrines of "repentance and forgiveness."

We own to being no better than we ought to be; nor as good as we mean to be; but this public charge of insincerity—well, considering its source, we will not be insulted. So we leave our radical friend to try again; commending to him his own maxim with a slight change of terms. "Radical vituperators will please take notice, that the orthodox practice the Golden Rule, which they only prate about."

As a specimen of the "gentlemanly manners," the candor and charity (?) of our radical friends, we give the view which our critic entertains of our soundness in the faith and the sincerity of our belief. Our critic favors us with this introduction to his readers:

"The mischief is that orthodoxy is ashamed of itself in these days, and seeks nervously to hide its defection from its own standards under noisy protestations of fidelity to them. Old phrases are retained, but emptied of old meanings. Old creeds are loudly reiterated, while old doctrines are quietly discarded. That is the matter with the editor of the INDEX, who is evidently out of humor with orthodoxy, but does not dare to say so. If he should venture to state in plain English his own hybrid theology, he might appear nearly as heretical as we. It gives him now a terrible fright to hold up before his eyes a photograph of genuine orthodoxy."

The "photograph" we have repudiated. Our friend is mistaken as to his artistic powers. His Photograph was a piece of smoked glass, old and cracked; "just that, and nothing more." That the editor of this INDEX dare not say what he thinks, and wishes to say, about his religious belief, is an insinuation quite in keeping with the notions of free religionists. We let that pass. "The mischief is that orthodoxy is ashamed of itself in these days." Ah, indeed, is that the "mischief"? If there were a grain of truth in the above sentence, would it not be to our radical maligners, the dawn of their "good time coming?"

So it seems in the judgment of our friend, orthodoxy is susceptible of being "ashamed of itself."

Then, it can not be totally depraved—there is hope. A great moralist has said, "Where there is shame there may be virtue." "Orthodoxy is ashamed of itself in these days." Thanks friend, "ye're unco guid." Sorry we cannot return the compliment. As to our friend's allegation that we did not cite a single statement of ours (his which we ventured to controvert—we answer, we did not attempt to controvert; there being, in truth, nothing in our friend's article to be controverted but religious caricature; and in that department, we grieve to say, our namesake bids for the monopoly. Caricature is not argument, and cannot be controverted; it must be answered, if at all, in kind.

Had our radical friend given us his views of repentance and forgiveness, we would have given them a place in our columns with respectful criticism, but we could not fill our columns with the coarsest perversion of these sacred themes. We repeat, what we want is our friend's views on these subjects. Never mind the orthodox views for the present—let us have the views of the "new lights." In our brief article we wrote:

"Gentlemen, it does not pay to spend one's time and strength threshing straw. We have our faith, our creed, if you please. We have our 'Christ and his salvation'—our sense of sin—repentance—pardon—hope of heaven—"peace on earth and good will toward all men, with glory to God in the highest"—what have you got better? In the name of reason, tell us; tell us calmly.

Does our friend offer us anything in reply? Not a word. We said, "give us something to reply to." We, in the plainest terms, declare our faith; and we ask our free religionist friends what they have got better—to tell us—to tell us calmly—never mind calling orthodox vile names. What do we receive in return? A base and unmanly charge of hypocrisy. That's the morality of the new order—the code of manners for those who become the disciples of the radical faith; or rather, the disciples of the radical negationists. The truth is, when our radical friends do not deal in perversion and caricature, they have nothing to offer on religious themes. In their view, pledged by their performances—and is not this a legitimate test—the highest faculty in man is destructiveness, and the sum of free religion is the negation of orthodoxy.

We have asked our friend what he proposes to give us as a substitute for our most cherished convictions, on the most transcendent subjects of human thought. Our friend laughs in our face, tell us we have no convictions; and our profession of orthodoxy is a mask worn for convenience. Now we repeat once more we object to the task of fighting negatives. There are errors, real errors, and wrongs in the world we live in; they throng round us daily; here is plenty of work, real work; and with the allotted work of life in hand, we do not choose to run a tilt against the "wind-mill" fancies of our Toledo friend.

It is therefore idle and evasive to ask us to go into details, when a man deals in the pet compounds, "dirt-eating-orthodoxy," "washed in a blood-bath," or when he tells us that repentance is "self-degradation" and "self-contempt," "and unmanly," when he blasphemes the character of the Almighty; denies Christ; scoffs at the Bible; travesties the doctrine of the atonement; scouts the sinfulness of man and the need of forgiveness; deals out denunciation as if he held in his hands the vials of vengeance; makes the most sweeping charges of hypocrisy and sham orthodoxy; treats with contempt the beliefs of Christendom, and the most sacred convictions of the best, the most humane and philanthropic; and the most scholarly and learned men of the past and the present; and then wipes his self-righteous lips and thanks—himself that he is not as other men, or even as the orthodox.

All this, and more of the kind, is done constantly in the columns of the Toledo Index; and then the editor and correspondents have the face to turn upon those thus caricatured and maligned, and demand to have their transesties of sacred things controverted in a "gentlemanly manner."

Our friend's notions of repentance, are the notions of the heathen, not the views of orthodox christians. That true repentance demeans and belittles man, is fancy, not fact. "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." Is that meanness—is that self-degradation, to inherit a kingdom? But we beg pardon; the words of Jesus will be no authority with the Toledo Index; and our weakness in appealing to the New Testament will no doubt provoke a smile.

Then, as to our friend's grossly-conceived notions of the christian atonement and his "blood-bath" for salvation. Of course our friend denies that man needs saving; all the salvation man needs, in the judgment of the "new lights," is salvation from orthodoxy. And herein we must agree to differ.

We ought to ask pardon of one readers for occupying so much space with this matter; but we have chosen to deal with it once for all. At least, until we get something of a positive character from the quarter indicated; and of this, we have little hope. It is the highest mission of our friends to pull down; they are destructionists of the purest type. They would take away all the old and long tried supports of faith, and leave us clinging to—nothing. For ourselves, we prefer the old way—the good in hand; and the hope that maketh not ashamed. Will the Toledo Index do us the justice to copy?

A Persian philosopher being asked by what method he had acquired so much knowledge, answered: "By not being prevented by shame from asking questions when I was ignorant."

TENDENCY OF RELIGIOUS BELIEF IN INDIA.

The Times' Calcutta correspondent, with a view of illustrating the tendency of religious thought among the educated class in India, gives an account of visits he paid to the Established Presbyterian College, under Dr. Ogilvie, and the Free Presbyterian College, under Dr. Mitchell. He says:—

"Here is a gentleman who wishes to know your exact thoughts on certain social and religious topics. Are you willing to converse with him freely?" "Yes." "Mind, we shall not, unless inadvertently, touch on any part of your college studies, or fall intentionally into any rut of thought. Tell us now what you think of the tendency of thought among the young men of Calcutta?" There was a pause. Then one said:—"Do you mean religiously?" "Yes; in that way or any way." "I think, then, that most of the educated young men are leaning to the Brahmo Somaj, or to philosophical inquiry, or unbelief." "Is that a general opinion?" Second student:—"It is mine as far as the Brahmo Somaj is concerned." "Very well; now, why do you think so?" Second student:—"Because I see Brahmoism growing, and people preparing to make sacrifices for it." "You mean, then, that there is persecution?" "Great persecution socially—in families." "Now, can you say how many educated young men believe in the Shastres?" Third student:—"Not one in a hundred." Fourth:—"Not one in a thousand. The Shastres are not believed in where there has been an English education." "What is your difficulty as to Christianity?" A quiet young man, who had not yet spoken, (I shall call him fifth), said:—"The Trinity." "You do not understand it?" "No." "You believe that the soul is immortal?" "Yes." "Why do you believe that?" "Because of the longing for immortality that seems in human nature. I believe that God never gave such a longing to leave it at last unsatisfied." "And what of Christ?" Second student:—"We believe him to be the best man that ever lived." "But not divine?" "No."

The principal was not quite satisfied. He said:—"You must come again; I shall have a larger class." I gladly accepted the invitation, and we had the larger class. But the only difference was that, whereas the small class held that the bent of "Young Bengal" was to Brahmoism, the larger one held it to be toward "philosophical doubt," which was clearly meant as what an Englishman would be apt to call "practical infidelity"—a phrase about as definite to him as the other is to the young men of Bengal. I shall give some of the replies of this class and of Dr. Ogilvie's, without distinguishing the one college from the other; but I should not like to omit saying that Dr. Ogilvie is an able and devoted Christian, and that the views of the students, which it is my duty to represent exactly as I found them, are not at all in harmony with his. The following are some of the questions and answers:—

"What is your view of the Bible?—do you think it a revelation?" "Only in the sense in which all good books are revelation." "But we require some guide of life, do we not?" "Yes, and we have conscience (this was over and over again insisted upon), and the lives and thoughts of good men." "Now, as to the Brahmo Somaj; do you not think that its foundations are laid in Christianity?" "I think that it has owed more to Christianity than any other thing; but it has drawn from many sources." "Do you think that without Christianity there would have been any Brahmoism?" "Yes; I believe that Brahmoism is truth, and, being truth, must have been known some day. But the day might have been far off but for Christianity." "Do you like the Bible as a reading book?" Several:—"Very much." "Do you like it as well as Shakespeare?" "Better." "Or Milton?" "Yes; better." "Or Bacon or Macaulay?" "Yes; better than any of them." "Then why don't you come oftener to read it?" "We haven't time, if we are to pass the examinations."

My object has been to leave these young men to speak for themselves. I went to see them with the single object of taking a photograph. For the satisfaction of the "supporters of missions" in England, one more fact may be stated. "Are we then," they will ask, "giving our money and care that these young men of Bengal may simply get on in life?" I would reply:—"You are, even from your point of view, doing the best you can. In the government colleges the Bible is not mentioned; and I was told by one of these classes that the only compensation to the students for that great want was the influence of the Brahmo Somaj. The missionary colleges never close the Bible, though it is not forced on any one; and, at any rate, the missionaries, especially the educational ones, are raising immensely the tone of thought among the young men of this strange race. Whither the thought is tending on the whole who can say? Only, one can say that a European, coming here to teach, and breaking the shell of Asiatic conservatism to reach the thought within, finds that he has much to learn, not merely of world-old problems, but even in connection with the newest phases of modern thought. It is remarkable how much the Bengalee picks up, and how quickly; but apart from mere 'cram,' he has a dreamy way of touching and shaking religious subjects—a way that the good people of Exeter Hall would not like. Reverence he has scarcely any; of scepticism he has enough to have satisfied Tom Paine."—Independent.

MODERN ERRORS.

[From "The Fountain," by A. J. Davis.]

Among the errors and hurtful superstitions which have sprung up in modern fields—in fields where we fondly hoped the immortal flowers of Reason alone would grow and forever bloom—I will in this place mention only nine, as follows:

1. That departed spirits, both good and evil, continually float and drive about in the earth's physical atmosphere;
2. That evil disposed characters, having died in their active sins, linger around men and women both day and night, in order to gratify their unsatisfied passions and prevailing propensities;
3. That all known mental disturbances—such as insanity, murder, suicide, licentiousness, arson, theft, and various evil impulses and deeds—are caused by the direct action of the will of false and malignant spirits;
4. That certain passionate spirits, opposed to purity and truth and goodness, are busy breaking up the tender ties of families, and take delight in separating persons living happily in the marriage relation;
5. That spirits are at all times subject to summons, and can be "called up" or made to "appear" in circles; and that the "mediums" have no private rights or powers of will which the spirits are bound to respect;
6. That spirits are both substantial and immaterial; that they traverse the empire of solids, and bolt through solid substances, without respecting any of the laws of solids and substances; and that they can perform anything they like to astonish the investigator;
7. That every human being is a medium, in one form or another, and to some extent, and that all persons, unconsciously to themselves, are acting out the feelings, the will, and the mind of spirits;
8. That spiritual intercourse is perpetual; that it is now everywhere operative; and that, being at last established, it cannot be again suspended;
9. That the reading of books and reflection, as a means of obtaining truth, are no longer necessary to believers; that the guardian band of spirits will impart to the faithful everything worth knowing; and that, for anything further, one need only wait upon the promptings of intuition, and that, in any event, "whatever is, is right."

These errors, these superstitions, and these dogmas, like all other human developments, contain rich intimations and germs of truth. These theories have taken deep root among a large class of avowed Spiritualists. And the legitimate effects, it will be remembered, are visible in the disintegrations and decompositions of character; in mutual disrespect and recriminations; in the disorganization of all our public efforts, and the abandonment of our beneficent enterprises; in the irreverence manifested toward even and facts must bow and cling; and, lastly, in the gradual suspension of the delightful intercourse itself, by which the glory and unspeakable opportunities of immortality have been brought to light.

After twenty-five years of constant investigation into the many and various phases of this subject, and with almost daily realizations of somewhat of the infinite goodness embodied in these high privileges, I can most solemnly affirm, and I do now make the declaration, that the nine propositions contained in the indictment, are mostly errors and hurtful theories, injurious in their effect upon the individual judgment, and still more injurious when made the foundation of faith and practice. They belong to the age of broom-riding witches; to the shallow doctrines of personal devils and sorcery; and the fiction age of astrology and the small gods of superstition. They will not bear analysis by the philosophical method of detecting the presence and value of truth. They will not stand a test by the supreme infallible authorities—Nature, Reason, Intuition. This affirmation is made without qualification; and it contains a challenge—a summons to investigation.

A Washington letter in the New Orleans Times, describing the San Domingo night debate in the Senate closes as follows:

"It was a noble sight to see the Massachusetts Senator baiting those animals. Although I agree with him in so little politically, I could not refuse him my homage. God knows he is bigoted, and one-sided—but he is honest. No one can say with truth that a dirty dollar ever stuck to his fingers, and in battling for what he thinks is right, he is as brave as the best of us. I sat by a warm-hearted Southern friend, who had left his best blood, and with it his health and happiness, on the field of Gettysburg, and I saw his eyes flash and his cheeks flush as Sumner went on. When the Senator's heavy voice ceased to thunder through the chamber, and he turned to his chair with a slow, sullen manner of an old lion from a fight, I heard my friend mutter: 'Cursed old abolitionist, I can never forgive him.' 'What's the matter now?' I asked. 'He has forced me to admire him. That's what's the matter.'"

The church at Bloomsbury, England, has a figure of George the Second on the top of its steeple which has such a hideous appearance, that it was quizzed at the time of its erection in such lines as the following:

When Harry the Eighth left the Pope in the lurch
He proceeded to make himself Head of the Church,
But improving on that our Bloomsbury people
Had made George the Second the Head of the Steeple —Observer.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"I wish to tell you how I like your article, 'Parties and Party Spirit.' I enjoyed every line of it, but especially the sentence, 'The moment a servant sets up for master, let him be promptly dismissed; and I, for one, shall never cease to regret that the American people failed to dismiss that insolent usurper, Andrew Johnson, by the back-door of impeachment.' I was present in the Senate Chamber when the final vote was taken by which the arch-traitor escaped just punishment for his great crimes. We feared it would be so, but that did not lessen our indignation and disgust. It has been a great privilege to live in Washington during the last few years, and when we return home permanently to ———, I hope to write out some of my experiences, which have been rather interesting. I do wish you would say something about the debate yesterday in Congress in regard to restoring Arlington to the Lee family. Was there ever anything more insolent? That any one should dare to lift his voice in such a cause in the city where our Lincoln was murdered! I wished months ago to write to you and thank you for your 'Welcome Home' to John P. Hale. During the terrible war times, my dear, dear sister and myself used to sit in the Senate where we could look straight down on John P. Hale and his noble compeers. We always sat in the same place, and what scenes we witnessed!"

"I am indebted to a friend in New York city for your paper since its first appearance, and, though I have no doubt it was from a high appreciation of its value that he sent it, I think he did not really comprehend how great a treasure it would prove to me. Living as I did in a neighborhood where the people were all church-members—Christians—and having long ago found that I could never be a Christian, because I could not accept Christ as the Messiah, yet, feeling the need of some social life above the plane of business or pleasure, I welcomed your little sheet as a weekly visitor, whose utterances were in sympathy with my own convictions, and whose strength was grateful to one a little weary of ostracism and a life quite apart from others in all matters touching theological opinions."

"I believe I am the only subscriber in this place; but I know I am not the only man in the place who believes in the doctrine of your paper. I have given the paper to different men to read, whom I thought honest and intelligent enough to read it; and, as a general thing, they have acknowledged that 'love his neighbor as himself.' Yet duty have not the courage to come out boldly, and say what they think."

"Having had the perusal of THE INDEX through the first volume, we are so well pleased with its brave position, in helping to shake off the trammels of a false religion and battling for the truth, whatever it may be and wherever it may lead, that of all the publications extant, it is the last that we could dispense with; and we herewith enclose postal order for the second volume."

"My wife and I are delighted with THE INDEX; would not be without it for much more than the cost. We are sending it to our friends and acquaintances in other localities, hoping to induce subscriptions."

"Enclosed please find ten cents, for which you may send me No. 45 of THE INDEX, dated Nov. 5th. My little boy got hold of that number, and destroyed it so that it was not fit for filing."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—In the absence of Mr. Abbot at the East, Mr. Guido Marx has very kindly consented to read one of Prof. Huxley's "Lay Sermons" before the Independent Society next Sunday, Feb. 12th, at the usual place and hour. It is hoped that there will be the fullest possible attendance.

FREE EVENING SCHOOLS.—The school for men and boys is held Monday, Wednesday, and Friday Evenings, from 7 to 9, in the hall over the U. S. Express Office, Daniels' Block. The schools for women and girls are held at the same time in Scott's Block, Cherry Street, and in Campbell's Block, St. Clair Street.

RECEIVED.

THE SCIENCE OF EVIL: OR FIRST PRINCIPLES OF HUMAN ACTION. Together with Three Lectures. By JOEL MOODY. Topeka, Kansas; CRANE & BYRON, Publishers. 1871. [Advance sheets already acknowledged.]

THE SUPREMACY OF REASON. A Discourse delivered at the Dedication of the Temple of Reason, in Chatham, Mass., Nov. 19, 1870. By Rev. MOSES HULL, Author of "Question Settled," "Letters to Elder Miles Grant," "That Terrible Question," etc., etc. Published by the COSMOPOLITAN PUBLISHING CO., Baltimore, Md. Chicago, Steam Job and Book Printing House of BIRNEY & HAND, 111 Madison St. 1870.

THE YOUNG PILOT. An Original Monthly Magazine for Young People in their Teens. February, 1871. $1.00 per annum, Single Copy, 10 cents. Chicago; The Young Pilot Publishing Company.

Poetry.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

THE ICE-KING:

FROM A COLLEGE POEM.

But while the storm is loud without,
A jolly crew within
Assemble some bright fire about,
And drown with laugh and song and shout
The elemental din.

Gaily the flames, with sudden leap,
Alternate rise and fall,
And strange, fantastic shadows creep,
Like spectres, o'er the wall.

The Ice-King, crowned with hail and frost,
His garments by the wild winds tossed,
Halts at the window-pane,
And views the scene in mute amaze,
But, dazzled by the cheerful blaze,
To enter strives in vain.

The dancing flames his power defy,
And, flashing merrily on high,
His shadowy eye-balls blind;
Like disappointed child he grieves,
And, weeping, on the window leaves
His crystal tears behind.

1887.

ASTERISK.

The Index.

FEBRUARY 11, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

Contributors are requested to write on only one side of each sheet.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

"TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES, OR REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX"—is the title of a neatly-printed tract of sixteen pages published by THE INDEX Association, concerning Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. One Hundred Copies will be sent for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate—one cent a copy. Packages will be sent free to those who will circulate them, but are unable to pay for them. Here is an excellent means of helping the cause of Free Religion and THE INDEX as an organ of it. Friends of Freedom, send for as many copies as you can use, and do your part in awakening an interest in ideas worthy of American institutions and the higher civilization of the future.

F. E. ABBOT.

"OUTSIDE OF CHRISTIANITY."

Two communications, one from Mr. Thos. Barlow, of Canastota, N. Y., the other from Rev. R. H. Howard, of Brookfield, Mass., will be found in the appropriate department of this week's INDEX, which bear upon the same point, and which we will therefore consider together.

In an editorial contained in our fifty-fourth number, we used the following language:—

"What Roman Catholic ever criticised Romanism in an absolutely impartial manner? What Protestant ever thus criticised Protestantism? Or, in general, what Christian ever thus criticised Christianity? It is our profound conviction that a criticism of Christianity truly impartial is only possible from an outside point of view. Whoever would be free from the secret bias referred to must pay the price of freedom, and come to the critic's work uninfluenced by the necessity of reconciling his criticism with his own publicly avowed adhesion to Christianity. The unconscious working of this bias, even in extremely radical minds, has so frequently and so plainly appeared to us, that a stand unequivocally outside of Christianity is, in our opinion, the absolutely necessary condition of an impartial estimate of it."

Now we frankly admit that there is a great deal of force in our correspondents' strictures upon this statement. It is too unqualified, and fails to put the point in a strictly true light because it leaves unsaid what ought to be said. We will try to express our thought more accurately.

1. A spirit of hostility to Christianity is just as fatal to a fair criticism of it as is a spirit of partisanship. It is quite true that a critic is as much disqualified for his work by prejudice as by predilection. His mere position, whether inside or outside, is not enough to ensure impartiality. An outside critic may be exactly as much biased as an inside critic. The first requisite for criticism is unquestionably the spirit of candor, truthfulness, and even-handed justice,—in a word, the scientific spirit, unwarped by preconception or prejudice either for or against. The physician should not undertake the post mortem examination either of his best friend or his worst enemy. He would be made unfit for the autopsy by love in the one case and by hate in the other.

2. But a proper spirit is not the only requisite for just criticism. Knowledge is equally essential. The critic must have viewed his subject both from the inside and the outside. He must have studied the interior of the cathedral as well as its exterior. The stained windows of Christianity look dull enough from without; their beauty can only be revealed when the beholder gazes at them in the "dim, religious light" within. So also its grand architectural design, which can only be appreciated at a distance, is hidden from one who never leaves the venerated precincts. The true critic must be at once insider and outsider, and know his subject as it appears from every point of view. If, having once been a Christian, he becomes a non-Christian without acquiring a hatred of his former state,—if he can unite the knowledge gained by interior experience with the knowledge to be gained only by exterior observation,—if he can pass through this change naturally and gradually, without becoming embittered by persecution or blinded by combativeness,—he would seem to be in the most favorable condition for forming a just and free estimate of Christianity.

3. If what we have said thus far is correct, we have no right to expect a true appreciation of Christianity from any one who has viewed it either from the inside alone or from the outside alone. Mr. Barlow ingeniously suggests that the same principle may hold in the case of Free Religion. How is that? Must we go outside of Free Religion before we can correctly judge it?

If there is any "outside" to Free Religion, we are very desirous to try Mr. Barlow's experiment. We should like to know how it looks on the outside. But, to tell the truth, we can as soon conceive an outside to infinite space as to Free Religion. Christianity is a stately cathedral; Free Religion is the boundless temple of Nature. We can pass out from the Church; we cannot pass out from outdoors except by going back into the Church. That is the exact difference between Christianity and Free Religion; the one has limits, the other has none. If Mr. Barlow or any one else can discover the limits of Free Religion, we pledge our word to go outside of it at once. Nothing narrower than the blue arch of heaven shall be our church-roof.

We hope that the real meaning of our former statement is now explained. Just criticism of any system is impossible to any one who has never stepped outside its walls; nor is it possible to one who has never viewed it except from outside them. By intellectual sympathy, at least, if not by actual experience, the critic must thoroughly know the inside of what he criticises, and the outside, too. But he will be best qualified for the task of criticism who knows both by actual experience. When a Christian critic can manage to get an outside view of Free Religion, we will confess his superior qualifications for judging it—but not before.

Mr. Howard makes two leading points besides the one, just considered, in which he agrees with Mr. Barlow.

1. He objects to hearing the Christian demand for "Christian education" characterized as "superstitious," inasmuch as an exclusively secular education jeopardizes "vital interests"—"hopes of transcendent magnitude."

We take this to be a euphemistic allusion to heaven and hell. He can hardly expect one who disbelieves that "souls" are at all "imperilled" in the Methodist sense of those words, to regard such "solicitude" as anything but unmitigated superstition. We should like to know whether Mr. Howard really believes in an "everlasting hell" for "unconverted sinners." If not, his language very pointedly suggests such belief; and he must excuse us for not withdrawing from it the epithet "superstitious." We cannot sacrifice truth even to courtesy.

2. He also objects to our holding Christianity responsible for the evil doings of the Church; and argues that Freedom would as justly be held responsible for the atrocities of the Slave-Power.

In reply we ask,—is not Christianity credited with all the good doings of the Church? Is not every benevolent action done by a Christian at once set down as the fruit of Christianity? Is not the natural goodness of the human heart robbed of all credit in the case, stigmatized as mere "depravity," and reckoned incapable of causing any virtuous deed? If so, why not justly credit Christianity with the evil, also, done by Christians? If the rule is just in the one case, it is just in the other.

But we consider the rule just in neither case. The influence of Christianity and the Christian Church is by no means so extensive as is claimed, either in society or in the private soul. Nature unmistakably asserts herself, despite all artificial systems. We do not charge to Christianity all the evil done by Christians. We charge it only with the evil which grows logically out of its essential ideas. The principle of authority, rooted in the Messianic claim of Jesus, leads logically to persecution, suppression of free thought, and numberless similar crimes; and for these Christianity is responsible, all disclaimers to the contrary notwithstanding. But Christ-ianity is not responsible for the private vices of Christians, nor for the crimes committed against its spirit by wicked ecclesiastics who held or hold control of the Church. It is just here that the analogy drawn by Mr. Howard fails. The Slave-Power was not an outgrowth of the principle of Freedom, but a violation of it, prompted by human cupidity. Freedom must not be charged with the guilt of slavery, any more than Christianity must be charged with the guilt of prostitution. These are excrescences in both cases. But Christianity must be charged with all evils that spring out of its fundamental doctrines, and stands thus responsible for the worst influences of the Church—that is, for its high-handed and remorseless warfare against liberty, science, and civilization. Justice requires that both the practical good and the practical evil which result inevitably from the Christian theory shall be attributed to Christianity itself. It is our conviction that pure partisanship alone will attribute to it only the good, and shift all the blame for the evil upon the shoulders of other parties. So far as the practice of the Christian Church is the direct result of the Christian theory, it must be referred, whether good or evil, to the inherent nature of Christianity as an historical religion.

THE CALL FOR COURAGE.

The originator of the recent demonstration in New York in sympathy with Italian unity told the writer of this article, one week before the great meeting was held, that he had not succeeded in prevailing on a single man of eminence in either of the great political parties to take part in the proceedings, or to commit himself to a strong approval of the sentiments or purposes of the managers. That is to say, no leading politician, Republican or Democrat, was willing to declare publicly that he rejoiced in the recovery and occupation of Rome by the Italians, the downfall of the Papacy as a temporal dominion, the establishment of civil and religious freedom, and the establishment in Italy of the same fundamental principles of society as exist here. To this condition of things there were two or three partial exceptions. Mr. Colfax wrote a noble letter; but Mr. Colfax has announced his intention to retire from public official life. Mr. Sumner sent a vigorous word; but Mr. Sumner always stood by conscience. George William Curtis penned such a reply to the invitation as he alone can; but Mr. Curtis is one who will sacrifice much to liberty. Mr. Bryant spoke at the meeting, and so did Mr. Greeley; but neither of these gentlemen are aspirants for political honor, and if they were, they would have considered their personal honor first. These exceptions prove the rule. They were exceptions. Every prominent statesman and leader in New York, Washington, and Boston was invited, and these alone gave hearty response. The rest feared the Irish Catholics, and dreaded to lose the Irish vote. We have been told that in Boston the effort to hold a similar meeting failed entirely through this cause.

The fear, supposing it to have been reasonable, was dastardly, and should condemn to distrust and obscurity all who yielded to it; for it betrayed an unconsciousness of moral responsibility, a want of loyalty to principles, an insensibility to the claims which the country makes on its leaders, legislators, and rulers of opinion, that proves them wholly unworthy of confidence. But the fear was as irrational as it was guilty. The Republicans cannot lose the Irish vote, for they never had it; nor can they risk it, for it is beyond their reach. Their opposition to slavery forfeited that forever. On the other hand, the German vote, equally important now, and destined to be more important presently, is within their reach, fairly belongs to them, and is obtainable simply by fidelity to their most radical principles. A cordial sympathy with the popular Italian cause would help them bravely in this direction.

But fear is always thus stupid; and it is more stupid in religion than in politics; for in politics a man's immediate interests are more immediately affected by his departure from the wonted lines of opinion and conduct. A correspondent of THE INDEX says,—"I find many who are well pleased with THE INDEX, but who (it seems to me) are afraid of popular opinion." The writer's inference is no doubt correct. A similar fear prevents many from reading the Radical, from having on their table the reports of the Free Religious Association, from attending the preaching of radical ministers. The fear is possibly a well grounded one in villages and small towns, where people know what their neighbors think, and where "orthodoxy" keeps a sharp look out for heresy, and employs all the social resources at its command to suppress it. But in places of considerable size and importance the grounds of apprehension are very small.

It requires little courage to be radical in this generation. The interest in theological questions is so small that few care what one believes, or know anything about it. There is a wide-spread persuasion that character is independent of opinion; and that for practical purposes character is the only thing worth considering. A business community troubles itself very little with theological speculations. Honesty and veracity, promptitude and directness, are worth more than the Thirty-nine Articles twice told. The man who pays his bills is orthodox enough. It is safe to presume that no sensible man lives in dread of personal violence on account of his irregular opinions. The police protect the Atheist as well as they do the Trinitarian. Here and there one suffers a trifling social disqualification, if he rejects the received opinions. Mrs. Prince does not bid him to her supper. The managers of the Charity Ball do not ask for his name on their committee. The controllers of the great public meeting in behalf of the Italians are unwilling that he should speak to their audience in the Academy of Music. Some silly woman, in velvet and lace, remarks that he is a good man, but has no religion. But trials of this sort are not hard to bear, even by men and women of unheroic mould. They do not interrupt sleep, or destroy the appetite for dinner. The merchant's come to him. The trader takes his note. Customers enter his store and purchase goods. Salesmen receive his money. Men and women engage in his service. The tailor makes his clothes. The butcher cuts the tender meat for him. The cook puts no poison into his gravy. To talk of making sacrifices for opinion's sake is ridiculous in this generation. We know infidels who are as well reputed as any people in the community. Their custom is sought as much as if they went duly to the most aristocratic church, and their society is courted,—if they are rich,—as sedulously as if they bowed the head at the mention of Jesus' name. Mothers would be glad to have them marry their daughters, and fathers would rejoice to have them as business partners with their sons. The sick are as willing to be cured by a materialist as by a spiritualist; and the litigious would as lief be defended in their suits at law, by the pantheist as by the theist. In society, the Radical is now and then just sufficiently embarrassed to be reminded of his politeness, and thrown upon his best manners; but beyond this, in our cities, and among people of average intelligence, the danger of more serious inconvenience is very trifling. In fact, it is hardly palpable enough to be gently stimulating to the nerves.

Even in smaller places the number of people who respect independence, honesty, frankness, sincerity of purpose, is generally large enough to keep a pretty decided Radical in countenance. Our people love generosity, boldness, and the assertion of mental freedom. They will pardon much to the spirit of liberty. Complete ostracism is impossible in any American community. If the Radical has fewer friends he will in all probability have warmer ones; if he loses popularity, he gains respect; if he forfeits applause, he wins honor. He cannot lose everything, and the chances are that what he loses in one way will be more than made good in another.

There was a time when people feared the intellectual and spiritual consequences of radical opinions. They imagined that doubt and questioning and denial put their souls in jeopardy. They fancied that one step would lead to another, until the place of safety should be left far behind, and the audacious explorer of perilous fields approach a terrible jumping-off place, the precipice from which there was no escape, and down which plunging, the hapless adventurer must tumble, awful fate! into the hands of the Living God. So the old navigators feared to venture out of sight of land, lest their bark should slip over the edge of the planet and be lost. The discovery that the earth is a round ball has dispelled that fear. The sailor goes on and on, seeming to sail over a vast plain, coming to no rapids, gliding down no descent, hovering over no abyss, stars all the while shining above him, suns rising and setting, winds swelling his canvass, water bearing him up, steady currents pushing him on, round and round the world.

We have discovered by this time, too, that the world of truth is a globe, and has no sharp edges, no precipice or jumping-off place. The navigator cannot get lost so long as he navigates scientifically. The further he goes the grander are the continents he touches; the faster he drives on the more speedily will he reach, not his doom, but his destination. So this bugbear has disappeared. No man in his senses apprehends danger to his soul from the eagerness of his desire for knowledge, or the ardor of his pursuit of truth. No man of rational mind lives in the apprehension of shipwreck through honest doubt, or dreads lest he shall go to pieces on the rock of conscientious denial.

What then are the grounds of fear? There are none. The things to be seriously afraid of lie in the other direction. There is really more to be apprehended from timidity than from audacity. The danger that mental activity may decline and intellectual purpose debase; that the desire for knowledge may abate and the aspiration after truth become faint; that one may miss, may actually deprive himself of the sympathy and friendship of the bravest minds, and may remain out of the reach of the finest intellectual influences,—thus gradually forfeiting self-respect, and abandoning the hope of obtaining that richness and elevation of mind which constitute its truest satisfaction; the danger of being ranked among the indifferent, the cowardly, or even the hypocritical, is very serious indeed. It is a danger which, if apprehended, must be appalling; a spiritual danger, a danger to the soul, and a danger likewise to the temporal estate. For the man who is honestly a radical and shrinks from avowing it, is presently discovered to be dishonest; and if dishonest in one respect, why not in another? If servile in soul, why not ignoble in business? If a cheat in worship, why not a cheat in trade? If slippery in church, why not slippery in the shop? The man who consults his petty interest in the presence of heaven, will be very likely to consult it in the presence of politicians and trades-people. Of the solemn obligation that is laid on all men to be honest and manly for the sake of the community they live in, for the education of public sentiment, the culture of public opinion, the toning up of the public conscience, we have here nothing to say. Considerations like these, however obvious and imperious, are quite too exalted for minds that are capable of balancing puny policies and weighing scruples of selfish prudence. We are speaking only of the relative danger of the two courses, the brave one and the timid. From which quarter comes the call for courage? Not, we are convinced, from the quarter of manly independence. In sincerity alone is safety.

O. B. F.

COPERNICUS.—Protestant writers generally indulge in the strange fancy that all the great minds of the period of the Reformation belong to their ranks; and it is almost a subject of surprise that Copernicus escaped an inscription on the monument raised to Luther at Worms. No doubt, however, at Luther's feet would have been an uncomfortable place for the man of whom we read in Luther's "Table-Talk": "People gave ear to an upstart astrologer, who strove to show that the earth revolves, not the heavens, nor the firmament, the sun and moon. . . . But such is now the state of things. Whoever wishes to appear clever, must devise some new system which of all systems is, of course, the very best. This fool wishes to reverse the entire science of astronomy. But sacred scripture tells us that Joshua commanded the sun to stand still, and not the earth."

Later on, Melancthon wrote in a work entitled "De Initio Doctrinæ Physicæ": "The eyes are witnesses that the heavens revolve in the space of twenty-four hours. But certain men, either from the love of novelty or to make a display of their ingenuity, have concluded that the earth moves, and they maintain that neither the eighth sphere nor the sun revolves. Now, although these clever dreamers find many ingenious things wherewith to recreate their minds, it is nevertheless a want of honesty and decency to assert such absurd notions publicly, and the example is pernicious. It is the part of a good mind to accept the truth as revealed by God, and to acquiesce in it."

Both reformers condemned the system of Copernicus, as opposed to the teaching of the sacred Scriptures. But the Catholic Church has always ignored that extravagant notion of inspiration, so justly censured by Lessing, according to which the Bible is to be received as a text-book even of astronomy, geology, and other natural sciences.—Catholic World.

The Providence Journal says:—"At a corner of the highway, about half a mile east of the 'Line Meeting House,' in Foster, a new guideboard has just been placed upon a pole, with this novel inscription printed in large and small letters:—'Zion's Hill, perfect church, 1½ mile. Thank God that we are not like other men.' It was recently erected between two days, and points towards the place of meeting of a new sect, which claim to be the only true church."

[The only difference between this and other sects is that it says what all the rest think.—Ed.]

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

THE CRITIC'S TRUE POSITION.

CANASTOTA, N. Y., Jan. 6, 1871.

F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—Whilst I find very much to approve and heartily endorse in your ably conducted paper, there are frequently taken, by yourself and other writers, positions I cannot approve as thoroughly sound. I am very much pleased with the frankness and fairness with which you treat articles antagonistic to your views, and your liberality in publishing matter in direct conflict with the theology you advocate.

I will call your attention to a point or two of your answer to the questions propounded to you by Rev. R. H. Howard, in the 54th number of THE INDEX. Speaking of the criticisms of Christianity, you say that a stand unequivocally outside of Christianity is, in your own opinion, the "absolutely necessary condition of an impartial estimate of it." From this I infer that, to judge Christianity or criticize it, we must not be a Christian, or a believer in it.

Now which do you think is best calculated to do justice to such a case, a friend or an enemy to Christianity? Do you think a person ought to be unequivocally outside of your "Free Religion" to justly criticize it? Are you willing that your system of religion should be tested by the opinion of those who do not believe it?

Is a Protestant better calculated to criticize Catholicism than a Catholic, or is a Catholic a juster critic of Protestantism than a Protestant?

You may say the Catholic is prejudiced in favor of Catholicity, so as not to be impartial; but is he more prejudiced in this direction than the Protestant is the other way?

Now if I properly understand you, I must take a position directly against you, and say that he who would be qualified to criticize Christianity justly must stand unequivocally within it; and so as to your own theory of Free Religion.

This is an indispensable requisite, if justice would be done. How far prejudice may affect the judgment or criticism, is a question that concerns the morale of the man. Your man entirely "outside of Christianity" may be as much affected morally by his prejudices as the man inside. It is the question of qualifications as to relation and condition, a knowledge of what is to be criticised, that is to be settled. That a man entirely outside of mathematics, astronomy, natural history, philosophy, morality, or religion should be deemed better qualified for criticism than one inside, seems to me to be something peculiarly strange in the logic and philosophy of things. An explanation from you would be very gratifying to me.

Yours truly,

THOS. BARLOW.

CHRISTIANITY AND EDUCATION.

BROOKFIELD, Jan. 9, 1871.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—Will you allow a word further touching the matter of the relation of Christianity to the interests of education?

1. You characterize the jealousy of Christians of an exclusively secular education as "superstition;" whereas, in reality, it is simply an intelligent concern for the welfare, a legitimate dread of the disastrous consequences to manhood and soulhood—to the spiritual nature of our youth—of an exclusively secular culture. May there not exist such a solicitude as this without one's being open to the charge of "superstition?" Shall we call that mother "superstitious" who dreads the influence upon her child's mind of the teachings of those who are confessedly godless? She feels sure that the child's principles, character, happiness, usefulness, present and future welfare, are all involved. How natural that she should be jealous of what seems to menace such vital interests—hopes of such transcendent magnitude! Certainly this earnest solicitude for souls, for the best interests of imperilled human beings, need not necessarily be "superstitious."

2. You intimate that Christianity must fairly be held responsible for all the abuses of the church. I would simply repeat what I have once before stated: If Christianity must necessarily be held responsible for all the vagaries, recreancies, apostacies and hypocrisies that have been committed in her name, in like manner must Freedom be held responsible for all the atrocities committed in her name, whether under the auspices of the Slave-Power in this country, or the "Reign of Terror" in France. While it is true that, as a rule, the real spirit and tendencies of a system must be studied in the light of the institutions it creates, and their actual working in the world, still discrimination must evidently be made between what is essential to and what is an abuse or perversion of a thing. We doubt, for example, whether Jefferson and his compatriots would be willing to father the present Democratic party.

3. You think that fair, impartial criticism of Christianity is impossible inside the church. I appreciate fully the force of the remark; but it would be difficult for you to show that there would be any more fairness or impartiality outside of the church. Is Goldwin Smith a more appreciative, impartial critic of free institutions than Henry Wilson; or J. S. Mill than the late Gov. Andrew; or De Tocqueville than Washington, Hamilton, or Abraham Lincoln? Is Robert Collyer disqualified for an intelligent and impartial appreciation and exposition of the "American" or Democratic "idea" by having become an American citizen? While love sometimes may blind us, it is also often necessary in order to a full appreciation of many things. No one so well as a loyal citizen can appreciate his country for all it is worth, much as he may be bigotedly prejudiced in its favor. No one is so well calculated to appreciate a noble woman as the man who loves her. Christianity meantime has frequently been criticised by candid outsiders. There, for example, was Rousseau. You recollect what he said:—

"Peruse the works of our philosophers, with all their pomp of diction; how mean, how contemptible they are, compared with the Scriptures! Where is the man, where is the philosopher, who could so live and so die, and without ostentation? If the life and death of Socrates are those of a Sage, the life and death of Jesus Christ are those of a God."

And there was Napoleon. One could hardly be practically or more completely an outsider than he. Yet he bore unequivocal testimony to the dignity of Christ, as evinced by the wonderful effect of his doctrines upon the world. Lecky seems to maintain, as nearly as any extreme outsider well can, a balanced, judicial mind; and how wonderful was the influence of Christianity, even according to his admissions, debauched as the Church became during the Middle Ages, upon the morals and civilization of mediæval Europe! Gibbon has ever been supposed to have written under the influence of a feeling of bitter animosity against the church—to have afforded an illustration of that kind of fairness and impartiality and intelligent appreciation which we might reasonably expect from outside critics. I do not share this view. As a historian, he was bound to discuss only the natural causes of the extraordinary reform which Christianity introduced. He did the best he could to account for the phenomena on natural principles. His failure fully to do so is the best evidence of its supreme character and origin.

R. H. H.

THE TRUE NATURE OF MORAL FREEDOM.

OLATHE, KANSAS, Dec., 1870.

EDITOR OF INDEX:

Dear Sir,—I have been very much interested by the correspondence on "Liberty and Necessity;" and if any new ideas on this old subject can be suggested, let us have them, by all means. I do not feel like one of your correspondents, who says that the subject has been handled so long and by such able minds that we ought to give it up. If with Voltaire we admit that motives or emotions, and our very thoughts even, are suggested independently of our volition, and all that we can claim is a limited control over them, let us inquire what is the nature of that control. Perhaps we shall go no further than Descartes, and say that all we can do is to govern and direct this mysterious force or motive power, "like an engineer, by turning a tap here or there."

Is it not a fact that each is governed by his own individual motives, and his so-called self-control is limited by those individual motives? When it is said that a criminal is a "free moral agent," and could have done otherwise, we only mean that he had power to control his action when dictated by his motives. We do not mean that he had power to have what motives he pleased. If sane, he could act, or not act, in accordance with his own motives or propensities; but he could never act in accordance with my motives or yours, unless he possessed them. Largely developed selfish motives will control a smaller benevolence or justice; or a large intellectual development will often show that gratifying such propensity will lead to evil, and so will control or prevent the action just as effectually as the higher sentiments would, if developed.

Huxley says that the "realm of matter and law is gradually extending, and that the consciousness of this great truth weighs like a nightmare upon many of the best minds;" . . . "they are alarmed lest man's moral nature should be debased by the increase of such science." Supposing it is true that the great universal motive of love of happiness or fear of evil prevents acting out the promptings of selfish propensities, when the higher motives of justice and benevolence are as yet undeveloped, is it not well to appeal to that motive which is sure to operate, rather than appeal to those higher sentiments which are not developed?

What do we mean by "choice," as applied to actions? It may mean a choice to act or not act in accordance with a motive, or it may mean a choice of different actions, dictated by different motives possessed by the individual; but let it be borne in mind that it never means a choice of all human motives; which it should do, if man is really free.

One of your correspondents says that "choice without freedom is a contradiction in terms." Certainly unlimited choice without freedom would be contradictory. So also limited choice and freedom is equally so. Let us not waste time and thought in stepping beyond the limits of the "knowable," but rather confine ourselves to facts on this old question. We do not know, and perhaps never can know, the essence of matter or mind, or what Spencer calls ultimate ideas in science and religion; but we can know facts of experience and consciousness.

Is it not a fact that in every deliberation our choice of action is limited by our individual motives, or by our individual intelligence? Often the choice is made in spite of our intelligence, the strong propensity controlling the intelligence.

If man is a moral free agent in the strict sense of the term,—if he can always choose to do the right when he likes,—then we are bound to show that he can create or call up what motive he pleases; that he has an unlimited choice of all human motives; so that he can be magnanimous, benevolent, or just, quite as easily as he can be mean, unjust or selfish.

But supposing all right action, all noble character, is the result of certain fixed, inflexible laws, just as good health is the result of the laws of digestion being obeyed, where is morality? What does the term moral mean? What is the meaning of duty—why use the term duty? The only reply seems to be that the universal motive of love of happiness and fear of evil is the ultimate standard by which our individual intelligence judges of duty. The miser considers it his duty to accumulate all he can, and the conscientious Hindu thinks it right to sacrifice her child to Juggernaut, both having ultimate good to be reached for themselves; and even the highest sentiment of abstract duty, or love of what the individual thinks is right for the truth's sake, is not this a largely developed instinctive feeling, which controls the lower propensities? In short, what is volition but the action of a powerful sentiment controlling the lower inclinations, and leading to positive action, or the intelligence showing that evil will result, if the propensity is followed, and leading to the negative result,—non-action? Morality, therefore, in its ultimate meaning, is acting for the general good.

Intelligence shows, sooner or later, that the world is constituted on the "theory of the supremacy of the moral and religious sentiments," and if those higher sentiments are not possessed, there will at least be a negative morality—a not doing of wrong.

Is it not a fact that may be known to all, that our very thoughts are suggested independently of our volition? Can any one remain quiet for five minutes without thoughts being suggested independently of his will? So that it might be said that man is governed by his thoughts more than he governs them!

If our higher sentiments, and our intelligence developed through experience, tell us that the lower propensities should be subordinate, it becomes a question of vast importance how those higher sentiments can best be cultivated. Will not the sciences, or a knowledge of nature's laws, be the most efficient means of such cultivation?

Very respectfully yours,

J. E. S.

JEPHTHA'S VOW.

TIPPECANOE CITY, O., Jan. 16, 1871.

MR. ABBOT:—I go to church sometimes; I did so last night. A Methodist Elder preached a discourse from these words:—"I will pay my vows to the Lord now, in the presence of all his people." In order to illustrate what was meant by a vow to the Lord, and the sacred, solemn obligation a man was under to pay such vows, he referred us to the case of Jephtha. "You know," said the preacher, "Jephtha on one occasion commanded the armies of Israel in a war against the Ammonites; but before he commenced the fight, he made a vow to the Lord that, if the Lord would be with him and give him the victory in the contest, he would make a burnt-offering to God of whosoever or whatsoever should first issue from his house to meet him, on his return home." The preacher also informed us, the more costly the thing vowed to be done or sacrificed, the greater was the obligation of keeping the vow and the more meritorious was the sacrifice. On this occasion it happened that Jephtha's only child and daughter was the first to meet him on his return from a victorious contest with the enemy; and Jephtha, true to his vow, made a burnt-offering to God of his beautiful, obedient and only child! And this was held up as an example, in some sort, at least, to be followed,—a pious action, in Jephtha, at least. I thought to myself,—what an overwhelming proof is this of the ignorance, bigotry and superstition of the Jewish nation at that time—ignorance and superstition in supposing such a vow could possibly induce the Lord to be on his side! And what a Moloch does it make of the God of Israel to suppose he would be pleased with such an offering, though a thousand times vowed to be offered! And according to Christian (falsely so-called) belief, the all-wise and good Governor of the world plotted and planned this whole transaction in order to test the fidelity of Jephtha, and get his daughter for a sacrifice!

Now, according to my belief, Jesus died to redeem the world from such ignorance and superstition. That is, Jesus taught the world that God required no such sacrifices of man; that it was error and falsehood to teach men so. When arraigned before the Jewish Sanhedrim on the false accusation of making himself equal with God, he denied the charge, but told them,—"It is written in your law, 'ye are called Gods.'" and he argued,—"If those to whom the word of the Lord [some truth not generally seen into by the multitude] came, are called Gods in your sacred books, why find fault with me because I said I was the son of God? No, no, it is not for this you would crucify me. I have been teaching you truths which will overthrow your superstitious and false doctrines; it is because of some of these truths you would kill me.'"

Mr. Abbot, in my opinion you said none too much for Jesus in your essay on the "Incarnation."

In Jesus were God's truths (God is truth) incarnated, and he boldly proclaimed them; and the truths taught by him will yet, I trust, save the world from such horrid acts as Jephtha was guilty of, and all similar acts performed by smaller Jephthas the world over. The great error of the Church is that she deifies Jesus, instead of the truths he taught, and teaches as truth what Jesus never taught.

EDWARD L. CRANE.

ENCOURAGEMENT.

PULASKI, LAWRENCE CO., Pa., Dec. 30, 1870.

FRIEND ABBOT:—As you propose to send THE INDEX for one month free to any one who wishes to examine it, I send you a few names of persons who are known to be liberal, and are about tired of the old ruts. Now I know of no lever so powerful as THE INDEX. With common sense as the fulcrum, it will hoist them high above the old heathen mythology, and place their vehicles on the high road of reason and progress. Go on, friend Abbot. You are doing a good work, though the influence of the Church may oppress you, and bigotry snub you in society—the finger of scorn and impudence be thrust in your face on the street,—no matter, so long as your INDEX points to the right way. With its foundation on the primitive rock of the Universe, you need not fear the consequences. You know what the poet says:

"He's thought a knave or fool,
Or bigot plotting crime,
Who for the advancement of his kind
Is wiser than his time."

But the persecution of this day is nothing to what it was fifty years ago. Now science and true civilization are illuminating the dark and foggy understandings of mankind, driving back ignorance, stupidity, superstition and bigotry, and letting in a flood of light which really astonishes and bewilders us, when we see where we are. But with this light we shall soon get out of this more than Egyptian darkness; and the world will make more progress in the ten years to come, than in fifty before. The progress I speak of, is religion, civilization and a common brotherhood among mankind. Success to your enterprise, and do not doubt there will be success for THE INDEX.

C.

PETTY PERSECUTION.

SOLDIERS' ASYLUM,
DAYTON, O., Jan. 2, 1871.

F. E. ABBOT:—

Dear Sir,—About a month or six weeks since, I obtained a few of those liberal tracts published by a society in Massachusetts, and, in return for those I had received at the hands of the Young Men's Christian Association of this place, I distributed a few. The consequence was the receipt of a letter threatening my life, and an assault by a drunken room-mate who struck me with his fist. I reported him to the Governor, E. F. Brown, who, after a mock trial, discharged the offender without a word of admonition or reprimand.

In a week or two afterwards, I made application to the Principal of our school for the position of Assistant Teacher, and had the pleasure of learning from her that I was the best qualified of all the applicants.

Learning afterwards that the Chaplain had the appointing power, I personally applied to him, when, after reading my application, he said he was not a bigot, but, as this was a "Christian government in which the religion of Jesus Christ our Lord and Savior" was acknowledged as the only true religion, etc., etc., I should "find it extremely difficult to succeed in business while I persisted in entertaining such unpopular sentiments," and that the officers had decided that it would be "impolitic to grant me any position in their gift while I continued to advocate such infidel opinions."

He then prevailed upon the Assistant Teacher to retain the situation, and in a few days afterwards appointed another man to the position, who, I should add, is a faithful attendant of church and Sunday school. Such intolerance of opinion and proscription demands exposure.

My life here is thus rendered extremely unpleasant, being pointed out as the "Spiritualist," "Infidel," "Unbeliever," "Deist," etc.

JESSE B. BARRY.

"A CORRECTION" CORRECTED.

LEAVENWORTH, KANSAS, 4th Feb., 1871.

F. E. ABBOT, Esq.:

My Dear Sir,—The statement W. C. Tenney complains of was correct. His assertions establish no inconsistency in my conduct. The Lawrence Society was not represented in New York, and had, therefore, no share in the vote of the Conference. In my first discourse after the Conference I denounced its action, greatly to the disgust of a few of Mr. Tenney's semi-orthodox friends. I at once informed my personal friends that I should not occupy any other pulpit, and opened negotiations for other employment. It did not seem to me right, in the circumstances, to agitate the church concerning the vote of the Conference, the Society being in a weak condition owing to a disruption that took place during Mr. Tenney's pastorate. You are yourself well aware that, though I have always been a radical Unitarian, I have hitherto been unable fully to accept your position. You have my warm sympathy and unqualified admiration, but I am just as unable to stand on your platform as I am to submit to the anti-Christian bondage the Unitarian Conference has put on the souls of its members. I now propose quietly and calmly to review my theological position in the light of common work-day life. Next year I may possibly ask the use of your columns to preach a few lay sermons. At present I am far more concerned in the preservation of the results of the war from Democratic treachery, and in the elevation of the working classes, than in the destruction of any ecclesiastical dogma whatever.

Very sincerely yours,

WM. SHARMAN.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

SINGLE COPIES

OF

THE INDEX for 1870

Containing the following

ESSAYS,

Will be mailed from THE INDEX office (post-paid) on receipt of

FIVE CENTS:

	No.
The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion,.....	1
What is Free Religion?.....	3
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Corner-Stones, 4
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Institutions, 7
Terms of Fellowship, Social Ideal, Moral Ideal, and Essential spirit,.....	5
The Practical Work of Free Religion,.....	6
Unitarianism versus Freedom,.....	7
Sunday Schools,.....	8
Friendship,.....	9
The Miracle Question,.....	10
Grief and its Compensations,.....	11
The Hebrew Prophets,.....	12
Capital Punishment,.....	13
Human Ideals,.....	14
The Essence of Religion,.....	15
The Management of Children,.....	16
A Quaker's Letter to a Presbyter, R. S. D.,.....	17
Comparison of Jesus and Socrates. (Report from the N. Y. Tribune),.....	17
The Candle of the Lord,.....	18
Public Opinion,.....	19
Conscience,.....	20
The Pedigree of Man,.....	21
"Following Christ,".....	22
The Tongue,.....	23
The Golden Age,.....	24
What is Truth?.....	25
The Last Battle on the Creed Question,.....	26
Observance of the Sabbath, Rev. W. W. Williams,.....	27
The Sunday Question,.....	28
Motes and Beams,.....	29
The Dove's Departure,.....	30
The Bible in the Public Schools,.....	31
Religious Freedom,.....	32
A Plain Talk to Young Men,.....	33
Noise,.....	34
The Humility of Free Religion,.....	35
Chaos and Cosmos,.....	36
An Oration on Alexander Von Humboldt,.....	37
Relation of Spiritualism to Free Religion,.....	38
War and Free Religion,.....	39
Religious Revivals,.....	40
Mary and Martha,.....	41
The Ministry of Free Religion,.....	42
Success,.....	43
"Repentance" and "Forgiveness,".....	44
Spiritual Beauty,.....	45
The Book of Daniel,.....	46
The Unity of Spiritual Freedom and the Opportunity which America offers for its Development. W. J. Potter,.....	47
The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition,.....	47
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? Chas. Reemelin,.....	47
The Work of Radicalism in Indiana. J. O. Martin,.....	47
Religion in the Light of Reason and Common Sense. Isaac M. Wise,.....	47
Sunday—Its Uses and Abuses. Thomas Vicker,.....	48
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? E. Peckham,.....	49
Parties and Party Spirit,.....	50
The Future of Religious Organization, as Affected by the Spirit of the Age,.....	51
The Incarnation. A Christmas Discourse,.....	52
Transient and Permanent,.....	53

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

Free Religious Association.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, on "The Idea of the Free Religious Association;" DAVID A. WASSON, on "The Nature of Religion;" MRS. E. D. CHENEY, on "Religion as a Social Force;" F. E. ABBOT, on "The Future of Religious Organization as affected by the Spirit of the Age;" S. JOHNSON, on "The Natural Sympathy of Religions;" RABBI WISE, on "The Universal Elements in Judaism;" COL. T. W. HIGGINSON, on "Mohammedanism;" WM. H. CHANNING, on "The Religions of China;" W. J. POTTER, on "The Religions of India;" and an abstract of a discussion on the "Relation of Religion to the Public School System of the United States." This Report is especially representative of the principles of the Association. Price 50 cents. In packages of five or more 30 cents each. Also CHANNING'S Address on "THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA," (a careful and instructive essay, of particular interest at this time to Americans) in a separate pamphlet for 20 cents. The ANNUAL REPORT for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cents respectively), Rev. Samuel Johnson's essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cents), and an essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by Wm. J. Potter (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained by applying to the Secretary. The Report for 1868 contains a letter from the celebrated Hindu Theist, KESHEE GHUNDER SEN, on the "Origin and Aims of the Brahmo Samaj," also an address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, on "Religion and Social Science;" a letter from M. D. CONWAY, on "Religious Movements in England," and speeches by JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHAS. H. MALCOM, JOHN WEISS, and others. The Report for 1869 has addresses by RALPH WALDO EMERSON, D. A. WASSON, JULIA WARD HOWE, C. A. BARTOL, PROF. DENTON, HORACE SEEVER, LUCY STONE, and others.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX
PROSPECTUS FOR 1871.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869, and has just closed its first yearly volume.

We deem it proper, therefore, to submit the following PROSPECTUS of Volume II for 1871, and ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if the matter was properly presented to them, and especially if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor. We cannot afford to send out travelling agents, nor would they succeed so well in getting names as persons of local influence. We therefore have determined to use the funds it would cost to get our paper before the people, in another way, namely, in the purchase of articles of value to be given as premiums to those who make up lists of subscribers; thus presenting to the friends of free thought and pure religion the double motive of doing good and getting paid for it.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two Dollars a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

PREMIUMS.

For Fifty Names, we will give one of PRINCE & Co's four Octave Melodeons (price $65,) or a complete copy of CHAMBERS' Encyclopedia of Universal Knowledge, in ten volumes (price $50).

For Forty Names, we will give a Wilson's Family Sewing Machine, one of the best Machines made.

For Twenty-Five Names, Webster's Royal Quarto Unabridged Pictorial Dictionary (price $12), or one of the following Chromos:

The Three Tom-Boys (Prang's), price..... $15.00
Winter in the Forest, 20x28..... 12.00
Watering the Horses, 21x29..... 12.00

For Ten Names, one of the following Chromos:

WHITTIER'S Barefooted Boy, (Prang's) price..... $5.00
The Unconscious Sleeper, 11x17..... 6.00
Mt. Blanc, 20x26..... 7.50
Or a copy of LECKY'S History of European Morals, 2 vols 6.00
MAX MUELLER'S Chips from a German Work-Shop, 2 vols 5.00
EMERSON'S Prose Works, 2 vols..... 5.00
WEISS'S Life and Correspondence of THEODORE PARKER, 2 volumes..... 6.00

For Five Names, a bound volume of THE INDEX, for 1870. (Price $2.50.) Or a copy of one of the following works, (post paid):

DARWIN'S Origin of Species, price..... $2.00
LUBBOCK'S Origin of Civilization, price..... 2.00
Essays in Criticism, by MATTHEW ARNOLD, price..... 2.00
Tablets, by A. BRONSON ALCOCK, with portrait, price..... 2.00
Any volume of the writings of THEODORE PARKER or HENRY D. THOREAU, each..... 2.00
On the Heights, AUERBACH..... 2.00

For Four Names, a copy of THE INDEX for 1871, or one of the following books (post paid):

EMERSON'S Society and Solitude, price..... $1.75
Nathan the Wise, a dramatic poem translated from LESSING by ELLEN FROTHINGHAM, price..... 1.75
HUXLEY'S Lay Sermons and Addresses..... 1.75
Speeches and Lectures, by WENDELL PHILLIPS..... 1.50
Historic Americans, by THEODORE PARKER, price..... 1.50
A copy of The Revolution..... 2.00
Or The Woman's Journal..... 2.00

CASH PREMIUMS.

For 75 Names,..... 50 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 50 Names,..... 25 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 25 Names,..... 15 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 10 Names,..... 5 Dollars in Greenbacks
For less than 10 Names, a Cash Commission of Twenty per Cent.

Any book in the above list will be sent by us post-paid upon the receipt of price.

N. B.—Names need not all come from one post office. We will send the paper wherever directed, and let the names count as clubs. Specimen Copies sent to all who enclose a three cent postage stamp. Address

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
Lock Box 38, Toledo, Ohio.

Guardian Mutual Life Ins. Co.,
ORGANIZED A. D. 1859.

Office No. 154 Summit Street,
E. F. MUNGER, } General Agents.
CHAS. M. LANG, }

WALTER C. SCOTT, Local Agent, 152 Summit St.
Special Agents—Kelly Bros., 22 Summit Street.
Office Hours—From 7 in the morning till 9 at night.
Medical Examiners—Drs. Samuel S. Thorn and T. J. Eaton Toledo, O. [18v1]

H. M. EDSON, A. TERRY.

EDSON & TERRY,
DENTISTS,
ROOMS 8 & 9 GRADOLPH BLOCK,
TOLEDO, OHIO.
ap16 1y

IMPORTER

Fine Chemicals, Drugs, and Toilet Articles.

Brandies, Wines & Liquors for medicinal purposes only. Also Proprietor of

Toledo Tonic Bitters,

Greatest Remedy known for general debility.

L. E. MULFORD,

23 Summit Street, Corner Perry, Toledo, Ohio
18-1y

THE CELEBRATED
CRAIG
MICROSCOPE

is an optical wonder, reveals thousands of the hidden Wonders of Nature; is of permanent use and practical availability, combining instruction with amusement, and never losing its interest. It magnifies

TEN THOUSAND TIMES,

a power equal to other Microscopes of many times its cost. Reveals countless little worlds all around us, teeming with life, which to the naked eye must forever remain a sealed book—as Eels in Vinegar, Animals in Water, Cheese Mites, Sugar and Itch Insects, Milk Globules, Claws and Hairs of Insects, Hundreds of eyes in a single eye of a Fly, Dust of a Butterfly's Wings to be perfectly formed Feathers, the much talked of Trichina Spiralis, or Pork Worm, which was first discovered in America with this Microscope.

It is of infinite value to professional men, to teachers, and to students, but NOWHERE IS IT OF GREATER VALUE THAN AT THE FAMILY TABLE, within the reach of every member. It will delight yourself, your children, and your friends during the long winter evenings. It will show you adulterations or uncleanness of various kinds in food, as sugar, tea, bread, meat, etc.

It is of Inestimable Value to the Farmer

in examining insects which prey upon his crops. The power of a $50 Microscope, and so simple in its construction that any child can use it understandingly, and with appreciation.

A Beautiful Present—Elegant, Instructive, Amusing, and Cheap. Over 60,000 sold.

During the past six years its worth has been testified to by thousands of Scientific Men, Farmers, School Teachers, Students, Physicians, Heads of Families, and others.

PRICE, $3.00—Sent by Mail Post-paid.

Every instrument is neatly boxed, and handsomely labelled with full directions for use. Thousands have been sent by mail. Address, W. J. LINESS & CO., CHICAGO.

FREE! FREE!

"THE MICROSCOPE," a Monthly Journal of Information for the People—the mysteries of Nature explained—interesting information on the wonders of Creation—stories, sketches, etc. Terms $1.00 per year. This Journal will be sent FREE for one year to any one purchasing a Craig Microscope at the regular price, $3.00. (Craig Microscope will be sent post-paid.) For sample copy, and our beautifully illustrated and descriptive circulars, and eight pages of testimonials of Craig Microscope, send six cents for postage to

W. J. LINESS & CO.,

Opticians, and Sole Proprietors of Craig and Novelty Microscope, CHICAGO, ILL.

AGENTS and DEALERS, this Microscope sells in every family on its merits, when exhibited. LARGE PROFITS. Send for terms. 53t16

SERMONS

By Rev. O. B. Frothingham

Forwarded free on receipt of five cents for each.

What is it to be a Christian?
Taking God's Name in Vain.
The Issue with Superstition.
Infernal and Celestial Love.
The Sin Against the Holy Ghost.
Pilate and Jesus.
The Dying and the Living God.
The Foes of Society.
The Living Spring of Water.
Elective Affinity.
Religious Irrigation.
Experience and Hope.
The Rational Belief.
The Eternal Gospel.

49t3] DAVID G. FRANCIS,
17 Astor Place, New York.

AGENTS WANTED--($225 A MONTH.) BY THE
Machine Co., BOSTON, MASS., or ST. LOUIS, MO. 56-68

THE FIRST VOLUME OF THE RADICAL.

Persons wishing to complete their sets of THE RADICAL by adding the FIRST VOLUME, which has been for some time out of print, can do so by at once sending me their orders. By reprinting this volume in part, I can supply 100 copies. To be able to do this, I am obliged to fix the price at $5.00. This will secure a copy, sent to any address post paid.

Volume 2, 3, 4, and 5, will be sent, post paid, for $3.50 each. Single copies of THE RADICAL 35 cts.

The May number contains Mr. Wasson's review of Mr. Abbot's Religion.

The June number contains Mr. Frothingham's article on "What is Religion for?"

Address S. H. MORSE, office of "The Radical," Boston, Mass.

WANTED--AGENTS. ($30 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the "under-feed," makes the "lock-stitch" (alike on both sides, and is fully licensed). The best and cheapest Family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Boston, Mass., Pittsburgh, Pa., Chicago, Ill., or St. Louis, Mo. 38y1

Ministers and Singers will find these particularly Adapted to the Voice. They contain no Cubebs, are very palatable, and act like a charm. Superior to all others for

Colds, Sore Throat, Bronchial and all Lung Difficulties.

RUSHTON'S (F. V.) COD LIVER OIL, for Consumption and Scrofula; the first introduced; fresh and pure. Sold by Druggists generally. 48m3.

Mr. Frothingham's New Book.

CHILD'S BOOK OF RELIGION, for Sunday Schools and Homes. PART I., Worship; PART II., The Good Life; PART III., Truth. In one Volume. New and revised edition. Forwarded free on receipt of $1.40.

55-68 DAVID G. FRANCIS,
17 Astor Place, New York.

Agents Wanted For

THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD. Containing Fleetwood's "Life of Christ," "Lives of the Apostles, Evangelists and Martyrs;" "Dodridge's "Evidences of Christianity;" "History of the Jews," by Josephus; "A History of all Religious Denominations," with treatises and tables relating to events connected with Bible History, containing many fine Engravings. The whole forming a complete Treasury of Christian Knowledge. W. FLINT & CO., No. 26 S. 7th St., Phila., 5 Custom House Place, Chicago, and 176 W. 4th St., Cincinnati. [48m3.

THE INDEX,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION

Published by the

Index Association, at TOLEDO OHIO.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Editor.

Terms, Two Dollars a Year.

Advertisements taken for THE INDEX by all responsible Advertising Agents. Address,

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
Lock Box 38, Toledo, Ohio.

AGENTS:—

TOLEDO, O., HENRY S. STEBBINS, 115 Summit St.
TOLEDO, O., JULIUS T. FREY, 47 Summit St.
NEW YORK, N. Y., DION THOMAS, 142 Nassau St.
BOSTON, MASS., CROSBY & DARRILL, 100 Washington St.
CINCINNATI, O., HAWLEY'S NEWS DEPOT, 164 Vine St.
ST. LOUIS, MO., WARREN CHASE, 601 North Fifth St.
DETROIT, MICH., WM. E. TUNIS, 16 Woodward Av.
SYRACUSE, N. Y., LEWIS & WHELAN, 7 Granger Block.

The Index.

VOL. 2.—No. 7.

TOLEDO, OHIO, FEBRUARY 18, 1871.

WHOLE No. 60.

The Index,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, OHIO.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCEER, Editorial Contributors.

FEAR, KNOWLEDGE, LOVE, IN THE DEVELOPMENT OF RELIGION.

[A Discourse by William J. Potter.]

For God hath not given us the spirit of fear; but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind.

II. TIMOTHY, 1:7.

The progress of mankind in religion has always been from a spirit of fear to a spirit of confidence and love. Note the difference between the Old Testament and the New. In the former the predominating sentiment with reference to God is that of awe, reverence, dread, fear. In the latter, the predominating sentiment is trust, gratitude, assurance, love. And in the progress of Hebrew history, as indicated in the Old Testament writings alone, the records of many centuries, the same advance may be observed. There was a gradual elevation of the religious sentiment from awe to tenderness; from the oppressive consciousness of Deity as an Almighty Sovereign to the belief in Him as a paternal Benefactor. The first mention that is made of the feeling of the traditional parents of the Hebrew race toward Jehovah, is that they were afraid of Him, and shrank away from His presence. And a fixed tradition, which well represents the ancient popular Hebrew feeling of the relation of the human race to its Creator, was that no man could look upon the face of Jehovah and live. That privilege, if accorded at all, was accorded only to Moses and a few great prophets, who were excepted from the evil result of it by supernatural power. But centuries later we read of the "loving-kindness" of the Lord, and of his "tender mercies," which are over "all his works." He becomes the friend of the poor, the oppressed, the fatherless, the weak. Even the transgressor may look to him with confidence for pity and forgiveness. Let him turn to God from the error of his ways, and he is assured that he will find One who will abundantly pardon. All this is in the Old Testament. And it indicates, as I have said, a progress in the Hebrew people from the sentiment of fear toward God to the sentiment of confidence. Nevertheless the prevailing expression of the Old Testament with regard to the character of Deity, though He is always conceived of as a human individual, represents his sovereignty, his majesty, his awfulness. The people are taught to tremble before Him; He must be approached from a distance; He is terrible in power; and He ruleth the earth and its inhabitants after His own pleasure. He is to be appeased, therefore, as a human sovereign; His anger is to be bought off, and His retributions escaped from by contracts for service and outward offerings of homage. It is not till we come to the New Testament that we find the idea of God's tenderness so advanced as to outweigh the old Hebrew awe and fear, and God represented as father more than as sovereign.

Yet we should not be true to the facts of the case, if we were to suppose that Christianity put aside at once and forever the old Hebrew conception of God. We may say that the prevailing sentiment of Christianity as we find it in the New Testament, is that God is a being to be loved,—that he is more Father than King. But even in the New Testament there are strong appeals to the sentiment of fear. It is the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews in the New Testament who says—"it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God." It is the book of Revelation that gives us the Scriptural picture of the burning lake of brimstone as the punishment of the damned. And it is Jesus himself who is reported as warning the people at times against the torments of hell, "where the worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched." And if we follow Christianity into its after-history, we shall find that hardly has another religion existed which has rested its appeals more emphatically on the sentiment of fear in one of its phases,—the fear, namely, of God as a final judge and avenger of sin. Historical Christianity, with no small foundation in the New Testament itself, has rested its central dogma upon the wrath of Deity. What an important part has that horrible doctrine of eternal punishment played in the history of the Christian church! What ghastly terrors have been conjured up by it! How anything but lovable has seemed the face of God in the light reflected from this endless fire of torment! What hideous blasphemies have grown out of the doctrine! How has the church seemed only an after expedient—a sort of second ark—for escaping this consuming vengeance of the Almighty! And how many people, shocked in heart and offended in reason, have been driven away from religion by these terrific spectres of belief that have appeared in its name!

Still, fearful as is this doctrine and the belief in it, this much is to be said of it, when used as indicating the popular conception of the character of God: it was an attempt to show that God's retributive anger falls only upon the sinner, and that He is to be feared therefore only because of sin; whereas in the earlier Hebrew times hardly was this distinction made, but God was represented in His general character as a Being to be feared and propitiated. Calvinism, therefore, with all its horrors of doctrine concerning God, shows some slight advance upon the conception of Him entertained by the rude nomadic tribes that first composed the Hebrew nation. It has at least attempted, in the character of its second person in the Godhead, to atone for the vindictive, unlovable nature attributed to the first; though it may be questioned whether it has succeeded in making the lights of the picture, proceeding from the mercy of the Son, counterbalance the horror of the shadows in which it has depicted the stern, unyielding features of the Father's face. But in later times the progress of Christianity from fear to love is shown in the evident reluctance to make this doctrine of endless misery, with all its ancient ingenuities of torture, prominent, even among those who still logically accept it; while thousands and hundreds of thousands of people who once accepted it have freed themselves from it, and advanced to more rational, consistent, and lovable views of the divine nature.

And the same kind of progress has been shown in all other religions where there has been any historical development, as well as in Judaism and Christianity,—an advance from the spirit of fear to the spirit of love. The first rude beginnings of religion among every people seem to have been in the awakening of the sentiment of fear toward some being or beings supposed to be almighty. The first acts of worship are sacrifices to appease the anger or obtain the favor of these beings. The first feelings of worship are wonder, awe, dread, a sense of mystery. The first thought about Deity is not of his goodness, but his power.

And this historic fact, that the religions have originated in the sentiment of fear, is a perfectly natural and easily explainable fact. Man comes into this world, which has been gradually shaped for his uses and needs, as inexperienced as a child,—his intelligence at first barely separated from the maternal, natural forces from which his being has been evolved. He finds himself in the midst of the wondrous phenomena of Nature. Mighty powers are at work all about him. Strange changes are constantly going on. The scenes are daily and monthly shifting. New exhibitions of power are constantly being made. The movements of the heavenly bodies, the ebb and flow of the sea, the succession of day and night, the forces of the winds, the progress of the season bringing various phases of verdure and fruitfulness, the conflicts of the elements in storms and tempests, the hurricane, the flooded river, the snow and rain and ice, heat and cold—to all these his external senses are opened. And there are agencies also which seem direful only. The fruits are cut off, and famine, disease, and pestilence, with violence and destruction in their train, appear. Amidst these scenes and agencies, man begins his existence on the earth,—with some dawning of mental and moral consciousness within him; with desires that are something more than the instincts of the brute; with some faint perceptions of order and beauty and right; with very decided dispositions to acquire and possess; and with a wondering wish to know what all this means, and to do and provide somehow for himself; but all these faculties, though in time to become so mighty, are at first as weak and futile as a child's vain first efforts at walking or the reachings out of its feeble arms after things that are utterly beyond its grasp. He soon finds his desires thwarted, his expectations disappointed, his will put to nought. The scenes shift, the mighty forces play around him, the mysterious agencies not only of life, but of death, keep at their work; and he stands there, wondering and helpless, the seeming puppet or victim of it all. His strongest sensation is that of bewildering ignorance and helplessness: and his first emotion, therefore, toward this strange power which somehow holds the destiny of his life in its control is that of awe and fear. He trembles before it. He knows not what it may do next. He must propitiate its favor. Does it want the lives of kids and oxen, that it sends the plague to cut them off? He hastens to offer in sacrifice the best of the herds and flocks, that the rest may be spared. Does it want the blood of human beings, that it attacks them with famine and disease? Give, then, the first-born of the family, that the rest may be saved. Give also of the fruits of the soil,—perhaps a thank-offering will appease his anger and avert the famine and disease. And so comes out of this emotion of fear the whole machinery of the first rude worship; and from that emotion religion starts on its career.

But it is evident that fear will cease as a controlling motive in religion just so fast and so far as the conditions of existence which called it forth shall cease to be operative. It sprang from man's sense of his ignorance and helplessness, when he first found himself face to face with the mighty powers and mysteries of Nature. But just so fast and so far as knowledge has taken the place of ignorance, and, instead of utter helplessness amid the forces of Nature, man has learned to control and use them, to just that extent has fear as a religious motive subsided, while true reverence, and admiration, and manly confidence and reliance have come in its place. As man has developed his capacities, as he has learned to use his reason and apply his inventive powers, to just that extent has he found his existence to be in harmony with the wondrous mighty agencies in the material universe around him, and discovered that Nature is not his enemy, but his best friend. The more perfectly he unfolds his own being, and brings to exercise his various gifts and faculties according to their normal design—that is, the higher he rises in the scale of intelligence and power as a true human being—the more completely does he come into sympathy with Nature's laws to find her ends his own. Fear must vanish before the growing sense of power and reason.

Man learns, for instance, that he is not so helpless amidst these forces of Nature as at first he seemed to himself to be. He discovers that he can bar out the cold; that he can shade himself from the heat; that he can build a wall against the overflowing river; that he can make the winds his steeds; that he can control the fearful agency of fire to do him service; that he can bridge the ocean with his ships, and draw the farthest continents to his neighborhood; that he can convert barren land to fertility, and drain the soil of pestilence and disease. He learns the use of the metals, the art of medicine, invents writing and printing, discovers steam, electricity, magnetism, and applies them to their multifarious uses. So far from being the weak, helpless puppet of these mighty forces and elements of Nature, man learns to wield them for his own benefit and pleasure. He becomes their master. Instead of being their victim, he makes them his servants. He gets power, and fear departs before it.

In like manner he learns through the exercise of his reason the laws which permeate these natural agencies and operations, and finds them to be the evidences, not of a cruel, arbitrary, and capricious will, but the embodiment of intelligence and beneficent design, which he can turn to his own service and with which he can himself co-operate. He learns that one and the same force holds his feet to the earth and the heavenly bodies in their places, and makes the ebb and flow of the tides. The stars become his time-piece for the years, and the finger-posts for his ships across the seas. He fathoms the law of the angle and the curve, and finds the secret for suspending his bridge in the air and carrying his road over the mountain or through its solid sides. He discovers the laws of health, of food, of social economy; and so comes to understand either how to prevent or to cure many diseases and miseries. And though there are still natural evils for which his intelligence has not yet found the remedy, he nevertheless feels that these also must be held within the bounds of divine laws of wise and good intent.

But he learns other laws than these of the material world. He discovers the laws of equity and brotherhood which must serve as the basis of States; the integrity that must underlie trade; the mutual good will and sympathy on which society must rest. And he sees in the method of his own mind, in the orderly working of his own intelligence, in the steady, instinctive pressure of his own consciousness to realize truth in perception and righteousness in conduct,—in all this he sees something akin to the method and intention apparent in the outward universe,—revealing the pregnant fact that the spark of intelligence which animates his being, is one with the light of the Infinite Intelligence which fills and moves the universe. The more, therefore, man truly knows, or the more accurately the Infinite Intelligence is reflected in his finite consciousness, the greater must be the harmony between him and God, and the less his apprehension of present or future harm from Nature's laws. Religious fear vanishes before the sound, well-filled mind.

And as fear in religion was begotten of man's ignorance and helplessness, so this knowledge and power which man is attaining, and which dispel fear, are to produce a religion of trust, of confidence, of hope, of enthusiastic devotion, and love. If man has knelt and worshipped in blind faith when he did not know, but only dimly felt, the great powers above him, shall he not worship all the more when he sees the Power in all the majesty and beneficence of its mighty action, and consciously grasps it in his thought? The form of his worship may change, but its substance shall surely survive. So far from knowledge doing away with religion, it is to be religion's hand-maiden. To say that science is hostile to religion is to confess our religion a superstition. And I look to see the religion of the future, disconnected utterly from the sentiment of fear, and rejecting every shred of the theory that it is necessary for man's safety that he should make terms with God by some offering of expiation, or that God should guide him by some miraculous message from the heavens, resting securely and serenely on the basis of man's natural capacity to know and to serve the divine intention, as it is made clear in the natural laws of matter and of mind.

And then man will find his salvation not as a possession into which he is to come by a purchase from Deity, the price of which has been paid by some bargain in the past, but as the mental and moral health which will come to him daily by the faithful keeping of the divine laws. He will not live as a pensioner upon God's bounty, but as a member of God's household. No longer a suppliant at the throne of awful Sovereignty, but a child resting trustfully in his father's arms and feeling perfectly secure in that strong embrace, he will freely take whatsoever of blessedness he has capacity for, and drink in the great Life that flows for all. And though the arms may sometimes seem to relax their hold, as some natural desire may be disappointed or childish will or wish be thwarted, the filial confidence shall not be lost, but shall return to find that the desire was checked, the will denied, not because the arms were weak or without love, but because they were strong and wise as well as tender, holding not only the good of one little being, but of all beings and all things, in their wide embrace.

From a confidence like this it is that that perfect love shall be born which casteth out all fear. For what is it really to love God? Is it merely to show gratitude for his care? to return sentiment for outward favors? to render filial homage for his fatherhood? to cling to him with desperation as one who is to save us from some dreadful calamity? Nay, but something vastly more than these. It is to attach ourselves to him for what he is in himself. It is to love the truth, the purity, the integrity, the holiness, the benevolence, which God is. It is to seek with pure and enthusiastic devotion to know and to do the perfect will, and to love the perfect life. There is a higher phase of love than that which manifests itself as sentiment. Love must show itself as an actual attraction in the character towards the objects that are desired. The love of God in its highest form, therefore, must be an actual impulse and movement in the human soul toward God-like qualities of life and being. Aspiration and desire must issue in actual possession. When this perfect love shall be begotten within us, we shall be one with God,—He in us, and we in Him,—seeking the same aims, living for the same objects,—sacrificing all merely selfish desires and ends that the high ends of truth and virtue and all moral order and beauty may be secured. This will be to "love Him with all the heart, and with all the understanding, and with all the soul, and with all the strength, and one's neighbor as one's self; which is more than all burnt offerings and sacrifices."

Fontenelle lived to be nearly one hundred years old. A lady of nearly equal age, said to him one day in a large company,—"Monsieur, you and I stay here so long, I have a notion Death has forgotten us?" "Speak as softly as you can, Madam," Fontenelle replied, "lest you should remind him of us."

Miscellaneous.

THE BOSTON RADICAL CLUB.

JANUARY MEETING—ESSENTIAL TRUTHS OF CHRISTIANITY—ADVANTAGES AND DISADVANTAGES OF BEING CALLED A CHRISTIAN—REMARKS OF DR. BARTOL, COL. T. W. HIGGINSON, GEN. ARMSTRONG, AND OTHERS—A FEW HAPPY THOUGHTS AND SOME SPICY DEBATE.

[From the New York World.]

Boston, Jan. 17, 1870.

The January meeting of the Radical Club was held on Monday. Compared with the previous meetings this season it was a decidedly brilliant affair, not so much on account of those who were present as for the vigor and point of the talk which followed the reading of the essay on "Essential Christianity" by Miss Mary Grew, of Philadelphia—the same essay read in Horticultural Hall on Sunday, and reported in The World next morning. The meeting was held at the house of Rev. Dr. Bartol, who divides the honors of Chestnut street radicalism with his neighbor, the Rev. John T. Sargent. It was a stormy day, and fewer persons than usual presented the elegant cards of invitation which secure admission to the club, but enough were there to make a cozy parlor full of listeners, and I presume that mild-voiced lady, Miss Grew, had quite as large an audience as she cared to address, under the circumstances. On the left of the reader sat the white-haired host, her most sympathetic listener, and around them was a bevy of ladies and a few gentlemen, among whom were Col. Higginson, Gen. Armstrong, who went into the army as a private and came out as a major-general, and others.

The essay, it will be remembered, was a mildly-worded plea in behalf of the humane side of Christianity as distinguished from the theological side, and was intended as a gentle protest against the objections made to the Christian name by some upright men who are not orthodox. It presented the Unitarian view of the New Testament teachings very well, indulging very little in argument and not much in illustrations. Without provoking sharp criticism by its statements, it served to draw out the different views of different thinkers in a really felicitous discussion. The lead was taken by Dr. Bartol, who said that there was great need of exploration in the direction taken by the essayist, in order to ascertain how far we can agree in regard to what Jesus was or is, what he meant to teach and be, for the loudest declaration of loyalty to him and the most stringent teaching in his name may be the farthest possible from him. I think none are so far from him in the understanding of the matter as those who wish to fondle and idolize and dote upon him. The Bible has been a sort of Chinese puzzle with every sect—so many scores or hundreds of pieces, all to be brought together, to make a picture, to make the map, the chart of heaven, to make the beautiful Mosaic, and the reason, I suppose, that the puzzle has never been solved is that the pieces won't all fit; they cannot be brought together. I have no doubt that sublime soul held all nature in solution, that he had such visions of God, truth, duty, humanity, as no man ever had before; he no doubt intended to teach the fellowship, the love of man, the brotherhood of man, but no such church as has ever been made did he intend for a finality. The cardinal facts he has taught will come to any mind in proportion to its intuitions and to its fidelity to its intuitions. It has always been assumed that Jesus looked down with a look of pity upon the wicked and the erring, but it is more important for all, in order to get at his method, to notice his upward look. He had an ideal, is it too bold to say an ideal that he never reached? I don't think that Jesus came to make Christians, but to make men, certainly not to make Christians in our ordinary ecclesiastical sense, but I think it may be truly said that in the highest sense Christ himself was not a Christian. I think it is no eulogy of him to say that he is the highest embodiment and incarnation of the truth and excellence that visited his own mind. It is a denial to him of immortality to say that. I think we get the most through him when we see him always and ever beginning to ascend, and feel that even now he is growing on towards that infinite beauty of an ideal truth and excellence, and that his benefit to us is to direct our eyes in the same way, to look to our own ideal, to the one ideal of truth, beauty, and excellence that is for all men.

Col. Higginson said, when Dr. Bartol finished, that his remarks were so fine that they prostrated and submerged criticism, and that after such an improvisation, discussion seemed hardly allowable. Yet the literary knight, who is the life of the club, carrying more brains in his big, round forehead than dozens of men who think themselves his peers, had a good deal to say. And his first remark was that while admiring the sweetness of tone in the essay and the spiritual appreciation which it implied, if looked at from one point of view, he should regret that Miss Grew had not been led by her personal experience to select as her representative disavowal of the Christian name some stronger type than the man who objected simply because of the attitude of its numerous defenders. He thought she put herself in the position of the religious lectures in the course got up last winter in opposition to the Horticultural Hall course, who never seemed quite to confront anybody in particular with their arguments. He would select as the leading type of those who disavow the Christian name such a man as Mr. Abbot, who would meet her on the basis of what Christ said and did, or the still more formidable men like Huxley and Tyndall, who question the religious faculty itself. As I understand the point that Mr. Abbot makes, it does not turn at all upon what the church has been. He wishes to go back to the record and base his positions there. Are you to go to the record of his life and pick out all the lovely things, and say that is Jesus, and leave out all the rest, or are you to read history severely and say, as Mr. Abbot would say, I find there not merely a young Jewish reformer, but I find also a man who had strong, clear, unquestioned views as to his own origin and destiny, who believed that he was anointed as none other was, and believed that he taught as nobody else did, and that all others were thieves and robbers; in short, a man who expected to come in his own generation to judge the dead, and therefore expected to see a new heavens and earth, and so far was in error. In that position there is a great deal of strength. I have thought as he does in regard to the position of Jesus for twenty years. I don't see how any person can look into it and say that Jesus did not teach a second advent, and that it was a portion of his mission to reappear again on earth. That being the case, it is of course impossible to leave it out of account in saying what is or is not Christianity. How far it is wise to raise this point that Mr. Abbot makes is another question. I think there is a great deal to be said on that side of the question; whether it would not be better to do as Mr. Emerson has done all through life, to drop it all and not call himself a Christian, but simply a Protestant, sending forth his teaching, and letting the world put on the label. Since Mr. Abbot has taken his position, there is something to be said in favor of that. It is worth while to use up a man once in a while to attract attention to a certain point, and that Mr. Abbot has effectually done. I have always thought that the word Christian is like the word reverend, which a man would not wish to claim for himself, but does not wish to spend his life in disavowing. The value of the Christian name is to be found in its associations. It keeps you "in" with the society in which you were born. Christianity has come to be a secular word as well as a religious word. Theodore Parker, who was not deficient in courage, always called himself a Christian. On the other hand there is the difficulty that just so long as you call yourself a Christian, you are constantly called upon to explain and define your position, and tell what right you have to accept certain doctrines of Jesus, and reject certain other doctrines. You keep yourself in constant perplexity, and expose yourself to the danger of great perversions. The great danger of every young clergyman is the constant temptation to let it be understood that he believes something that he does not really believe. In this connection Col. Higginson told how Theodore Parker once confronted Dr. Dewey, who was then at the head of the Unitarian denomination, with the inquiry whether he believed in the miraculous birth of Jesus, and the latter, instead of making a direct answer, or throwing himself upon his dignity and refusing to be so catechized, turned red in the face, and excused himself from answering on the ground that his infirm health gave him no chance to study up the matter. It was an ignominious situation for the doctor.

The Rev. Francis Tiffany, of Newton, a Unitarian minister of a good deal of wit, said the work of distinguishing between the followers of a man and the man himself could never be avoided, because no amount of explicit statement and no amount of clear action can ever prevent a man from becoming one of the greatest oppressors of human thought, from the fact that his works fall into the hands of narrow men. Calvin, or Luther, or Theodore Parker, never claimed to be infallible, but he had seen followers of each of those men who had the spirit within them to burn another who differed from anything that one of those men had said. It seemed to him to be a waste of time to define words when they admitted of such a latitude of interpretation. It was very evident that the word Christian stood in the mind of Miss Grew for a line of beauty in life and character, and he did not believe that it could be overthrown by any man's protest.

Mr. R. P. Hallowell said that it seemed to him that the great objection to giving up the word Christian was the bias of education that all had received. He did not believe that there were two people in the room who had not, at some time or other, regarded Jesus or the Christ as supreme authority in religious matters, and that very fact was his objection to the term. He objected to taking his name even if we grant that his ethics are worthy of acceptance, because it seemed to him to be a species of idolatry. The Unitarian Church made a demagogue of him. It was a struggle for him (Mr. Hallowell) to throw off the authority of Jesus, and therefore he valued Mr. Abbot's protest.

Gen. Armstrong was next called upon, and made a vigorous, combative speech. He thought the strong men who represented orthodoxy were to be found not among the clergy, but among the men and women who were doing the practical work of spreading Christianity. He told how his father was a missionary on the Sandwich Islands, and of the heroic Christian effort which he had seen displayed there. To displace Christianity they must produce some system which could generate not only logic, but enthusiasm. The gallant General waxed quite eloquent over his missionaries and other Christian laborers. He liked nothing better, he said, than being enrolled under a leader. He thought that Christ was Catholic and not Protestant, and that he represents all that is good in Protestantism, and Roman Catholicism, and Mormonism, and Radicalism, and that no one had any right to attempt to fasten upon him the name of a class.

Mrs. Ednah D. Cheney, who is reputed the coolest-headed woman in Boston, had just been talking with some Japanese students, and reminded the General that in the eastern countries there were several religious systems which generated quite as much earnestness and enthusiasm among their followers as did the religion of Christ. She also told how she had nonplussed Gen. Howard when he claimed that none but a member of a Christian Church could be a faithful teacher to the freedmen in the South, by instancing teachers who were among the best and most efficient and yet refused to accept the name Christian.

Col. Higginson recalled an amusing army experience in connection with Gen. Armstrong's remarks. He fully appreciated his admiration for the noble work done by the missionaries, but called his attention to the fact that one had only to look a little wider to see the same enthusiasms, and that other religions have been equally effective. He fully recognized the value of having a leader, especially to the young, but after all there was an unspeakable value to the strength which came when a man could see his leaders, one by one, take their positions in the ranks of humanity, and still can see the personal relations that have grown between himself and them. One of the great forming sentences of his life was that saying of Emerson, that once leave direct acquaintance with God and take secondary knowledge, as through St. Paul's mediation, or George Fox's, or Swedenborg's, and we begin to grow weak. He thought the vital worth of such a book as Plutarch's "Lives," or his "Morals," or the works of Epictetus, is, that while there is a certain charm in Christian works that you do not feel in those, there is in them a magnificent directness—there is a feeling that here was a man who depended directly on God. You can wipe out all the religion of Jesus Christ, and all the Renans and Strausses, and it does not affect these men, and he thought that that was a great value. While he knew a great many people who had been strengthened and encouraged by Jesus, he saw not less the weakness in some persons which comes from the habit of acting indirectly, the habit of acting outside of the inspiration of their own souls.

Mr. Hallowell thought it was singular that, while Jesus's teachings were opposed to war, yet when the country became involved in war we find all the Christians not only going themselves, but urging everybody else to go.

Miss Grew said she had referred to Mr. Abbot, who draws his definition of Christianity from the men who assume to interpret Christ, against whom she appealed to Christ's own words.

Mr. Tiffany inquired whether Gen. Armstrong's idea of Christianity would allow him to fellowship a man who showed by his life that he loved Christianity, and yet believed Christ was a man.

The General replied that he believed that faith in Christ was a power that had made the world better more than any other power in it. Still, he believed that a man could have the essential light of Christ without the extreme doctrines of orthodoxy. He thought denominations in the church were proper, right, and essential to its progress.

Mr. Tiffany made other interesting comments on some of the ideas advanced, and a Mr. Newell, near the last, said that he did not think that talking about religious subjects had any religion about it—the more of such discussion the less religion. This led Col. Higginson to refer to the New Hampshire preacher, who was praised by his hearers because he did not touch upon religion or politics, or any of those troublesome topics. Mr. Newell furthermore remarked that he thought the world needed silence on religious subjects as much as anything. Mr. Tiffany finally put a damper on the man by asking him,—"Then, why did you break it?"

Once in a while some question concerning the organization and conduct of the club comes up for the consideration of the managers, and for the time being the material coherence of the club rather than the mental coherence of its members is the object of contemplation. A recent question of serious consequence has been, not exactly whether 'twere best to be or not be a Radical Club, but whether, being a Radical Club it were best to be reported—whether 'twere well to continue to shine in the far-spread columns of The World, and other less widely-circulated newspapers, with such reflection as fallible and unregenerate correspondents could afford, or whether it were well to hide the rays of the Radical candle after each monthly snuffing beneath the bushel of Chestnut street. It has been finally decided to let the world at large continue to know what is said in the club, and all the reports are to be clipped and garnered in a book, in order that the aroma of the meetings may not be wholly dissipated in the parlors where they occur.

CHAT.

[By Mrs. Louise Chandler Moulton, in the N. Y. Independent.]

The Radical Club, the story of which has already been told at some length in your columns, is but an assemblage of thoughtful men and women, in a large and pleasant drawing room, to hear a lecture, and talk about it afterward. By the way, there has been a good deal of misconception about this same Radical Club. It has been taken for granted, by some who have never walked into the parlor of this fascinating Radical spider—who spins such a lovely, glittering web all the most brilliant flies are willingly caught therein—that Radical means infidel, and the Club are altogether a set of iconoclasts. They would be surprised, should they chance to drop in on a field-day, to discover in the Chestnut-street drawing-rooms a greater variety than can usually be found in any company of the size. One looks not in vain, of course, for the Free Religionists, so styled—for John Weiss, and Col. Higginson, and Francis Abbot and David A. Wasson, and the rest of the Twelve Apostles of Heresy. But one sees, besides conservative Unitarians such as Rev. James Freeman Clarke, or Rev. Dr. Hedge, an orthodox minister now and then, a noted lecturer, a stray member of Congress; any one, in short, who cares to see or hear some new thing, for the Radical Club is part of the century's advance guard.

Neither are discussions there by any means confined to religion, free or conservative. Social questions come up often, and political puzzles and art hints. John Weiss has talked there about music, in that strange, vibrant voice of his, which always makes one think of a wind-harp breathed through by the fitful breath of the "inspired and inspiring soul." Col. Higginson, Greek in his instincts, as in his culture, has lifted the misty veil woven by the centuries before the goddesses of Greece. A. Bronson Alcott has unfolded the laws of conversation; and Rev. Francis Tiffany has spoken of education with earnestness and practical wisdom anything but vague or transcendental. And, indeed, a list of the illustrious too numerous to mention have there given us of their best. [Mrs. Moulton.]

The already-mentioned Twelve Apostles of Heresy, who spoke last winter at Horticultural Hall, were, it must be confessed, among those whom the Club delights to honor. But, if bold, they were certainly brilliant; if wicked, witty; and the Club extends its hospitalities to all shades of belief, from the High Churchman to the Buddhist. Last year's Horticultural Hall Course was a success; and a similar one is announced to commence this winter in January. This time there are to be only ten apostles, and the list of names has been somewhat changed. [Independent.]

The Commonwealth, a very religious journal, though not of the Christian pattern, but quite the other way, says:—"A club of thirty has been formed at the Harvard Divinity School to take course tickets for the Horticultural Hall Sunday afternoon lectures. The Harvard draws from the Hub instruction as well as money. 'Hence lesser lights repair.'"

Some may be curious to know what these lectures are upon, and for which thirty of the Massachusetts divinity students (for Massachusetts supports this school) organize clubs to attend on Sabbath afternoons. So we give the subjects, although the advertisement is not paid for, and not even complimentary tickets have been sent us. See the food on which our Harvard clerical Caesars feed:—O. B. Frothingham, "The Beliefs of the Unbelievers;" Mary Grew, "Essential Christianity;" John Weiss, "The American Opportunity;" T. W. Higginson, "The Religion of the Heart;" F. E. Abbot, "Intuitionism versus Science, or the Civil War in Free Religion;" W. J. Potter, "The Doctrine of Immortality in the Light of Science;" D. A. Wasson, "The Complaint of Labor;" Samuel Johnson, "Theodore Parker and the Religious Movement of our Time;" John Fiske, "Auguste Comte and the Positive Polity;" Ralph Waldo Emerson, to be announced.

Prof. Fiske, of the Harvard University, is a materialist and atheist, and will undoubtedly favor Comte; Mr. Emerson, an idealist and pantheist, and the rest free religionists of the worst type. Not one will speak of Christ with reverence, hardly one with respect. Though pretending to be catholic, they dare not admit one Christian to their list. Yet half and over of Harvard's Unitarian ministerial proteges are to attend the course. And yet some fancy this school should be supported; other some, that its patrons who frown on no such conduct should be fraternized with as Christian ministers. "By their fruits ye shall know them." Suum cuique; they seek their own.—Zion's Herald.

James Fisk, Jr., was sitting in his luxurious private office at the Opera House, when an ill-favored man entered, and asked for a pass to the West.

"Who are you, and what is your business?" "My name is McFarland—Daniel McFarland. I am a lawyer by profession. You have heard of me, of course. I have a national reputation now."

"Yes you have. I know you now, and the whole country knows you too, as a scoundrel who deserves hanging. A lawyer by profession and a murderer by practice. Your impudence is boundless. I've heard all sorts of pretexts for begging passes; but never knew a man to ask for a pass before, because he was a damned assassin. The Erie road may not run Sunday schools, but it doesn't chalk men's hats because they murder men in cold blood."

At this point McFarland moved to the door. "Stop," said Fisk, "I'll give you a pass out of New York, if you'll agree never to come back; we have villains enough here now without you. When I build a road to hell, come and see me, and you shall have the first ride."

Before the words were out of Fisk's mouth the murderer had slunk away.

An artist showing his pictures to a customer received the following sharp retort:—"Well, I don't think much of this," said the customer, holding up the picture before him. "Don't think much of it! Why, that's a very rare print—a very rare print, indeed, sir!" "Rare! I've no doubt it is rare—it certainly is not well done!"

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"Since attaining my majority, I have not done anything in aid of evangelical missions; but the cause of truth and natural religion should inspire a missionary zeal in every lover of our race. How I wish every family in our country could have read and carefully weighed the contents of your paper for the last year! I am sure it would have done more towards giving a just sense of our duties and responsibilities than any amount of 'Christian' worship. I will only add that we think your paper a gem—truth and goodness crystallized. Hoping that, as heretofore, it may contain in abundance 'the bread of life' and the 'milk of human kindness,' let me assure you that I will exert myself to place it before those of my acquaintance who are hungering and thirsting for natural, honest, healthy, and invigorating food and drink."

"It has grown to be so much of a necessity with me as a religious teacher, that I should hardly know how to get along without its weekly visits. I regret that I cannot send a goodly list of subscribers from this town, where orthodoxy prevails to an alarming extent, with little or no influence to disturb its pool of black and poisonous waters. Its redemption from such teachings is possible, notwithstanding the impenetrable cloud of a terrible theology, hanging over the people and paralyzing their religious growth."

"If it teaches heresy, then I am a heretic; if infidelity, then I am an infidel. I hear people talk of the men of God, the home of God, the book of God, and the day of God; I suppose God may be the author of all that is. Please send me THE INDEX of God another year. The Cardiff Giant is being exhibited here. If it is a petrified human body, it is the first I have seen. There are petrified souls enough here, but they are not gigantic. They were petrified young, in order to 'save' them."

"Mr. Abbot, let me thank you for the great good you are doing to me and a multitude of others. Your labors are a continual blessing to me, and from my heart I thank God that He gives you courage and strength for such a work, so thankless and unappreciated as it is by the world in general."

"I shall try and get you more subscribers, as I think your paper should have a wider circulation. Faith in ideas is the God we are seeking to find and know. We feel in our affections, we know by our intellect and reason; and God, so far as he is to be apprehended, is the highest ideal our faculties are capable of receiving."

"I duly received THE INDEX of the 3rd inst., but have not had that of the 10th. I am very impatient about it, as your views with regard to religion appear to be healthy, and I am anxious to profit by the enlightened and unfettered ideas in your columns."

"I wish well to thy effort to diffuse light, and disenthral the minds of the people from the bonds of educational prejudices and superstition with which they are so thoroughly bound."

"I am handing THE INDEX to my friends as fast as I read them as the most successful way to give circulation and get subscribers. Your friend for liberal progress and the wiping out of old traditions."

"Please send two numbers of THE INDEX. I may be able to get you a few subscribers. I am an Atheist of long standing, and take much interest in the march of progress."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—Regular meetings of this Society will be held during the winter on Sunday forenoons, at 10½ o'clock, in Daniels' Block, corner of Jefferson and Summit Streets, in the hall over the U. S. Express Office. The public are cordially invited.

FREE EVENING SCHOOLS.—The school for men and boys is held Monday, Wednesday and Friday Evenings, from 7 to 9, in the hall over the U. S. Express Office, Daniels' Block. The schools for women and girls are held at the same time in Scott's Block, Cherry Street, and in Campbell's Block, St. Clair Street.

RECEIVED.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON ORGANIZATION, presented to the Trustees of the Cornell University. October 21st, 1866. Albany: C. VAN BENTHUYSEN & Sons' Printing House, 1867. pp. 48.

THE CORNELL UNIVERSITY. First General Announcement. pp. 19.

THE CORNELL UNIVERSITY. Second General Announcement. Second Edition, with Additions. Albany: WEED, PARSONS & Co., Printers. 1868. pp. 27.

THE CORNELL UNIVERSITY. Account of the Proceedings at the Inauguration, Oct. 7th, 1868. Ithaca: at the University Press. 1869. pp. 39.

Poetry.

1871.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

What is the promise of thy tuneful greeting,
Oh glad New Year?
Is Truth advancing, Error's form retreating
With doubt and fear?
Art thou commissioned of the waiting ages,
To bring to this,
The ripened thought of prophets, poets, sages;
With all the bliss,
God's will interpreted by Nature, gives
In use and beauty unto all that lives?

Speed on thy mission, with the prayerful sending
Of all who love
The angel in the human, ever tending
To God above;
Teach us by fall of tottering thrones, the reason
Of cruel war;
Give us millennial foregleams of the season
No strife shall mar.
When rescued Nations, set from Priestcraft free,
To the One God alone shall bend the knee.

CORA WILBURN.

CAMDEN, ME., Jan. 13, 1871.

The Index.

FEBRUARY 18, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

Contributors are requested to write on only one side of each sheet.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

"TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES, OR REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX"—is the title of a neatly-printed tract of sixteen pages published by THE INDEX Association, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. One Hundred Copies will be sent for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate—one cent a copy. Packages will be sent free to those who will circulate them, but are unable to pay for them. Here is an excellent means of helping the cause of Free Religion and THE INDEX as an organ of it. Friends of Freedom, send for as many copies as you can use, and do your part in awakening an interest in ideas worthy of American institutions and the higher civilization of the future.

F. E. ABBOT.

MORE LIBERAL THAN LOGICAL.

The New York Independent, a few months ago, quoted a series of passages from Keshub Chunder Sen, in order "to make good our assertion that Mr. Sen, although he calls himself a Brahmin, is better entitled to be called a Christian." The following extract will be interesting to our readers, if they have not already read it:—

"According to the 'unco guid,' Mr. Sen is a heathen. Indeed, perhaps he would thus paganly style himself. Certainly he takes great pains to say that he does not accept the Christian religion. He is a Hindu, and means so to remain. He visits England, not to embrace its Christianity, but to witness its civilization. He will return to India, not to preach Christianity, which he thinks has been dwarfed by its expounders into a too narrow system, but to preach what Theodore Parker (if he were alive) would call the 'Absolute Religion.'

But, were it not for Mr. Sen's statement to the contrary, we should be inclined to take him for a Christian—yea, and for one of the best of Christians. Commend us to such a heathen as this man! For instance, what is his view of Jesus of Nazareth? We copy a few words of reverential eulogy, which seem surcharged with tender and sympathetic appreciation of the 'name which is above every name.'

'Tell me, brethren, whether you regard Jesus of Nazareth, the carpenter's son, as an ordinary man? Is there a single soul in this large assembly who would scruple to ascribe extraordinary greatness and supernatural moral heroism to Jesus Christ and him crucified? [Applause.] Was not he who by his wisdom illuminated and by his power saved a dark and wicked world—was not he who has left us such a priceless legacy of divine truth, and whose blood has wrought such wonders for eighteen hundred years—was not he above ordinary humanity? [Cheers.] Blessed Jesus, immortal child of God! For the world he lived and died! May the world appreciate him and follow his precepts. [Applause.]

Can anybody read the above extract without feeling that Jesus Christ at this moment numbers this devout Brahmin among his disciples?"

Mr. Sen, in the words above quoted, (we do not know from what), certainly uses stronger expressions with reference to Jesus than we could do. We see nothing "supernatural" in his real heroism, which has been repeatedly paralleled, perhaps excelled, in other lives. Neither can we admit that "his wisdom illuminated", or "his power saved", a "dark and wicked world"; for much darkness and wickedness still remain, and we are tired of this exaggerated estimate of the services of any individual. What Mr. Sen attributes to a man, we attribute to the race itself. If the right to wear the Christian name depends on a certain spiritual attitude towards Jesus, as Mr. Tilton tacitly admits, then Mr. Sen has a far better right to wear it than we,—a better right, we think, than some of our contemporaries who claim it. Yet he refuses to wear it.

The reason, however, which has led us to refer to this article in the Independent, is to call attention to the fact that the highest praise it has to bestow would be to call Mr. Sen a "Christian." There is a very common but vague use of this appellation which suggests only a beautiful life and spirit regardless of all opinions; and in this sense it is properly applied to Mr. Sen. In fact, there are those who contend that all persons are really Christians who possess this spirit and live this life, no matter whether they have heard of Jesus or not. This opinion was once our own; but we were at last forced to relinquish it. It lands those who hold it in almost laughable absurdities. One of these, which alone ought to expose its loose and wild logic to every thinking mind, is well illustrated in the following extract from Bayard Taylor's "Journey to Central Africa," page 485:—

"After my tent was pitched on the beach, I called my camel-men, Ali and Mohammed, who had crossed with me, and gave them each the forty piastres still due, with a Maria Theresa dollar—abou-zerar, or the 'Father of Buttons,' as this coin is called in Central Africa, from the button which clasps the drapery on the Empress's shoulder—as backsheesh. The men were delighted, and kissed my hand in token of gratitude. I gave them also the money for the shekh, and took leave of them with the exclamation,—'May God grant you a prosperous journey to your country!' They replied warmly,—'May God prolong your days, O Effendi!' and as they moved away I overheard old Mohammed again declare to Achmet, '—Wallah, but this is a good Frank! He certainly has Islam in his heart!'

And so it goes. The Christian sees Christianity in the good Pagan; the Islamite sees Islamism in the good Christian. Why is not the one as sensible as the other? Or will they not both become more sensible still, when they see that goodness is neither Christian nor Mohammedan, but human,—that Christianity necessarily includes supreme faith in the Christ, and Mohammedanism supreme faith in Mohammed,—and that neither the Christ nor the Prophet is of any value whatsoever to mankind, except so far as they illustrate our own higher humanity, and thus help us a little to be more faithful to ourselves and our fellow-men? Christianity and Mohammedanism, Judaism and Hinduism and the rest, are all partial and mutually exclusive; and it is a conceit at which the wise may well smile, when one of them elevates itself above the rest as the absolute goodness and truth. Others may be partizan or patriotic,—we would be a cosmopolite in religion.

COMMERCIAL CHRISTIANITY.

The Daily Morning Chronicle, of Washington, D. C., has the following extraordinary advertisements:—

PAWNBROKERS.

SUMMER ARRANGEMENT.—The National Loan Office of R. FULTON & CO., No. 314 Ninth Street, will be open from 6 A. M. to 7 P. M. This is the only Christian Loan Office in the city.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

NATIONAL LOAN OFFICE.
314 Ninth street,
Four doors north of Pennsylvania avenue.
ROBERT FULTON & CO., loan money on all kinds of collaterals at the lowest market rates. The only Christian Loan Office in the District.

"This is the only Christian Loan Office in the city!"

What is the purport of this most remarkable announcement? Perhaps the loans are on the Christian principle of "lending, hoping for nothing again" [Luke VI, 35]. But then who pays for the advertisement? Such loans do not need to be advertised. They are snapped up at once as the best thing in the money-market. In fact, borrowers might well entertain an extraordinarily high opinion of the Christianity of those from whom they borrow on such terms, and attribute to them a preternatural devotion to Christian precepts in this particular. From our own experience in this line, we fear that these "Christian" pawn-brokers will be over-run with business and soon land in bankruptcy,—unless, indeed, like the old apple-woman who always sold her apples for less than cost, and made up her losses by her "immense sales," R. Fulton & Co. have discovered the useful art of making something out of nothing.

No—we dismiss this hypothesis as untenable, especially as we now observe that the loans in question are made "at the lowest market rates." It must be the office that is "Christian" not the loans. Probably money transactions are here commenced with "divine service," and concluded with a benediction. But beautiful and affecting as this would be in the abstract, it would hardly attract the class of customers who haunt pawn-brokers' establishments. On the contrary, we suspect that a torrent of profanity on their part is far more likely than a benediction to follow the peculiar style of loans negotiated by R. Fulton & Co.

Thus we are afloat again. But a thought strikes us. Possibly the advertisers intend to announce that they themselves are Christians rather than Jews,—that they are no diabolical Shylocks or Fagins, but good, pious people, with hearts of flesh and bowels of compassion for virtue in distress. All other pawn-brokers in Washington are heathens and hyenas,—these are pillars of orthodoxy, and will fleece their victims according to the most approved principles of genteel Christianity. But even this interpretation fails to satisfy us wholly; we cannot believe that only one firm of this sort should be found in the great capital of the United States. Surely, the Government must make better provision than this for starved office-seekers, and Congressmen who are not important enough to be bribed. Of all places in the world, Washington ought to be well stocked with "Christian" pawn-brokers' shops. We regret the sad necessity of doubting the word of these exemplary advertisers; but really we cannot afford to think so ill of Uncle Samuel as to believe that he is so neglectful of the wants of his dependents, or that he could so cruelly overload and crush R. Fulton & Co. with inevitable business, as to furnish only one "Christian Loan Office" to all Washington.

To the interesting inquiry, therefore,— "What is a Christian Loan Office?"—we can discover no satisfactory reply. The conundrum is too tough for us,—we give it up.

What a relief! We are under everlasting obligation to the New York Nation which steps forward with the following solution of the problem:—

"VICIOUS PIETY.—The vices of our time,—(that is, of a commercial and scientific age,) are fraud, chicane, falsehood, and over-eagerness in pursuit of material enjoyment, and skepticism as to the existence of anything higher or better. . . . Great numbers of the knaves of our times are in the church, and even active in it, and call themselves 'Christians,' as a help in their business."

LETTER FROM WM. C. GANNETT.

When it was proposed to abandon the special department of the Free Religious Association in THE INDEX, and in lieu of it to ask a number of persons more or less interested in the ideas which the Association represents to fill an equal space as Editorial Contributors, among those invited to this position was Mr. Wm. C. Gannett, of Boston. Mr. Gannett replied in the following letter, which explains itself, and which the Editor of THE INDEX desires to be published as a sincere and friendly criticism of his position and work. The temptation was very strong to use the liberty which Mr. G. gave of deciding for him,—thus drawing his fine spirit and excellent pen into the service of the readers of this journal. But on reflection it was decided that it was better to leave the responsibility in his own hands. To the Editor of THE INDEX, as to the writer of the invitation, the difference of view to which Mr. Gannett alludes did not seem a sufficient reason to prevent his taking the position,—since it was desired that this page should present various views of the free religious movement, and it was expressly understood that there need not be unity of opinion of the contributors with each other or with the editor. But unless Mr. G. could feel clear on this point in his own mind, the work might not have been entirely pleasant to him, and it did not seem quite fair to draw him into it. We are sorry to add that on the decision being referred back to him, he decided no.

W. J. P.

BOSTON, Jan. 4, 1871.

DEAR MR. POTTER:—Thank you for the invitation to join your band of "Editorial Contributors" to THE INDEX. The only good reason I have for hesitating to accept it is a feeling that I am not very heartily with Abbot in the work of demolition on which he lays out so much of his force. Not that this prevents my rejoicing in THE INDEX and in him,—as one rejoices in a great deal which is not quite near enough to his own taste or conviction for actual hand-participation. Such differences, I suppose, are chiefly differences of emphasis, and result chiefly from temperament, or perhaps circumstances. I greatly like, very greatly, nearly all the statements of his own positive thought or attitude; but all matters of opinion, especially of religious opinion, seem to me organic,—subject to laws of organic growth, not to the rules of brick-laying,—which means that the best way to help religious advance (or rather religious deepening and broadening) is to bring out the hints of good in poor things rather than to pull down with hard blows the poor things. Rather than, I say; it's a question of emphasis. But that means considerable when one dislikes religious pommelling.

Then, too, the fact that religious difference is very greatly intellectual difference, means that what seems poor to one mind is the best another mind can reach as yet. Most people, I think, would not get from Radicalism the warming of sympathies and the inspiring of conscience and the comfort and hope that they get from their various Christian faiths. That is a reason for doing several things; but among them, of being very glad and grateful that, with men and women as they are, there are other teachers beside Radicalism to help them. Luther did ever so much more good than Erasmus; but isn't such a being possible as Luther, broad and wise, or Erasmus, brave and honest? Cannot the second Reformation be carried forward in a better spirit than the first one?

Abbot will say this does him injustice. I hope it does. But it seems to me to do his public leadership, his printed emphasis, justice. Or he may say, and you, that the lack of just what I dislike is to be disliked in me. I hope then I may come to see better. Meanwhile that makes me doubt whether I should be helpful and pleasant as one of your "Editorial Contributors." Suppose you decide. Abbot's explanation of the new arrangement (in the last INDEX) is as frank and cordial as can be, and seems to anticipate differences from himself. And if you still invite me, you can print this as my first contribution,—if it will serve.

I must beg you to be as frank in saying No as in saying Yes. In fact for the other reasons not "good," I hope it will be No.

Yours truly,

W. C. GANNETT.

AMENITIES OF FAITH.

There is an impression that "Christianity" is relaxing its rigors of sentiment and dogma, and is disposing itself to be more gracious, or at least more tolerant than of old, to honest doubt and sincere unbelief. We hear it continually asserted that the most offensive doctrines of the "orthodox" faith are no longer preached, and are virtually abandoned; that the theological virus is pretty much spent, or is so diluted by the cold water of Unitarianism, that in sermon and pamphlet it is hardly discoverable. That this is true in some measure is quite possible; that it is true among cultivated, rational people, we know. But that it is true of the great mass of those who conduct "evangelical" associations, or who compose the "evangelical" churches, we never believed, and have now the best reasons for disbelieving. In fact "Christianity," so called, stands or falls with its dogmatic system; and the instinct of the multitude which bids them hold fast to it, is deeper than the unthinking suspect.

It was in entire good faith therefore, that a pamphlet, one of many such, a tract, issued by the American Tract Society, was left at the door of one who has made himself somewhat conspicuous by his emphatic dissent from commonly received opinions in religion. The tract is entitled "The Wrath to Come." After describing this wrath in the usual incoherent fashion, it proceeds in the following language, underscored by the benevolent sender of the pamphlet for the good of the benighted individual who was supposed to need the admonition:—

"Oh, how dreadful is the wrath to come! It is unmitigated wrath. However distressing our situation in this world, there is always something to soften its horrors. There are anodynes to soothe our pain, medicines to relieve our sickness, friends to sympathize with us in our sorrows, hope to cheer us in our darkness. But the wrath to come has no such alleviations; it is poured out without mixture; it is pain and sorrow and grief without sympathy and without relief. It is everlasting wrath. Still, as eternity rolls on its un-wasting ages, the deep wailing of the lost will be heard uttering the bitter agonies of despair," etc., etc.,—with the usual abuse of Scripture and anguish of rhetoric. "Now it may be escaped," etc., etc. "You hope to escape." "Oh, listen not to the soothing delusion! It is the suggestion of the devil, the father of lies."

Now there is no law against a man's believing such wretched rubbish as this, if he chooses to do so for his private satisfaction. We may pity one who takes comfort in such sulphuric opinions, but we let him alone. This devil worship, privately entertained, concerns himself alone; and if he chooses, in the privacy of his chamber, to vent his spleen against the author of the universe, we would leave him his privilege. He is a deserving candidate for the wrath he delights to contemplate. But the wrath will not probably fall. We will not return cursing for cursing. We venture to say that God will pay no more attention to the stench of his abuse than he does to the perfume of his flattery.

But when he prints his trash, and leaves it on the tables of respectable hotels, or distributes it in street cars to innocent and well-behaved strangers, or drops it at gentlemen's doors, or sends it through the mail to public teachers he never talked with, and religious ministers he never saw, a serious question of ethics is involved.

By what right does a man or a society of men insult citizens, neighbors, fellow-beings in this way? By what right does he rant and scold and threaten and bestow evil names on people who, so far as he knows, are guilty of no graver offense than that of thinking more honorably of God than these fanatics think? It is a question of morality. "By their fruits ye shall know them." These people consider it good manners, nay good virtue, good piety, to heap abuse on men and women promiscuously, without discernment or discrimination; to slander them all in a mass; to consign them in a lump to hell; to write insulting letters, anonymous of course; to enclose to them vile pictures and disgusting caricatures; to fling the dirtiest mud at them from behind an incognito. They do these things as religious people, particularly as "Christians." It is their way of testifying their reverence for God, their devotion to Christ, their heavenly charity, their passionate love of souls. It is their characteristic mode of showing themselves to be disciples of their "divine Master." Two things are necessary in their regard to the perfect "Christian:" first, a feeling of entire self-complacency in view of his own spiritual condition and eternal prospects; and, second, a feeling of absolute assurance in view of the horrible fate of everybody else in the world who is not sitting in the same boat with him; two assumptions either one of which would be fatal to a man's reputation for moral sanity in the world of business or society.

It was not a handsome thing to say, but it was said sincerely, and with a deep sense of truth, that "evangelical" Christianity had inflicted fatal injury on the moral sentiments, ideas, and practices of men, by its cardinal assumptions, and conduct based thereon like that we have alluded to. It is conduct that would not be tolerated in any sphere of life where veracity, kindness, or the most ordinary rules of justice are regarded. The system that countenances such ethics is condemned in the judgment of honest men. People wonder at Mr. Abbot, and blame him as irrational and extreme for calling "Christianity" a superstition productive of much intellectual and other mischief, and standing in the way of mental and moral progress. But if Christianity through its organized bodies justifies the composition and distribution of such documents as we have quoted, Mr. Abbot is surely right, and will ere long carry with him the sympathies of respectable men. The friends of the "Christian" religion must revise the publications of the American Tract Society and exert themselves to arrest the demoralizing effects of abusive methods; else they will themselves convict their faith of being no better than paganism in disguise. A religion that flings about vituperation at random and uses vulgar insolence as a weapon, cannot live in the esteem of sensible people. Zeal for the faith must keep within the limits of good breeding, and solicitude for the salvation of souls must commend itself by a certain measure of regard for the obligations of civilized society. Publicly to call one's self before God, a miserable sinner is not especially commendable; but, in the name of God to call one's unknown and apparently harmless neighbor a miserable sinner, is an offence against charity so deep that the stupidest conscience would be shocked by it, were it not so habitual, and had not faith quite forgotten what charity is like.

O. B. F.

The following story is told of Rev. Dr. Taylor the noted New Haven theologian:—Profound in metaphysics, but not versed in science, he was an obstinate defender of the literal interpretation of the six days of creation in the Book of Genesis, as against the idea of six long periods of time, which Professor Silliman advocated. One day Professor Silliman took Dr. Taylor into the geological cabinet, and confronted him with several trilobites in rocks of the lower strata, and said:—"Now, Dr. Taylor, how did these once living animals get into this position except as the rock gradually formed about them in one of those long early periods?" "Nonsense, nonsense," answered Dr. Taylor; "do you think that God, when he made the rocks, couldn't have stirred in the things just as easy as a cook stirs raisins in a pudding or cake?" Professor Silliman was so disgusted that, perfection of courtesy though he was, he put on his hat, without reply, walked straight out of the building, and did not say a word to Dr. Taylor for three weeks.

The ministers find it hard to dispose of Dickens. The Windham, Conn. Association of Congregational preachers had him up on trial the other day. They discussed the solemn question "How far is it best to encourage the circulation and reading of Dickens' Works?" They confessed that they had not been readers of his works, did not know exactly how bad they were, and on the whole deemed it unadvisable to encourage their circulation.—S. Oracle.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

THE CLAIMS OF THE HEART IN RELIGION.

NO. II.

Having in a previous article unfolded the idea that only the heart, or the spiritual and emotional nature of man, could fully appreciate and authoritatively pronounce upon the value or character of religious truth, I now proceed to make some practical observations upon the same.

1. Why should the man who is not specially gifted with spiritual insight, the man of cold, unfruitful imagination, the unsusceptible and naturally unconfiding person, assume that, because he does not or can not readily perceive and realize what others do, therefore the beliefs, the experiences, the hopes, the disclosures made to others, are necessarily all a delusion—mere moonshine—nonsense?

Does a blind man assume that, because he cannot see, there is no such thing as color; or the deaf man assume that there is no such thing as sound? The man who has no ear for music is naturally tempted to despise the fondness of certain others for it. The writer himself is quite unprepared to appreciate the gymnastics, the "ground and lofty tumbling," of certain operatic Prima Donnas. But he is very careful not to denounce all this as folly, or vanity, or anything of the kind, because, as often as tempted to do so, he is reminded of the fact that he has not received the culture necessary to enable him to perceive precisely where the music comes in.

Some people there are who are tempted in like manner to despise metaphysics. Here again the writer can sympathize with certain of his fellows. He recollects distinctly heartily responding to Thomas Carlyle's characterizing the disquisitions of Coleridge as "theosophic moonshine." But here, also, experience has taught him moderation and wisdom. For he now perceives that doubtless his lack of appreciation of these abstruse matters—those laws, facts and relations that belong to an intellectual realm beyond the scope of common sense—is to be attributed to the lack of a vigorous speculative or metaphysical faculty. How many there are who ridicule the idea of poetry, sentiment, or of "artistic effects;" and yet who is there, belonging to the more cultivated class that does not know that such simplicity simply betrays a want of mental refinement or unawakened aesthetic, or beauty-loving faculty? And I do not know but there may be people somewhere—if you please, some juiceless, crusty, hopeless, incorrigible old bachelors,—who, because the fountains of their own hearts have never been unsealed, assume (alas that any should be so "left to themselves" or "given over to believe a lie!") that there is no such thing as love—as connubial felicity or parental affection.

Now, then, why does it never occur to the unspiritual rationalist, that to a more open vision, to a loftier and more inspiring faith, possibly his own unbelief may appear just as irrational as the assumptions of the foregoing manifestly undeveloped natures,—that the reason why he doubts as to the truth, reality, or existence of many things which others joyfully accept, may be that his spiritual eye has never been opened, his spiritual ear unstopped, his heart never really touched and thrilled by the life and the love of God; that, in a word, if spiritual truth of any sort be hid from any, it can be hid from those alone whose natures are not attuned in sympathy with it, whose hearts have never been properly opened to receive it?

Father Hyacinthe speaks about depths of the soul in which "illusion is impossible." Paul, in speaking of Moses, speaks of him as one who "endured as seeing Him who is invisible."

With what propriety, then, can that man who has never cultivated anything but the multiplication-table faculty of his soul assume or affirm that these experiences of the higher spiritual life just adverted to, are not valid or genuine? There is indeed a deep and solemn significance in the words of Paul: "If our Gospel be hid, it is hid to those that are lost."

2. It is to be observed that the higher spiritual affections are closely allied to the social. The great majority of people, I think I may safely say, are interested in and led to religion, in the outset, not so much by their heads as by their hearts; that is, by the stress of their natural earthly affections. A mother has seen her baby's eyes open for the first time, and then watched them as they closed for the last time. A son has just torn himself from the lifeless form of the mother who was as an angel to him. With what agony these bereaved ones, at such an hour, feel the need of an assured hope of immortality, and of divine consolation and sympathy! How instinctively then the bleeding hearts of these mourners lead them to trace beyond the grave the dwelling-place of these loved ones, and thence-forward to look steadfastly that way, until somewhat of the immortal quiet of that "better land" shall have passed into their own souls. "O that I now had your hope!" once said an atheist to a Christian friend of the writer, as he turned heart-broken from the open grave of his departed companion. What a sermon that man's heart was preaching him in that hour, as to the nature and need of a spiritual religion—a warm, generous, soul-illuminating faith. "Those who love," says De Wette, "can never have any doubts concerning immortality." "Most desolate and dreary was my heart," once wrote a bereaved parent, after the death and burial of two interesting little daughters, "to think that they

'No more would run to lip their sire's return,
Or climb his knee the envied kiss to share.'

So chilled, indeed, and discouraged was I, I must have sunk into the gulf of utter skepticism but for the supporting hope of meeting those lost and loved ones again in a bright and better world."

There is no such prophet of Hope and a future Home as Love. In what thoughtful soul, truly, does not the following eloquent utterance of the death-devoted Greek in the beautiful drama of Ion—so expressive of this love-inspired instinct of immortality—awaken an earnest and unequivocal response! When about to yield up his young existence to Fate, his betrothed, Clemanthe, asks him,—"Shall we ever meet again?" "I have asked that dreadful question," says he, "of the hills that look immortal; I have asked it of the streams that flow forever; I have asked it of the stars, among whose fields of azure my raised spirit has often walked in glory. All were dumb. But, while I gaze upon thy living face, I feel there's something in the love that mantles through its beauty that cannot wholly perish. Yes, Clemanthe, we shall meet again."

While the stars, set so far above the reach of his limited faculties, could only mock him with their unapproachable glory, his own human heart assured him of a blessed world to come. In the light of this love-inspired hope, he sweetly falls asleep.

But not only do suffering human beings crave divine consolation—not only do they pine for the sympathy of the sweet heavens—the tender care of the "great Shepherd and Bishop of their souls," but for human sympathy withal. And yet what kind of human sympathy do they instinctively seek? To whom, with their whole hearts open, do they turn for consolation? Is it to bigots, or formalists, or to coldly theorizing, speculating, criticising, rationalizing philosophers? On the contrary, is it not rather to some man or woman of mighty faith—some noble-minded, whole-souled man that can bear them up to heaven, as it were, on the wings of his own strong prayers? Not only do we need the thought and hope of immortality, but, especially when depressed, either by the overwhelming cares and labors of life, or by the fear of bereavement and death, we feel the need of some specimen, some human specimen of living faith, to rest upon,—one of those rich and saintly natures whose personal faith is so joyful and abounding and serene as to make itself felt, sweetly and healingly, upon the minds of all around. The very voice and face of such a person as this communicates such strength, that fear vanishes before him, and unbelief shrivels away. In the sick room, especially, the presence of such a one is literally a benediction. By the death-bed his hope is strongest and his faith brightest; for what others call death he recognizes as but a resurrection to a higher and truer life. In his hands a funeral service is the celebration of a solemn yet joyous sacrament. In the light of the promises that, to his vision, glow like stars in the firmament, all the trials and bitter experiences of life are made to appear but as the stepping-stones in the river on which we pass over to immortal vigor, to immortal beauty, and immortal strength. Most worthy prophet, while no sect is wholly without such as thou, yet, guided by such a spirit, art thou greater far than any sect, truer far than any creed. Thou art truly a citizen of the world, and a teacher of all time.

But the idea, it will be recollected, which we had in hand, was that the soul, in its moments of eclipse, hungers for the support that can only be afforded by those who are rich in faith. And how often, accordingly, have we seen poor wretches, for the want of a better and healthier guidance, led willing captives by or running insanely after the first designing sentimentalist that would invent for them some maudlin tenderness from some imaginary angel!

3. Those persons in whose faith there is the most room for heart-work are uniformly found to be the happiest, if not the holiest, the most zealous and enthusiastic and effective. A heart on fire with love is what the locomotive is under a full head of steam. A religion which does not stir and inspire the heart must necessarily prove practically a failure. There must be loyalty, else there can be no perfect obedience, no conquering zeal, no joy in tribulation. It is heart-work that enables one to sing, for example:

"In hope of that immortal crown
I now the Cross sustain,
And gladly wander up and down,
And smile at grief and pain."

Nothing, moreover, but heart-work can give peace, assurance, joy, victory in death. Hear the melancholy plaint of Unfaith:

"My days are in the yellow leaf,
The flowers and fruits of love are gone;
The worm, the canker, and the grief
Are mine alone."

The fire that on my bosom preys
Is lone as some volcanic isle;
No torch is kindled at its blaze—
A funeral pile!"

Epictetus could only say,—"When death overtakes me, it is enough if I can stretch out my hands to God and say,—The opportunities which Thou hast given me of comprehending and following Thy government, I have not neglected. I thank Thee that Thou hast brought me into being; I am satisfied with the time I have enjoyed the things Thou hast given me.

Receive them again, and assign them whatever place Thou wilt." Contrast this with the jubilant testimony of Charles Wesley:

"O what hath Jesus bought for me!
Before my ravished eyes
Rivers of life divine I see,
And trees of Paradise!"

How remarkable that rationalism should seldom if ever sing!

Listen also to the farewell words of Paul:

"I am ready to be offered. The time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight; I have finished my course; I have kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of Righteousness, which the Lord, the Righteous Judge, shall give me at that day; and not unto me only, but unto all them also that love His appearing."

R. H. HOWARD.

[There is much that is beautiful in the above article. But we do not exactly see to what conclusions it is designed to lead. If it is an indirect argument for the truth of the Christian system of belief, the reply is pertinent that the "heart" has no right to claim jurisdiction in matters of thought. Once admit such a claim, and the flood-gates of superstition are thrown wide open. Whether Jesus is the "Savior of the world," whether there is a "heaven" for the righteous and a "hell" for sinners, and so forth, are questions not to be answered by rhapsodies, ecstasies, or emotions of any sort; and whoever trusts to these for answers is blown about by the winds. Reason alone is the truth-determining faculty; and the truth-loving man, as distinguished from the willing self-deceiver, quietly accepts its decisions as irreversible.—Ed.]

THE "WORD OF GOD."

DELAVER, WISCONSIN, Jan. 12, 1871.

F. E. ABBOT:—

Dear Sir,—I lately endeavored to impress on the mind of a Christian neighbor the enormity of war, and the low order of civilization that encourages it. He replied—"What does God say?" and referred me to several instances in the Bible where God commands it. "He is the same yesterday, to-day and forever," said he. The ultimate appeal of all believers in the written "word of God" is: "What does God say?" Catalogue modern crimes, and the most of them are authorized or permitted by God, as the chapters and verses can be named in the Bible where murder, lying, cursing, arson, larceny, retaliation, polygamy, alcoholic drinking, mutilation of the body, free-love, infanticide and divorces, more loose than Indiana's, are all sanctioned by "God's holy word." The same crimes are forbidden by the same holy book in other places. The orthodox people shudder at the late anathemas of the "vicar of God on earth," against his supposed enemy Victor Emanuel, but say Amen to the anathemas of that ancient vicar, David, "after God's own heart," who was wholly free from sin except in the matter of Uriah the Hittite—so says the Bible. I open the Psalms of David, and read at random as follows. "Let death seize upon them, and let them go down quick into hell." "Let there be none to extend mercy unto him, neither let there be any to favor his fatherless children." "Happy shall he be that taketh and dasheth thy little ones against the stones"—which of the two anathemas is the most abominable? It seems to me that no nation can become highly civilized, while so many of its inhabitants take the Bible for God's word. This is seemingly the virus that kills the noblest promptings of humanity in Christendom, a mental epidemic, a species of insanity. That course of treatment that will best remove this night-mare of delusion, is what every Doctor of Civilization should assiduously prescribe. The cure once effected, Free Religion would then be orthodox indeed.

I prize the Bible as highly as any one, when attributed to the human writers of the different books. If attributed to God, it must be in the sense that all things are made by him, including all books good and bad. In closing, I would say that the combative spirit in humanity must not be acquiesced in, always remembering that all facts of human nature are the inevitable results of antecedent conditions; and so the leanings of the human mind and conscience itself can be radically changed, sometimes in a short time by partly changing outward conditions and facts and by presenting new and better inducements. Human nature lets go the old, and clings to the seemingly best. This law is absolute, I think, whether it is readily accepted or unconsciously forced on us through the ages.

TRUMBEL D. THOMAS.

A chaplain of the State Prison, an enthusiastic devotee of the temperance reform, had the idea that most of the convicts were incarcerated because of the use of whiskey.

In his rounds he met a sturdy man of many stripes, and put the usual question to him: "Had whisky anything to do with bringing you here?"

"Everything, sir, everything!" exclaimed the man.

The chaplain was encouraged, and eagerly inquired how it was.

"Well, sir, I'll tell you how it was: the judge was drunk, and the lawyers were all drunk, and so they fetched me in guilty."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

SINGLE COPIES

OF

THE INDEX for 1870

Containing the following

ESSAYS,

Will be mailed from THE INDEX office (post-paid) on receipt of

FIVE CENTS:

The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion,.....	No. 1
What is Free Religion?.....	3
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Corner-Stones, 4
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Institutions, Terms of Fellowship, Social Ideal, Moral Ideal, and Essential spirit,.....	5
The Practical Work of Free Religion,.....	6
Unitarianism versus Freedom,.....	7
Sunday Schools,.....	8
Friendship,.....	9
The Miracle Question,.....	10
Grief and its Compensations,.....	11
The Hebrew Prophets,.....	12
Capital Punishment,.....	13
Human Ideals,.....	14
The Essence of Religion,.....	15
The Management of Children,.....	16
A Quaker's Letter to a Presbyterian, R. S. D.,.....	17
Comparison of Jesus and Socrates. (Report from the N. Y. Tribune),.....	17
The Candle of the Lord,.....	18
Public Opinion,.....	19
Conscience,.....	20
The Pedigree of Man,.....	21
"Following Christ",.....	22
The Tongue,.....	23
The Golden Age,.....	24
What is Truth?.....	25
The Last Battle on the Creed Question,.....	26
Observance of the Sabbath, Rev. W. W. Williams,.....	27
The Sunday Question,.....	28
Motes and Beams,.....	29
The Dove's Departure,.....	30
The Bible in the Public Schools,.....	31
Religious Freedom,.....	32
A Plain Talk to Young Men,.....	33
Noise,.....	34
The Humility of Free Religion,.....	35
Chaos and Cosmos,.....	36
An Oration on Alexander Von Humboldt,.....	37
Relation of Spiritualism to Free Religion,.....	38
War and Free Religion,.....	39
Religious Revivals,.....	40
Mary and Martha,.....	41
The Ministry of Free Religion,.....	42
Success,.....	43
"Repentance" and "Forgiveness",.....	44
Spiritual Beauty,.....	45
The Book of Daniel,.....	46
The Unity of Spiritual Freedom and the Opportunity which America offers for its Development, W. J. Potter,.....	47
The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition,.....	47
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? Chas. Reemelin,.....	47
The Work of Radicalism in Indiana, J. O. Martin,.....	47
Religion in the Light of Reason and Common Sense, Isaac M. Wise,.....	47
Sunday—Its Uses and Abuses, Thomas Vickers,.....	48
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? E. Peckham,.....	49
Parties and Party Spirit,.....	50
The Future of Religious Organization, as Affected by the Spirit of the Age,.....	51
The Incarnation. A Christmas Discourse,.....	52
Transient and Permanent,.....	53

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

Free Religious Association.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, on "The Idea of the Free Religious Association;" DAVID A. WASSON, on "The Nature of Religion;" MRS. E. D. CHENEY, on "Religion as a Social Force;" F. E. ABBOT, on "The Future of Religious Organization as affected by the Spirit of the Age;" S. JOHNSON, on "The Natural Sympathy of Religions;" RABBI WISE, on "The Universal Elements in Judaism;" COL. T. W. HIGGINSON, on "Mohammedanism;" WM. H. CHANNING, on "The Religions of China;" W. J. POTTER, on "The Religions of India;" and an abstract of a discussion on the "Relation of Religion to the Public School System of the United States." This Report is specially representative of the principles of the Association. Price 50 cents. In packages of five or more 3) cents each. Also CHANNING'S Address on "THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA," (a careful and instructive essay, of particular interest at this time to Americans) in a separate pamphlet for 20 cents. The ANNUAL REPORT for 1868 and 1869 (at 49 and 50 cents respectively), Rev. Samuel Johnson's essay on "THE WISDOM OF JESUS" (50 cents), and an essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by WM. J. POTTER (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained by applying to the Secretary. The Report for 1868 contains a letter from the celebrated Hindu Theist, KESUB CHUNDER SEN, on the "Origin and Aims of the Brahma Samaj," also an address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, on "Religion and Social Science;" a letter from M. D. CONWAY, on "Religious Movements in England," and speeches by JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHAS. H. MALCOM, JOHN WEISS, and others. The Report for 1869 has addresses by RALPH WALDO EMERSON, D. A. WASSON, JULIA WARD HOWE, C. A. BARTOL, PROF. DENTON, HORACE SEAVER, LUCY STONE, and others.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Nature's Gifts, SCIENTIFICALLY DEVELOPED.

As mankind, from indiscretion or other causes, have been doomed to suffer from disease, so also has remedy for disease been provided. Our hills and valleys abound with roots and herbs, which if scientifically prepared and compounded, will restore health and vigor to the invalid. To find such a remedy we should seek one that has stood the test of age.

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

A
Sure Cure for Liver Complaint, Sure Cure for Dyspepsia,
Sure Cure for Debility, Sure Cure for Jaundice,
Sure Cure for Marasmus.

And all affections arising from weakness or want of action in the Liver or Digestive Organs. The great remedy for

IMPURE BLOOD,
And all diseases arising from it. The great preventive of
FEVER AND AGUE!

It is an impossibility for any one to have fever and ague, if they will use a few bottles of this remedy each spring and fall.

$100 $100 $100

Will be given for any case of this disease that occurs to any one that uses the Bitters or Tonic as a preventive.

Those who have the Fever and Ague will find, after the chills have stopped, that by using a few bottles of the Bitters or Tonic, the disease will not return.

These remedies will rebuild their Constitution faster than any other known remedy.

The remedies were placed before the public thirty years ago, with all the prejudices of so-called "patent medicine" operating against them, but gradually their virtues became known, and now, to day, they stand at the head of all preparations of their class, with the indorsement of eminent judges, lawyers, clergymen and physicians.

Read the following symptoms and if you find that your system is affected by any of them, you may rest assured that disease has commenced its attack on the most important organs of your body, and unless soon checked by the use of powerful remedies, a miserable life, soon terminating in death, will be the result.

II

Constipation, Flatulence, Inward Piles, Fullness of Blood to the Head, Acidity of the Stomach, Nausea, Heartburn, Disgust for Food, Fullness or Weight in the Stomach, Sour Eructations, Sinking or Fluttering at the Pit of the Stomach, Swelling of the Head, Hurried or Difficult Breathing, Fluttering at the Heart, Choking or Suffocating Sensations when in a lying posture, Dimness of Vision, Dots or Webs before the Sight, Dull Pain in the Head, Deficiency of Perspiration, Yellowness of the Skin and Eyes, Pain in the Side, Back, Chest, Limbs, etc., Sudden Flushes of Heat, Burning of the Flesh, Constant imagining of Evil and Great Depression of Spirits

All indicate disease of the Liver or Digestive Organs, combined with impure blood.

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

Is entirely vegetable and contains no liquor. It is a compound of Fluid Extracts. The Roots, Herbs and Barks from which these extracts are made, are gathered in Germany, all the medicinal virtues are extracted from them by a scientific chemist. These extracts are then forwarded to this country to be used expressly for the manufacture of this Bitters. There is no alcoholic substance of any kind used in compounding the Bitters; hence it is free from all the objections incident to the use of a liquor preparation.

Hoofland's German Tonic

Is a combination of all the Ingredients of the Bitters with the purest quality of Santa Cruz Rum, Oranges, &c. It is used for the same disease as the Bitters, in cases where some pure alcoholic stimulus is required.

TESTIMONY

Like the following was never before offered in behalf of any medical preparation:

HON. G. W. WOODWARD,
Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, writes Philadelphia, March 16th, 1867.

I find "Hoofland's German Bitters" is a good Tonic, useful in disease of the digestive organs, and of great benefit in cases of debility and want of nervous action in the system.

Yours, truly,
GEORGE W. WOODWARD.

HON. JAMES THOMPSON,
Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania,
Philadelphia, April 23d, 1866.

I consider "Hoofland's German Bitters" a valuable medicine in case of attacks of indigestion or Dyspepsia. I can certify this from my experience of it.

Yours, with respect,
JAMES THOMPSON.

HON. GEO. SHARSWOOD,
Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania,
Philadelphia, June 1st, 1868.

I have found by experience that "Hoofland's German Bitters" is a very good tonic, relieving dyspeptic symptoms almost directly.

Yours, with respect,
HON. WM. F. ROGERS,
Mayor of the City of Buffalo, N. Y.

I have used "Hoofland's German Bitters and Tonic" in my family during the past year, and can recommend them as an excellent tonic, imparting tone and vigor to the system. Their use has been productive of decidedly beneficial effects.

WM. F. ROGERS.
HON. JAMES M. WOOD,
Ex-Mayor of Williamsport, Pennsylvania.

I take great pleasure in recommending "Hoofland's German Tonic" to any one who may be afflicted with dyspepsia. I had the dyspepsia so badly that it was impossible to keep any food on my stomach, and I became so weak as not to be able to walk half a mile. Two bottles of Tonic effected a perfect cure.

JAMES M. WOOD.
JOHN EUTERMARKS, ESQ.,
Law Partner of Judge Maynard, Williamsport, Pennsylvania.

This is to certify that I have used "Hoofland's German Bitters" for dyspepsia, and found it an invaluable remedy.

CAUTION.—Hoofland's German Bitters are counterfeited. See the signature of C. M. JACKSON is on the wrapper of each bottle. All others are counterfeit.

Principal Office and Manufactory at the German Medicine Store, No. 631 ARCH STREET, Philadelphia, Pa.

CHAS. M. EVANS, Prop'r.
(Formerly of C. M. JACKSON & CO.)

PRICES.—Hoofland's German Bitters, per bottle, $1; Hoofland's German Bitters, half doz., $5; Hoofland's German Tonic, put up in qt. bottles, $1 50 per bottle, or half doz. for $7 50.

Do not forget to examine well the article you buy in order to get the genuine. For sale by all druggists and dealers in Medicines everywhere.

24—cowly

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX PROSPECTUS FOR 1871.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869, and has just closed its first yearly volume.

We deem it proper, therefore, to submit the following PROSPECTUS of Volume II for 1871, and ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if the matter was properly presented to them, and especially if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor. We cannot afford to send out travelling agents, nor would they succeed so well in getting names as persons of local influence. We therefore have determined to use the funds it would cost to get our paper before the people, in another way, namely, in the purchase of articles of value to be given as premiums to those who make up lists of subscribers; thus presenting to the friends of free thought and pure religion the double motive of doing good and getting paid for it.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two DOLLARS a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

PREMIUMS.

For Fifty Names, we will give one of PRINCE & Co's four Octave Melodeons (price $65,) or a complete copy of CHAMBERS' Encyclopedia of Universal Knowledge, in ten volumes (price $50).

For Forty Names, we will give a Wilson's Family Sewing Machine, one of the best Machines made.

For Twenty-Five Names, Webster's Royal Quarto Unabridged Pictorial Dictionary (price $12), or one of the following Chromos:

The Three Tom-Boys (Prang's), price..... $15.00
Winter in the Forest, 20x28..... 12.00
Watering the Horses, 21x29..... 12.00

For Ten Names, one of the following Chromos:

WHITTIER's Barefooted Boy, (Prang's) price..... $5.00
The Unconscious Sleeper, 14x17..... 6.00
Mt. Blanc, 20x26..... 7.50
Or a copy of LECKY's History of European Morals, 2 vols 6.00
MAX MUELLER's Chips from a German Work-Shop, 2 vols 5.00
EMERSON's Prose Works, 2 vols..... 5.00
WEISS's Life and Correspondence of THEODORE PARKER, 2 volumes..... 6.00

For Five Names, a bound volume of THE INDEX, for 1870. (Price $2.50.) Or a copy of one of the following works, (post paid):

DARWIN's Origin of Species, price..... $2.00
LUBBOCK's Origin of Civilization, price..... 2.00
Essays in Criticism, by MATTHEW ARNOLD, price..... 2.00
Tablets, by A. BRONSON ALCOTT, with portrait, price..... 2.00
Any volume of the writings of THEODORE PARKER or HENRY D. THOREAU, each..... 2.00
On the Heights, AUERBACH..... 2.00

For Four Names, a copy of THE INDEX for 1871, or one of the following books (post paid):

EMERSON's Society and Solitude, price..... $1.75
Nathan the Wise, a dramatic poem translated from LESSING by ELLEN FROTHINGHAM, price..... 1.75
HUXLEY's Lay Sermons and Addresses..... 1.75
Speeches and Lectures, by WENDELL PHILLIPS..... 1.50
Historic Americans, by THEODORE PARKER, price..... 1.50
A copy of The Revolution..... 2.00
Or The Woman's Journal..... 2.00

CASH PREMIUMS.

For 75 Names,..... 50 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 50 Names,..... 25 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 25 Names,..... 15 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 10 Names,..... 5 Dollars in Greenbacks
For less than 10 Names, a Cash Commission of Twenty per Cent.

Any book in the above list will be sent by us post-paid upon the receipt of price.

N. B.—Names need not all come from one post office. We will send the paper wherever directed, and let the names count as clubs. Specimen Copies sent to all who enclose a three cent postage stamp. Address

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
Lock Box 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Guardian Mutual Life Ins. Co.,

ORGANIZED A. D. 1859.

M. O. Waggoner, Gen. Supt. for Ohio, Mich. & Ind.

Jno. H. Hood, Assistant General Superintendent.

Office No. 154 Summit Street,

E. F. MUNGER, } General Agents.
CHAS. M. LANG, }

WALTER C. SCOTT, Local Agent, 152 Summit St.

Special Agents—Kelly Bros., 22 Summit Street.
Office Hours—From 7 in the morning till 9 at night.
Medical Examiners—Drs. Samuel S. Thorn and T. J. Eaton Toledo, O. [18y11]

H. M. EDSON,

A. TERRY.

EDSON & TERRY, DENTISTS,

ROOMS 8 & 9 GRADOLPH BLOCK,

TOLEDO, OHIO.

ap16 1v

IMPORTER

Fine Chemicals, Drugs, and Toilet Articles.

Brandies, Wines & Liquors for medicinal purposes only. Also Proprietor of

Toledo Tonic Bitters,

Greatest Remedy known for general debility.

L. E. MULFORD,

23 Summit Street, Corner Perry, Toledo, Ohio
18-1y

THE CELEBRATED CRAIG MICROSCOPE

is an optical wonder. reveals thousands of the hidden Wonders of Nature; is of permanent use and practical availability, combining instruction with amusement, and never losing its interest. It magnifies

TEN THOUSAND TIMES,

a power equal to other Microscopes of many times its cost. Reveals countless little worlds all around us, teeming with life, which to the naked eye must forever remain a sealed book—as Eels in Vinegar, Animals in Water, Cheese Mites, Sugar and Itch Insects, Milk Globules, Claws and Hairs of Insects, Hundreds of eyes in a single eye of a Fly, Dust of a Butterfly's Wings to be perfectly formed Feathers, the much talked of Trichina Spiralis, or Pork Worm, which was first discovered in America with this Microscope.

It is of infinite value to professional men, to teachers, and to students, but NOWHERE IS IT OF GREATER VALUE THAN AT THE FAMILY TABLE, within the reach of every member. It will delight yourself, your children, and your friends during the long winter evenings. It will show you adulterations or uncleanness of various kinds in food, as sugar, tea, bread, meat, etc.

It is of Inestimable Value to the Farmer

in examining insects which prey upon his crops. The power of a $50 Microscope, and so simple in its construction that any child can use it understandingly, with appreciation.

A Beautiful Present—Elegant, Instructive, Amusing, and Cheap. Over 60,000 sold.

During the past six years its worth has been testified to by thousands of Scientific Men, Farmers, School Teachers, Students, Physicians, Heads of Families, and others.

PRICE, $3.00—Sent by Mail Post paid.

Every instrument is neatly boxed, and handsomely labelled with full directions for use. Thousands have been sent by mail. Address, W. J. LINESS & CO., CHICAGO.

FREE! FREE!

"THE MICROSCOPE," a Monthly Journal of Information for the People—the mysteries of Nature explained—interesting information on the wonders of Creation—stories, sketches, etc. Terms $1.00 per year. This Journal will be sent FREE for one year to any one purchasing a Craig Microscope at the regular price, $3.00. (Craig Microscope will be sent post-paid.) For sample copy, and our beautifully illustrated and descriptive circulars, and eight pages of testimonials of Craig Microscope, send six cents for postage to

W. J. LINESS & CO.,

Opticians, and Sole Proprietors of Craig and Novelty Microscope, CHICAGO, ILL.

AGENTS and DEALERS, this Microscope sells in every family on its merits, when exhibited. LARGE PROFITS. Send for terms. 53t:6

THE GOLDEN AGE,

A NEW WEEKLY JOURNAL EDITED BY

THEODORE TILTON,

Devoted to the Free Discussion of all Living Questions in Church, State, Society, Literature, Art, and Moral Reform.

PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY, IN NEW YORK.

Price, $3.00 a Year, Cash in Advance.

Mr. TILTON, having retired from THE INDEPENDENT and THE BROOKLYN DAILY UNION, will hereafter devote his whole Editorial labors to THE GOLDEN AGE.

Persons wishing to subscribe will please send their names, with the money, immediately, to

THEODORE TILTON,

P. O. Box 2,848,

60t4

NEW YORK CITY.

SERMONS

By Rev. O. B. Frothingham

Forwarded free on receipt of five cents for each.

What is it to be a Christian?
Taking God's Name in Vain.
The Issue with Superstition.
Infernal and Celestial Love.
The Sin Against the Holy Ghost.
Pilate and Jesus.
The Dying and the Living God.
The Foes of Society.
The Living Spring of Water.
Elective Affinity.
Religious Irreligion.
Experience and Hope.
The Radical Belief.
The Eternal Gospel.

DAVID G. FRANCIS,
17 Astor Place, New York.

49t3]

AGENTS WANTED—($225 A MONTH.) BY THE American Knitting Machine Co., BOSTON, MASS., or ST. LOUIS, MO. 56-68

THE FIRST VOLUME OF THE RADICAL.

Persons wishing to complete their sets of THE RADICAL by adding the FIRST VOLUME, which has been for some time out of print, can do so by at once sending me their orders. By reprinting this volume in part, I can supply 100 copies. To be able to do this, I am obliged to fix the price at $5.00. This will secure a copy, sent to any address post paid.

Volume 2, 3, 4, and 5, will be sent, post paid, for $3.50 each. Single copies of THE RADICAL 35 cts.

The May number contains Mr. Wasson's review of Mr. Abbot's Religion.

The June number contains Mr. Frothingham's article on "What is Religion for?"

Address S. H. MORSE, office of "The Radical" Boston, Mass.

WANTED—AGENTS. ($20 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock-stitch" (alike on both sides, and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest Family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Boston, Mass., Pittsburgh, Pa., Chicago, Ill., or St. Louis, Mo. 38y1

Ministers and Singers will find these particularly Adapted to the Voice. They contain no Cubes, are very palatable, and act like a charm. Superior to all others for

Colds, Sore Throat, Bronchial and all Lung Difficulties.

RUSHTON'S (F. V.) COD LIVER OIL, for Consumption and Scrofula: the first introduced; fresh and pure. Sold by Druggists generally. 48m3.

Mr. Frothingham's New Book.

CHILD'S BOOK OF RELIGION, for Sunday Schools and Homes. PART I., Worship; PART II., The Good Life; PART III., Truth. In one Volume. New and revised edition. Forwarded free on receipt of $1.00.

DAVID G. FRANCIS,
17 Astor Place, New York.

55-68

Agents Wanted For

THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD. Containing Fleetwood's "Life of Christ," "Lives of the Apostles, Evangelists and Martyrs;" "Dodridge's "Evidences of Christianity;" "History of the Jews," by Josephus; "A History of all Religious Denominations," with treatises and tables relating to events connected with Bible History, containing many fine Engravings. The whole forming a complete Treasury of Christian Knowledge. W. FLINT & CO., No. 26 S. 7th St., Phila.; Custom House Place, Chicago, and 176 W. 4th St., Cincinnati. [48m3.

The Index.

VOL. 2.—No. 8.

TOLEDO, OHIO, FEBRUARY 25, 1871.

WHOLE No. 61.

The Index,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION,

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, OHIO.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Editorial Contributors.

THE ETHICS OF PULPIT INSTRUCTION.

[The following article was originally delivered as an Address before the Unitarian "Ministerial Union" in the vestry of Arlington St. Church, Boston, Oct. 14, 1867, and afterwards published with additions in the Christian Examiner for January, 1868. The first part refers to Rev. Samuel J. May's "Brief Account of his Ministry."]

"1. Kung-sun Ch'ow said: 'Lofty are your principles and admirable, but to learn them may well be likened to ascending the heavens, something which cannot be reached. Why not adapt your teaching so as to cause learners to consider them attainable, and so daily exert themselves?'

2. Mencius said: 'A great artificer does not, for the sake of a stupid workman, alter or do away with the marking line. E. did not, for the sake of a stupid archer, change his rule for drawing the bow.'

3. 'The superior man draws the bow, but does not discharge the arrow. The whole thing seems to leap before the learner. Such is his standing exactly in the middle of the right path. Those who are able, follow him.'

Works of Mencius, Book VII, Part I, Chapter XII.

Of the countless sermons that pour yearly from the press, few are so well worthy of being read and pondered, especially by ministers, as this short autobiography of Mr. May. It is the story of a moral hero, told in simplest phrase, and free from the least taint of egotism. Possibly those who infer the egotism of President Johnson from the frequency with which he uses the pronoun of the first person, might object to its frequent occurrence in this pamphlet; but, although Mr. May is by no means afraid to say "I," certainly no one ever said it more modestly than he. In all these fifty pages, devoted as they are to the history of his own life, he never offends, in the least, by a sentence designed rather to entrap admiration than to state with simplicity a fact or a thought. The single-mindedness of the man is mirrored in the directness of the style. Not forgetful of the clamors raised against him in former times by the angry crowd, he is at no pains to hide the approval of his own conscience, as he now calmly scans his seventy years. What generous heart is not touched with sympathy, when, referring to the rescue of a fugitive slave from the United States officials in October, 1851, Mr. May says, not without honest pride,—"Let me only add now that I have not lived long enough yet, to be ashamed of anything I said or did for the 'rescue of Jerry'!" The same spirit of conscious yet unassuming rectitude pervades the whole of this unvarnished record of actual facts. During a ministry of forty-seven years, every reform that promised to help lift mankind out of spiritual or social evils has found in Mr. May a friend equally ready to give and take hard blows in its defence. Peace, temperance, education, anti-slavery, woman's rights, the succor and elevation of Indians and canal-boys,—whatever humanitarian movement came to his notice, at once enlisted his sympathies and hearty efforts. Indeed, he now expresses some regret that his work as a reformer has at times unduly withdrawn his attention from the more special duties of the ministry; but the fault, if it be one, is quite easy to forgive on the score of its exceeding rarity.

"Thus to relieve the wretched was his pride,
And e'en his failings leaned to virtue's side."

Nothing could be more touching than Mr. May's treatment of an aged parishioner in Brooklyn, Conn., who believed that the baptism by sprinkling, which he had received in infancy, was insufficient, and consequently felt himself debarred from partaking of the "Communion." Against the advice of some aged ministers to whom he had applied for counsel, Mr. May baptized his simple-hearted friend by immersion in Blackwell's Brook; taking care, however, to caution the moved spectators against subordinating the spirit of the ceremony to its mere form. "One drop of water," I said, 'would be sufficient for one who sincerely intended to become a disciple of Jesus; an ocean of water would not be enough to baptize truly a pretender.'" If anything could reconcile the modern consciousness to symbolical acts in religion, it would surely be a baptism such as this.

Equally honorable to Mr. May was his treatment of Theodore Parker. What he regarded as opposite extremes,—honest superstition and honest heresy,—won from him equal tenderness and respect. Would that such a spirit were as common as it is beautiful! In the very height of the young iconoclast's unpopularity, Mr. May wrote to him for an exchange; avowedly to show that his own esteem was quite independent of repute for orthodoxy, or the applauses of a sect. The course adopted by the Boston Association of Ministers "disconcerted" him. "It seemed to me that they had lost confidence in the fundamental principle of Liberal Christianity. Mr. Parker's doctrines were then, more than they are now, offensive to me; as much so, probably, as they were to any of the Boston ministers. . . . If, then, we believe it possible for a Calvinist to be a good Christian, I saw not why we should doubt that a rationalist might be." The italics are ours. What a genuine and most rare liberality is this, going out as freely to those who believe less, as to those who believe more! To men such as Mr. May, the unity and prosperity of a denomination can never become a chief object of concern; nor can the "denominational spirit," which is only party spirit in religion, seem ever in any wise helpful to humanity. Love of the truth for its own pure sake, and as superior to all sectarian interests, has been the inspiration of this noble ministry, and shines out from every page of the little pamphlet which records it. A grand life grandly told, full of lion-heartedness, sincerity, moral valor, and self-dedication to all noble ends! The world is better for this man's living in it; and now that the hue-and-cry of prejudice dies away, and in his venerated age he hears a growing murmur of applause which cannot wholly stifle itself even out of deference to his modesty, let him rejoice in the approval, not of his own conscience alone, but of the universal conscience of his times.

It is chiefly as a preacher, of rare fearlessness and faith in the benign power of truth, that we behold in Mr. May the living text of a lesson in practical ethics. He has never held his peace from fear of consequences, whether to himself or to society. In season and out of season, he has spoken out like a man, with words of great power because backed by great character. Few men have so shone in the pulpit with those virtues, seldom blended,—bravery of speech and sweetness of spirit. Measured by the only true standard, healthy moral influence, whose preaching has been more fruitful of good? Others may have adorned their "profession" with more brilliant reputations for eloquence; others may have bequeathed to posterity richer legacies of thought or scholarship; others may have built up larger and wealthier societies; others, with the tuneful witchery of the "Pied Piper of Hamelin," may have fluted more dollars out of the pockets of their congregations. But who has done more to make the pulpit respected by a keen-eyed world? Who has done more to prove to this American people, so quick to spy out shams, that religion is the best and truest friend of suffering humanity? In all ages, a vast deal of shoddy has gone to "the cloth;" and he does yeoman's service to the cause of pure religion who shows in the pulpit character that wears like home-spun. It is men like this—faithful to the high duty of the prophet, speaking the truth of God to unwilling ears, proving that to put on the preacher is not to put off the man—who in this nineteenth century redeem the pulpit from contempt. If, indeed, the world's welfare at all depends upon "Sunday services," it is to men like this that the world most owes the perpetuity of the institution. Because he has been so radical in his public speech, our generation has produced no more powerful conservator of the pulpit than Samuel J. May.

It is quite true that Mr. May has never been, and is not now, what is commonly considered "radical" in theology. But he has always preached his theology as unreservedly as his religion, and that, too, where it was the ultima Thule of radicalism. It seems but fair to infer, that, had his theology been quite different from what it is, he would have preached it no less frankly. Boundless faith in the wholesomeness of the truth, whether practical or doctrinal, is the open secret of his pulpit course. If his life teaches anything, it teaches the equal nobleness and wisdom of bold utterance of all deep convictions. Hence it appears just to point to his preaching as a most apt illustration of that course in the pulpit which we here advocate. If we are wrong in this, we make haste to drop the illustration, but nothing more.

In discussing the "ethics of pulpit instruction," we cannot wholly waive inquiry into the previous question, whether instruction is properly a function of the pulpit at all. We are not sure that all would admit this. "Liberal Christianity" was, at first, mainly an intellectual re-action against Christian superstition. The force of this re-action is now in great measure spent; and there is in some quarters an evident tendency to disparage the intellect, to treat it as an interloper in the Church, and to magnify at its expense the practical and emotional side of human nature. The tremendous power of ideas, their influence both on worship and on work, is forgotten. The views taken of the purpose of the pulpit could not possibly remain unmodified by this tendency. Hence edification—the building up of moral character, and the culture of religious sensibility; the practical application of old, familiar truth to heart and life, and not at all the promulgation of new truth—seems to many persons to be the preacher's only legitimate aim. To all such, therefore, the pulpit appears false to its duty, when it undertakes the task of real instruction; instruction, that is, which is more than the simple illustration and enforcement of duties and truths already well known.

With this view of the matter, however, it is hard to see how any liberal minister can agree. It is quite in keeping with the "evangelical" theory of religion: it is quite out of keeping with his. The mere suggestion that the pulpit may have new truth to promulgate, must be to the "evangelical" denominations a direct attack on the sufficiency of the Scriptures, an impious insinuation that the last word of the Holy Ghost is not the Amen at the end of the Apocalypse. But that there is today new truth in religion of which men stand in need is implied in the belief, that revelation is a gradual and never-ending process, rather than an ancient and completed fact. The thoughts of God come to man, one by one, in a deeper and deeper reading of existence. They are born in solitary souls before they grow a part of the life of all. Every great idea has its date, and adds itself to human knowledge as a new truth. In religion, as in all else, humanity climbs, step by step, to higher levels of experience and thought; and the landscape widens as it climbs. To doubt, therefore, that the law of development covers religion as well as art and science, politics and trade; that the nineteenth century also has its new truths of weighty import in spiritual life,—is to lose faith utterly in religious liberalism.

Yet, if new truth in religion is indeed dawning upon our age, where shall it find fitter utterance than in the pulpit? What excuse has the liberal preacher for his vocation, but the duty of speaking to the people his private insights? Surely it is robbing the ministry, not only of its independence, but also of its moral dignity and its chief claim upon the respect of mankind, to prohibit instruction from the pulpit in the highest thought and the best wisdom of the age. If the institution of public preaching has its sole raison d'être in a desire to eternize the ideas of less cultured times; to prop up old forms of worship, which bear no relation to the living spirit of the present; and thus perpetuate a cultus which has become less a help than a hindrance to the most highly developed religious consciousness,—it will soon enlist in its support only men of inferior ability and unimportant character. Commanding power and profound moral earnestness will wear no such fetters. Expect conformity,—and obtain mediocrity. Under such an administration of religious institutions, the rising generation will not be educated in the Church, but out of it. Religious instruction that is abreast of the hour must and will be had; if not from the pulpit, then from general literature. The age is too religious to lend its ears to ordained parrots. It has deep faith in an ever-living and ever-speaking God,—a God that never speaks without saying something,—a God that never deals in stale repetitions, but utters a new word to every listening soul; and, by his fine hearing of the "still, small voice," it unerringly distinguishes the prophet from the pulpiteer.

Never was there greater need of pulpit instruction than today; never was there greater craving for spiritual truth, or sincerer hospitality towards it. By his position, the preacher gets the readiest access to human hearts, if only faithful to his opportunity. Men are bewildered and dazzled by the new ideas and magnificent discoveries of the age. In its whirl through space, the world is cutting the orbit of a brilliant army of meteors, that stream across the skies of thought in fiery swarms; and, while its heavens are thus ablaze with distracting lights, it has great need to be instructed by a science worthy of its name, that, of all these flying and flashing hosts, God is the one radiant point. The old problems are dropping into oblivion; new problems demand solution. The intellectual activity of the age is intense; and can any one believe, that, while the intellect is thus stirred to its depths, the heart can remain unstirred? The pulpit may adjourn these questions of the intellect, if it will, and seek to move the heart alone; but a surgeon might as well stop a gushing wound with lint, when a severed artery needs to be tied. If the heart-faith of the age is disturbed, the disturbing cause is quite as much in the intellect as in the will. Many a noble nature is distressed by a secret decay of faith in the reality of religion, caused by the influence of modern thought and science in destroying old beliefs. Appeals to the heart, which are based on these very beliefs, only exasperate the disease, and turn earnest questioning into bitter rejection. In almost every congregation there will be many such. When, out of sluggishness, apathy, policy, or fear, the liberal preacher eschews all discussion of living issues, and confines himself to moral platitudes and soft little sentimentalities, he lets slip his grandest opportunities, and simply runs a machine.

It is of infinitely less moment, both to him and to his hearers, what truth he sees, than what character he shows. It is far easier for a man of moderate ability, but sturdy sincerity, to hold the attention of the most highly cultivated audience, than it is for a man of genius, without moral courage, to hold the attention of a congregation of mechanics or farmers. It is the manner in which the minister approaches or shuns the exciting questions of the day, that in a great measure determines the weight of his word. The people expect outspokenness and candor,—especially those of them who already know the existence of such questions; and they quickly see through the minister who dares not discuss them. The silences of the pulpit are the secret of its lessening power. If frank speech drives away some, timid or politic non-committalism keeps away others. And we venture to believe, that among those thus kept away are many of the ablest and noblest in the community. In the majority of pulpits, the traditional ideas, undermined by advancing knowledge, are still quietly taken for granted, or defended without any appreciation of the real issue, or perpetuated (not honestly) in phraseology signifying one thing to the speaker, and another thing to the hearer. There is too little frank and earnest instruction in the pulpit of any kind. Whatever his opinions on important points, whether in favor of the old or of the new, the preacher owes them an unreserved and unambiguous expression; and his usefulness, especially to the young, will depend much on this absence of reserve and ambiguity.

A young man, for instance, takes up one of our commonest periodicals, and reads Professor Tyndal's essay against "Miracles and Special Providences." If he has been already instructed that religion has nothing to do with miracles, but rests on its own evidence in the spiritual nature of man, no harm ensues; but if he has heard nothing on the subject from the pulpit, and has grown up with the notion that miracles are the great proof of Christianity, it is ten to one that he loses faith in miracles, Christianity, and religion itself, altogether. If, on the other hand, he has heard the question of miracles honestly discussed in its modern aspect, and answered in harmony with the received theologies, he is certainly able to form a more valuable opinion on the subject for himself, than if he had heard nothing of the sort. In any case, instruction does good, and the want of it does harm. The thoughtful and the thoughtless alike are confronted with questions affecting profoundly their deepest faith. A single illustration will suffice. In the paper by Sir John Lubbock, on the "Early Condition of Man," and in the report by Mr. Pengelly, from the Committee on the Exploration of Kent's Cavern, Devonshire,—presented at the annual meeting of the British Association at Dundee, only a few weeks ago,—ideas are advanced and facts established which are utterly subversive of Christianity, as popularly understood; and yet these papers, in full or in abstract, have been published in the newspapers throughout the civilized world. Through countless channels, the same influences are pouring into the minds of the common people. The press teems with books which treat the greatest and gravest questions of religion in wholly new lights; and publishers say that no books sell more rapidly than these. The public mind is fermenting with new ideas, which, entering through the intellect, sink into the heart, and most powerfully move the feelings and the life. Christianity is not today what it was yesterday; nor will it be tomorrow what it is today. The world's innermost faith is shaken by modern thought, and the only hope of peace lies in more thought; the only cure for agitation is more agitation. A spasmodic plunge into sentimentalism, or into the soulless clatter of "work" uninspired by ideas, will in no wise mend matters. The cause of good thinking is, after all, the cause of good living. Religion can no more dispense with theology, than theology can dispense with religion. Distinct as religion and theology are, and all-important as it is never to lose sight of the distinction, yet it is ruinous to make this distinction a practical separation. They endlessly act and re-act upon each other; a change in one ultimates in a change in the other. The two great and equal human needs of edification and instruction are the two pillars upon which the pulpit, as a permanent institution, rests; and, if either of these is shattered, the pulpit falls. In the present state of society, let the liberal pulpit least of all disown its high obligation to instruct the people to come into full sympathy with the grand currents of modern life, and thereby help the world to put a religious interpretation upon the time. If it shall prove recreant to its task, it will yet be supplanted by the lyceum and the free platform. Intelligent men and women have ears for intelligence alone.

Instruction, therefore,—imparted, of course, in no jejune, didactic, perfunctory manner, but rather with the glow of deep and intense conviction,—must be conceded, we think, to be a main function of the pulpit. Quite free from the oracular tone and temper of the dogmatist, the prophet of today will quote no authority for his teachings but his own inward vision, and ask no acceptance of them that rests not ultimately on the inward vision of his listeners. So far forth as instructor, he must be content with setting other minds to work, and giving the best material he has for them to work upon. True instruction is not so much to impart results, as it is to educate the faculties, and train them in right directions. To instill into the minds of his people a profound love and reverence for the truth, to deepen their thirst for it, and to substitute the freedom of candor and courage for the slavery of timid prejudice, is a better fruit of preaching than the most successful propagandism; for, while this may enlighten the mind, that also ennobles the character, and makes possible the sweet grace of charity. It is idle, however, to expect this fruit from any but the boldest and freest preaching. There is no avenue to the heart of this age, except through the gateway of the intellect. The chief reason, we believe, why the preaching of Frederick W. Robertson has made so deep an impression on the world, lies in the fact that, with manly earnestness and courage, he grappled publicly with the problems of his day; not with his heart and conscience alone, but with his brain as well. It is true that he died before working out any real solution of those problems; but because he threw his whole soul into the work of instruction, and poured forth the finest gold of his thought, fused in the best fire of his heart, he has enriched the age with nobler and higher aims. Not a dry and passionless rehearsal of speculative theories, however true in the abstract, but rather the clothing of strong, hard bones of thought in the warm flesh of feeling and imagination and moral earnestness,—such was the instruction that has immortalized the pulpit of Robertson, and such only is the instruction for which we plead.

The great work of religious instruction is not lightly to be assumed. No man is fit for the duties of pulpit instruction whose soul is not aflame with fresh and original inspiration,—who is not convinced in his own heart that he has some deeply needed message for the people. The very idea of instruction implies that the instructor sees truth not seen by the instructed,—else how instruct? Simply to cater for people's anticipations, and week after week to ring the changes on perfectly familiar doctrines, is to be a priestly expounder of the past, not a living prophet of the present. Quite true it is, and shameful as true, that the pulpit, by ceasing to instruct, has too often made the pews cease to expect instruction; and the consequence is, that, when a preacher faithfully and undauntedly proclaims his message, loud is the outcry at his presumption. How incendiary to kindle the fires of thought beneath the roof of the Church! And thus the uninstructed refuse instruction; and punish the pulpit for its long unfaithfulness, by turning it into a tread-mill. Most sure it is, that he who has no living, original word to utter, enters the pulpit only to destroy its usefulness; that he who cannot truly instruct his hearers, cannot in any high sense edify them. Well-meaning and devout though he be, he is not ahead of his people, and will seek to lead them in vain. The day is fast going by when pious stupidity could be a power in the pulpit. With every year, the demand of the people grows louder for preaching that is intelligent, and bears intelligibly on real issues. It is becoming clearer every day, that the only preacher who can deeply move them is he who has fought the battle of the age in his own soul, and is qualified, by that stern experience, to reveal to others the secret of victory. To him thoughtful and earnest men will listen, whether he cites antique parchments as his authority or not. They crave instruction, new light, on the vital questions of today; and, even though he holds up in the darkness nothing better than the penny-candle of his own honest thought, he is soon the centre of a crowd. Whoever thinks deeply, feels strongly, lives manfully, and speaks boldly, is a preacher anointed of God, whether in or out of the pulpit, and because he gives needed instruction, there will be always many to hear him gladly.

Will an enlightened conscience suffer the preacher to maintain, in his instruction, the ancient Pythagorean distinction of esoteric and exoteric? Will it suffer him to discriminate between truths as safe and unsafe, proclaiming the one class publicly in the pulpit, and reserving the other as the private luxury of his study? Or does it not imperatively demand a greater faith in the people and in truth, and give him as his great law of duty the word of the old prophet, "Cry aloud and spare not"?

That is the most important question of practical duty that can meet the preacher; and the way in which he answers it shows unmistakably of what stuff he is made. In it lurks the "temptation in the wilderness," which awaits every minister at the outset of his career. To guide him to a wise and noble answer, there is great need of an "ethics of pulpit instruction,"—of some general moral principle which shall sweep away the cobweb sophistries of the tempter, and free the entangled conscience of the tempted one. Between the preacher and his congregation there exist recognized moral relations; but between the preacher and his own thought there exist moral relations as real, whether recognized or not. It is too commonly taken for granted, that the preacher has no "higher law" than the immediate prosperity of his congregation, the harmony and growth in numbers of his society. But special duty to a society may sometimes conflict with higher and more general duty to truth itself: they cannot always be reconciled. What then? Shall truth be sacrificed to the welfare of an organization, or the organization sacrificed to the cause of truth? How shall we answer the question here raised? Is the preacher morally bound to proclaim his deepest and best thought, or may he innocently suppress it because he fears its effect on the well-being of his parish?

To this, as to all other questions of practical duty, two answers are rendered,—that of Policy and that of Principle. Two preachers, conversing on this matter, summed up the two answers in brief. Said one,—"I am not half so conservative as people think me; but I take mighty good care to tell no lies in the pulpit." "But," replied the other, "are you not also bound to tell the truth in it?" Policy teaches that the obligations of sincerity are fully met, provided the preacher "tells no lies;" its rule is negative. Principle teaches that these obligations are unfulfilled unless he "tells the truth;" its rule is affirmative. Policy holds its peace; Principle bears its witness. Policy buries its talent in the earth; Principle puts out its talent at interest, and makes it two. Policy is non-committal; Principle commits itself. Policy gives every new truth and modern reform the go-by, and dodges all vexed questions, because they stir up strife, disturb quiet slumbers, excite men's minds, interfere with business, derange the clock-work of Church and State, embroil parishes, imperil salaries; Principle fronts vexed questions fairly and squarely, not because it loves contention, but because it knows that every vexed question has got to be settled, and remembers that wise saying,—"Unfinished issues have no pity for the repose of mankind." Policy thinks itself acquitted in the court of conscience, if it gets through the Sunday services without actually telling lies; Principle thinks itself under mountains of condemnation, if it forbears to disburden itself of its weightiest truth.

Let us glance for a moment at the practical results of the two kinds of preaching here indicated.

When policy guides the preacher's utterance, at first great outward prosperity often accompanies his ministrations. The church is crowded, perhaps, with contented listeners. There will always be people enough who like to hear their own opinions given back to them in elegant phrase from the lips of their minister. But policy kills, first the preacher's enthusiasm, and then the people's interest. The more thoughtful begin to weary of empty rhetoric into which they soon perceive no soul has entered, and turn elsewhere for instruction on questions that move the age. The floods of ignorance are subsiding, the Church is aground on Ararat, and the exodus begins. The people will not stop learning because the pulpit stops instructing. Alas for the church deserted by its fresh, young life! It soon ceases to be a power, and becomes a clog. The people today instruct the clergy, not the clergy the people: seldom, until the pews demand it, does the pulpit teach the new lessons of the age. The anti-slavery reform is a striking proof of this. Few preachers indeed threw their influence against the giant sin of slavery, before the people, under God's stern tuition, had first repented of it themselves. It is this backwardness to utter the truth without fear or favor, this politic weighing of the consequences of every word, that so often robs the finest minds of nine-tenths of their power, and robs the community at large of greatly needed intellectual and moral influences.

The preacher's first duty is to humanity, not to his "society,"—to truth itself, not to the creed of his "denomination." If he proves faithless to the higher duty, the worst penalty is wrought in his own soul. The subtle fiend of policy first gags the mouth, and then puts out the eye; first whispers that truth is not safe to be spoken, and then makes it impossible to be seen. Moral relations are ill discerned by an apathetic or perverted conscience. Let the preacher avoid proclaiming a truth because he dreads the ferment it must create, or shrinks from the sacrifices it must involve, and it becomes to him a haunting voice, to which he shuts the ear. He hardens his heart against the unwelcome angel, and tries to persuade himself it is a lying spirit. Perhaps he succeeds,—perhaps he fails: we know not whether success or failure is the greater curse. But, in either case, self-respect rots slowly away, and is replaced by love of ease or the world's applause. Morn after morn, the alarm of opportunity strikes the summons to brave service and fearless speech; but because he turns in his bed, refusing to arise, the warning sound grows daily fainter and fainter, until it fails in any wise to disturb his unfaithful slumbers. A sleeping shepherd and a starving flock, not the less starving because full-fed with self-complacency,—that is the end of policy in the pulpit.

Not without conflict, however, can the preacher follow principle in his calling. Let him surrender dreams of ease, of popularity, of outward comfort. The mass of men do not live by principle, and little understand those who do. The instructions of a fearless spirit are no food for the world's vanity. To be called higher, implies that we are not high; and who accepts the implication without offence? Only the wisest and the best—whom it least concerns. Truth boldly spoken seldom pleases at the first; yet, in the end, for nothing are men more grateful. He that is before his age, rarely lives to be overtaken by it; but his word will nevertheless find its echo in myriad souls. However bitterly opposed, the true preacher utters his thought "with malice towards none, with charity for all." New ideas, doubtless, ride roughshod over the world's idolatries; new truths plough up the very roots of old associations and old attachments; new inspirations supersede old dispensations, and Dagon falls headlong before the ark of God. Every prophet, like Socrates, must confess himself a gad-fly, stinging an idle age out of its lethargy. Not a sublime comparison, we admit; but the reformer and the prophet wear no aureole, except when seen through the long vista of time. The ship's ropes are soiled with tar, and its sturdy hulk marred with many a bruise; gilding is reserved for the figure-head. If "respectability" looks askance at the toilers who do the great work of humanity, let them toil on with cheerful unconcern; for service is a nobler fate than the conspicuous uselessness of ornament. Little prosperity or popularity awaits him who raises his race to higher levels; and that little is meagre and tardy. He must bear the brunt of opposition, and not be dismayed by seeming failure. Though stigmatized as an innovator, disorganizer, schismatic, he must quietly speak and work for ideas. Disruption of parishes, after all, is not the extinction of religion; neither is dismemberment of denominations the death of the true Church. By fresh solution only can crystals be purified or perfected. Through all contentions, despite all slanders, the preacher true to principle will serenely and lovingly speak his piercing word; and Time, the only vindicator of the ways of God to man, will bear him out. Poverty and neglect, even in these days of "religious liberty," may be his reward from his own generation; but, by the fruits of his unthanked service, mankind will learn at last that faithfulness to high truth is the only practical prudence, discipleship to ideas the only expediency, principle the only policy. To have taught that lesson, is to have lived not in vain.

But the appeal to consequences, in a question of duty, is really evasion of the question. The moral relation of the preacher to the truth he holds, must be otherwise determined. Unless we can find some broad and far-reaching principle from which to derive it, it is idle to talk of the "ethics of pulpit instruction," and we must concede that pulpit instruction has only its "politics."

When the mechanic has discovered the secret of a new machine which will benefit his race, he cannot rest till he has perfected his idea in outward shape, and given his invention to mankind. When the scientist has discovered some hitherto unknown truth in science, he is moved irresistibly to publish it. When the philosopher has conceived a system which he thinks will reduce the tangled elements of human knowledge to unity and order, he is impelled to make it known. When the artist has dreamed a dream of beauty in form or color, he burns to immortalize it in marble or on the canvas, that it may give delight to the eyes of all. When the poet has been thrilled with a heavenly vision, his heart preys upon itself, until he has set his idea to music, and sung it to the charmed world. When the prophet is fired with a great thought, or kindled by a great moral truth, which he knows will make mankind wiser, happier, or better, he can find no peace until he has put his idea into burning words, and poured them into the hearts of his fellow-men.

Shall we call this inward impulse the mere calculation of "self-interest well understood," and account for it by the desire of fame, or profit, or other selfish gain? Away with such suspicious and shallow utilitarianism! In all, let us recognize a deeper, a nobler motive. A lofty, uncalculating conviction of duty, however conjoined with other impulses, lies at the bottom of this instinct to impart; and every great soul feels profoundly its solemn obligation. The mechanic, the scientist, the philosopher, the artist, the poet, the prophet, are all bound by the universal law of expression. Whoever, of great gifts or of little gifts, violates this law, and forbears to give what has been given,—whoever keeps to himself what may in any way help or better the world,—falls justly under the general condemnation of mankind. Here is the burden of the parable of the talents. Milton means this, when he speaks of his genius as "that one talent which is death to hide." Jesus also meant this, when he dropped that saying, every whit worthy of him,—"To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness to the truth." Such is always the feeling of the deep seer and faithful sayer, to whom this stands as a divine law—The God-given power to see truth is God's command to utter it. Hence the brave old "Thus saith the Lord." He who suffers a great thought to die with him, though tomorrow he be born again in some other soul, robs the world of that which is the world's as much as his. We have no proprietorship in truth; we are but trustees for humanity, custodians for an hour of that which is humanity's for all time. Not to recognize this; not to feel, down to the soul's depths, that the power of vision contains the duty of speech,—is the mark of a base, a miserly, a sordid spirit.

Truth rots on our hands, if hoarded. Like the fabled manna from heaven, it will not keep over night; but must be gathered fresh every morning, and unstintedly used every day. To see and not to tell! To know that the world is stumbling in night, and yet thrust our candle into a dark lantern, that its beams may fall only on our own path! Shall we quench the torch, in dread lest a falling spark set on fire the course of nature? Is the universe, then, so combustible? If the conflagration spreads, if the flame and the smoke fill the skies, let us believe that the world had need to be well burned over—that the stubble and rubbish and rotten brushwood of the autumn needed to be consumed, to make room betimes for the tender herbage of the spring. The hammer of the image-breaker can reach but to idols: there is no ground for fear lest God be put to death. Providence will survive the boldest word. Terror is the worst atheism. Sunk, then, be "policy" and "prudence," in the speaking of conviction! There is no wisdom, but only bleary-eyed folly and weak-kneed cowardice and black-hearted treason, in suppression of testimony. Neither fear nor expediency, neither selfish tenderness for our own ease nor unwise concern for other people's ease, should stifle one word of manly and modest avowal. The world has no bribe big enough to pay for one hour of bought silence.

By entering the witness-stand of the pulpit, the preacher takes oath before the universe to speak "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth," and must stand most searching cross-examination in the court of the universal conscience. Let his whole testimony of thought and feeling, word and bearing, be a brave and simple witness to the truth; and if his honest witness trips on a stammering tongue, or falters itself out in broken words, let him remember that he testifies before the perfect Linguist that masters all forms of speech, respects the dumb eloquence of faithful purpose, and, quite as well as the smooth periods of the orator, comprehends the inarticulate lisps of the tongue-tied and the voiceless pantomime of the deaf-mute. We are not bound to achieve an absolutely faultless or adequate utterance of our truth; who can achieve that? But we are bound, without fear or favor, to give our best expression of our best thought. Less than that is recreancy to a high trust, treason to truth, disloyalty to God. Policy may count cost and weigh consequences: principle, never.

Is there, then, no middle course between deliberate and complete suppression of testimony, and immediate, full, and frank proclamation of it? Is there no sagacious union of silence and speech, policy and principle? Is there no golden mean, no judicious compromise between them, which shall throw a sop to growling conscience, yet not alarm fear, or rouse opposition?

It is precisely here that the preacher meets temptation in its most insidious form; his spiritual integrity is assailed most dangerously at this very point. Conscience itself is easily beguiled into appearing as "devil's advocate" in this case. It looks so suicidal to draw the fire of prejudice before reason has had time to deploy her forces, it seems so impolitic to make enemies when one wishes to make friends, that it needs a sublime faith in the power of truth to carry one safely over this moral pit-hole. If conscience is hoodwinked by her wily foe, and made to tumble into the snare, it is a reason, not for denunciation, but for pity and deep sadness. Give policy an inch, and it takes an ell; begin to calculate, and the habit grows apace. There is to the preacher no safety from moral deterioration, but unconditional surrender to truth. Moral courage cannot breathe the crass atmosphere of calculation. What is more mournful than to see generous enthusiasm cooling down to the average temperature? The men who have electrified the world are those who have sacredly obeyed their inspirations, and dared to be impolitic. The least compromise of principle with policy always involves, even as a matter of policy itself, a grave miscalculation of results. Grant that immediate evil as well as good follows the blast of every trumpet that gives no uncertain sound; grant that cowards and bounty-jumpers take it as the signal for deserting the ranks; grant that it works partial disorganization in the army, by starting a stampede among bums and camp-followers,—is it not true that the army's morale is enhanced by purification from all but veterans and reliable recruits? A handful of heroes is worth a host of faint-hearts. Whatever ills befall the preacher or his flock, in consequence of bold adhesion to the cause of human progress, be very sure that in the long run, in the final issue of things, the great moral spectacle of incorruptible fidelity to truth infinitely outweighs, in true service to this cause, the petty advantage of apparent and brief prosperity at truth's expense. If such men fail, they make their failure a Thermopylae.

It cannot be overlooked, however, that, even among those preachers who mean on the whole to be faithful to their best insight, two theories of pulpit instruction exist.

One theory is to treat the society like a child, study its average condition, and administer to it only so much truth in one dose as is judged to be safe, reserving more advanced truth for the future: in other words, to break the truth to the people by degrees, and thus gradually "educate them up to it." But the society is not a child. It consists of many minds, in many stages of development; and it is impossible to average its intelligence so as to adapt preaching to it. The most striking feature of this theory is the amazing self-complacency it implies. Let the ablest mind in America concentrate all its powers, and it cannot overshoot the wants, the real wants, of even a village congregation. By all means let the preacher beware of lowering himself to find his audience. His highest thought is none too high for it, if simply put; his deepest thought is none too deep. He shows little policy and less principle, if he hangs his flag at half-mast. What society, furthermore, would ever settle a minister who should plainly tell them that he should only preach so much truth as he thought they could bear? Assuredly not one. If, then, a minister settles over a society with a theory of preaching which he could not venture to state in public, is there no insincerity in his conduct? Yet, on the other hand, what liberal society would refuse to settle a minister who should only demand perfect liberty of utterance for his profoundest convictions? If, after the candidate had boldly showed his colors, he had nevertheless received a hearty "call," such a stipulation would only increase their respect for him. The moment we look at the matter from the congregation's point of view, we see plainly enough that the theory of preaching under consideration is an oil-and-water admixture of principle and policy, in which policy largely predominates. It is a theory which cannot be squared with high-toned sincerity.

The other theory is to treat the society as an assemblage of men and women, who desire the best instruction their minister can give; to study only the best expression of the best truth in the best spirit, and preach this unreservedly from the pulpit, leaving all care for consequences to the God of truth. This alone is the theory of unadulterated principle. The preacher has no business to discriminate between "safe" and "unsafe" truth; his business is to preach unflinchingly the truth as he sees it, without asking any questions about its safety. All truth is safe; it is error and sin that are dangerous. The parish is not an infant-school, to be coaxed into learning its A B C. Has it not been the trick of priestcraft, in all ages, to treat the people like children, and spoon out pap into their mouths from the church-porringer? "Liberal Christianity," if truly such, must go and do otherwise. The clergy are not so affluent of truth themselves, that they can feed this American people with crumbs from their own tables. There are more vigorous thinkers today in the pews than in the pulpits, and more outside the church doors than in pulpits and pews together.

We have little patience with the current complaints of the short "supply of ministers." What does more to keep our young graduates of the finest abilities out of the ministry, than the knowledge that in it their abilities are under bonds to keep the peace? The ruinous theory of policy in the pulpit, practised and advocated by the pulpit itself, has made parishes intolerant of instruction; and the last thing they really want is a preacher of genuine independence and first-class powers. But all this indicates an approaching crisis. The fear that religion is going to suffer by the very frankest and boldest speech in the pulpit, grows out of appalling want of faith in religion itself. There is a very deep, wide-spread, and growing discontent with every form of instituted Christianity. The "evangelical" denominations feel the coming storm, and are huddling together like cattle for mutual shelter from the blast. If the Church is indeed a house of cards to be toppled over by the first wind that blows, let that wind blow at once, stiff and strong! The deeply religious soul wants no shelter from such architecture. It demands an open bivouac, out on the broad prairies of unchurched humanity, with the damp turf for bed, and the starry heavens for roof, and its own deep faith for meat, rather than any ecclesiastical couch and bowl of charity soup. This plan of doling out truth from the pulpit in quantities proportioned to imagined wants, leaves hungry and dissatisfied the very best minds in the congregation. What can a minister know of the real wants of his listeners? Their first and last want is the want of a preacher with manhood enough to fling policy to the winds. They have urgent want of all the truth he has to give, and more; and though, perhaps, in ignorance of their own want, they may break out in dissensions among themselves, or turn the preacher adrift for his faithfulness, none the less has he rendered them the highest service in his power. When was a true prophet otherwise received? He may yet live to be welcomed back with contrition and open arms. Such things have been. But he has at least "delivered his own soul."

It is the high privilege of the preacher, above all others, to be a student of truth. His coffers, above all others, should be wealthy with golden accumulations. His mind, indeed, should be a mint, converting bullion into specie, and making great ideas the current coin of humanity. Nor should he half perform his work, out of deference to popular nervousness concerning "negations." That distinction of affirmative and negative has been put to evil use. Affirmation and negation are but the obverse and reverse of the same coin; and either implies the other. Impress upon a thought the stamp of the affirmative alone, and it is worthless as currency,—a nugget but half fit for service. Until it bears the double stamp of affirmative and negative, it is undefined, and useless in the spiritual commerce of society. As the preacher climbs the pulpit stair, his audience silently accost him with somewhat of the rough manners of the highwayman,—"Your money or your life!" That stern alternative he cannot escape. To pour out without stint or stinginess the golden treasure he has won, or to yield up his own spiritual life,—between these must he choose. He must confess his sincerest and innermost thought; he must avow with earnestness and simplicity of soul his dearest and mightiest faith, or his spiritual eye shall grow pur-blind, and the divine fires of enthusiasm expire in the suffocating fumes of expediency. He must pour new life into his audience, or they will unknowingly rob him of his own. Alas for him whose epitaph is written,—“Killed by his congregation!” And well for him who—reviewing his life-long services in the cause of all truth, as Mr. May reviews his life and services in the cause of anti-slavery—can write his own epitaph in these noble words:—“It may be that I recurred to this subject oftener than was necessary; but that were better than not to have been spoken.”

Poetry.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

THANKSGIVING.

For many days we two had met
‘Round hearth and board, yet never knew
How, underneath each laughing face,
There lived a passion sweet and true.

Last night, yet seems it years ago,
So have I lived, my love and I
Sat chatting by the pleasant fire,
While slipped the hours, uncounted, by.

In lightsome jest and ready laugh,
In murmured talk of books and art,
How should we see the fire burn low,
And all the company depart?

Nor did we hear the parlor door
Swing softly, on the last “Good Night,”
But, startled, we looked up and saw
The ominous clock, the dying light.

A sudden tremor filled our hearts,
Our ready voices died away;
In all of earth and life there seemed
Not one befitting word to say.

Beside my own my love’s hand lay,
And I, who ne’er that hand had pressed,
Did watch it silently, with eyes
That kissed and tenderly caressed.

So gazing, I looked up and saw
My love’s eyes reading all my thought,
And felt how madly weak was I
To love—in vain—and hide it not.

We rose as if to say good night—
One instant, faltering, we stood:
“Say not Good Night, unless, dear love,
You’ll make all life’s To-morrows good!”

I know not what low word was breathed;
I saw but two eyes filled with light,
A mouth a-smile with joy—and so
We kissed each other sweet Good Night.

And so, today, November reigns
A summer land from pole to pole;
And, summer-hearted, I can feel
THANKSGIVING singing in my soul.

MILWAUKEE, NOV. 1870.

MIGNONETTE.

The Index.

FEBRUARY 25, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

Contributors are requested to write on only one side of each sheet.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

“TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES, OR REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX”—is the title of a neatly-printed tract of sixteen pages published by THE INDEX Association, containing the “Fifty Affirmations” and “Modern Principles,” together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. One Hundred Copies will be sent for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate—one cent a copy. Packages will be sent free to those who will circulate them, but are unable to pay for them. Here is an excellent means of helping the cause of Free Religion and THE INDEX as an organ of it. Friends of Freedom, send for as many copies as you can use, and do your part in awakening an interest in ideas worthy of American institutions and the higher civilization of the future.

F. E. ABBOT.

INDUCEMENTS.

We would invite the special attention of our friends who cannot afford to give their services gratuitously in getting subscribers for THE INDEX, to the very liberal Cash Premiums offered in our Prospectus for 1871.

Whoever collects $150.00 for 75 subscriptions, is authorized to retain $50.00, forwarding $100.00.

Whoever collects $100.00 for 50 subscriptions, is authorized to retain $25.00, forwarding $75.00; and so on.

Now it cannot be very difficult, in a town of any considerable size, to get twelve subscriptions a day for one week, if the agent uses ordinary business energy. Yet he would be paid about $8.00 a day—as much as his representative in Congress receives for work not always, we fear, so useful!

“A word to the wise.” Who will canvass for THE INDEX, and at the same time earn as much as the Hon. Mr.—? Send for “Truths for the Times,” and begin at once.

Mrs. H. L. Green, of Syracuse, N. Y., has proved herself not only a warm friend of THE INDEX, but also a lady of great energy and tact, by sending us a club of over fifty names from that city and vicinity. One of Prince & Co.’s four-octave melodeons has been ordered to be sent to her as a premium, according to announcement; and we consider it abundantly earned. Dr. Jasper H. York, of Dover, N. H., (formerly of Boston), has also sent us a club of thirty-five names; Mr. Benjamin Greene, of Adel, Iowa, has sent a club of twenty names; Mr. Seth Hunt, of Northampton, Mass., has sent a club of fourteen names; and many other friends have recently sent clubs of a less number of names. To each and all we would tender our most cordial acknowledgements for their friendly offices, hoping that they will enjoy the paper all the more for having so generously aided it.

It is with pleasure that we call attention to the editorial article of Mr. Hallowell in today’s issue, entitled “Theology.” We shall candidly consider his criticisms; and we thank him for making them. Our readers can hardly judge of their entire justice until they see our lecture in full, which will probably be soon. We believe Mr. Hallowell himself has only seen an imperfect report of it; and his impressions of our meaning are naturally not quite correct.

Mr. Theodore Tilton, as will be seen by his advertisement on our eighth page, announces a new paper, The Golden Age. He needs no introduction of ours to the American public. Whoever has read the Independent, knows the ability which the editor will bring to his task. Brilliancy, boldness, dash—literary finish, imagination, the utmost catholicity of spirit—it would be strange if these rare qualifications for editorial writing inhered in his former position, and not in the man. Hosts of friends will greet him once more with pleasure, and wish him, as we do, success.

“A brother sends us two new subscribers, of one of whom he says: ‘He has embraced religion within a few weeks, or since the new year came in, spoke in our Sabbath evening prayer-meeting the first time last night, and now subscribes for the Herald.’ A first-rate way. Let every new convert begin his new life with this holy help.”

Zion’s Herald understands how to “serve God and Mammon” at the same time. But we hope it is not selfish. Let us go shares, neighbor. We suggest that half of the new converts begin their new life with the holy help of THE INDEX.

OUR EASTERN TRIP.

Our recent visit to New England was exceedingly pleasant. After lecturing twice in Boston on Feb. 5, in the tasteful hall of the Parker Fraternity and in Horticultural Hall, we went to Dover, N. H., to meet the staunch friends with whom we spent five of the best and happiest years of our life. Wednesday evening, Feb. 8, a little company of about thirty assembled, notwithstanding the severe snow-storm, in the hospitable parlors of Mrs. J. B. Folsom, to unite in a simple, improvised service; after which the first steps were spontaneously taken towards the formation of a Radical Club. Over twenty names were recorded on the spot. There are brave, true hearts in Dover, and we expect to hear good news from them. Sunday morning, Feb. 12, we repeated our Horticultural Hall lecture in Florence, Mass., before what is in some respects the most wisely organized liberal society in the country; and on Tuesday evening, Feb. 14, we again repeated it in Syracuse, N. Y., in the cosy little hall of the Syracuse Radical Club, which has prospered wonderfully thus far. In all these places we met men and women of the finest minds, earnest, hopeful, and bold, thoroughly inspired with the great ideas which are dawning with such infinite promise of the golden age in the consciousness of our times. A new spirit is sweeping through the land, wakening Æolian music in myriad hearts, and breathing the harmonies which are yet to float around the world, making all men one. We have come back to our work refreshed and ten-fold more in earnest than ever before. Courage and hope, friends—the divine in man is surely and steadily outgrowing the brute, and the light of the morning is already gilding the horizon. Let us each stand true to his trust, and count it a glorious privilege to feel the early beams of the truth that shall at last burst forth in full and perfect splendor.

During our late absence, the supply of paper on which THE INDEX is printed was cut off by the burning of the paper-mills which were under contract to furnish it. As a consequence of this disaster, THE INDEX for Feb. 11 was delayed nearly a week. We are very sorry for this, and trust it will never happen again. One pleasant feature of the mischance, however, was the avalanche of letters we received, sending for the missing number, and proving that our subscribers not only take, but read, THE INDEX. We have sent no second copies, since the first ought to have been received long before this. In case any one has not yet received the copy due him, it will be sent on application.

Mr. A. J. Boyer, formerly co-editor of the Woman’s Advocate with Mrs. Cole, has issued the first number of a four-page monthly paper at Dayton, Ohio, with the name of The Nineteenth Century. It is devoted to “radical reform and the promotion of civil and religious freedom.” If well supported, it promises to become a semi-monthly, and ultimately a weekly. We believe Mr. Boyer to be an earnest and conscientious reformer, who puts his whole soul into his work, writes with raciness, and expresses his thought without fear. Terms, $1.00 a year.

"CREDO" AND "CREDE."

Mr. Thomas Hughes told me that he had faithfully read the reports of the Radical Club in the New York National Standard. "You seem to me to be all a set of popes," he added.

I answered, or should have answered,—“Is not that the thing to be desired? One pope is fatal to free thought, but a million popes guarantee it. As our political institutions abolish monarchy by making every man a monarch, so the Radical Club abolishes popery by making every man his own pope. The ideal of free discussion is that each should issue a bull announcing his own thought, and leaving out the excommunications.”

It is the difference between credo and crede. Every man should have a credo and announce it as frankly as possible. It is simply the present indicative, first person singular, “I believe;” that is all. But when you change the mood to the imperative, and write crede, you become a bigot and a despot. This is the original form of our modern word “creed.” Not “I believe,” which is innocent, but “believe thou,” which is intolerable.

It is just this distinction which people find it so hard to see. Mr. Abbot's evangelical critics on the one side, and some of his radical critics on the other, think him inconsistent in objecting to the creed of the Brahmo Somaj, while announcing “Fifty Affirmations” of his own. But the truth is that Mr. Abbot is in this, as he usually is, more clear-headed than his critics. For an individual to announce his opinions is a credo; for an organization to be based on opinions is to set up a crede, or creed. The one is right, the other is dangerous; at any rate they are two wholly different things. Credo is the every-man-his-own-pope of the Radical Club and the Free Religious Association; but crede culminates in a papacy whose head is Rome, or Princeton, or Andover, or Cambridge.

Of course at every step you take away from crede, you introduce variations. An Andover theological student writes to the Springfield Republican in dismay, that at the last Free Religious Convention he heard six different definitions of religion! I am encouraged. I did not think there were so many. Those Conventions must be even more interesting and valuable than I had supposed. But he did not mean it as a compliment; only as a censure. What is remarkable is this,—that my Presbyterian friends point out the same fatal divergence and want of solid unity among Congregationalists; and my Episcopalian friends among Presbyterians; while every Roman Catholic friend you have will guarantee your speedy conversion, if you will but read Bossuet's “Variations of Protestantism,” and see whereunto these things tend. The more you hold a man to crede, the less he has the trouble of thinking for himself; once teach a man to be satisfied with credo, and he will go on thinking for himself while he lives.

Von Humboldt remarks that, in a troop of wild dogs, all look nearly alike, and he contrasts this with the infinite variety of look among civilized and educated dogs. It is the same with men, he says; among savages there is a face of the tribe; among civilized men there is a face for every individual. Fancy a New Zealander's dismay when he first looks round among such a crowd, in Boston perhaps, where every man has his own face. “It is frightful,” he says; “I went into yonder hall to see the American face, and behold, I saw as many as six different faces! Let me return to New Zealand immediately!”

There is no such thing as combining the advance of knowledge with the monotony of ignorance. In the conquering German army there is at least an opinion per man; nay, it used to be said that, wherever there were two Germans, there were at least three different opinions. But, on the other hand, in the whole rural population of France, there seems to be but one opinion, that of the priest. It is the victory of variety over monotony, of credo over crede.

T. W. H.

THEOLOGY.

The Free Religious Association was organized “to promote the interests of pure religion, to encourage the scientific study of theology, and to increase fellowship in the spirit.” At the outset some members objected to the second of these three propositions. My objections were based, first, upon the belief that a truly scientific study of theology is impossible; and, secondly, that theology is at best but indirectly connected with religion; the study of it as an essential element of religion promotes the interests of sectarianism, and encourages bitterness of spirit rather than fellowship in the spirit.

The Society has been in existence for several years, and some of us now ask,—What advance have our would-be scientists made in the prosecution of their work? We have heard most of the speeches made upon our platform, and have read such as we have not heard. We have listened at the Radical Club and have read The Radical. We have studied the pamphlets published by our Association, and sat at the feet of our wise men and women in Horticultural Hall. THE INDEX, of course, has been one of our Penates, and we have noted, with profound admiration, Mr. Towne's efforts in his Examiner to promote brotherly love and spiritual fellowship. During four long years, we skeptics, keeping our minds open to conviction, have watched the scientists, hoping to catch a glimpse of that Deity yet to be constructed by scientific methods. For one, I am obliged to say our friends have failed. We have been treated to plenty of theology, and philosophical statements have not been wanting, but no approach to a scientific statement has been made.

In saying this I do not forget Mr. Abbot's recent discourse in Boston. On the contrary, and in view of his eminent position in the ranks of our scientific theologians, I have read this lecture with considerable care and with some expectation, but find in it only fresh evidence that it is necessary to divorce religion from theology in order to promote the interests of a free and pure religion.

Let us notice briefly a few leading points of this case.

It is in part an attempt to indicate the relation science bears to theology, and we are justified (are we not?) in expecting to find the announcement that a development of “fellowship in the spirit” is to be one result of an application of science to our study of theology. In place of this, however, we are startled by a declaration of war, and are summoned to enlist on one side or the other in the “Civil War in Free Religion.” The essayist defined the issue and proceeds, as theological controversialists usually do, to abuse his opponents. They have “not unlearned the orthodox habit . . . of looking down superciliously on those who think differently from them.” They deal in “empty affirmations” and in listening to them “the world's heart grows sick with hope deferred.”

Now what is the casus belli?

Mr. Abbot says that some of us dogmatize about the existence of God; we take it for granted; we belong to the intuitional school, and plant ourselves upon the theory that the revelation of God in the soul is a part of the universal spiritual outfit of every human being. He declares war against this gross superstition, and calls upon us to hold the question of the existence of God an open one until science shall have answered it. Her present attitude towards God is one of “pure indifference;” she is busy (as she should be, I think) with mundane problems, but when she gets ready she will give a final answer to our anxious, earnest questions about God. In the meantime we must wait. It is a hard thing, he thinks, to be “thrown back upon ourselves”; but we must make the best of it. Poor consolation, is it not, for the “world's heart?” It must grow sick again with hope deferred.

How will it do, Mr. Abbot; if we hold on to the idea of God, since we possess it, or rather it possesses us, until science teaches us a higher thought? Need we go to war because we differ about the process by which we have come to believe in God, and must we forego our belief because we cannot agree as to the process?

Curiously enough, Mr. Abbot rejects for himself the advice offered to others. He believes in God already, and what is still more strange, he forecloses the question by assuring us that, after all, science will confirm the “empty affirmations” he is now so ready to despise. He expresses the opinion, indeed he is “convinced, that the final answer of science will but deepen, fortify and exalt our human faith in God as intelligent, self-conscious Being.” What convinced him, and what does he mean by faith? Has he arrived at this conclusion by any scientific procedure? Do we find a scientific statement demonstrating the existence of God, in the “Affirmations” or the “Modern Principles?” It is somewhat singular that, relying solely upon science to answer the grave question, he should tell us that science has not answered it, has thus far been indifferent to it, and in the same essay assure us that he is already convinced. Until he furnishes us with the reason for the faith which is in him, we shall surmise that he came by it in pretty much the same manner as the rest of us; and we have good grounds for this surmise. Notwithstanding his war upon what he sometimes calls intuitionalism and at other times revelation, he has already given in his adherence to it. In his fine essay on the “Essence of Religion,” he informs us that “the strong, secret, purifying impulse to seek ideal excellence is, in my own thought, the natural revelation of God within the soul.” He attempts to qualify this by saying, “but the fact is one thing and my intellectual theory of it is quite another.” This qualification is of no importance. He may have an intellectual theory concerning the impulse, but when he ascribes it to revelation he admits the whole question. The revelation, he says, is natural, and it is therefore antecedent to the intellectual theory. Suppose the “impulse to seek ideal excellence” is denied altogether. He believes it is a natural revelation. What, then, must his answer be? Will he not maintain that every one making the denial has the "higher reason in an undeveloped state?"

For one, I am not willing to accept Mr. Abbot's declaration of war. I do not believe any of us have been "supercilious in manner;" and, if we except The Examiner, the essays and speeches of our members have been generally characterized by a catholicity of spirit very creditable to them and to the Society. The cause of the war is insufficient, unless we wish to fall back into the ruts of sectarianism. The Christian church employs itself busily in quarrelling about God, and is no nearer a settlement of the question today than it was when Athanasius and Arius discussed it. They promoted a warfare no more fruitless and profitless than the one to which we are now invited.

Let us have scientific investigations of all questions appertaining to science, and, if some of us think theology is one of them, if we still cling to the hope that through science finite man will ultimately be able to comprehend the Infinite, let us proceed with our work in the spirit of truth and fellowship, allowing the sects to monopolize the spirit of controversy and war.

R. P. H.

"GOETHE'S CONVERSATIONS WITH MUELLER," edited by C. A. H. Burkhardt, have only recently been published in Germany, although Mueller has been dead twenty years. It has been impossible to give his literary remains to the world before on account of the decease of one after another of his literary executors before completing the work. The book has been looked for expectantly by all who knew of Mueller's relations with Goethe, and his character for ability and integrity. Chapters are now being published in The Radical, translated for that magazine by C. C. Shackford, whose translations of Auerbach's works have been received with great favor and commendation. The complete work will be published in book form early in the spring.

MODERN SKEPTICISM.—We believe that a great change is preparing in religious opinion, of which these and many of our best men know almost nothing. To those who are thrown into the currents of life, it is evident that men's minds are in unusual working, and that the very foundations of religious belief are rotten and shaking. Among all the earnest-minded young men who are at this moment leading in thought and action in America, we venture to say that four-fifths are skeptical even of the great historical facts of Christianity.

What is held as Christian doctrine by the churches, is not even considered by them. And furthermore, there is among them a general ill-concealed distrust of the clerical body as a class, and an utter disgust with the aspect of modern Christianity and of church worship. This skepticism is not flippant; little is said about it. It is not a peculiarity alone of the radicals and fanatics; many of them are calm and of even balance of mind, and belong to no class of ultraists. It is not worldly and selfish. The doubters lead in the bravest and most self-denying enterprises of the day. It is not an unbelief to be laughed at, or hunted down. It is calm, abiding, earnest, sorrowful.

Not much is known of it above; but it underlies now all the strongest external movements. There are, however, glimpses of it. You see it in the daily diminishing influence of the pulpit, and the increasing influence of the press; in the lessening number of strong and original minds who take hold of theology, and the tone of the men who are leading American thought. It speaks in those strange longings for new revelations, and in the occasional denunciation of the old.—Independent.

A Glasgow merchant, on his death-bed, sent for a Free Church clergyman. Having some fears regarding his future prospect, he asked the reverend gentleman: "Do you think if I were to leave £10,000 to the Free Kirk that my soul would be saved?" "Well," answered the cautious minister, "I couldn't just promise you that, but I think it's an experiment well worth trying."

A little boy once said to his aunt: "Aunt, I should think that Satan must be an awful trouble to God." "He must be trouble enough; indeed, I should think so," she answered. "I don't see how he came to turn out so, when there was no devil to put him up to it," said the boy.

"Lovers of Fruits and flowers and home adornments should read advertisement headed 'FRUIT RECORDER AND COTTAGE GARDENER,' in this number."

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

PROGRESS ETERNAL.

We learn of Heaven as of a land
Where care and sorrow cease,
A land of perfect, holy rest,
Where souls may be at peace.

A land from toil and labor free,
Where grief may never come,
Where aching hearts are comforted,
And sorrow finds a home.

A home we can not reach until
We leave this earthly sphere:
A happiness we may not find
Around, about us here.

Is this the highest, grandest hope
A noble soul can feel,
While striving for the perfect right
With steadfast love and zeal?

Or is there yet a higher aim
We may aspire unto,
A ceaseless, endless work for us
When this short life is through?

For is it not a truer bliss
To feel we're moving on,—
That we shall never cease to grow,—
The victory ne'er quite won?

For what were rest without that toil
Which makes our rest so dear?
And what were joy, if all were joy,
If sorrow ne'er came near?

Then let us not despise this life,
And only wish it done;
But think of it as truly part
Of our eternal one.

Then may we find our heaven here,
Nor need to wait one hour;
'Tis ready for our times of joy,
And when the storm-clouds lower.

Nor can this thought one moment dim
The joy that it will prove,
To meet those loving ones again
Whom God has called above.

LIBERALISM AND FANATICISM.

CROMWELL, IND., Dec. 22, 1870.

FRIEND ABBOT,—With anxious longing I wait for each weekly mail that brings to me THE INDEX, for it is the greatest consolation to me to know that there are so many hearts in this broad land that beat in unison with my own. For eighteen years I have been a Liberalist, and fate has always cast my lot in Christian society exclusively, by which I have not been canonized for my faith, I can assure you, but am treated by them as a dog or an outcast. And having been an invalid for the last two years, I have received a very small amount of sympathy in my suffering at their hands.

But God preserve THE INDEX! It is joy and gladness for me to know that men dare think, and dare to write their thoughts regardless of Christianity.

When a man's mind is open enough or developed enough to see and to feel that mankind are one universal, common brotherhood; that the destiny of one man is the destiny of the race; that each is destined to live; and to live but to learn; and that in knowledge alone are we happy; then, like the opening bud, as it were, swelling and bursting with thought, shelling off the husks of bigotry and superstition, does the human mind open out into bloom and fragrance, the immortal flower of reason.

He cries not then to his brother—"thou fool!" nor, as he passes, does he seem to say—"I am holier than thou."

Yet there are darkened minds whose only bliss lies in the thought that 'tis not they who are to suffer. There are those in this world who profess the Christian religion and by their construction of it would heartlessly and hopelessly doom father, mother, and even their own offspring, to eternal woe; while their "theological hatred" of all those who disbelieve such infernal doctrines, knows no bounds.

Should one come among them endeavoring to teach higher and holier thoughts of God, and more ennobling views of man, or hinting that heaven is a condition open to all men alike, all orthodox Christendom is alive in a moment, and a madness equal to frenzy seizes hold upon them.

The itinerant minister denounces him from the pulpit. The school director is beset to know if it is proper to allow him to talk to the people in the school-house. Yes, even the postmaster thinks that such "fandangoes" should not be tolerated there, for "his teachings would lead the children astray;" while one poor pious soul meekly suggests that "these infidel preachers are a disgrace to any good, moral community, and should be egged out of town."

Will this people ever learn a lesson of charity and forgiveness? Let them go to the heathen, whom they seek to "convert," or hearken to the voice of Confucius, saying,—“The superior man is one who entertains an equal feeling of benevolence toward all men, and has no egotism or partiality. The vulgar man is he who has none but sentiments of egotism, without any benevolent disposition toward all men in general.” Again,—“He who is conscientious, and who feels toward others the same sentiments he has for himself, is not far from the truth.”

How well the "darkness of paganism" compares with the "light of Christianity!" Yet these babes in Christ betray their need of some nursery tale to frighten them, as it were, into obedience to law and order; for they boldly avow that, if they believed there were no hell in the other world, they should consider themselves under no restriction against criminality in this. Thus you perceive they could do as well without a Savior as without a devil. And notice with what fear and trembling they approach the altar of brotherly love! If they hear the voice of the world's Savior—"Behold I stand at the door and knock,"—instead of throwing the door open wide to admit him at once, they peep out of some chink to assure themselves that the Devil is not there, too. Are they not really afraid to trust themselves to be alone with principle and alone with God?

I feel thankful to have lived long enough to see this doctrine of endless misery fading away like an old garment that has been worn threadbare and will soon be cast aside with other relics of the past.

A prominent writer says upon this subject:—

"If there existed the least possibility that any one of the human family should be miserable hereafter—that children should in any possible event go into everlasting punishment,—then I should recommend the Shaker system to all. Abolish all marriages; love no more; bring no more children into existence; smile no more; hang the heavens in mourning; blot out the twinkling stars, and be ye miserable, even as your fathers and your mothers, your sons and daughters, may be miserable in the world to come. You who feel this doctrine as truth should be consistent forever with it.

And when nature shows her circling gems, her mountains, rivers and landscapes of wild and wondrous beauty; when she lets you hear her vocal valleys and the music of the curling wave which breaks against the shore; then, if you believe in future misery, close your eyes and deafen your ears, because these joyous truths, these evangels of existence, these beautiful sights and sounds, must only agitate your soul, excite useless hopes, and enhance the misery of life. Before all, death would show his hideous front, eternal misery clank his chains, while the deafening discord of his sighs would make the angels weep, and drive all music, all joy, all heaven, from this beautiful universe."

Please accept my heartfelt wishes for your success in the cause of humanity.

Yours fraternally,

N. E. DOANE.

CREDO.

1. THERE IS ONE GOD.

There can be but one supreme being; for, if we imagine two or more Gods, then are they not supreme, but must necessarily limit each other. If they do not agree in their opinions, then must one decide against the other, and the second is not supreme.

If, however, it be said that to infinite wisdom no mistake could happen, and there could be no possible difference of opinion, then a second person in the Godhead would be unnecessary and contrary to the economy of Nature, as well as the dictates of reason.

Moreover, God being pure spirit, two or more persons of the same knowledge and other general attributes cannot preserve their separate identity and must be merged into one.

2. THERE MAY BE INFERIOR SPIRITS.

All men are imbued with the Divine spirit to a greater or less degree. This is implied in the general belief of the origin, characteristics, and ultimate destiny of the soul. The disengaged spirits must either have a separate existence, or be merged into one, as the Brahmins believe. But here there is room for individuality, and it is quite uniformly held that they have a separate existence.

3. SPIRITS MAY DIFFER IN DEGREES OF EXCELLENCE AND GLORY.

Admitting the immortality of the soul, are all or a part of its faculties to be perpetuated? Evidently only a part, since, as the body is useless, such faculties of the mind as pertain to the gratification of animal appetites are also useless. We shall probably retain perception, imagination, reason, memory, etc. These must be immortal, if the mind is immortal; for take them away from it, and what is there left? Now these faculties are constantly changing. The mind preserves its conscious identity, but at no two periods is exactly the same. In a year such changes may take place in a person's mind, that it will be vastly different from its former state. Their faculties and their peculiar development form character. Take them away, and no character or individuality is left. These souls must enter the future state in an endless variety of culture and power. This idea gives an incentive to exertion, since we shall retain our hard-earned knowledge, forming as it does an inseparable part of the mind. Is it possible that a mind like Newton's, which has been engaged for a lifetime in eager searchings for a few truths which (he says) are only as a few pebbles compared to the great ocean in whose depths lie treasures unknown—is it possible that he would not revel in the midst of evidences of infinite wisdom, love, and power, more than he of the sluggish brain could ever imagine, even if illuminated according to the popular but groundless belief? We may reasonably suppose that in Heaven there are different degrees of felicity, and that the reward of devotion to intellectual culture and fidelity to moral principles will be found in an increased degree of innate happiness.

4. ALL MEN MAY BE SAVED.

Objection has been urged against universal salvation, that the righteous and wicked would receive the same reward, etc. But this idea springs from the erroneous theory of equality in the future state. The first proof that there is an infinite diversity of happiness in Heaven is from analogy. The dull boor plods to and from his daily toil with little or no admiration of beautiful scenes of nature surrounding him; the educated lover of nature sees much to admire; the artistic eye observes beauty of grouping, light and shade, detecting those innumerable little things which go to make a landscape. To the combined artistic and poetic mind, which "Sees forms appear and disappear," a new charm is added, and his enjoyment is more full and complete than the other's. Of one it has been said—

"A primrose at the water's brim
A yellow primrose was to him,
And it was nothing more."

Is it nothing more to one who understands the harmony and delicacy of its structure and colors, and the beautiful associations clinging about the modest flower? It may be said that persons capable of the greatest pleasure are more sensitive to pain, and thus nature equalizes her burdens on us all. If this were true here, yet it would have no force as applying to the future state, for then most causes of sorrow are removed. Now can we not conceive that such differences may exist in the future state?

If such differences do not exist, there can be no recognition of friends.

We recognize our friends by means of their features, voice, manner, etc. We esteem them for certain peculiar qualities of mind and heart. Now few will contend that our present bodies will be raised. It must be a perfect body, an ideal body, perhaps similar to our own in general outline, but without weakness, deformity, or liability to decay. A little consideration will suffice to convince any candid mind that the transformation must be so great as to prevent identification by means of the body.

Now, unless the spirits differ, and in the same characteristic features which originally pertained to them, what room is there for identification or even identity?

"What idea, then, have you of Heaven?" you will ask. I object to the cold, cheerless, joyless "Heaven" of dogmatic theology, and perhaps Hades would be the more appropriate term for my conception.

To the enlightened it is a place of almost supreme happiness; and if it be said that the wicked enjoy the same happiness, then the answer will be, that they are incapable of it. A belief in physical torture, as punishment, in the future state, is now happily superseded by the more rational belief that the torment will consist in remorse and endless longing for the happiness beyond their capacity. According to the most liberal construction of orthodoxy, at least nine-tenths of the human race will be condemned to eternal punishment. The devil has defeated God's purpose, and "to the victor belong the spoils."

I, for one, dare not accuse God of such malignant cruelty, such wholesale slaughter and diabolical vengeance upon the creatures he has called into being.

Purgatory, probation, or any name applied to that state of purification and development necessary to the full enjoyment of Heaven, does not necessitate a separate place with distinct bounds. A "prison-house" is by no means indispensable.

Here, then, is a vast multitude, many of whom have hitherto lived almost altogether in the exercise of the lower faculties, gratifying pride, appetite and lust. Now, then, animal nature is removed, and with it their occupation is gone; for their moral natures are sunken, their mental faculties weak. Now what would be the effect upon such a person under the restraining and educating influences of good society in which he might be obliged to move?

1. He would feel a sense of inferiority on account of his ignorance.

2. He would be spurred to undertake improvement.

3. He would keenly regret his misspent time, his unthankfulness to God for numberless blessings, his lost opportunities for doing good, his evil influence upon others, remembrances which would be neither transient nor agreeable.

Finally, he would go on improving, never losing a sense of regret for lost opportunities; but increasing wisdom would yield unto him increasing happiness. Thus he would receive his punishment and his reward.

ANN ARBOR, Jan. 23, 1871.

"LAW."

THE IRRESPONSIBILITY OF MAN.

MALINE, N. Y., Dec. 26, 1870.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Dear Sir,—The question discussed lately by yourself and Mr. Crane, is about the only question I have given much thought to for the last thirty years. I was taught when a boy that Adam's fall brought a curse upon the whole animal creation, as well upon those who were not accountable as upon those who were. But I could not be reconciled to such a doctrine; for before I was out of my boyhood, I saw a perfect, unchangeable, unalterable, and infinite law, governing the entire universe without any deviations or exceptions. Therefore I could not help departing from the road in which I was trained to go.

All the different and multitudinous creeds and rituals looked so inconsistent that I gave them little heed; for they have been so perforated by philosophy, reason, and common sense, they can be seen through as plainly as through a sieve. But to the question, for all others sink comparatively into nothing; and you will allow me to state it in my own way. Why is the way of the transgressor hard, when we cannot help transgressing? Now we all admit that "the way of transgressors is hard;" but it is harder not to transgress, for we can live and transgress, and we cannot live and not transgress, unless we can be perfect, which is a state no one claims for himself, much less for his neighbor. We are punished only for our own individual good and benefit, and it makes little or no difference whether we are accountable, blamable, guilty or not, for the All-Wise One, who is the only one that moves on this great chess-board of creation, always moves right. He always hews to the mark, not caring which way the chips may fly. All things to us are relative. We stand on the mean between extremes, at all times and under all circumstances. No cost, no worth; one talent as good as ten. If not, the Maker is accountable, and not that which is made. What we want, and what we do not want, are equal. Or, in other words, we want just as much as we do not want. We should be as thankful for woes as for blessings; as thankful for thirst as for water; as thankful for hunger as for food; as thankful for storms as for sunshine. One is the legitimate consequence of the other. Each by the other is begotten. One is dead without the other. Perhaps no person on this "footstool" has a freer religion than myself. I want it as free as God is free. My party or creed does not exclude angels or reptiles.

If we can read God direct, why should we waste time trying to read that which is second-hand and void of reason and common sense? There is nothing right but truth. There is nothing wrong but ignorance. When we cast up our accounts, the debt or credit is carried forward; but the books of the Infinite balance. If we are free to strike the chords which are interwoven through all creation by the God of Nature, we shall produce a sound that will vibrate in one harmonious melody to all eternity. Let him write who writes one perfect and unbroken law, and let these mortal hands keep still.

Yours, freely,

GEO. H. STEVENS.

THE DUTY OF FREE UTTERANCE.

[From Spencer's "First Principles," p. 123.]

"Whoever hesitates to utter that which he thinks the highest truth, lest it should be too much in advance of the time, may reassure himself by looking at his acts from an impersonal point of view. Let him duly realize the fact that opinion is the agency through which character adapts external arrangements to itself—that his opinion rightly forms part of this agency—is a unit of force, constituting with other such units the general power which works out social changes; and he will perceive that he may properly give full utterance to his innermost conviction, leaving it to produce what effect it may. It is not for nothing that he has in him those sympathies with some principles and repugnance to others. He with all his capacities and aspirations and beliefs is not an accident, but a product of the time. He must remember that while he is a descendant of the past, he is a parent of the future; and that his thoughts are as children born to him, which he may not carelessly let die. He, like every other man, may properly consider himself as one of the myriad agencies through whom works the Unknown Cause; and when the Unknown Cause produces in him a certain belief, he is thereby authorized to profess and act out that belief. The highest truth he sees he will fearlessly utter, knowing that, let what may come of it, he is thus playing his right part in the world."

ANTEDILUVIAN CONSCIENCE.

[The following note, printed in the Northampton (Mass.) Free Press, is sent by a friend. A more temperate criticism of a more foolish scruple it would be hard to find.]

MR. EDITOR:—It was stated a few weeks since in the Free Press that a man living in a neighboring village refused, on account of conscientious scruples, to sell brooms to the Free Congregational Society of Florence. Now this man's fidelity to his conscience is to be commended, and no persons would treat it with more respect than the members of the Florence Society. The only thing in the matter that they regret is that this honest man has been misinformed, either through ignorance or design, as to the character of the Free Congregational Society. The aim of the organization is to "Prove all things, and hold fast that which is good." It does not condemn a man before it hears him. It does not believe that Truth is so weak as to be unable to grapple with Error. It believes in fair play in religion as well as in other matters. Believing that there is something yet to be learned, it is unwilling to admit that all knowledge can be stated in a creed, or that we have exhausted the Infinite. What is there in these positions to which any good man ought to object? To me, it seems the course of the Florence Society is the only wise and consistent one for all who wish to know and follow the truth.

S. H.

A WARNING.—"It is true that if philosophers have suffered, their cause has been amply avenged. Extinguished theologians lie about the cradle of every science, as the strangled snakes beside that of Hercules."—Prof. Huxley.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

SINGLE COPIES

OF

THE INDEX for 1870

Containing the following

ESSAYS.

Will be mailed from THE INDEX office (post-paid) on receipt of

FIVE CENTS:

	No.
The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion,	1
What is Free Religion?	3
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Corner-Stones,	4
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Institutions, Terms of Fellowship, Social Ideal, Moral Ideal, and Essential spirit,	5
The Practical Work of Free Religion,	6
Unitarianism versus Freedom,	7
Sunday Schools,	8
Friendship,	9
The Miracle Question,	10
Grief and its Compensations,	11
The Hebrew Prophets,	12
Capital Punishment,	13
Human Ideals,	14
The Essence of Religion,	15
The Management of Children,	16
A Quaker's Letter to a Presbyterian, P. S. D. ,	17
Comparison of Jesus and Socrates. (Report from the N. Y. Tribune),	17
The Candle of the Lord,	18
Public Opinion,	19
Conscience,	20
The Pedigree of Man,	21
"Following Christ,"	22
The Tongue,	23
The Golden Age,	24
What is Truth?	25
The Last Battle on the Creed Question,	26
Observance of the Sabbath, Rev. W. W. Williams ,	27
The Sunday Question,	28
Motes and Beams,	29
The Dove's Departure,	30
The Bible in the Public Schools,	31
Religious Freedom,	32
A Plain Talk to Young Men,	33
Noise,	34
The Humility of Free Religion,	35
Chaos and Cosmos,	36
An Oration on Alexander Von Humboldt,	37
Relation of Spiritualism to Free Religion,	38
War and Free Religion,	39
Religious Revivals,	40
Mary and Martha,	41
The Ministry of Free Religion,	42
Success,	43
"Repentance" and "Forgiveness,"	44
Spiritual Beauty,	45
The Book of Daniel,	46
The Unity of Spiritual Freedom and the Opportunity which America offers for its Development. W. J. Potter ,	47
The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition,	47
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? Chas. Reemelin ,	47
The Work of Radicalism in Indiana. J. O. Martin ,	47
Religion in the Light of Reason and Common Sense. Isaac M. Wise ,	47
Sunday—Its Uses and Abuses. Thomas Vickers ,	48
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? E. Peckham ,	49
Parties and Party Spirit,	50
The Future of Religious Organization, as Affected by the Spirit of the Age,	51
The Incarnation. A Christmas Discourse,	52
Transient and Permanent,	53

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

Free Religious Association.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, on "The Idea of the Free Religious Association;" DAVID A. WASSON, on "The Nature of Religion;" MRS. E. D. CHENEY, on "Religion as a Social Force;" F. E. ABBOT, on "The Future of Religious Organization as affected by the Spirit of the Age;" S. JOHNSON, on "The Natural Sympathy of Religions;" RABBI WISE, on "The Universal Elements in Judaism;" COL. T. W. HIGGINSON, on "Mohammedanism;" WM. H. CHANING, on "The Religions of China;" W. J. POTTER, on "The Religions of India;" and an abstract of a discussion on the "Relation of Religion to the Public School System of the United States." This Report is specially representative of the principles of the Association. Price 50 cents. In packages of five or more 31 cents each. Also CRANKING'S Address on "THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA," (a careful and instructive essay, of particular interest at this time to Americans) in a separate pamphlet for 20 cents. The ANNUAL REPORT for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cents respectively), Rev. Samuel Johnson's essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cents), and an essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by W. J. POTTER (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained by applying to the Secretary. The Report for 1868 contains a letter from the celebrated Hindu Theist, KESUB CHUNDER SEN, on the "Origin and Aims of the Brahmo Samaj," also an address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, on "Religion and Social Science;" a letter from M. D. CONWAY, on "Religious Movements in England," and speeches by JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHAS. H. MALCOM, JOHN WEISS, and others. The Report for 1869 has addresses by RALPH WALDO EMERSON, D. A. WASSON, JULIA WARD HOWE, C. A. BARTOL, PROF. DENTON, HORACE SEEVER, LUCY STONE, and others.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX PROSPECTUS FOR 1871.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869, and has just closed its first yearly volume.

We deem it proper, therefore, to submit the following PROSPECTUS of Volume II for 1871, and ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if the matter was properly presented to them, and especially if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor. We cannot afford to send out travelling agents, nor would they succeed so well in getting names as persons of local influence. We therefore have determined to use the funds it would cost to get our paper before the people, in another way, namely, in the purchase of articles of value to be given as premiums to those who make up lists of subscribers; thus presenting to the friends of free thought and pure religion the double motive of doing good and getting paid for it.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two Dollars a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

PREMIUMS.

For Fifty Names, we will give one of PRINCE & Co's four Octave Melodeons (price $65,) or a complete copy of CHAMBERS' Encyclopædia of Universal Knowledge, in ten volumes (price $50).

For Forty Names, we will give a Wilson's Family Sewing Machine, one of the best Machines made.

For Twenty-Five Names, Webster's Royal Quarto Unabridged Pictorial Dictionary (price $12), or one of the following Chromos:

The Three Tom-Boys (Prang's), price..... $15.00
Winter in the Forest, 20x28..... 12.00
Watering the Horses, 21x29..... 12.00

For Ten Names, one of the following Chromos:

WHITTIER's Barefooted Boy, (Prang's) price..... $5.00
The Unconscious Sleeper, 11x17..... 6.30
Mt. Blanc, 20x26..... 7.50
Or a copy of LECKY's History of European Morals, 2 vols 6.00
MAX MUELLER's Chips from a German Work-Shop, 2 vols 5.00
EMERSON's Prose Works, 2 vols..... 5.00
WEISS's Life and Correspondence of THEODORE PARKER, 2 volumes..... 6.00

For Five Names, a bound volume of THE INDEX, for 1870. (Price $2.50.) Or a copy of one of the following works, (post paid):

DARWIN's Origin of Species, price..... $2.00
LUBBOCK's Origin of Civilization, price..... 2.00
Essays in Criticism, by MATTHEW ARNOLD, price..... 2.00
Tablets, by A. BRONSON ALCOTT, with portrait, price..... 2.00
Any volume of the writings of THEODORE PARKER or HENRY D. THOREAU, each..... 2.00
On the Heights, AUERBACH..... 2.00

For Four Names, a copy of THE INDEX for 1871, or one of the following books (post paid):

EMERSON's Society and Solitude, price..... $1.75
Nathan the Wise, a dramatic poem translated from LESSING by ELLEN FROTHINGHAM, price..... 1.75
HUXLEY's Lay Sermons and Addresses..... 1.75
Speeches and Lectures, by WENDELL PHILLIPS..... 1.50
Historic Americans, by THEODORE PARKER, price..... 1.50
A copy of The Revolution..... 2.00
Or The Woman's Journal..... 2.00

CASH PREMIUMS.

For 75 Names,..... 50 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 50 Names,..... 25 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 25 Names,..... 15 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 10 Names,..... 5 Dollars in Greenbacks
For less than 10 Names, a Cash Commission of Twenty per Cent.

Any book in the above list will be sent by us post-paid upon the receipt of price.

N. B.—Names need not all come from one post office. We will send the paper wherever directed, and let the names count as clubs. Specimen Copies sent to all who enclose a three cent postage stamp. Address

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
Lock Box 38, Toledo, Ohio.

Guardian Mutual Life Ins. Co.,

ORGANIZED A. D. 1859.

M. O. Waggoner, Gen. Supt. for Ohio, Mich. & Ind.

John H. Hood, Assistant General Superintendent.

Office No. 154 Summit Street,

E. F. MUNGER, } General Agents.
CHAS. M. LANG, }

WALTER C. SCOTT, Local Agent, 152 Summit St.

Special Agents—Kelly Bros., 22 Summit Street.
Office Hours—From 7 in the morning till 9 at night.
Medical Examiners—Drs. Samuel S. Thorn and T. J. Eaton Toledo, O. [1871]

H. M. EDSON,

A. TERRY.

EDSON & TERRY, DENTISTS,

ROOMS 8 & 9 GRADOLPH BLOCK,

TOLEDO, OHIO.

ap16 1y

IMPORTER

Fine Chemicals, Drugs, and Toilet Articles.

Brandies, Wines & Liquors for medicinal purposes only. Also Proprietor of

Toledo Tonic Bitters,

Greatest Remedy known for general debility.

L. E. MULFORD,

23 Summit Street, Corner Perry, Toledo, Ohio
18-1y

THE CELEBRATED CRAIG MICROSCOPE

is an optical wonder: reveals thousands of the hidden Wonders of Nature; is of permanent use and practical availability, combining instruction with amusement, and never losing its interest. It magnifies

TEN THOUSAND TIMES,

a power equal to other Microscopes of many times its cost. Reveals countless little worlds all around us, teeming with life, which to the naked eye must forever remain a sealed book—as Eels in Vinegar, Animals in Water, Cheese Mites, Sugar and Itch Insects, Milk Globules, Claws and Hairs of Insects, Hundreds of eyes in a single eye of a Fly, Dust of a Butterfly's Wings to be perfectly formed Feathers, the much talked of Trichina Spiralis, or Pork Worm, which was first discovered in America with this Microscope.

It is of infinite value to professional men, to teachers, and to students, but NOWHERE IS IT OF GREATER VALUE THAN AT THE FAMILY TABLE, within the reach of every member. It will delight yourself, your children, and your friends during the long winter evenings. It will show you adulterations or uncleanness of various kinds in food, as sugar, tea, bread, meat, etc.

It is of Inestimable Value to the Farmer

in examining insects which prey upon his crops. The power of a $50 Microscope, and so simple in its construction that any child can use it understandingly, and with appreciation.

A Beautiful Present—Elegant, Instructive, Amusing, and Cheap. Over 60,000 sold.

During the past six years its worth has been testified to by thousands of Scientific Men, Farmers, School Teachers, Students, Physicians, Heads of Families, and others.

PRICE, $3.00—Sent by Mail Post-paid.

Every instrument is neatly boxed, and handsomely labelled with full directions for use. Thousands have been sent by mail. Address,
W. J. LINESS & CO.,
Chicago.

FREE! FREE!

"THE MICROSCOPE," a Monthly Journal of Information for the People—the mysteries of Nature explained—interesting information on the wonders of Creation—stories, sketches, etc. Terms $1.00 per year. This Journal will be sent FREE for one year to any one purchasing a Craig Microscope at the regular price, $3.00. (Craig Microscope will be sent post-paid.) For sample copy, and our beautifully illustrated and descriptive circulars, and eight pages of testimonials of Craig Microscope, send six cents for postage to

W. J. LINESS & CO.,

Opticians, and Sole Proprietors of Craig's and Novelty Microscope, CHICAGO, ILL.

AGENTS and DEALERS, this Microscope sells in every family on its merits, when exhibited. LARGE PROFITS. Send for terms. 53126

THE GOLDEN AGE,

A NEW WEEKLY JOURNAL EDITED BY

THEODORE TILTON,

Devoted to the Free Discussion of all Living Questions in Church, State, Society, Literature, Art, and Moral Reform.

PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY, IN NEW YORK.

Price, $3.00 a Year, Cash in Advance.

Mr. TILTON, having retired from THE INDEPENDENT and THE BROOKLYN DAILY UNION, will hereafter devote his whole Editorial labors to THE GOLDEN AGE.

Persons wishing to subscribe will please send their names, with the money, immediately, to

THEODORE TILTON,

P. O. Box 2,948,

60t1

NEW YORK CITY.

FRUIT RECORDER

—AND—

COTTAGE GARDENER.

ENLARGED, 1871, to 16 pages, at $1 per year. All we ask is for you to see a copy of the Paper (which we send free to all applicants,) and let it speak for itself. The Premiums that we offer in Plants and Flowers to those getting up Clubs, would cost you as much at any responsible Nursery as we charge for the paper. Show Bills, Sample Copy, etc. sent free on application to
A. M. PURDY,
61t1 Palmyra, N. Y.

SERMONS

By Rev. O. B. Frothingham.

Forwarded free on receipt of five cents for each.

What is it to be a Christian?
Taking God's Name in Vain.
The Issue with Superstition.
Infernal and Celestial Love.
The Sin Against the Holy Ghost.
Pilate and Jesus.
The Dying and the Living God.
The Foes of Society.
The Living Spring of Water.
Elective Affinity.
Religious Irreligion.
Experience and Hope.
The Radical Belief.
The Eternal Gospel.

DAVID G. FRANCIS,
17 Astor Place, New York.

49t3]

AGENTS WANTED--($225 A MONTH.) BY THE
Machine Co., BOSTON, MASS., or ST. LOUIS, MO. 56-68

Mr. Frothingham's New Book.

CHILD'S BOOK OF RELIGION, for Sunday Schools and Homes. PART I., Worship; PART II., The Good Life; PART III., Truth. In one Volume. New and revised edition. Forwarded free on receipt of $1.00.

DAVID G. FRANCIS,
17 Astor Place, New York.

55-68

WANTED--AGENTS. ($20 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock-stitch" (like on both sides, and is fully licensed). The best and cheapest Family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Boston, Mass., Pittsburg, Pa., Chicago, Ill., or St. Louis, Mo. 88yl

Ministers and Singers will find these particularly Adapted to the Voice. They contain no Cubes, are very palatable, and act like a charm. Superior to all others for

Colds, Sore Throat, Bronchial and all Lung Difficulties.

RUSHTON'S (F. V.) COD LIVER OIL, for Consumption and Scrofula; the first introduced; fresh and pure. Sold by Drug-gists generally. 48m3.

THE FIRST VOLUME OF THE RADICAL.

Persons wishing to complete their sets of THE RADICAL by adding the FIRST VOLUME, which has been for some time out of print, can do so by at once sending me their orders. By reprinting this volume in part, I can supply 100 copies. To be able to do this, I am obliged to fix the price at $5.00. This will secure a copy, sent to any address post paid.

Volume 2, 3, 4, and 5, will be sent, post paid, for $3.50 each. Single copies of THE RADICAL 35 cts.

The May number contains Mr. Wasson's review of Mr. Abbot's Religion.

The June number contains Mr. Frothingham's article on "What is Religion for?"

Address S. H. MORSE, office of "The Radical," Boston, Mass.

The Index.

VOL. 2.—No. 9.

TOLEDO, OHIO, MARCH 4, 1871.

WHOLE No. 62.

The Index,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION,

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, OHIO.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Editorial Contributors.

CHRISTIANITY VERSUS FREE RELIGION.

[A Sermon by Rev. Dr. Powers, of St. John's Church, Chicago, preached February 13, 1870, and reprinted from the Chicago Tribune of next day.]

The subject of "Christianity vs. Free Religion" was discussed on last evening by Rev. Dr. Powers. His church (St. John's, Union Park) was densely packed on the occasion, many persons going over from the other divisions of the city to hear him. Taking for his text the words found in 1st Corinthians, 1, 24,—"Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God,"—he said:—

One characteristic of the religious aspect of the age is an increasing interest in the study of the historic Christ, and a more general and, I think, better appreciation of his gospel in its practical bearings on the everyday life of man. While the influence of science has caused some fluctuations in the drift of religious thought, and excited a lively spirit of inquiry, Christianity as a divine gift, an element of renewing and conserving power suited to accomplish for humanity the highest good, has received no permanent shock, but has multiplied its beneficent agencies, and disclosed a wider horizon of blessed promise for the race.

As in every age it has had its opponents, whose assaults vary with the intellectual phenomena of the times, so now there are those who, professedly with pure motives, deny its claims. What is a little singular, some of the most accomplished advocates of the free religion which they propose to substitute for the gospel were once, in a certain sense, believers in Jesus. The doctrines enunciated by this class of thinkers through the press and from the platform are doubtless influential over many minds and insidiously affect, to some extent, the religious views of many who are not prepared to repudiate the Christian faith.

Mere controversialism within the church is to me simply repulsive. Still I cannot let such bold and arrogant assertions respecting Christianity as are made by some of the free religionists go unchallenged. Within the limits of a single discourse I can hope only to present a mere outline of some of the questions that I deem worthy of your consideration. Mr. Francis E. Abbot, formerly a Unitarian minister in New England, and now preaching to a society of Theists in Toledo, Ohio, where he also edits a weekly paper to advance his views, sums up the system of free religion in contrast with Christianity very succinctly, in three paragraphs, which, as presenting the subject as now held by the most advanced apostles of his school, afford a convenient text for study and examination.

The first point is as follows,—"The essential spirit of Christianity is that of self-humiliation at the feet of Jesus and passionate devotion to his person. The essential spirit of free religion is that of self-respect and self-devotion to great ideas. Christianity is pro- trate on its face. Free Religion is erect on its feet." Here are two affirmations. Let us extract from them the truth.

Man, as his history abundantly shows, is assimilated in character to the being whom he worships. The hateful attributes of the heathen deities were copied in the persons of their devotees. Where the gods were believed to be lustful, blood-thirsty, fickle, arbitrary, and revengeful, the people took their spirit and imitated their example. On the same principle Christianity will be shaped and inspired by him who is its source. The gospel teaches that Christ is the representative of spiritual perfection; the revealer of God; the soul of all that is morally lovely, true, and glorious in the universe. He typifies the highest virtues. He illustrates the crown of manhood. He shows the very flower of the sublimest sacrifice. He attests for man a supreme and ineffable love. In him is the fulness of the Godhead. Now I agree that the "essential spirit of Christianity is self-humiliation at his feet—a passionate devotion to his person." But what is the fruit of this? Is it spiritual bondage? Is it the abrogation of self-respect, moral responsibility, a wholesome self-reliance? Is it enervating to the highest manliness? Is it narrowing to the largest sympathies, or in any way degrading to the nature which, in its ruins, shows such wonderful possibilities of spiritual growth and power? On the contrary, so mighty, so supreme in inspiration is this person of Jesus, that "self-humiliation at his feet" is the very means to the truest and most joyous exaltation. Out of this passionate devotion to him grow the most heroic will, the most dauntless intrepidity, the largest expansion of the affectional nature, the highest and most harmonious activities of the liberated and purified soul. This is one of the enigmas of Christianity; obscure to the uninitiated, but experimentally known to the true believer. Indeed all human experience corroborates such a result. He who in the presence of one whose nature is rich and pure and noble feels his own meanness and unworthiness is on the road to a better life. There is moral strength in contact with what is great and good. He that humbleth himself shall be exalted, is one of the most practical principles of the gospel. It is when struck with reverence at illustrious virtues above us, when awed and humbled by the splendor that flashes out of wonderful purity, and sacrifice, and love, that we are brought to a state of preparation to receive the influences of a higher life, to grasp truth lovingly, to rise up to manly work, to do, and dare, and suffer in the assurance of securing a lasting good. It is a fact of ordinary observation that the holy charm of a true and noble woman before whom a man bows himself, begets in him that self-respect, that high tone of feeling, that largeness of purpose and sympathy that were unknown before his passionate devotion brought a sense of reverence and humiliation. So, on a proportionally higher plane and scale, is humanity affected by self-humiliation at the feet of Jesus. Devotion to his person in this spirit incites to the practice of his virtues, inspires a consciousness of the exalted uses, intentions, and possibilities of being, furnishes the highest motives to conduct, reaches the springs of sincerest feeling, and begets a glorious liberty foreign to the spirit of self-confidence and pride.

But this will appear more clearly as we note the assertion that "the essential spirit of free religion is that of self-respect and free devotion to great ideas." The great moral and spiritual ideas which are crystallized in human lives, and which are the inspiration and strength of all righteous effort and noble character, were disclosed by whom, and when? A few, fragmentary and mixed with error, are scattered through the Vedas and the works of Confucius, Buddha, Zoroaster, and the Greek and Roman sages; many more, valuable and divine, but preliminary to a fuller dispensation, are revealed in the Hebrew Scriptures; but all of practical utility are set forth, clear, sharp-cut, coherent, and majestic in their fullness and scope and relations by Jesus Christ. Look elsewhere for the great ideas of brotherhood, an exact and infinite justice united with supreme mercy, the divine fatherhood whose perfect sympathy embraces the degraded, and ignorant, and wretched,—the ideas that lie at the basis of our family life, our social order, our humane institutions and liberal government, ideas that make men true, valiant, generous, pure, magnanimous, self-contained, and you will find their fountain in the gospel. They are embodied, illustrated, and made vital and commanding in Christ. Practically, ideas of righteousness, justice, love, sacrifice, have no existence in mere abstractions. They must be embodied in a person or they fail to excite our admiration or establish our faith. When we sift the matter in question down to bare facts, we find that the very notions of self-respect and self-devotion to great ideas were derived from the truth as it is in Jesus; that the highest truths by which men live have their disclosure in his ministry and life. If Christianity did not exist, the very best ideas of the free religionists would not be. Devotion to the person of Jesus is practically devotion to the grand ideas of progress, liberty, spiritual disenthralment, illumination of soul, of knowledge, and virtue, and the best uses of being. There can be no higher self-respect than for a man to regard himself as a vessel of the divine glory, a brother of Christ, an heir to the celestial thrones and beatitudes. The cleanliness, the candor, the generosity, the self-control and integrity and love inspired and fostered by close and affectionate contact with Christ must inevitably beget such a sense of self-reverence as to be gloriously invigorating to its possessor. Devotion to him increases it. The very humiliation that is most self-forgetful feeds it. From the vale of his lowliness the man is lifted to the mountain-top of blessed and exalted attainment. If one thing is clear in the phenomena of the spiritual life, it is that all great moral victories are through this spirit of self-renunciation and abasement before what is infinitely glorious. "Christianity is flat on its face," but this man ascends to the heavenly places in the sweet liberty of love. "Free Religion is erect on its feet," but this holds man down to the low level and narrow limit of his creative poverty.

In the second paragraph which I am to consider, Mr. Abbot says,—"The noblest fruit of Christianity is a self-sacrificing love of man for Jesus's sake. The noblest fruit of Free Religion is a self-sacrificing love of man for man's own sake." Allowing this, and striking at the root of the matter, what do we discover? Is not self-sacrificing love of man for Jesus's sake the highest possible motive in human conduct? As Christianity teaches, Jesus represents the highest humanity—all that is possible in the amplest endowments, the most glorious meanings of man. He discloses the real worth of man, the preciousness of human affections, the obligations of brotherhood, the use and end of life. Not only so, but his sufferings and teachings, his life and death, show how dear man is to the heart of God, and how dear men should be to each other. It is the love of Jesus that incites love to our fellow-men. We cannot rise to a right conception of this love, or an experience of its power, until we apprehend Jesus and love him. "Whatsoever ye do to the least of these my brethren, ye do it unto me." He takes their place, assumes their burdens, demonstrates their preciousness. So, in the highest sense, to sacrifice for man's sake, we must do it for Jesus's sake. The greater includes the less. In Christ is the whole humanity, and the fair sight and realization of his love inspires a man to do what is most befitting his manhood and most useful to his fellow-men. Man, viewed as he generally is, without reference to Christ, is as much an object of repulsion as attraction. His vices, his greedy selfishness, his crimes and corruptions are discouraging and appalling. It is Jesus who shows the reverence due to the soul by reason of its origin and possibilities, who lifts man up where, in the divine radiance, the better features come out, and who invests him with a solemn dignity and interest. That man did little for man "for man's own sake" before the disclosure that Christ made of the meaning of our humanity, is plain to all acquainted with his history. The hospitals, the asylums, the reformatories, the homes of mercy—all the humane institutions of the world are the outgrowths of the gospel. Show me what is really and permanently helpful, liberating, improving to the race, that does not get its vitality in Christianity. It has revolutionized the old estimates of human value. The heathen notion attributed merely to the gifted, the learned, the masters of men, importance, worth, glory,—these were the favorites of the gods. But what word of cheer, what blessed hope had it for the poor, the ignorant, the enslaved, the great multitude wallowing in their vices and wretchedness? Where was gained the idea that the miserable, degraded common herd, "for the sake of man," ought to be helped, taught, comforted, elevated to the light and glory of a princely estate as the children of God? It was because Jesus threw such meaning upon manhood, because he revealed its true features, because he ennobled it by wearing its likeness and suffering its penalties, because he vindicated its dignity in his supreme life, and gave himself for its blessed restoration, that we are now enabled to see that man is worthy of self-sacrificing love. The whole doctrine of man's value, our duty to him, the estimate of his place and relations in the moral universe, was first enunciated by Jesus in his teachings and examples. So, again I say, that, as the greater includes the less, he who shows a self-sacrificing love of man for Jesus's sake shows it in the best and most effectual sense for man's own sake. He gets his ability to appreciate his privilege and to do his duty by having the spirit of the master. The correct idea of humanity is found in Jesus—its perfection. Loving him supremely, spurred at heart by the spirit of his philanthropy, assuming his cross of sacrifice, a man is prepared to illustrate the valor, the generosity, the sympathy, the justice, and the mercy that accomplish most for the amelioration, the enlightenment, and real welfare of the race. He that loves God will love his brother also. If we were to look for the most glorious examples of suffering for man, the most heroic daring and endurance, the grandest exhibitions of constancy, faith, charity, sacrifice for others, we shall find them in the Christian heroes who, in the love and fellowship of Jesus, have followed his blessed steps.

In the third paragraph to be noticed, Mr. Abbot says,—“Christianity is the faith of the soul's childhood; Free Religion the faith of the soul's manhood. In the gradual growth of mankind out of Christianity into Free Religion lies the only hope of the spiritual perfection of the individual and the spiritual unity of the race.” Of course, then, such souls as Paul, Jerome, Chrysostom, Augustine, Luther, Milton, and Newton were infants as compared with the disciples of free religion. It is no doubt true that Christianity, as taught by babes and received by babes, is “the faith of the soul's childhood,” but as it is revealed in Jesus, it is unmeasured in its capacity of development, applicability, and spiritual resource. Its principles are eternal, and lie at the base of all that can be premised of the moral welfare of the race. Whatever growth may be predicated of the soul, there can be no stage of its progress imagined where the factors of its excellence and elevation are not found in Christ. I can conceive a downward growth out of Christianity, but I cannot see how a growth out of it to anything higher is possible. For is not its ideal of good perfect? Can there be a more glorious triumph for the soul than over evil? Is it capable of anything higher than the complete fulfillment of its functions? Getting beyond Christianity, what would be the standard of manhood? What the sources of spiritual joy? What the elements of spiritual excellence, unity, power? I can see how Christianity, as the soul develops under its influence, can contribute more and more to satisfy and enrich it; to give it glorious scope, insight, elevation, blessedness; but I cannot discover a good beyond it. I cannot imagine an “individual perfection” whose constituents are not of the Christ-like mind. I cannot conceive a “spiritual unity of the race” outside the unity of that divine, renewing, harmonizing love whose fulness was revealed in Jesus. There can be common knowledge, common interests, common consent to great principles of general applicability and advantage, constituting a certain kind of unity: but the unity that binds the race together; that begets the living consciousness of mutual regard, brotherhood, unanimity of moral aim and aspiration; the unity illustrated by kind offices, forbearance, charity, toleration, a sense of kindred obligation, joys, and destiny, must exist in the realization of a blessed sonship of God the Father, and a life in him. There must be a union at an infinite source, the inspiration of the same spirit, or there will inevitably be moral antagonism and chaos. Christianity offers the only reasonable hope for the race, and it has abundantly demonstrated its utility by bearing through the ages the most practical tests. A religion that can furnish such examples of illustrious character and thoroughly trained, exalted understanding in its disciples; which can show so many sublime trophies over superstition, vice, ignorance, tyranny, and hoary wrong; that has met the spiritual wants of so many noble natures, is fitted for something higher than “the soul's childhood.” It is adequate to its highest manhood—in fact, it is constantly contributing to it. It may seem a sign of great profundity to some to discourse flippantly of Christianity as something worn out, effete, fit only for a low stage of intellectual culture and progress, and to boast of the blessings that are to be enjoyed by the individual and the race in that golden age when it shall quite expire. Human vanity may be flattered in this way, but human good will not be thus advanced. If, without God, the ancient world rotted down, through its hideous spiritual ignorance and depravity, there can be no better hope for the future by thrusting away the Christ who “brought life and immortality to light in the gospel.”

There are two considerations especially, I think, which the free religionists fail to appreciate, and which serve, at least in some measure, to explain their position. One is their misconception of Christianity in its capacity and opulence as a spiritual system suited to the whole race in every stage of its advancement, and possessing divine elements that preclude exhaustion. The other is the fact that what they picture as liberating and elevating to mankind; the great ideas of whose power they boast, so far as they are vital, wholesome, and inspiring, are derived from Christianity. Whatever ideas of vital spiritual efficacy prevailed before the Advent are due to the beneficent source from which sprang Christianity. The world now needs no new revelation. It has the gift which, if used, can regenerate it, and enable it to realize the divine kingdom with unprecedented power. It is vain, before the sublime monuments of Christianity, to deny the efficacy of the revelation made by the historic Christ, and his place in the further triumphs of the cross. Christianity itself is a standing miracle, and if there is a spiritual good that is not embraced in it, I have failed to find it. It will be time enough to talk of the advantage of “growing out” of it when something more satisfying, inspiring, benevolent, divinely renewing and consoling to the human heart, is offered to supply its place. We cannot exhaust its fulness. While it is passionate devotion to the person of Jesus, it has all the great moral ideas that can benefit mankind, or are in the world. While it does glorious work for man for the sake of Jesus, it views man through the medium of his charity and brotherhood, and hence can never ignore the image of God in him. While it condescends to the young, the lowly, the ignorant, it meets the spiritual want of the most cultivated intelligence and the most advanced civilization. As its source is infinite, its blessings must be inexhaustible. “Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, today, and forever,” and “his kingdom is without end.” Nothing better and higher than his gospel can be given for “the spiritual perfection of the individual,” and “the spiritual unity of the race,” for “he is the power of God and the wisdom of God.”

Miscellaneous.

THEOLOGICAL DIFFICULTIES.

[From the Chicago Republican of Feb. 17, 1871.]

After an intermission of one month, the third number of Mr. Towne's Examiner makes its appearance with the date of February. The articles of the February number have, we believe, with one exception, the impress of the hand and the mind of the editor; and their uniform purpose is, directly or indirectly, to exemplify and recommend the peculiar views of their author upon points religious and theological. Mr. Towne, although he denies the specially divine inspiration of the Bible, and the specially divine character of Jesus of Nazareth—whom, indeed, he represents as inferior to Ossawatimie Brown in heroism and true manhood—considers himself a Christian, and calls the Examiner “an organ of Radical Christianity.”

It is interesting to observe that Mr. Towne—not differing in this respect from theologians of a more orthodox description—finds his chief antagonist in the Rev. Francis E. Abbot, of Toledo; the Reverend, of all others in the United States, whose religious, or theological, views—to our wholly secular understanding—approach the most nearly to his own. Indeed, the main difference between the two appears to be that, with the divinity of Christ, Mr. Abbot repudiates altogether the name of Christianity, and describes the journal which is his organ as “devoted to Free Religion,” while Mr. Towne adheres to the name, although denying the divinity. In this respect, from a strictly profane and logical point of view, the Toledo divine seems to have the best of it.

It is not the part of a worldly journal to deal very extensively in matters theological; though we trust that we never touch upon them without that becoming solemnity of aspect which is due to their importance. Nevertheless we are aware that this is hardly sufficient. There is a sort of divine dialect or holy patos, unattainable except through formidable experiences, to which we hardly pretend, and without which the unction is wanting that is so essential to a perfect separation of the sacred from the profane, and to the treatment of the first in a manner commensurate to its awfulness. The truth is, that in divine things, human standards, logical as well as rhetorical, fail altogether; in consequence of which, offences are sometimes detected where none were intended.

When, for example, our Reverend Rector Cheney omits the rubrical word “regenerate,” in the baptismal service, we find it impossible to comprehend whether it is the Right Reverend Bishop, the Church, the cause of Christ, or the patient, that is thereby endangered; consequently we are in the dark in whose behalf the Reverend defendant is prosecuted. So when Mr. Proctor Judd, who closes for the prosecution, asserts that the offence of public drunkenness in the Rev. Cheney would be more pardonable than the omission above described, our notions of spiritual and moral values become altogether confused and unsettled.

So when the Reverend Sabine, of the Protestant Episcopal faith, declines to open the door of his church to, or to assist at, the ceremonies of a funeral, because the deceased happened to belong to a particular, although perfectly lawful, profession; but, at the same time, sees no unfitness in having the required service performed at, and by the Rector of, “the little church around the corner,” of the same profession of faith with his own, we are ready with Paul—we believe it was that canonized person—to exclaim: “Great is the mystery of godliness!”—and to give up altogether the hope of ever rising to the height essential to its comprehension. There are, it is true, certain old passages of Scripture which, rather peremptorily, inquire of a certain kind of righteously stuck-up people: “Who made thee to differ?”—but the probability is that these are among the interpolations which that volume has, from time to time, received—the work, in this case, of some old fogey with a democratic theory in his brain, perhaps—and that they have, therefore, been permitted to become practically obsolete. But all this is only for illustration.

To return to our brethren of the Church independent—and militant also—we remark: It would seem rather pleasant for a professional divine to have some one with whom, without much sacrifice of his personal identity, he could commune and fellowship; and, as we have a very sincere regard for both these gentlemen, we rather wish that, as they can neither of them fraternize with anybody else, they would contrive to fraternize a little with each other. The articles of their faith, respectively, are not so numerous that to drop or to take on one would be either a serious privation or an intolerable burden. If there is anything in the matter of producing impressions upon the world by united effort, it is obvious that there must be some little sacrifice in things not very essential, for the sake of unity. A little ambiguity in belief, where there is so vast a practical latitude, might, without scandal, be permitted.

[Mr. Towne would probably unite with us in assuring our good-humored and friendly critic that the editors of the Examiner and INDEX “fraternize” with each other in a very real fellowship, without coming under any necessity of resorting to “a little ambiguity of belief.” We differ, but as friends; and the difference is much, very much less than the agreement. So far as we are personally concerned, we have not been in the least annoyed by Mr. Towne's keen but generous criticism. He cuts off a good many heads; but, being as yet unconscious of decapitation, we hope to realize complete unity of conviction by making our belief not more, but less, ambiguous.—Ed.]

A DETERMINED DARWINIAN.

[From the Washington Iconoclast.]

I have a friend, a doctor in good practice, and living in the same house, and both being bachelors, we occupy communicating rooms. The doctor is a determined Darwinian, and can talk intelligibly for hours upon the development theory, and believes religiously that man has been developed from the monkey, the gorilla being the connecting link. The doctor, like myself, is very sceptical in religion, and yet, strange to say, he was a believer, not long since, at least, in the phenomena of Spiritualism; took stock in the Davenport, Gurnell, and Read, the dark seance, and the ring performance, and contended that, perhaps by some law unknown to mortals, spirits could dissolve or disintegrate the substance of steel rings and place them on and off the arm at pleasure. But another doctor, by the name of Wright, fortunately righted his credulity on this point by showing before a large audience that all of these performances were the merest jugglery, since which the doctor has abandoned the spiritual phenomena. He also, at the height of the furor, took considerable stock in the Cardiff Giant, maintaining that he was a petrified giant of a race long since extinct. This, of course, he has now abandoned; but upon the Darwinian system, in the classic language of the learned Sumner, he continues to “stick.”

As an illustration, and also reminder, of his illustrious ancestors, he has the walls of his room plastered with illustrations of monkey and gorilla anatomy as compared with man, as also imbeciles, dwarfs, giants, and other monstrosities of the genus homo and kindred tribes. The doctor is learned in geology, reads Lyell, and especially Darwin, more than most people read the Scriptures, and the travels of Du Chaillu he has at his fingers' ends. These are his text-books. Of course he has heard Du Chaillu lecture, and his daily conversation is about Africa, Borneo, Australia, and other quarters of the world where the ape species and inferior races of men do most abound. With all of this, he is earnestly searching after living specimens of his noble progenitors, and not a show comes to the city having anything in the doctor's line that they do not find him a zealous patron. But the doctor had never seen a live gorilla.

During one of the hottest of the last dog-nights I returned about 10 o'clock and found the doctor in bed. Just at that moment we heard a band of music, and the doctor inquired what it was. I answered,—“At the circus.” He inquired,—“Have they got any side show?” Instantly comprehending where he was drifting to I answered,—“yes, got a side show and a whopping big gorilla!” “A gorilla! a gorilla!” said the doctor, and at one bound he landed in the middle of the floor. “A gorilla in Washington and I not see it—I'll go if it is late.” Not expecting that he would bite so ravenously, and not wishing to put him to unnecessary trouble, I tried to choke him off by saying that “I had not seen it, that these painted bills on side shows were generally frauds, as he had often found to his cost,” and reminding him that it was late; in short, tried to persuade him not to go. All would not do. “It's a gorilla—a gorilla, no doubt of it,” he said, and in less than two minutes I could hear his heels, tap, tap, on the pavement, in the direction of the side show. In about half an hour he returned, sweating and blowing, and sold again. “A gorilla be d—d,” said he, (the doctor swears at times,) “it's nothing but a monkey, and a little old cuss at that.”

A good thing happened in Newark, N. J., on Tuesday night, during the reception of the election returns by the rejoicing republicans. A colored orator—who, by the way, made one of the best speeches of the evening—remarked, with enthusiasm,—“The Republican party is our mother.” “Who's your father?” sung out a Democratic loafer. “Father Abraham,” came the snapping retort, swift as a rifle-shot. It is needless to say that the reply brought down the house.

ATTENDING CHURCH BY PROXY.—They tell a story of a farmer who, in reply to the question of a clergyman,—“Shall we see you at church next Sabbath?” answered slowly,—“Y-es, I'll go—or send a hand!” But a fashionable lady beat that; being unable to attend church one Sunday, she sent her card!

EXTRACT

FROM THE LONDON SPECTATOR OF THIRTY YEARS AGO,
"ON THE STATE OF RELIGION IN ENGLAND."

Two rival churches (Catholic and Protestant) and many hostile sects, each professing to have the true religion, will consent to the teaching of no faith but their own. It is absurd to be afraid of studying the works of God, lest they should be found to be at variance with the will of God.

The vice of theology is that it treats Nature as an unholy thing, and sets up doctrine in its stead. "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom." But the Lord here intended is the Creator of the world and of all things therein, and his creation must be the most authentic record of himself. Natural religion is therefore the basis of all truth, and ought to be the test of all divinity; and the more the matter is considered, the more it will appear that the zeal of both churchmen and dissenters is an obstacle not only to secular but to religious education.

The true basis of education is not doctrine but fact—the universal and indisputable facts which Nature presents to us all, and upon which only sound doctrine and theory can be built. Fact is not material and mechanical only. Morals and religion come within a natural course of education, as strictly as a school course. Our knowledge of religion is as immature and progressive as all other knowledge. The study of Nature is the study of everything from the sand to the stars—from the organs of motion to the organs of thought; only in everything it is investigation and not assumption, whereas in church schools everything is assumption and not investigation. All churches have dishonored natural religion and corrupted revealed.

Religion is not an open question in England; and those questions the most interesting to the highest minds are determined for the people by sacerdotal and sectarian authority merely, and thus a great gulf is fixed between faith and reason.

It is only the dead body of doctrine that is sought to be cast out, the imposition of cold, scholastic systems in the name of religion upon the plastic minds of the young. Let the young mind be free, if only that it may be honest towards God; and that it may be so, let us not be brought up under the dominion of despotic opinion, any more than despotic power. Let conscience be as free of creeds as creeds are free of law.

EXTRACT FROM A. HUNKER'S EPISTLES.

HUNKERVILLE AS THE POPE'S REFUGE.

[From the Troy Daily Whig.]

I have written to Pope Pius the Ninth, offering him an eligible site in Hunkerville, which he may build on and hold undisturbed, as the Head of the Church. England has offered him Malta, Prussia wants him, and James Gordon Bennett used to try periodically to tempt him with Washington Heights. But Rome has got tired of him, and when he receives my generous proposition, I hope to secure him for my village. Let nobody, now, dare to impugn my motives. They are purely religious. If my real estate should be worth more after Hunkerville becomes a holy place, I say that is a secondary consideration, which would be a special providence, but not my fault.

But whether this filial offer of mine should be accepted by the Pope or not, I trust that all of his gentle flock will remember it, if I should ever be nominated again for President of the village, or should run for Congress in this District. Every American politician will do almost anything in complaisance to the holy Roman Catholic vote, which is cast by so many of our fellow-citizens. But no one is willing to do more for it than I am.

'Tis true I declined to speak at the late popular demonstration here in favor of the Pope's temporal sovereignty. But I also declined to speak at the opposite demonstration in favor of Italian freedom and unity. A man who may ever desire to hold office in an American community has to be exceedingly prudent in his public conduct.

Mrs. Hunker unfeelingly accuses me of tendering my private congratulations to all the prominent leaders of both the Pope's friends and Victor Emmanuel's. She tells that I attended one of these demonstrations, so that I could be seen conspicuously without participating, and then sent my eldest son, John Hunker, to the other assemblage, to do the same thing. As the strong-minded Samantha is almost as much of a public character as I am, her story has naturally got abroad and injured me. I denounce it as a base fabrication. She may have stated the facts correctly, but her inferences branded me with duplicity, and tended to decrease my political strength on both sides. This was too much to be borne in silence, and I hereby deny all improper inferences that suspicious persons may have drawn from appearances to the detriment of my public prospects.

The work of the hour for women is not going about preaching that women ought to be lawyers, but learning law; not preaching that women ought to be doctors, but studying medicine; and not declaiming in halls on the intellectual equality of the sexes, but buckling down in lonesome, dull studies and chambers, where nobody is looking on, and proving it by thinking a few things out the way men think them. This would not be half as agreeable as attending a convention, but it would be vastly more effective—and is vastly more effective wherever tried.—N. Y. Nation.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"I have been indebted to your kindness for THE INDEX for the past year. For this I wish to express my thanks, and to assure you, heartily, that I highly value your journal, and believe that it is doing a noble and only too much needed work. The great word for our day is Emancipation. Thank heaven, we as a nation have learned something of its meaning, though at a fearful cost of precious life and substance. But there are a thousand subtle forms of slavery still binding the hearts, minds, consciences, souls of men, and thus perpetuating forms of social evil that stand only second to chattel slavery in their baneful and blighting effects. Emancipation from all the fetters that are still imposed on free thought, till it shall be no longer a crime or a social disgrace for one to see clearly some new truth, or even to see more clearly than his fellows. I live in a small community wherein to see or accept any truth outside of or beyond the old, authorized, 'evangelical' tenets, is to be subjected to complete social ostracism. Episcopacy, with its frigid 'decenties' and cramping forms, is the religion of 'the aristocracy' in our little village. I know of no person here, outside my own family, who is prepared to give THE INDEX a cordial welcome. I think of the people who of old 'sat in darkness' and in the 'valley of the shadow of Death,' and wonder in what form of outward or inward 'manifestations' light can ever be revealed from the heaven of pure Truth and all-embracing Love to those whose spiritual idols are still the Dogma, the Form, the Creed. I can only now send you a brief New Year's greeting and a hearty God-speed in your sturdy and wholesome work of the Liberator. Being poor in this world's goods, and for many years a feeble invalid (with a dependent family), I am sorry I cannot enclose a portion of what is still, in our competitive civilization, the 'one thing needful.' But if, through the generous spirit of some who are not lacking financially, you can still thus favor a true friend and brother, I will in return do all that is in my power." [Our friend has no kindness of ours to thank, but that of others who have generously given us money to pay for free copies to those who cannot afford to pay for themselves.—ED.]

"I take this opportunity to renew my subscription for THE INDEX, and at the same time say a word in appreciation of its value. For seventeen years I have been a member of the Congregational Church; and during this time there has been a constant struggle in my mind to reconcile the doctrines of Christianity with common sense. I felt obliged to accept the doctrines for the sake of the moral principles which Christianity inculcated, never doubting that the world owed to Christianity all its virtue, and to the Bible all its progress. When (through your teachings mainly) I discovered that the principles of virtue and morality were not alone inherent in the Christian religion, but to some extent in all religions—that the moral sense of mankind has been a growth, and not a gift—that the maxims of virtue and righteousness which prevail among men are the embodied wisdom of ages, and not the product of any particular period or being—I felt free to discard the irrational doctrines, and cease the warfare with reason. And it is a relief. One breathes freer to know that 'the incarnation,' 'atonement,' 'total depravity,' and 'eternal retribution,' are not essential to human happiness and virtue. This is the teaching of THE INDEX, and my own soul says amen."

"Enclosed find fifty cents for another three months' subscription to THE INDEX. If I was not so intolerably poor, I would remit for a year's subscription; but as that is beyond my 'pile,' you must be content with these little dribs. I do not mean to let you take my name off your mailing files, for your blessed little paper has become indispensable to me. In belief I am an Atheist, and humanity is my God. The Boston Investigator is my Old Testament and THE INDEX my New."

"I do most heartily endorse your paper. No publication that I have ever met with has afforded me so much satisfaction as THE INDEX, on matters pertaining to religion. I was first waked up by Theodore Parker, whose teachings I have admired more than any other; but I think he erred, as you justly remark, in pronouncing Christianity the absolute religion."

"I like your paper quite well, but think there is an opportunity for you to speak independently of party or reformation, politically. Doubtless you see that legislation at present is not for the greatest good of the greatest number of people."

"You will find enclosed two dollars to renew my subscription for THE INDEX another year. Your paper is doing a noble work. Already it has become a power in the land, and thousands are wishing you good-speed, and a happy New Year."

"The present number of THE INDEX is very fine. I particularly enjoy and admire 'Modern Principles.'"

"We cannot do without THE INDEX, so for dollars enclosed please continue it for another term."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—Regular meetings of this Society will be held during the winter on Sunday forenoon, at 10½ o'clock, in Daniels' Block, corner of Jefferson and Summit Streets, in the hall over the U. S. Express Office. The public are cordially invited.

Next Sunday, March 5, PARKER PILLSBURY will address the Society in the morning and in the evening. Mr. PILLSBURY's life-long services in the cause of Anti-Slavery can never be forgotten by those who honor true heroism; and no liberal of Toledo should miss this opportunity of hearing him.

DONATIONS.—The INDEX Association gratefully acknowledge the receipt of the following donations:—

J. L. WHITING, Boston, Mass. $3.00
Jas. W. BARTLETT, Dover, N. H. 10.00
WILLIAM WEBSTER, Dover, N. H. 1.00

FREE EVENING SCHOOLS.—The school for men and boys is held Monday, Wednesday, and Friday Evenings, from 7 to 9, in the hall over the U. S. Express Office, Daniels' Block. The schools for women and girls are held at the same time in Scott's Block, Cherry Street, and in Campbell's Block, St. Clair Street.

RECEIVED.

PLUTARCH'S MORALS. Translated from the Greek by several hands. Corrected and Revised by WILLIAM W. GOODWIN, Ph. D., Professor of Greek Literature in Harvard University. With an Introduction by RALPH WALDO EMMERSON. Boston: LITTLE, BROWN, AND COMPANY. 1870. 5 vols. Svo. Price $15.00.

THE HIEROPHANT: OR GLEANINGS FROM THE PAST. Being an Exposition of Biblical Astronomy, and the Symbolism and Mysteries on which were founded all Ancient Religions and Secret Societies. Also an Explanation of the Dark Sayings and Allegories which abound in the Pagan, Jewish, and Christian Bibles. Also the Real Sense of the Doctrines and Observances of the Modern Christian Churches. By G. C. STEWART, Newark, N. J. ROSS & TOUCEY, 121 Nassau Street, New York, Agents for the Publisher. WM. H. WINANS, Printer, Newark, N. J. 16mo. pp. 234.

FIRST LESSONS IN COMPOSITION. By JOHN S. HART, LL. D., Principal of the New Jersey State Normal School, Author of "Composition and Rhetoric," "In the School Room," "English Grammar," etc. Philadelphia: ELDERIDGE & BROTHER. Boston: J. L. HAMMETT, New York: J. W. SCHERMERHORN & Co. Cincinnati: GEO. E. STEVENS & Co. Chicago: W. B. KEEN & COOKE. 1871. 12mo. pp. 144.

THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY. Devoted to Literature, Science, Art, and Politics. [Complete File for 1870.]

THE RADICAL, Published Monthly. March, 1871. Boston: Office of Publication 25 Broomfield St. 1871. Price $3.00 a Year. Single Numbers 30 cents.

THE EXAMINER, A Monthly Review of Religious and Human Questions, and of Literature. February, 1871. Rev. EDWARD C. TOWNE, Editor. Chicago: THE WESTERN NEWS COMPANY, 121 & 123 State St. Price $4.00 a Year. Single Numbers 50 cents.

RELIGIOUS MAGAZINE AND MONTHLY REVIEW. February, 1871. Rev. JOHN H. MORRISON, Editor. Boston: LEONARD C. BOWLES, Proprietor. No. 3 Beacon St.

THE LADIES' OWN MAGAZINE. February, 1871. Edited by Mrs. M. CORA BLAND. Indianapolis.

THE TRUTH-SEEKER. February, 1871. Edited by the Rev. JOHN PAGE HOPPS. London: TRUEBNER & Co., Paternoster Row.

THE DUEL BETWEEN FRANCE AND GERMANY, with its Lessons to Civilization. Lecture by CHARLES SCHMNER. Boston: LEE & SHEPARD. 1871. pp. 74.

THE SYMPATHY OF RELIGIONS. An Address delivered at Horticultural Hall, Boston, February 6, 1870. By THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON. Boston: Reprinted from The Radical. Office 25 Broomfield St. 1871. pp. 23.

BIOLOGY VERSUS THEOLOGY; or Christ and the Christian Idea, viewed from a Biological Standpoint. By JULIAN. LEWES: GEORGE P. BACON, Steam Printing Offices. 1870. Nos. 4, 7, 8, 9.

THE GOSPEL OF CHARACTER. A Sermon by Rev. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, preached in Lyric Hall. New York: D. G. FRANCIS, 17 Astor Place. 1871. pp. 31.

GEORGE FOX AND QUAKERISM. A Lecture by JOHN W. CHADWICK. Second Unitarian Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. New York: S. W. GREEN, Printer, 16 & 18 Jacob Street. 1871. pp. 43.

THE ATONEMENT. A Sermon preached by EZEKIEL W. MUNDY, Syracuse, N. Y. Syracuse: TRUAX, SMITH & Co. 1871. pp. 18.

Address before the International Business College Association, at Boston, June 12, 1870. By E. G. FOLSOM. Subject:—"The Two Values." Cleveland, Ohio: W. S. ROBISON & Co., Book and Job Printers, 65 & 67 Frankfort St. 1870. pp. 14.

POPULAR EDUCATION, Document No. 2. The Theory of American Education. By WM. T. HARRIS, Superintendent of Public Schools, St. Louis. WESTERN PUBLISHING AND SCHOOL FURNISHING COMPANY, 708 & 710 Chestnut St., St. Louis. pp. 19.

ESSAY ON THE SYSTEM OF CLASSIFICATION. By WM. T. HARRIS. pp. 3.

THE OVERSHADOWING QUESTION. Speech of Hon. GEORGE W. JULIAN, of Indiana, delivered in the House of Representatives, January 11, 1871. Washington: F. & J. RIVES & GEO. A. BAILEY, Reporters and Printers of the Debates of Congress. 1871. pp. 16.

THE RIGHTS OF WOMEN to Exercise the Elective Franchise under the Fourteenth Article of the Constitution. Speech of A. G. RIDDLE, in the Suffrage Convention at Washington, January 11, 1871. Washington: JUDD & DETWEILER, Printers. 1871. pp. 16.

Poetry.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

ASPIRATION.

I love to stand at my window,
And see the lights flash out,
One by one, from the windows
Of the houses all about.

The stars through the clouds are peeping;
But dearer is the light
From warm home-firesides leaping,
To hearts in weary plight.

The stars in the sky are shining
Afar; but heaven is near,
In happy homes enshrining
All that the heart holds dear.

Still of Prometheus dreaming,
We reach out toward the stars;
Still Zeus, the cruel-seeming,
Makes strong our prison-bars.

We must carve our fair ideal,
With heart-ache and slow toil,
Out of the granite real,
Environed by earth's soil.

And we may not bring from heaven
The fire that blesses men,
Till we have toiled and striven
Among them; we find it then.

In ourselves and in our neighbor
Burns the celestial fire,
And they who love and labor
Victoriously aspire.

The stars in the sky are shining
Afar; but heaven is near,
In happy homes enshrining
All that the heart holds dear.

M. R. W.

The Index.

MARCH 4, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

Contributors are requested to write on only one side of each sheet.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

INDUCEMENTS.—We would invite the special attention of our friends who cannot afford to give their services gratuitously in getting subscribers for THE INDEX, to the very liberal Cash Premiums offered in our Prospectus for 1871.

Whoever collects $150.00 for 75 subscriptions, is authorized to retain $50.00, forwarding $100.00.

Whoever collects $100.00 for 50 subscriptions, is authorized to retain $25.00, forwarding $75.00; and so on.

Now it cannot be very difficult, in a town of any considerable size, to get twelve subscriptions a day for one week, if the agent uses ordinary business energy. Yet he would be paid about $8.00 a day—as much as his representative in Congress receives for work not always, we fear, so useful!

"A word to the wise." Who will canvass for THE INDEX, and at the same time earn as much as the Hon. Mr. ———? Send for "Truths for the Times," and begin at once.

"TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES, OR REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX"—is the title of a neatly-printed tract of sixteen pages published by THE INDEX Association, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. One Hundred Copies will be sent for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate—one cent a copy. Packages will be sent free to those who will circulate them, but are unable to pay for them. Here is an excellent means of helping the cause of Free Religion and THE INDEX as an organ of it. Friends of Freedom, send for as many copies as you can use, and do your part in awakening an interest in ideas worthy of American institutions and the higher civilization of the future.

All the bound volumes of THE INDEX which have been paid for have been sent to their destination. Whenever the express charges would have exceeded the rate of postage, we sent by mail; and our thanks are due to the kindness of many friends who refunded the amount of the postage paid. Quite a number of the volumes ordered have not yet been paid for; and in accordance with public notice in THE INDEX, such volumes are subject to new orders. Any one who has forwarded the price without having yet received the volume, should at once inform us of the fact.

THE PYRAMID ON ITS APEX.

Our opening essay today is a sermon by Rev. Dr. Powers, of St. John's Church, Chicago, which we recently rediscovered among some old papers, and think will interest our readers. As an attempt to overthrow Free Religion by ingenuous argument instead of misrepresentation, invective, or sophistical evasion, it merits the respectful attention of all who would do justice to both sides in the great controversies of modern thought. A sincere and in the main courteous plea for Christianity, it is an exception to the common run of such discourses, in that it appeals to reason rather than to texts. How far the attempt succeeds, our readers will judge for themselves. Without undertaking a reply in detail, we propose to say something on a few leading points. Dr. Powers recognizes the essential fairness of our comparison of Christianity with Free Religion in the "Fifty Affirmations," from which he quotes, but strikes the balance in favor of the former.

1. "Self-humiliation at the feet of Jesus" he finds to be the true secret of the highest human development. The influence of a superior character in stimulating to virtue he regards as supremely exemplified in the power exerted over mankind by such a type of spiritual perfection as he beholds in Jesus. Devotion to the person of Jesus, he thinks, develops the soul in the largest and freest way.

History, in our opinion, negatives this view. The freest and finest characters have been those which have most deeply felt the inspiration of principles, as opposed to that of persons. The saints of Christendom have been all modelled on the same pattern; their individuality has been suppressed to a greater or less degree. Native force asserts itself as independent of tutelage, and strikes out a path of its own. High development in a very narrow range, we admit, results from the hero-worship of Christianity. But no hero-worshiper becomes a hero. The large soul relies on humanity itself, not on single men; and while all noble examples inspire and vitalize, no one must acquire exclusive sway. It is impossible that a follower should be original in life; yet originality of life is the proof and test of a great moral development. Such is the instinctive judgment of mankind, as shown in the bestowal of historic honors. Even great crimes are pardoned to the powerful and independent minds that have disdained to follow. Commonplace men are content to follow; but even they follow no followers.

2. Dr. Powers sees no reality in ideas as such. They are nothing to humanity until embodied in persons. He derives the very notions of self-respect and devotion to ideas from the historic Jesus.

Singular inversion! Whence did Jesus derive them? From antecedent persons? No. He drank at the universal fountain. So should we. It is treason to his real greatness to worship him as the world's wet-nurse. No individual suckles the race. Jesus originate the idea of self-respect! Who, then, was Socrates—perhaps the most profoundly self-respecting man that ever trod the globe? Here was one refusing alike to follow or to lead, and in this point showing a self-respect which has no parallel in Jesus, his junior by centuries. To the nurslings of the church, ideas may be airy nothings; but to the adult spirits of all ages they are more than meat and drink, which can but minister to the carcase and not the mind. They are the eternal powers, on which in proportion as men feed, they too become powerful. But for his ideas (his only as he perfected and uttered the ideas of his time) Jesus would have been the merest nobody—would never have been heard of in Chicago, or elsewhere. Men never make ideas; but ideas make men. They made Jesus, and will make greater men than he.

3. Dr. Powers, of course, finds love of the personal Jesus the supreme motive for loving our fellow-men. "We cannot rise to a right conception of this love, or an experience of its power, until we apprehend Jesus and love him." "In the highest sense, to sacrifice for man's sake, we must do it for Jesus' sake. The greater includes the less."

That is, Jesus is more to us than man; an individual more than the race. This is doubtless the developed Christian doctrine. To throw away your life for your fellow-men, like the heroic Edward Howard Simpson at New Hamburg, is a poor sacrifice unless done for Jesus' sake; or to spend your life, like Garrison, in battering down a great wrong because your soul bleeds for the wronged, is a cheap devotion unless sanctified by personal affection for a man dead two thousand years ago. But the question recurs—what have these heroisms to do with Jesus, or he with them? No connection between them exists that is not artificial. To live and die for man because humanity is infinitely precious, is to obey a motive as much higher than love to Jesus as can be conceived. But the power of such a motive is incomprehensible to the sects. Entanglement with persons and insensibility to sufficing ideas is the fatal defect of Christianity.

4. This defect prevents Christianity from being "suited to the whole race in every stage of its advancement." It is a religion suited only to the immature or childish period of human development. If there is one mark of manhood more sure than any other, it is the power to govern self by principles, power to apprehend the obligations of ideas in their universality. And if the Christian is bewildered at such a conception, and fails to grasp it, there is no cause for wonder. The man understands the child, but not the child the man.

In fine, to attribute with Dr. Powers the ideas that vitalize modern civilization to Christianity, a merely local and historical religion, is to be utterly insensible to their true origin, which is the universal humanity of man. From this sprang Christianity itself, and every other religion. A wider reading and deeper study would correct this narrowness, and show the provincial character of the religion of Jesus. The extravagant assumptions made by Christians rest on non-acquaintance with facts. Every year adds to the proofs that Christianity has its limits, and must content itself with being one of many faiths derived all from a common source. The day is surely coming when humanity will be more important than any man.

UTILITY OF DOUBT.

If God had seen fit to have implanted all knowledge within the cranium of our great Adamic progenitor, and had moreover provided that posterity should infallibly inherit such knowledge, what a happy world this would be!—for no one would be troubled by doubt in his search after truth. We could consult the cortical layers of the various “bumps” and by an easy inspection read therein the laws of the Universe. No hunting after truth, but a perpetual rumination of our blessed inheritance; no weary sowing and reaping, but a holding open of the lap to catch the falling manna.

But for some reason best known to himself God saw fit to make man after another plan.

He comes into this world a lump of perdition, according to St. Augustine; according to physiology, an organic machine. He is a kind of vacuum; an “aching void” waiting to be filled. The world comes into him through the channel of the senses. But it so happens that the false comes in with the true. Man opens his eyes and declares that the earth is flat, and the sun is no bigger than a cart-wheel, and of course goes round the earth,—for doesn't he see it come up and go down? All his other senses cheat him too, sometimes. Reason is weak, imagination is active and does double duty. Facts and fancies come tumbling into his mind together, lawless as a squad of raw recruits, bunking anywhere.

Man naturally thinks that his ideas of nature and life are correct, without a doubt, but the truth probably is that they are not correct without a doubt; and what is more important to know is that they cannot be corrected without a doubt; I mean, that doubt is a necessary state of mind in their correction. So far as philosophy is concerned, this principle has been generally admitted. Sir Wm. Hamilton says,—“a preliminary doubt is the fundamental condition of philosophy.” “Philosophy is the art of doubting well,” says Aristotle; and Descartes' method was to start with a clean slate, rejecting provisionally everything which education had furnished. Why has this principle been admitted in philosophy? Simply because men saw the possibility of error in systems of philosophy, and that doubt only could detect the error; hence in philosophy they have admitted the utility of doubt. Why not in religion? Because they have assumed that religion stands upon fundamental, axiomatic truths, where there is no error to be detected and eliminated and hence no need of doubt. The Catholic Church and Protestant Bible are to thousands such truths, not to be questioned nor doubted.

I do not mean to say that doubt, strictly speaking, detects error; it is rather the external sign or symptom that reason is doing it. We begin by inquiring into the accuracy of our opinions. Even this we should not do, probably, unless we had some doubts about their accuracy. If we were in error, then inquiry leads to further doubt, which ends in disbelief and rejection of the doctrines altogether. The history of human progress is a record of destroying rather than fulfilling the old; in other words, progress is generally through error to truth. Old structures had to be removed in almost every department of inquiry before men could erect the new. Old contradictory ideas had to be uprooted and cast out before the new and true could be implanted in the mind. This process of uprooting is necessarily accompanied by doubt. At every step of the transition from the old doctrine to the new, you will feel, you must endure, the pain of doubt. It is a simple phenomenon; it is the process of mental growth.

If you would escape all doubting, you must stop thinking and dead-lock the wheels of progress. Mother Rome attempts to do this with her children by feeding them on water gruel and soothing syrup. She suppresses doubt by suppressing thought. It is the common short-cut remedy.

I know that it is painful to doubt, but it is the tribute which Truth has always exacted, and we must pay the price or forego the prize. Take your choice. It is an inexorable law which God has made, that the labor-pains of doubt must precede the birth of every new truth. The fruit is born of pain. It is vain and foolish to whine over the fact; it is cowardly to blink it; it is dishonest to disown it.

The brave man will not fear to think because doubt, and perhaps painful doubt, may accompany his thought. The man who loves truth, though naked and homely, better than “harmless error” and pleasing delusion, will scrutinize at times his own most cherished opinions, and besiege them behind and before; he will verify and re-verify them; and if he should once suspect that there might be a hole somewhere in the bottom of his theories, he will dig down to find out, and not try to blind himself to it or to putty it over. Such a man will take out Religion, sacred Religion herself, occasionally, and put her on the witness-stand and make her confess her rights and titles,—he will even be willing to put her on the rack and wring out the secrets of her origin and authority. The only way for man to get out of the wilderness of error is to march right through the wilderness of doubt. There is no under-ground or upper-air passage. It is a long road to travel, depend upon it. Many good people, weak and weary, will fall by the way. They stop at the many half-way houses between Rome and Reason, where the logical thinker can find no rest for the sole of his foot. Does it seem to you that the “logical thinker” must tire of his eternally tramping after the truth, never quite sure that he has reached it or ever will,—never entirely out of the wilderness of doubt? Do you, dear reader, get impatient for Reason to lead you to some little Rome by the way where you may rest? No doubt you do! Every one gets weary of tramping, and ever and anon pitches his tent for the night and gets refreshing slumber; but by another sun he may, perchance, find the ground treacherous under his feet and move on, and thus nightly pitch his moving tent, a day's march nearer the—all truth.

By doubt, we mean, of course, what Goethe has called—“the active scepticism whose sole aim is to conquer itself,” and not that other sort which Huxley says—“is born of flippancy and ignorance, and whose aim is only to perpetuate itself as an excuse for idleness and indifference.”

Doubt, then, can only serve us when our aim is to conquer it. It is not an end in itself, but the means to an end—truth—which every one must struggle to reach for himself. Free Religion has no doctrinal finalities to offer. It lays open even the “great verities” for your inspection and dissection. It has convictions, but it regards of far more importance the attitude of your mind than any present conviction. It erects no pillars of Hercules as barriers to thought. It says to every adventurer who longs to sail the unknown seas,—go! You may prove yourself an intellectual Columbus, and discover and bequeath to humanity some great unknown continent of truth; and you may get blocked in by North-pole icebergs—your ship may be crushed to pieces and your poor frozen body may go to feed Arctic foxes and Polar bears.

Does the doubt chill you?

Remember, “nothing risked nothing won,” and that “the brave alone deserve the fair.” If you would win the Truth, you must brave the doubt. If you love truth as you ought to, you will seek it; if you would seek it, you must think; if you do think, you must at least not fear to doubt. “The just thinker,” says Emerson, “will give full swing to his skepticism.” And, after all, can we not, too, say with Tennyson,—

“There lives more faith in honest doubt,
Believe me, than in half the creeds.”

W. H. S.

A TRUE HERO.

A man has recently died in Delaware whose name surely ought to stand somewhere in the columns of THE INDEX. Thomas Garrett was one of the truest of believers in the application of reason and freedom to religion. And his character and career served to test the ecclesiastical type of religion in America and to prove its hollowness. He was a man of the staunchest integrity and purity, whose life of eighty years was devoted to philanthropic interests. No one ever had the audacity to point out any spot upon his personal reputation. His word in any of the banks of his city was as good as a bond. His quality of heroism was especially shown in his anti-slavery work. Living in a slave State, on the very border of freedom, his house became widely known among the slaves as one of the safest depots of the “underground railroad.” During those eventful years of agitation before the war, nearly three thousand fugitives, by his aid, passed from Southern bondage over Mason and Dixon's line to freedom. He did not have to go out to seek them. They knew his fidelity and came to put themselves in his hands. He was confronted by armed slaveholders and their kidnapping agents; he was threatened with exile from the State; he was brought before the courts, and every dollar of his property taken from him in fines; but still he stood unflinchingly at his post, keeping open door to the fugitives, and still they came, and were helped on as before. There was such a moral presence in the man, that, though unarmed himself, kidnappers shrank away from before him, their weapons dropped nervelessly, and they could not execute their threats.

Here, surely, was a man, one would say, reasoning a priori, of such heroic mould that any church in Christendom would have been proud to count him as a member,—a man whose fellowship would have been courted by all the sects. Ah, no! That is not the kind of stuff of which American church-members have been generally made. Not a denomination in Christendom cordially fellowshiped him. He was born and educated in the more liberal branch of the Society of Friends; he was a Hicksite Quaker. Yet for this fidelity to the slave he only escaped excommunication from that sect because of the smallness of the particular congregation where he lived and his own personal influence in it. His helpers in the work of aiding bondmen to liberty, only a few miles further north, as pure and blameless in character as he, were all disowned by the Friends' Society for their anti-slavery zeal. And when these men and women organized the society of "Progressive Friends" at Longwood, Pa., Thomas Garrett joined them, and has always acted with them, though retaining also his membership in the old society at Wilmington.

He was, therefore, one of the heroes and saints of that religion which believes in freedom both of body and mind; which knows no limits to inquiry, and sets no sectarian bounds to human fellowship.

W. J. P.

A gentleman who has shown himself a kind and energetic friend of THE INDEX writes to us as follows from Fredonia, N. Y.:-

"I send you by mail today a paper containing a report of the remarks made by members of the bar on the occasion of the death of William A. Barden, of this place. Mr. B. was one of the first who gave me their names for THE INDEX; and, believe me, it is no small praise for the paper to say that it met with his cordial approval. He deeply sympathized with the objects and aims of THE INDEX, and more than once has he told me that he 'liked Abbot's style of putting things.' We who knew him best most deeply regret his loss."

The Fredonia Censor for Feb. 15, which accompanied the above letter, contained very warm encomiums of the deceased at a special meeting of members of the bar, and a copy of appropriate resolutions adopted by them. We are aware that in meetings of this sort much is often said that is formal, trite, and not wholly sincere; but there is something in the tone of the remarks on this occasion that has impressed us as unusually earnest. Such a tribute as that of Hon. F. S. Edwards, from which we extract the following paragraph, must have had a deeper origin than mere regard for custom or professional etiquette:-

"To be recognized as an upright, honest lawyer, a generous friend, was a noble ambition; to this he aspired, we all know with what complete success. The high and the low, the rich and the poor, in his sight, as in the sight of the great Judge, were all equal; and while he sought to forget, in the duel of words and legal strife, human sympathy, as delaying or interfering with the stern mandates of the law as applied to facts, he was not always successful. His deep sympathies for misfortune and innocence often led him to forget for a moment that he was but the oracle of the law and not the generous friend."

We have received an interesting circular, signed by E. M. Woodworth and twenty others (among whom we recognize the names of several subscribers to THE INDEX), protesting against the sectarian action of the majority of the First Universalist Society of Dubuque, Iowa. The spirit of the document is so temperate, yet so resolute and vigorous, that we cannot repress a wish that these friends of religious liberty might be able to make their society free not only from the limitations of Universalism, but also from the sectarianism inherent in Christianity itself. Experience has but deepened our conviction that complete freedom of thought and utterance cannot be enjoyed anywhere within Christian limits. But Rome was not built in a day, and we sympathize with all who are moving towards liberty. The only danger is lest they pause to "fortify."

"Well, Mrs. Smith," said Mrs. Jones, "if I'm anything, I'm a Unitarian; what religion are you?" "I ain't quite certain what they call it, but my old man says he's a vegetarian."

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON.

DETROIT, Jan. 20, 1871.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—The good people of Detroit have had a rare, never-to-be-forgotten treat in a two days visit from Ralph Waldo Emerson. He has come and gone, and, besides many delightful memories, has left a "hunger and thirst"—after righteousness, I hope. What he says and is, and the whole manner of the man, are stimulants to all true living. I never meet him without being reminded of his advice to the Divinity student—"Be the divine man, and where you are, men shall think they walk in hallowed cathedrals."

(I quote from memory, and I presume not correctly, but give the idea.)

He gave us an evening of reading and conversation in a parlor which certainly seemed hallowed by that radiant, wise face of his, though he a little disappointed many in that he would hide behind the words and thoughts of other writers, which, though rendered with a new meaning and beauty, were not quite what they wanted. But to have done other than evade us in this way would not have been Emerson, I suppose. This modesty seems temperamental with him, pervading even the estimate in which he holds his own face, where he declares there are no Greek lines, nor anything to justify its repetition upon canvass or by photographic art—as if Greek culture and more than Greek philosophy could for forty years dwell behind any face without moulding it to beauty.

In this, I think, we may fairly charge him with lacking faith in the formative laws of the spirit. Flesh would be stubborn indeed that did not yield to the gentle persistence of such persuasive ministers as have him in charge. Yet, while others divine in his face much of the beauty of his thought, he seems half to suspect that the Great Artist, if he has not placed him in the wrong body altogether, has at least given his soul a sadly deficient likeness.

We have hope that he will come to us again next winter. His friends multiplied most encouragingly during the few days of his visit. He certainly cannot come too often, or stay too long.

Yours,

L. T. I.

PERISHING THEOLOGIES.

EVANSVILLE, IND., Feb. 16, 1871.

F. E. ABBOT, ESQ.:

Dear Sir,—Last summer a lady friend sent me a few numbers of THE INDEX, with the perusal of which I was no less pleased than surprised. Not that there was anything very new to me in its statements or arguments, for I have been a free thinker since I was ten years of age (surely better than a slavish thinker), and am now on the verge of three-score and ten. It was the scholarly and gentlemanly manner in which it was written, the boldness of its avowals, and altogether its respectable appearance, that struck me; and I hailed it as a streak of light that is ushering in the dawn of a new day—a day of light and truth that will at no distant period dispel the various superstitions that have held the minds of men so long in darkness and bondage.

The paid priesthood of every sect, all over the globe, have an interest in shrouding in darkness and mystery their various doctrines, dogmas, and creeds, and preventing their investigation. Creeds being fixtures, their living depends on their keeping them fixed. They do not admit the light of science, for science is progressive. Your Free Religion takes all the light it can get, and depends upon investigation to arrive at the truth. Its converts never can go back to an old superstition, any more than one who has learned the truths of astronomy can go back and believe in the visions of astrology. He moves still onward, while the votaries of the common beliefs may and do veer around from one sect to another until they make the whole circle of the churches, never examining with their own eyes what it is they believe. They believe simply on the authority of parents and priests, and these are called true believers.

"Learn three-mile prayers and half-mile graces,
With well-spread hands and long wry faces,
Grunt up a solemn, lengthened groan,
And damn all parties but your own;
I'll warrant then ye're not deceived;
But aye a sturdy, staunch believer."

Such a man is not true to himself, and cannot be honest to God. It is he who is the real infidel. But the man who examines whatever seems doubtful with his best abilities, and admits only what he finds to be true, is surely the true believer, because he is honest and true to himself and to God, although the sectaries call him infidel. If names must be called, it is high time the terms were reversed.

Can we not put the events, as they occurred, on which the doctrines and dogmas of the Christian churches are built, into a very few words, divested of all mysterious matter, miracles, and sacraments, and the immaculate conception by the influence of the Holy Ghost, etc.? The first event in the Christian theology is the rebellion of Satan, or the Devil, in Heaven—an angel created by the All-wise Being, who must have known beforehand what mischief he was inclined to do, and, if so pleased, might have left him unmolested. He was cast out of Heaven and bound in chains forever in—the pit (wherever that may be). But he got loose again some how, and found his way to Eden in shape of a serpent, and by his persuasive tongue induced our first parents (the crowning work of God's creation) to transgress the divine command, by which the race was doomed to eternal misery. Although it is said man was made perfect, yet he fell, and the Creator must have known it beforehand. Satan turns up next in the book of Job, tormenting that honest, grumbling soul, several thousands of years after the first eating and the flood, by which the whole race, except the family of Noah, was drowned. The Almighty sent the Holy Ghost to Mary, the wife of the carpenter Joseph, that she might have a son, who, when he had grown up and had done all the good he could, and was guilty of no crime, was purposely to be killed by the Jews, in order that his Father might be reconciled to the race whose parents had eaten forbidden fruit so many thousands of years before. As if a moral crime was like a money debt, and could be paid by another who was innocent!

I would not exaggerate anything in this strange history, to make it more absurd than it is. The sole aim is, not to offend the feelings of any, but to let the sincere and honest see what it is they really believe.

I am, very respectfully,

JAMES FORBES.

A QUESTION TO THE CLERGY.

PARKERSBURG, IND., Jan. 21, 1871.

FRIEND ABBOT:—I have a logical problem that I have presented to various orthodox divines, that they might solve it. As yet no one has made the attempt. Perhaps, if it had an insertion in your excellent little INDEX, some one would make the effort. It is as follows:—

The same laws will uniformly produce the same result, other things being equal.

The body of Jesus was composed of the same material and subjected to the same laws with ours.

Our bodies do not rise the third day. Therefore, the body of Jesus was not raised the third day.

Will some one be kind enough to disprove the conclusion?

And oblige

J. N. OSBURN.

THE HUMAN AND DIVINE.

It was once almost universally believed that there was an infinite abyss between Man and God, Earth and Heaven, an impassable gulf between the Human and Divine, the real and ideal, between the soul and its highest conceivable good.

It was hoped that this abyss would be spanned, that the Divine would bridge it over by becoming human, that heaven would come to earth, that the Human and Divine would be at one.

This has been the world's hope, ever old and ever new. This confident hope becomes a no less confident belief.

The Divine, the Perfect, the Ideal has become human and real. The Messiah, the Christ, the Savior, has come into this world. God and man are at one. This is the world's faith. It finds its most perfect expression in Catholic and Orthodox Christianity. Out of the fears of the just came hope; hope soon becomes a faith. The deepest hopes of the human soul have ever been its truest prophets, for the reason that they become motives and give direction to the aspirations and efforts of the soul.

Admit that man and God, the human and Divine, were at one in the soul and consciousness of Jesus—that the abyss between God and man was bridged over—how was it done? There are only two ways:

First, by the Divine becoming Human.

Second, by the Human becoming Divine.

How was it done? By the descent of the Divine, or the ascent of the human? Did God come down to earth or did an earth-born soul raise itself to heaven? Did God from without come into a human soul and incarnate himself in a human being, and reveal himself through a human life? Or did the Divine in the human, God within, he whose temple Jesus declares man to be, manifest itself through a human life? Or in other words was the abyss between the human and Divine bridged over from above or below? This is the old problem of which every system of religion is a professed solution.

My confident answer to the question is—the human became Divine. A human will become at one with the Divine will. A human soul prompted by love of truth, of God and man, aspire, toiled, resisted temptations, consecrated its powers to the cause of Truth, of Justice, and the service of man, and by his aspirations, by struggle and conflict, by consecration and obedience to his conscience, by a life of purity and self-forgetfulness, attained unto the consciousness of the Divine.

The chasm between earth and heaven, between the human and Divine has been spanned from below, from the human side. And wherever a human soul aspires and struggles, resists and rises above temptation, forgets self and consecrates its powers to truth and human welfare, lives in obedience to the will of God, making its life the expression of God's law, attuning its life in unison with the purpose of God, wherever and whenever a human soul does this, the abyss is bridged over. The human becomes Divine, earth and heaven meet. The soul can say "my purposes, my motives, my affections are at one with the purpose and law of God." "I" (considered as will, purpose, motive, law,) and "My Father" (considered as the Infinite will, purpose, law,) are one. This was the religious consciousness of Jesus, this will one day be the consciousness of humanity. In the life of Jesus earth and heaven meet. In the soul of Jesus man became Divine and was at one with God.

Great, profound and beautiful as is this truth (not yet apprehended by Christendom), it is but a gleam of the whole truth (not yet dreamed of.) It will one day be felt and known (not accepted upon authority but learned from experience as all religious truths are learned) that not to one man alone is it given to become divine, that not alone in one life can heaven and earth meet. Not alone in one human being can the soul be formed in the image of its Creator, in the likeness of its Father.

It will be seen that every life may be divine, that all true life is divine. Humanity by its knowledge of, and obedience to the truth, may become at one in will, in purpose with the Divine will and purpose. Then will the consciousness of Jesus become universal; then will his prayer be answered. Then will the will of God be done on earth as in heaven. Every temptation we resist, every truth we speak, every wrong we right, every evil we remove, every reform we effect, every upward reaching of the soul, does somewhat towards making the human Divine. O, how great is the joy of living, loving, toiling, aspiring, and from the —stepping stones of our dead selves

Rising to higher things.

EDWIN S. ELDER.

INCOMPREHENSIBILITIES.

The grounds upon which our venerable friend McClintock finds fault with Mr. Abbot's "Modern Principles" are the grounds upon which I do most approve of that statement. "What kind of a God?" says our friend. As if he had asked, what kind of an incomprehensibility? And up to this age, the human race has never been able to agree in any one idea as to what no one of the human family has the power of comprehending. Hence this, of all others, is "an open question," and one which neither needs nor admits of argument.

So also of man's condition after death. The faculties of human knowledge are adapted only to this universe in which we find ourselves placed. Hence the folly of attempting to dogmatize respecting a world of which nothing can be known. You may believe what you please; but your mere belief is for yourself, not for me. Your experience is for you, not for me. And hence we find that all forms of fanaticism and mental epidemics, as in ancient and modern mediumism, grow out of faith in respect to an invisibility of which no man can really know anything at all. Bacon said, two hundred years ago, that it is just as natural to die as it is to be born. And if it was not necessary that I should know anything of this life before my birth into this world, I can see no necessity of my knowing anything of any other world before I find myself born into it, with a capacity of adapting myself to that other state of existence, as I have had to do in this. But, as there are no faculties in the human mind for obtaining a knowledge of incomprehensibilities, it is not difficult to understand how it has come to pass that we have had Christianly and modern mediumism. Credulity and hope, carried beyond sound reason and the authority of science, makes gods, devils, ghosts, and such fanatisms as we have in witchcraft, the crusades, and mediumism, all of them based on faith in ideas by which this world shows no evidence of having been benefited. And surely we have had "creeds," "statements," "revelations," and "visions" respecting these "open questions," already enough to last the human race for all future ages; and I like THE INDEX the more, because its scope and design do not include dogmatizing upon incomprehensibilities.

LAROY SUNDERLAND.

QUINCY, MASS., Feb. 12, 1871.

EXTRACT FROM PRESIDENT GRANT'S MESSAGE, Dec. 5, 1870.—"In conclusion, I would sum up the policy of the Administration to be a thorough enforcement of every law; a faithful collection of the taxes provided for; economy in the disbursement of the same; a prompt payment of every debt of the nation; a reduction of taxes as rapidly as the requirements of the country will permit; reductions of taxation and tariff to be so arranged as to afford the greatest relief to the greatest number; honest and fair dealings with all other peoples, to the end that war, with all its blighting consequences, may be avoided, but without surrendering any right or obligation due to us; a reform in the treatment of Indians, and in the whole civil service of the country; and finally, in securing a pure, untrammelled ballot, where every man entitled to cast a vote may do so just once at each election, without fear of molestation or proscription on account of his political faith, nativity, or color."

U. S. GRANT.

Executive Mansion, Dec. 5, 1870.

"Seize opportunity by the forelock" is advice frequently given. "Opportunity has long hair in front and short hair behind." Many a man thinks he wears a queue, but finds out his mistake when he tries to catch it.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

SINGLE COPIES

OF

THE INDEX for 1870

Containing the following

ESSAYS,

Will be mailed from THE INDEX office (post-paid) on receipt of

FIVE CENTS:

The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion.....	No. 1
What is Free Religion?.....	3
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Corner-Stones, 4
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Institutions, 4
Terms of Fellowship, Social Ideal, Moral Ideal, and Essential spirit,.....	5
The Practical Work of Free Religion.....	6
Unitarianism versus Freedom.....	7
Sunday Schools.....	8
Friendship.....	9
The Miracle Question.....	10
Grief and its Compensations.....	11
The Hebrew Prophets.....	12
Capital Punishment.....	13
Human Ideals.....	14
The Essence of Religion.....	15
The Management of Children.....	16
A Quaker's Letter to a Presbyterian, R. S. D.....	17
Comparison of Jesus and Socrates. (Report from the N. Y. Tribune).....	17
The Candle of the Lord.....	18
Public Opinion.....	19
Conscience.....	20
The Pedigree of Man.....	21
"Following Christ,".....	22
The Tongue.....	23
The Golden Age.....	24
What is Truth?.....	25
The Last Battle on the Creed Question.....	26
Observance of the Sabbath, Rev. W. W. Williams.....	27
The Sunday Question.....	28
Motes and Beams.....	29
The Dove's Departure.....	30
The Bible in the Public Schools.....	31
Religious Freedom.....	32
A Plain Talk to Young Men.....	33
Noise.....	34
The Humility of Free Religion.....	35
Chaos and Cosmos.....	36
An Oration on Alexander Von Humboldt.....	37
Relation of Spiritualism to Free Religion.....	38
War and Free Religion.....	39
Religious Revivals.....	40
Mary and Martha.....	41
The Ministry of Free Religion.....	42
Success.....	43
"Repentance" and "Forgiveness,".....	44
Spiritual Beauty.....	45
The Book of Daniel.....	46
The Unity of Spiritual Freedom and the Opportunity which America offers for its Development. W. J. Potter.....	47
The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition.....	47
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? Chas. Reemelin.....	47
The Work of Radicalism in Indiana. J. O. Martin.....	47
Religion in the Light of Reason and Common Sense. Isaac M. Wise.....	47
Sunday—Its Uses and Abuses. Thomas Vickers.....	48
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? E. Peckham.....	49
Parties and Party Spirit.....	50
The Future of Religious Organization, as Affected by the Spirit of the Age.....	51
The Incarnation. A Christmas Discourse.....	52
Transient and Permanent.....	53

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

Free Religious Association.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, on "The Idea of the Free Religious Association;" DAVID A. WASSON, on "The Nature of Religion;" MRS. E. D. CHENEY, on "Religion as a Social Force;" F. E. ABBOT, on "The Future of Religious Organization as affected by the Spirit of the Age;" S. JOHNSON, on "The Natural Sympathy of Religions;" RABBI WISE, on "The Universal Elements in Judaism;" COL. T. W. HIGGINSON, on "Mohammedanism;" WM. H. CHANNING, on "The Religions of China;" W. J. POTTER, on "The Religions of India;" and an abstract of a discussion on "The Relation of Religion to the Public School System of the United States." This Report is specially representative of the principles of the Association. Price 50 cents. In packages of five or more 33 cents each. Also CHANNING'S Address on "THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA," (a careful and instructive essay, of particular interest at this time to Americans) in a separate pamphlet for 20 cents. The ANNUAL REPORT for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cents respectively), Rev. Samuel Johnson's essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cents), and an essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by Wm. J. Potter (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained by applying to the Secretary. The Report for 1868 contains a letter from the celebrated Hindu Theist, KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, on the "Origin and Aims of the Brahmo Somaj," also an address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, on "Religion and Social Science;" a letter from M. D. CONWAY, on "Religious Movements in England," and speeches by JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHAS. H. MALCOM, JOHN WEISS, and others. The Report for 1869 has addresses by RALPH WALDO EMERSON, D. A. WASSON, JULIA WARD HOWE, C. A. BARTOL, PROF. DENTON, HORACE SEAYER, LUCY STONE, and others.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Nature's Gifts, SCIENTIFICALLY DEVELOPED.

As mankind, from indiscretion or other causes, have been doomed to suffer from disease, so also has remedy for disease been provided. Our hills and valleys abound with roots and herbs, which if scientifically prepared and compounded, will restore health and vigor to the invalid. To find such a remedy we should seek one that has stood the test of age.

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

A
Sure Cure for Liver Complaint, Sure Cure for Dyspepsia,
Sure Cure for Debility, Sure Cure for Jaundice,
Sure Cure for Marasmus,
And all affections arising from weakness or want of action in the Liver or Digestive Organs. The great remedy for

IMPURE BLOOD, FEVER AND AGUE!

It is an impossibility for any one to have fever and ague, if they will use a few bottles of this remedy each spring and fall.

$100 $100 $100

Will be given for any case of this disease that occurs to any one that uses the Bitters or Tonic as a preventive.

Those who have the Fever and Ague will find, after the chills have stopped, that by using a few bottles of the Bitters or Tonic, the disease will not return.

These remedies will rebuild their Constitution faster than any other known remedy.

The remedies were placed before the public thirty years ago, with all the prejudices of so-called "patent medicine" operating against them, but gradually their virtues became known, and now, to day, they stand at the head of all preparations of their class, with the indorsement of eminent judges, lawyers, clergymen and physicians.

Read the following symptoms and if you find that your system is affected by any of them, you may rest assured that disease has commenced its attack on the most important organs of your body, and unless soon checked by the use of powerful remedies, a miserable life, soon terminating in death, will be the result.

H

Constipation, Flatulence, Inward Piles, Fulness of Blood to the Head, Acidity of the Stomach, Nausea, Heartburn, Disgust for Food, Fullness or Weight in the Stomach, Sour Eructations, Sinking or Fluttering at the Pit of the Stomach, Swimming of the Head, Hurried or Difficult Breathing, Fluttering at the Heart, Choking or Suffocating Sensations when in a lying posture, Dimness of Vision, Dots or Webs before the Sight, Dull Pain in the Head, Deficiency of Perspiration, Yellowness of the Skin and Eyes, Pain in the Side, Back, Chest, Limbs, etc., Sudden Flushes of Heat, Burning of the Flesh, Constant imagining of Evil and Great Depression of Spirits

All indicate disease of the Liver or Digestive Organs, combined with impure blood.

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

is entirely vegetable and contains no liquor. It is a compound of Fluid Extracts. The Roots, Herbs and Barks from which these extracts are made, are gathered in Germany, all the medicinal virtues are extracted from them by a scientific chemist. These extracts are then forwarded to this country to be used expressly for the manufacture of this Bitters. There is no alcoholic substance of any kind used in compounding the Bitters; hence it is free from all the objections incident to the use of a liquor preparation.

Hooftland's German Tonic

Is a combination of all the Ingredients of the Bitters with the purest quality of Santa Cruz Rum, Oranges, &c. It is used for the same disease as the Bitters, in cases where some pure alcoholic stimulus is required.

TESTIMONY

Like the following was never before offered in behalf of any medical preparation:

HON. G. W. WOODWARD,
Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, writes Philadelphia, March 16th, 1867.

I find "Hooftland's German Bitters" is a good Tonic, useful in diseases of the digestive organs, and of great benefit in cases of debility and want of nervous action in the system.

Yours, truly,
GEORGE W. WOODWARD.

HON. JAMES THOMPSON,
Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania,
Philadelphia, April 23d, 1866.

I consider "Hooftland's German Bitters" a valuable medicine in case of attacks of Indigestion or Dyspepsia. I can certify this from my experience of it.

Yours, with respect,
JAMES THOMPSON.

HON. GEO. SHARSWOOD,
Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania,
Philadelphia, June 1st, 1868.

I have found by experience that "Hooftland's German Bitters" is a very good tonic, relieving dyspeptic symptoms almost directly.

HON. WM. F. ROGERS,
Mayor of the City of Buffalo, N. Y.
Mayor's Office, Buffalo, June 23d, 1869.

I have used "Hooftland's German Bitters and Tonic" in my family during the past year, and can recommend them as an excellent tonic, imparting tone and vigor to the system. Their use has been productive of decidedly beneficial effects.

HON. JAMES M. WOOD,
Ex-Mayor of Williamsport, Pennsylvania.

I take great pleasure in recommending "Hooftland's German Tonic" to any one who may be afflicted with dyspepsia. I had the dyspepsia so badly that it was impossible to keep any food on my stomach, and I became so weak as not to be able to walk half a mile. Two bottles of Tonic effected a perfect cure.

JAMES M. WOOD,
Law Partner of Judge Maynard, Williamsport, Pennsylvania.

This is to certify that I have used "Hooftland's German Bitters" for dyspepsia, and found it an invaluable remedy.

CAUTION.—Hooftland's German Bitters are counterfeited. See the signature of C. M. JACKSON is on the wrapper of each bottle. All others are counterfeit.

Principal Office and Manufactory at the German Medicine Store, No. 631 ARCH STREET, Philadelphia, Pa.

CHAS. M. EVANS, Prop'r.
(Formerly of C. M. JACKSON & CO.)

Prices.—Hooftland's German Bitters, per bottle, $1; Hooftland's German Tonic, half doz., $5; Hooftland's German Tonic, put up in qt. bottles, $1 50 per bottle, or half doz. for $7 50. Do not forget to examine well the article you buy in order to get the genuine. For sale by all druggists and dealers in Medicines everywhere.

24—cowly

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX
PROSPECTUS FOR 1871.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869, and has just closed its first yearly volume.

We deem it proper, therefore, to submit the following PROSPECTUS of Volume II for 1871, and ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if the matter was properly presented to them, and especially if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor. We cannot afford to send out travelling agents, nor would they succeed so well in getting names as persons of local influence. We therefore have determined to use the funds it would cost to get our paper before the people, in another way, namely, in the purchase of articles of value to be given as premiums to those who make up lists of subscribers; thus presenting to the friends of free thought and pure religion the double motive of doing good and getting paid for it.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two Dollars a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

PREMIUMS.

For Fifty Names, we will give one of PRINCE & Co's four Octave Melodeons (price $65,) or a complete copy of CHAMBERS' Encyclopædia of Universal Knowledge, in ten volumes (price $50).

For Forty Names, we will give a Wilson's Family Sewing Machine, one of the best Machines made.

For Twenty-Five Names, Webster's Royal Quarto Unabridged Pictorial Dictionary (price $12), or one of the following Chromos:

The Three Tom-Boys (Prang's), price..... $15.00
Winter in the Forest, 20x28..... 12.00
Watering the Horses, 21x29..... 12.00

For Ten Names, one of the following Chromos:

WHITTIER's Barefooted Boy, (Prang's) price.....$5.00
The Unconscious Sleeper, 14x17..... 6.50
Mt. Blanc, 20x26..... 7.50
Or a copy of LECKY's History of European Morals, 2 vols 6.00
MAX MUELLER's Chips from a German Work-Shop, 2 vols 5.00
EMERSON's Prose Works, 2 vols..... 5.00
WEISS's Life and Correspondence of THEODORE PARKER, 2 volumes..... 6.00

For Five Names, a bound volume of THE INDEX, for 1870. (Price $2.50.) Or a copy of one of the following works, (post paid):

DARWIN's Origin of Species, price..... $2.00
LUBBOCK's Origin of Civilization, price..... 2.00
Essays in Criticism, by MATTHEW ARNOLD, price..... 2.00
Tablets, by A. BRONSON ALCOTT, with portrait, price..... 2.00
Any volume of the writings of THEODORE PARKER or HENRY D. THOREAU, each..... 2.00
On the Heights, AUEBACH..... 2.00

For Four Names, a copy of THE INDEX for 1871, or one of the following books (post paid):

EMERSON's Society and Solitude, price.....$1.75
Nathan the Wise, a dramatic poem translated from LESSING by ELLEN FROTHINGHAM, price..... 1.75
HUXLEY's Lay Sermons and Addresses..... 1.75
Speeches and Lectures, by WENDELL PHILLIPS..... 1.50
Historic Americans, by THEODORE PARKER, price..... 1.50
A copy of The Revolution..... 2.00
Or The Woman's Journal..... 2.00

CASH PREMIUMS.

For 75 Names,.....50 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 50 Names,.....25 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 25 Names,.....15 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 10 Names,..... 5 Dollars in Greenbacks
For less than 10 Names, a Cash Commission of Twenty per Cent.

Any book in the above list will be sent by us post-paid upon the receipt of price.

N. B.—Names need not all come from one post office. We will send the paper wherever directed, and let the names count as clubs. Specimen Copies sent to all who enclose a three cent postage stamp. Address

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
Lock Box 38, Toledo, Ohio.

Guardian Mutual Life Ins. Co.,

ORGANIZED A. D. 1859.

M. O. Waggoner, Gen. Supt. for Ohio, Mich. & Ind.

John H. Hood, Assistant General Superintendent.

Office No. 154 Summit Street,

E. F. MUNGER, } General Agents.
CHAS. M. LANG, }

WALTER C. SCOTT, Local Agent, 152 Summit St.

Special Agents—Kelly Bros., 22 Summit Street.
Office Hours—From 7 in the morning till 9 at night.
Medical Examiners—Drs. Samuel S. Thorn and T. J. Eaton Toledo, O. [1871]

H. M. EDSON,

A. TERRY.

EDSON & TERRY,
DENTISTS,

ROOMS 8 & 9 GRADOLPH BLOCK,

TOLEDO, OHIO.

ap16 1y

IMPORTER

Fine Chemicals, Drugs, and Toilet Articles.

Brandies, Wines & Liquors for medicinal purposes only. Also Proprietor of

Toledo Tonic Bitters,

Greatest Remedy known for general debility.

L. E. MULFORD,

23 Summit Street, Corner Perry, Toledo, Ohio
18-1y

THE CELEBRATED
CRAIG
MICROSCOPE

is an optical wonder; reveals thousands of the hidden Wonders of Nature; is of permanent use and practical availability, combining instruction with amusement, and never losing its interest. It magnifies

TEN THOUSAND TIMES,

a power equal to other Microscopes of many times its cost. Reveals countless little worlds all around us, teeming with life, which to the naked eye must forever remain a sealed book—as Eels in Vinegar, Animals in Water, Cheese Mites, Sugar and Itch Insects, Milk Globules, Claws and Hairs of Insects, Hundreds of eyes in a single eye of a Fly, Dust of a Butterfly's Wings to be perfectly formed Feathers, the much talked of Trichina Spiralis, or Pork Worm, which was first discovered in America with this Microscope.

It is of infinite value to professional men, to teachers, and to students, but NOWHERE IS IT OF GREATER VALUE THAN AT THE FAMILY TABLE, within the reach of every member. It will delight yourself, your children, and your friends during the long winter evenings. It will show you adulterations or uncleanness of various kinds in food, as sugar, tea, bread, meat, etc.

It is of Inestimable Value to the Farmer

in examining insects which prey upon his crops. The power of a $50 Microscope, and so simple in its construction that any child can use it understandingly, and with appreciation.

A Beautiful Present—Elegant, Instructive, Amusing, and Cheap. Over 60,000 sold.

During the past six years its worth has been testified to by thousands of Scientific Men, Farmers, School Teachers, Students, Physicians, Heads of Families, and others.

PRICE, $3.00—Sent by Mail Post-paid.

Every instrument is neatly boxed, and handsomely labelled with full directions for use. Thousands have been sent by mail. Address, W. J. LINESS & CO., CHICAGO.

FREE! FREE!

"THE MICROSCOPE," a Monthly Journal of Information for the People—the mysteries of Nature explained—interesting information on the wonders of Creation—stories, sketches, etc. Terms $1.00 per year. This Journal will be sent FREE for one year to any one purchasing a Craig Microscope at the regular price, $3.00. (Craig Microscope will be sent post-paid.) For sample copy, and our beautifully illustrated and descriptive circulars, and eight pages of testimonials of Craig Microscope, send six cents for postage to

W. J. LINESS & CO.,

Opticians, and Sole Proprietors of Craig and Novelty Microscope, CHICAGO, ILL.

AGENTS and DEALERS, this Microscope sells in every family on its merits, when exhibited. LARGE PROFITS. Send for terms. 53t26

THE GOLDEN AGE,

A NEW WEEKLY JOURNAL EDITED BY

THEODORE TILTON,

Devoted to the Free Discussion of all Living Questions in Church, State, Society, Literature, Art, and Moral Reform.

PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY, IN NEW YORK.

Price, $3.00 a Year, Cash in Advance.

Mr. TILTON, having retired from THE INDEPENDENT and THE BROOKLYN DAILY UNION, will hereafter devote his whole Editorial labors to THE GOLDEN AGE.

Persons wishing to subscribe will please send their names, with the money, immediately, to

THEODORE TILTON,

P. O. Box 2,848,

COL1

NEW YORK CITY.

AGENTS WANTED--($225 A MONTH.) BY THE American Knitting Machine Co., BOSTON, MASS., or ST. LOUIS, MO. 56-68

Mr. Frothingham's New Book.

CHILD'S BOOK OF RELIGION, for Sunday Schools and Homes. PART I., Worship; PART II., The Good Life; PART III., Truth. In one Volume. New and revised edition. Forwarded free on receipt of $1.00.

DAVID G. FRANCIS,

17 Astor Place, New York.

55-68

WANTED--AGENTS, ($30 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock-stitch" (alike on both sides, and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest Family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Boston, Mass., Pittsburgh, Pa., Chicago, Ill., or St. Louis, Mo. 38y1

Appleton's Journal.

Now is the Time to Subscribe.

BEGIN THE NEW YEAR

BY

SUBSCRIBING FOR

The Best Weekly,
The Cheapest Weekly,
The Best Illustrated Weekly,
Containing the Best Stories,
The Best Literary Matter,

COMBINING

Information and Entertainment.

Send for a Specimen—Only TEN CENTS—and TRY IT.

Subscribe for Three Months, only $1.00,

A FURTHER TRIAL.

Subscribe for One Year, $4.00,

And Get Two Months Gratis.

It is Beautifully Printed.

D. APPLETON & CO., Publishers,

62t1

90, 92 & 94 Grand St., New York.

WHAT TO READ, and HOW TO READ:

Being Classified Lists of Choice Reading,

With Appropriate Hints and Remarks, adapted to the General Reader, to Subscribers to Libraries, and to persons intending to collect Books. Brought down to September, 1870.

By CHARLES H. MOORE.

One vol., 12mo. Paper covers, 50 cts.; cloth, 75 cts. Sent free, by mail, on receipt of price.

D. APPLETON & CO., Publishers,
90, 92 & 94 Grand St., New York.

62t1

The Index.

VOL. 2.—No. 10.

TOLEDO, OHIO, MARCH 11, 1871.

WHOLE No. 63.

The Index.

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION,

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, OHIO.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Editorial Contributors.

GROWING OLD.

[Read to the Unitarian Society of Dover, N. H., Mar. 10, 1867.]

"How old art thou?"

GENESIS, XLVII, 8.

It is exceedingly immoral to grow old. Perhaps old age may be justly set down as the unpardonable sin. It should be the prerogative of an immortal being to be always young; eternal life without eternal youth would be the heaviest of curses, as is beautifully taught in the old Greek fable of Tithonus. I never wish to see an "aged" person; old age, like an iceberg, radiates cold, as it were, in all directions, and sinks the temperature of every soul that approaches it. Shakespeare was wise when he said,—“Youth and crabbed Age cannot live together,” like darkness and light, the one always expires on the advent of the other. The presence of an old man or an old woman makes the soul frost-bitten, unless its youthful fire is hot enough to thaw out the snow and ice of time.

In Gulliver's Travels, Dean Swift makes his hero visit the kingdom of Luggnagg, in which was found a number of people that never died. They were called struldbrugs or immortals, and were distinguished by a red circular spot over the left eye. They commonly acted like mortals, until they came to be about thirty years old, after which they became melancholy, and lived in this state until fourscore, when they entered on a peevish, covetous, talkative second childhood that never knew any end. Without memory, they passed through centuries on centuries of wretched dotage, envying equally the young, who could enjoy, and the old, who could die and thereby cease to suffer. Equally hated and despised, they differed from mummies chiefly by the power of motion, and grew more and more repulsive, with the lapse of years. By this quaint fancy Swift exemplifies the intrinsic misery of old age, the unspeakable disaster of arrested development. Every old person, from the nature of the case, is a struldbrug, and appears among the youthful like an exile from the kingdom of Luggnagg. I know not which to call the greater—the calamity or the crime of growing old.

But let me not be misconstrued. Grey hairs do not make one old, nor a wrinkled forehead, nor crow's-feet about the eyes, nor the deep furrows of Time's plough about the mouth, nor a bent back, nor a palsied arm, nor the feeble steps that totter towards the grave. Neither can you reckon the age of a man, as you do that of a horse, by looking at his teeth. Scan the body as closely as you may, and if you cannot look through the body into the soul, your estimate of age is the wildest of all guess-work. Many a soul seamed and corrugated by the lapse of time looks out at you wearily in the face of a mere boy, as the calendar would rank him; and many a soul fresh as the May-flower in earliest Spring shines through the weather-beaten features of the patriarch. Our bodies are the masks of character. The census-taker in the “kingdom of heaven” will never inquire for the date of your birth, have no transactions with the town-clerk, consult no parish register, care nothing for the record in your old family Bible; he will measure your youthfulness by yourself alone, and take no more account of your carcase, in calculating your age, than of the coat you wear on your back. A thread-bare garment makes no one aged,—neither does a worn-out body. The body must grow old, and fall to pieces; its fabric is frail, and its texture loose. But it is against nature for the soul to grow old. Your body is not you, except as your glove is part of your hand, or your boot of your foot. There should be no more loss of youth involved in the casting-off of an old body, than there is in the discarding of a ragged waistcoat. When decrepitude strikes deeper than your flesh and bones, it is because you have suffered the fountain of youth, which God unseals in every heart, to be choked up with rubbish and dirt. The youngest man I ever knew was by the almanac more than eighty years old. How beautifully serene and placid was that furrowed brow! How fresh and hearty used to be his laugh, how genial his conversation, how pure and unpolluted his daily life! Little children instinctively nestled in his lap, and smiled trustingly in the kindly old face that revealed a soul childlike as their own. Sympathy with all that is sweet, noble and true illumined every feature, and cast the glory of a summer sunset about a well-spent life. Though the frosts of winter had whitened his head, his heart was warm and lovely with perennial spring. One could not meet him without being cheered as if by the song of birds and the fragrance of fresh violets. He often spoke cheerfully of death as not far off; but who could see or hear him, and not feel that he was too young to die? And, indeed, he was too young to die,—I think, when I remember the vitality of his spirit, that he never died, and will never die. The last time I saw him he lay on his bed, never to rise in his old health again; his long white locks streamed over his shoulders, and, as I knelt at his bedside, he laid his trembling hand upon my head, blessed me, and with a feeble voice prayed a few simple words to the Father in Heaven. Never did a prayer ascend from a more youthful, a more childlike spirit. When the useless and worn-out body was laid away forever, there never was set free a soul more fair and fresh with the bloom of eternal youth.

“How old art thou?” It is well to pause now and then, and put this question home to ourselves. Youth is growth; old age is simply cessation of growth. To advance, to improve, to enlarge the sphere of our being day by day, is to be young; to stand still, to retrograde, to contract into a smaller volume,—this is to grow old. Youth is spiritual progress or development; age is spiritual retrogression or decay. This is what I meant at the outset by saying that it is immoral to grow old. We have no business to surrender the grand privilege of perpetual advancement. The body grows old because it is created to grow a while, to be mature a while, to decay a while, and then to perish; but the soul flies in the face of its own nature ever to pause in the ascent towards perfection. Aspiration is the secret of youth, and the proof of it; the soul that persists, under all defeats and disappointments, in aiming at higher good and vaster truth, shows the elastic vigor and fresh bloom which are the index of increasing vitality. But to halt, to accept defeat as final, to turn away from the hope and the toilsome task of spiritual amelioration, is to begin the soul's decrepitude. Youth is aspiration,—age is desperation. Look in upon your own heart, estimate the fervor of your longings for greater goodness and the strength of your efforts to realize it, remember that these longings and efforts are the index of your age,—and then answer silently your own, self-put question,—“How old art thou?” Old age has nothing to do with the body,—it attaches to the soul alone, if it truly belongs to you; and if that is getting infirm and grey, wrinkled, palsied, and decrepit, it is time to fill its veins once more with fresh tides of life.

I once had a piece of gum-copal, yellow and transparent and clear, in the centre of which was a spider, embalmed in a sepulchre of surpassing beauty. I care not how prosperous or magnificent may be one's external condition,—if his soul is superannuated, he is not one whit better than the spider in the gum-copal. If you are empty of earnest aspiration and effort as earnest, then depend upon it that the more dazzling the splendor of your outward prosperity, the more conspicuously you are entombed in your own success.

Men's souls grow old in many ways. Some, eager to enjoy and reckless how they enjoy, barter purity for pleasure, and even in youth become superannuated in soul,—lose all faith in goodness and all desire to achieve it,—and live a life of seemingly contented debasement. To such, Life, like premature fruit, ripens fast because worm-eaten. He who yields to passion piles century after century on his soul, and even in early manhood stands whitened by the multitude of his years. Of all octogenarians, the old young man is the dreariest and saddest to see. Enthusiasm replaced by cynical contempt for virtue, hope supplanted by ennui, every high purpose sapped and destroyed by self-indulgence, the young profligate is a greybeard even before his prime; the delicacy and beauty of youth are lost, and, cheating himself into the belief that he is a thorough man of the world, he has only made himself a precocious dotard.

Many men grow old in mind, by simply standing still. In early life they form opinions which, though honestly adopted, they fail to revise in the added light of experience and fresh thought. Prejudice steps in; and, becoming committed to the defence of these opinions, they make it a point of honor never to strike their flag. It is only the growing mind that will consent to call in question its own preconceived notions, and give to new thought a candid and hospitable hearing. Perhaps timidity and policy cast their chains about the mind, and rob it of its youth. To let expediency or fashion slip into our thought, and give the casting vote between the old and the new, makes the soul rapidly grow aged, and afflicts the spiritual eyes with a loss of sight which no lenses can repair. Youth is courageous, and pays no heed to the seductions of self-interest or conformity; it is charmed with the grand perspective of truth, and gazes with throbbing heart upon its vast plains and lofty mountains. It listens to no temptations that appeal from without; it hears only the impulses of the Divine Spirit within, which urge it to reverence supremely the true, the beautiful, and the good. But Age is little concerned except for ease, enjoyment, respectability; and, stealing prematurely into the young man's heart, it strikes with paralysis every enthusiastic aspiration for truth alone. Conservatism, in the bad sense of the word, is not the holding of this or that particular opinion; it is the holding of any opinion we have once formed, simply because we have formed it, and because we do not choose to change. Any soul which surrenders to pride or timidity speedily becomes conservative in this bad sense of the word, and grows grey with years, forfeiting perpetual youth.

Old ministers often complain that they lose their hold on their audiences, and are ungratefully used; but commonly the fault is their own. No man has any business to be an old minister; if he keeps his heart warm and fresh with noble sympathies, and keeps his mind candid and active by the steady pursuit of truth, he will be a boy still at the end of ninety years, and find himself heard with ever increasing respect and affection. The ministers who are dry and tedious, and complain so much of want of appreciation, are commonly men who grow early old, who are afraid to speak out their best and boldest word, and so cease to speak from their own enthusiasm and deepest faith. They are fossils. Let a minister utter always his best thought, and, poor as may be his eloquence, he will find willing hearers. The young, growing spirit is forever in sympathy with growth; an electric current runs from every live speaker to every live hearer, and from the hearer back to the speaker again. The pews little know how much they may make or mar the inspiration of the pulpit. The thought of one eager, hungry, receptive listener, one soul that thirsts and waits for a living word, will inspire the preacher in his solitude, and call out his best truth, his deepest feeling. But alas for him who must address himself to an old audience, an audience whose souls are not fresh with the life of youth and growth! The thoughts that rise are congealed again at their source; and the finer experiences of his soul refuse to voice themselves to careless ears. Let me openly thank you, friends, for the help you render me when you know nothing of it, by the kindly sympathy and indulgence with which you greet my words, always imperfect and disappointing to myself. Though I have but a young man's message to utter, I feel that I utter it to young hearts; and this thought is the fountain of unspeakable encouragement. That is a meagre intercourse in which all that passes shoots over the telegraphic wires of open speech; more and better must pass noiselessly through the air, or else there is a weary waste of breath. So I trust that you receive, not only the spoken words I bring to your ears, but also those unspoken words I would fain bring to your hearts. I thank you because your hearing supplements my speaking, and because thus you bear away something better than your ears have heard.

Men grow old in conscience also. They obey a lower law, and suffer the voice of God, ever sounding, to be drowned in their own inattention. How easy it is to grow complacent over our own goodness! We accept the customs of men for the laws of God, and find that yoke so easy that we fall in love with our own very respectable virtue. We suffer our souls to get into a moral dotage, and then applaud ourselves for our own excellence. Conscience grows fearfully old, if we suffer its warnings to be overborne by the invitations of profit or fashion or inclination; it mumbles over its unheeded monitions and seems sometimes in the last gasp of consumption. But though suffered to become old and disregarded, conscience cannot die. It is the numbness of old age that befalls her, not the coldness of death, and new tides of immortal vigor may yet course again through her tepid veins. When we adopt the world's ethics, and lower the high commands of conscience to harmonize with the easy code of Mammon, we grow gray in worldliness, and heap the years of the Pyramids on our own heads. Folly of follies! Conscience is not extinguished after all, and will yet revive to show us that the wisdom of selfishness, with all its ill-got gains, is moral lunacy and dotage. Keep your conscience young, whatever grows old within you; let that at least wear the amaranthine wreath of perpetual youth.

Men grow old in their affections also. Many a generous boy with chivalrous and noble instincts ends by becoming a cold, hard, suspicious, utterly heartless man; he scoffs at his early dreams as nonsense, and chooses even his friends from business motives. This decay of the heart is a melancholy spectacle. The prosperity which demands so costly a sacrifice is not worth the price paid for it. Frequently, also, the most beautiful ties of life are suffered to perish by mere neglect. How many a household is blasted for all earthly happiness by a cold omission of everything that expresses love, until, by this mere omission, poor love is frozen to death! Untold domestic misery springs out of a carelessness of treatment which makes the souls of husband and wife grow old with frightful rapidity. Every impatient word writes a wrinkle on their souls,—every selfish disregard of each other's comfort blanches a lock,—every side-thrust of pique or ill-temper steals a tint from the cheek; and before they know it, all the beauty of early love is gone, and two peevish, selfish, unhappy people are compelled to endure the discomfort of each other's old age. They may be still young in years, but their happiness is largely destroyed because they have not cherished the delicacy and tenderness and unselfishness which are the beauty of love, and without which marriage becomes the worst of handcuffs. The importance of simple courtesy in a home cannot be over-estimated; there should be a chivalry of devotion, a thoughtfulness of attention, to obviate the little frictions of life, and prevent mere trifles from becoming thorns and torments. Keep the heart young,—let not the fair flower of home happiness perish from want of a little watering and tending.—let the radiance of genuine love grow only mellowed and softer with each passing year; and thus guard jealously against the invasion of old age where old age should never be allowed to come.

Youth,—fresh, warm, generous youth,—let us keep that always as the very life of the soul. No standing still, but progress in all that is fair and good, pure and true; growth upwards and outwards, in mind, conscience and heart. Free expansion and no repression,—no bondage to the world or its lusts, its gains or its prizes; but free fidelity to the laws of spiritual development. The way to be young is to get out of oneself, and live for others, live for ideas, live for God. Let us take leisure from ambitious cares to be men and women,—to recreate, laugh, cultivate the beautiful, seek for truth, foster the affections of life,—in a word, let us not sacrifice the real progress or youth of the soul to any delusion of outside show. Remember that Eternal Life would be a curse without Eternal Youth, and that the youth of an immortal being must consist in the everlasting unfolding of its nature, its endless development in goodness and knowledge. "Except ye be converted and become as little children," said Jesus, "ye cannot enter the kingdom of heaven." There is a truth in the saying. Only the fresh and youthful spirit can inherit the blessing. Like the phoenix, that fabled bird of Oriental dreamers, the soul must rise with renewed youth out of the ashes of each dead experience, and soar upwards into the empyrean, a thing of indestructible life and beauty, the brightness of whose wings the touch of Time shall have no power to tarnish or corrode.

THE BORGIAS.

In no other place than Rome could a Borgia have arisen; in no other position than that of Pope could so frightful a monster have retained his power. Alexander VI., or Roderic Borgia, a Spaniard of noble family and nephew to Pope Calixtus III., was early brought to Rome by his uncle, and made a Cardinal in spite of his vices and his love of ease. He became Pope in 1492 by the grossest simony. Alexander's only object was the gratification of his own desires and the exaltation of his natural children. Of these, whom he called his nephews, there were five—one son being Caesar Borgia, and one daughter the infamous Lucrezia. Alexander is represented to have been a poisoner, a robber, a hypocrite, a treacherous friend. His children in all these traits of wickedness surpassed their father. Caesar Borgia, beautiful in person, and so strong that in a bull-fight he struck off the head of the animal at a single blow—a majestic monster ruled by unbridled passions and stained with blood, now governed Rome and his father by the terror of his crimes. Every night, in the streets of the city, were found the corpses of persons whom he had murdered either for their money or for revenge, yet none dared to name the assassin. Those whom he could not reach by violence he took off by poison. His first victim was his own elder brother, Francis, Duke of Candia, whom Alexander loved most of all his children, and whose rapid rise in wealth and station excited the hatred of the fearful Caesar. Francis had just been appointed Duke of Benevento, and before he set out for Naples there was a family party of the Borgias one evening at the papal palace, where no doubt a strange kind of mirth and hilarity prevailed. The two brothers left together and parted with a pleasant farewell, Caesar having meantime provided four assassins to waylay his victim that very night. The next morning the Duke was missing; several days passed, but he did not return. It was believed that he was murdered; and Alexander, full of grief, ordered the Tiber to be dragged for the body of his favorite child. An enemy, he thought, had made away with him. He little suspected who that enemy was. At length a Sclavonian waterman came to the palace with a startling story. He said that on the night when the Prince disappeared, while he was watching some timber on the river, he saw two men approach the bank and look cautiously around to see if they were observed. Seeing no one, they made a signal to two others, one of whom was on horseback, and who carried a dead body swung carelessly across his horse. He advanced to the river, flung the corpse far into the water, and then rode away. Upon being asked why he had not mentioned this before, the waterman replied that it was a common occurrence, and that he had seen more than a hundred bodies thrown into the Tiber in a similar manner. The search was now renewed, and the body of the ill-fated Francis was found pierced by nine mortal wounds. Alexander buried his son with great pomp, and offered large rewards for the discovery of his murderers. At last the terrible secret was revealed to him; he hid himself in his palace, refused food, and abandoned himself to grief. Here he was visited by the mother of his children, who still lived at Rome. What passed at their interview was never known; but all inquiry into the murder ceased, and Alexander was soon again immersed in his pleasures and his ambitious designs.

Cæsar Borgia now ruled unrestrained, and preyed upon the Romans like some fabulous monster of Greek mythology. He would suffer no rival to live, and he made no secret of his murderous designs. His brother-in-law was stabbed by his orders on the steps of the palace. The wounded man was nursed by his wife and his sister, the latter preparing his food lest he might be carried off by poison, while the Pope set a guard around the house to protect his son-in-law from his son. Cæsar laughed at these precautions. "What cannot be done in the noonday," he said, "may be brought about in the evening." He broke into the chamber of his brother-in-law, drove out the wife and sister, and had him strangled by the common executioner. He stabbed his father's favorite, Perotto, while he clung to his patron for protection, and the blood of the victim flowed over the face and robes of the Pope.

Lucrezia Borgia rivalled, or surpassed, the crimes of her brother; while Alexander himself performed the holy rites of the church with singular exactness, and in his leisure moments poisoned wealthy cardinals and seized upon their estates. He is said to have been singularly engaging in his manners, and most agreeable in the society of those whom he had resolved to destroy. At length Alexander perished by his own arts. He gave a grand entertainment, at which one or more wealthy cardinals were invited for the purpose of being poisoned, and Cæsar Borgia was to provide the means. He sent several flasks of poisoned wine to the table, with strict orders not to use them except by his directions. Alexander came early to the banquet, heated with exercise, and called for some refreshments; the servants brought him the poisoned wine, supposing it to be of rare excellence; he drank of it freely, and was soon in the pangs of death. His blackened body was buried with all the pomp of the Roman ritual.

Scarcely is the story of the Borgias to be believed; such a father, such children, have never been known before or since. Yet the accurate historians of Italy, and the careful Ranke, unite in the general outline of their crimes. On no other throne save the temporal empire of Rome has sat such a criminal as Alexander; in no other city but Rome could a Cæsar Borgia have pursued his horrible career; in none other was a Lucrezia Borgia ever known. The Pope was the absolute master of the lives and fortunes of his subjects; he was also the absolute master of their souls; and the union of these two despotisms produced at Rome a form of human wickedness which romance has never imagined, and which history shudders to describe.—Harper's.

LABOR IN VAIN.—The Worcester Gazette says that legal circles thereabouts are greatly enjoying an occurrence at the recent term of the Superior Court at Fitchburg, at which Judge ——— presided. As is usual at the opening of a term, a clergyman was present and opened the sessions with prayer, in the course of which, after asking Divine favor and guidance for the presiding Judge, he proceeded to earnestly implore the Lord for similar blessings upon the Judge's wife and children, that they might be spared in life and in health during his absence, and that, at the close of the year, he might be once more restored to the bosom of his family. As the presiding judge was never married, his feelings during the service may be imagined; the members of the bar, and officers of the court who were present and knew the fact, found the constitutional dignity of their profession stretched to its utmost to maintain a proper decorum.

On a certain occasion Henry Ward Beecher preached a sermon on the injustice of obliging men to work on Sunday. The next day while riding down to Fulton Ferry, he entered into conversation with a car-driver, and asked him if he did not think some plan might be adopted to dispense with the need of running the cars all day Sunday. The driver, in ignorance of the name of his interrogating friend, made a frank reply: "Yes, sir, I think there might. But Beecher no hope of it so long as they keep that cursed Beecher theatre open in Brooklyn. The cars have to run to accommodate that."

"Why don't the great men of France stir? Why do they remain motionless and cold while our bleeding country is ruined?" asked an orator in Paris the other day. "Because they are cast in bronze," answered a voice from the gallery.

SIMPLICITY OF SIGNATURE.—Without doubt our readers will have observed that of late our diplomatic envoys and other great officers of State, have fallen into the habit of subscribing themselves to their notes and dispatches by their surnames only. This has occurred, of course, through their adoration of the noble simplicity of English patricians; and we think it is a fine proof of the fact, mentioned concerning Major Pendenis, that one may associate with the aristocracy until one imagines himself of their quality.

The time was when our ambassadors would have signed their letters Daniel E. Sickles, Elihu B. Washburne, J. L. Motley, and so on, just as in their day Benjamin Franklin, John Adams and Daniel Webster used to write their names in full. But having observed that Earl Russell, Lord Palmerston and the rest called themselves Russell, Palmerston, etc., our transitory diplomatists now write themselves Sickles, Motley, and Washburne, as if their Christian names were so many titles of nobility which they modestly left off like the English lords. It has not always the finest effect, as, for example, when our patrician Secretary of State laconically signs himself "Fish," as if he were the only kind of fish, or were Duke Fish or Earl Fish; but we wish to respect any effort to give a European polish to our manners and we are going to try to stand in awe of this noble simplicity of signature.

It has nowhere impressed us so deeply as in the Marquis of Washburne's correspondence with Jules Favre, French Minister of Foreign Affairs. The Marquis of Washburne there signs himself simply Washburne, just as if he were not a Marquis at all, or as if he had no Christian name. We like it in this because the other party, being a poor devil of a French democrat, and not a great Illinois noble, with ever so many descents, is obliged to sign himself Jules Favre—as fully as Alexander Hamilton would have done in the like circumstances. We think that when he got the letter of M. le Marquis de Washburne he must have opened his eyes in astonishment at the noble simplicity of the Sucker grandee. We hope he did not laugh. In the present condition of French affairs, we cannot imagine his laughing.—Every Saturday.

AN AESTHETIC VIEW OF SWEARING.—One of the young ladies in a Brook Farm story in the Overland Monthly says: "There is profane swearing where the heart is filled with vindictive passion—with malice; but most of the swearing indulged in by young people and uncultivated people is only so much emphasis to back up their sentences with. It shows that those who indulge in it are wanting in intelligent respect for their own statements; or are doubtful if they will be accepted as true by those they address. I do not deny that it is extremely bad taste, that it is vulgar and disagreeable; and yet a great deal of informal swearing is indulged in by the really reverent and kind-hearted."

To which a sailor present responds: "I am sure, Miss, it's not language that's so wicked; it's the way one feels in the heart. I was thinking, all the time you were talking, of once when I was at sea—leagues from land in the Pacific; and we fell in with a water-logged ship, with nine starving men on her. They hailed us, and we hove to. Then they begged to be taken on board. Now, our captain was one of your pious sort. Well, when the mate, with his hands on the ropes ready to lower the boat, heard the captain's cold-blooded decision—'Tell them we can't take them; we have only provisions enough to take ourselves to port'—why, the mate swore an oath (I should not dare to repeat it to you, Miss; in a bad cause it were enough to sink a ship), and wished that he might be hung besides at the yard-arm, if he did not fetch those poor souls on board. And down went the boat, in spite of the captain, and on board they came; and we all arrived safe and sound in port. Now, Miss, I ask you: Who swore—the mate or the captain?"

THE KIND CONDUCTOR.—It is a pleasure to say something to the credit of an individual who belongs to that much-abused class of our community, horse-car conductors, whom people like to believe dishonest. On the morning of the Fourth, a little girl riding to Boston tendered to a conductor, for fare, a dingy-looking scrip, of the denomination of twenty-five cents. He took it, looked at it, said, "Counterfeit!" and returned it to her. Evidently judging by her appearance that it was all she had, he added,—"Never mind; let it go till next time."

But the girl was mortified by the circumstance, and, her eyes brimming with tears, she turned her face away. A lady standing near remarked,—"Her Fourth of July is spoiled."

The conductor heard her, and, hesitating but a moment, said to the girl,—"Let's see that money again."

She handed it to him, and then he took from his pocket the brightest, newest twenty-five cent scrip he could find, and gave it to her in exchange. When he saw her countenance expressing the thanks she could not utter, we have no doubt that he felt amply rewarded, and we will wager quite an amount that his wearisome labors that day were very much lightened by his little act of kindness.—Watchman and Reflector.

CAT AND DOG.—The following "marriage" notice appears in a Durham (England) paper, apparently without exciting suspicion of a joke: "At Purton, 1st instant, the Count de la Ferriere, of Howlton Hall, near Barking, to Tabitha Felicia, youngest daughter of Mr. Thomas Pussey Catt, formerly of Catterick Bridge, Yorkshire."—Transcript.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"I have distributed THE INDEX freely with my friends and acquaintances, both liberal and orthodox, and with the former find quite a number that say they like the paper very well; but when you come to ask them to subscribe, it is an appeal to their pocket, and they have a volley of excuses, but no stamps. But the main obstacle in the way of obtaining subscribers for THE INDEX is this—it is all Greek or Latin to them, and might as well be geese-tracks. They comprehend that it is slightly different from what they are in the habit of hearing preached, and that is enough for them to know. They don't want anything of it. If Rationalism is ever successfully taught either in America or Europe, it will be by adopting the Christian plan of teaching it in our common schools. The early teachers of Christianity were not slow to see the fact that, if they were to make sincere Christians, they must commence at the cradle. Our early impressions are the most lasting; and when men and women have grown to their full stature believing a falsehood, they very much dislike to be told of the fact. There are but few that like the truth for the sake of truth. One man said to me that, if Christ was not God, we were all lost, and for his part he should be a miserable man, if it were shown to the contrary. If he had grown up to the stature of a man before he had ever heard of Christ, he would have rejected the teachings he now so much cherishes, with as much contempt as he now does the teachings that Christ is not God. But alas for man's inconsistency! It seems so strange to me that they cannot see that, if God was any such wrathful and fickle personage as the Bible teaches him to be, long ere this he would have been disgusted with them; and today each one would have had assigned to him his little pot of brimstone, with an imp to keep it smoking."

"I have no desire to contribute my means to the propagation of any set of ideas, that cannot but in the nature of things be but mere matters of inference. What I think, what conclusions I have come to in religious matters, is a matter that concerns no one but myself. What others think, so long as they let me alone, is no business of mine, and is a matter of perfect indifference to me. The views of Christianity held by some men of the nineteenth century are very different from those of the sixteenth; they may be for the better—I think they are—and as men advance in information they will construct a religion to suit their wants; what those may be I care not. Men's minds, as their stature, never alter; their circumstances do. All that civilization requires, all it should ask, is to remove from the churches all civil and military power. Then the people will do right, despite of churches, priests, popes, or papers. Remove from the ordinary minds of the great unwashed all idea of churches and religion, and you take from them all they have to live for, and all that keeps them above the brute. To the man of higher reasoning power, all religious restraint is useless and unneeded; but such men are in a great minority. To the little obscure minds, that move from generation to generation in the same groove, let them have what pleases them, and do not rudely destroy their idol, which may do them some good, but in no case injures them or others."

"While I think THE INDEX is doing much good, and reaches thousands of those we cannot, I am not in full sympathy with it, but feel under obligation to support it. I willingly accord to it talent. But, mechanical, cold, and statue-like, your drilled education has worked you in fixed grooves of thought, misdirecting your intuition in search of natural truths. Might not many of your contributors gather some beautiful lessons from Mrs. Conant, or The Banner, by going a little deeper in the council of their own thoughts by exercising charity? I like the expression in The Radical, that intuition religion goes a generation ahead of science. Please place the enclosed two dollars to my credit."

"We believe THE INDEX supplies a necessity of the times. It answers our highest expectations, and we heartily wish its circulation might be increased a thousand fold, and that it might be read by every intelligent person in the land. I regret that I cannot send you the names of more subscribers, but, being closely confined with the care of my invalid husband, I am unable to do as much as I wish to towards increasing your subscription list. However, I keep our copy of THE INDEX doing missionary work by sending it to friends who I think will read it, trusting that the seed thus sown will bear good fruit some day."

"My friend and I, not being blessed with much of that 'root of all evil,' cannot do as we would like to help spread the real, glorious Truth, by each one taking a copy; but we have to go into a sort of partnership—that is, he takes THE INDEX one year and I take The Radical, and vice versa—which is doing all we possibly can in aid of the good cause. My friend cheers many an evening reading to me (while I work) from either The Radical or your paper—and such colleagues, from more than Krupp's batteries! The orthodox find them so, I will guaranty. Please accept our thanks."

"The columns of your paper seem to be a sort of open court where people of differing beliefs can, in a respectful manner, with absolute independence, express their opinions and convictions. Wide as I am from you in religious views, I cannot yet but honor your position, and respect your independence. May God by his spirit guide you into all truth! I send you a little communication this morning. I shall wait with impatience, and finally read with interest your review of it. It is such a pleasure to read what an intelligent man, who differs from us, has to say on a vital question."

"In a late number I made the discovery that you have no singing at your meetings or Conventions. This (in my estimation) is not as it should be. Certainly there are subjects enough in the Free religious element for song, and if rightly got up it would enliven the lecture room, and draw around or to it hundreds who do not now attend. Witness the effect of our patriotic songs on the populace, the so-called spiritual songs of the churches, &c., &c."

"I enjoy its weekly visit—it is one of the papers I prize the most among the many of the reformatory sheets that come to my table—I wish you success. Free thought and its free utterance is what makes us worth living for. You may, if you please, send me a few copies to circulate in January. Don't enlarge it, but continue to print it neatly on such clean white paper."

NEW TRACTS.

Intended to teach religion without superstition.

The Church and the World; an exposure of the "Young Men's Christian Association," (so-called).

I am an Honest Man; do loud professions show us very much about character?

The Bible Vindicated; against infidels on 'one side and idolaters on the other.

The Wisdom of Jesus; how misrepresented by those who call themselves his followers.

God's Justice and Mercy; not antagonistic, but working together for the welfare of all.

Infallibility; no better founded in Orthodox Protestantism than in Popery.

Rationalism; a plea for the co operation of reason with faith, as God intended.

Prayer; suggestions to a child who has been taught to be afraid of his father.

Learn by Experience; one of the lessons greatly needed by pious people.

What becomes of Sin? another lesson greatly needed by pious people.

Fulton on Dickens; an exposure of one of the Reverend Fulton's professional tricks.

Love to God; written on the supposition that love means love, and not fear.

The Negative Party in Religion; showing who are specially distinguished by not believing.

Five for 10 cents; all for 25 cents. Address

CHARLES K. WHIPPLE,
43 Bowdoin Street, Boston.

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—Regular meetings of this Society will be held during the winter on Sunday forenoons, at 10½ o'clock, in Daniels' Block, corner of Jefferson and Summit Streets, in the hall over the U. S. Express Office. The public are cordially invited.

FREE EVENING SCHOOLS.—The school for men and boys is held Monday, Wednesday, and Friday Evenings, from 7 to 9, in the hall over the U. S. Express Office, Daniels' Block. The schools for women and girls are held at the same time in Scott's Block, Cherry Street, and in Campbell's Block, St. Clair Street.

RECEIVED.

ESSAYS ON THE PROGRESS OF NATIONS, in Civilization, Productive Industry, Wealth, and Population. Illustrated by Statistics of Mining, Agriculture, Manufactures, Commerce, Coin, Banking, Internal Improvements, Emigration, and Population. By EZRA C. SEAMAN. New York: CHARLES SCRIBNER & Co., 654 Broadway. 1868. First and Second Series. 2 vols. 12mo. pp. 645, 659.

THE AMERICAN SYSTEM OF GOVERNMENT. Its Character and Workings, its Defects, Outside Party Machinery and Influences, and the Prosperity of the People under its Protection. By EZRA C. SEAMAN, Counsellor at Law, and Author of "Essays on the Progress of Nations." New York: CHARLES SCRIBNER & Co., 654 Broadway. London: SAMUELSON LOW, SON, AND MARSTON. 1870. 12mo. pp. 382.

SCIENTIFIC ADDRESSES by Prof. JOHN TYNDALL, LL.D., F.R.S., Royal Institution. 1. On the Methods and Tendencies of Physical Investigation. 2. On Haze and Dust. 3. On the Scientific Use of the Imagination. New Haven, Conn.: CHARLES C. CHATFIELD & Co. 1870. pp. 74 (pamphlet.) [No. 5—University Series.]

THE JOURNAL OF SPECULATIVE PHILOSOPHY for January, 1871. St. Louis: E. P. GRAY, F. ROESLEIN, &c.

EVANS' ADVERTISING HAND-BOOK, Containing a List of the most desirable Advertising Mediums in the United States, including the leading Religious, Agricultural, and Literary Publications, together with valuable suggestions to Advertisers. Boston: Published by T. C. EVANS, General Advertising Agent, 106 Washington St. 1871.

HEAR THE CRY THAT COMES ACROSS THE SEA! Rallying Song and Chorus. Words and Music by GEO. F. ROOT. Published by ROOT & Cady, Chicago.

Poetry.

AFTER THE WAR:
SUNG AT A PUBLIC FESTIVAL.

O God! in vain our lips would move;
We can but sit in silent awe,
And muse on thy eternal law,
And lean on thy eternal love.

Thou hear'st the psalm of hero-lives,
The requiem sob o'er hero-graves,
The anthem joy in hearts of slaves,
The rhythmic fall of broken gyves;

The gasp of dying wrongs and wars,
Smitten by thy triumphant will,—
The deep world-music, deepening still,
And blending with the song of stars.

O God! we have no hymn beside;
Thy works shall praise thee,—we are dumb;
We can but pray, "Thy kingdom come!
Thy spirit in our hearts abide!"

1865.

ASTERISK.

The Index.

MARCH 11, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

Contributors are requested to write on only one side of each sheet.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

INDUCEMENTS.—We would invite the special attention of our friends who cannot afford to give their services gratuitously in getting subscribers for THE INDEX, to the very liberal Cash Premiums offered in our Prospectus for 1871.

Whoever collects $150.00 for 75 subscriptions, is authorized to retain $50.00, forwarding $100.00.

Whoever collects $100.00 for 50 subscriptions, is authorized to retain $25.00, forwarding $75.00; and so on.

Now it cannot be very difficult, in a town of any considerable size, to get twelve subscriptions a day for one week, if the agent uses ordinary business energy. Yet he would be paid about $8.00 a day—as much as his representative in Congress receives for work not always, we fear, so useful!

"A word to the wise." Who will canvass for THE INDEX, and at the same time earn as much as the Hon. Mr. ———? Send for "Truths for the Times," and begin at once.

"TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES, OR REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX"—is the title of a neatly-printed tract of sixteen pages published by THE INDEX Association, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. One Hundred Copies will be sent for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate—one cent a copy. Packages will be sent free to those who will circulate them, but are unable to pay for them. Here is an excellent means of helping the cause of Free Religion and THE INDEX as an organ of it. Friends of Freedom, send for as many copies as you can use, and do your part in awakening an interest in ideas worthy of American institutions and the higher civilization of the future.

It is seldom that the two oil-and-water elements of Protestantism—Catholicism and Free Religion—are so strikingly contrasted as in the following consecutive items in an evangelical paper. The one breathes the spirit of the Pope's Index Expurgatorius, the other that of another INDEX we wot of:—

"We admit that our daily papers should give the news, but it is a fair question whether they are justified in giving columns to avowed infidel sentiments simply because uttered in the guise of a lecture; no more than they would be justified in apologizing at great length for some heinous crime, or allowing the criminal to argue why his crime is not a crime."

"Those who would legislate God into the Constitution of the United States might try their hand at the Book of Esther; there would be as much sense in the one as in the other."

PLUTARCH'S "MORALS."

Disgusted at the longevity which characterized a certain rich relative, an impatient heir is said to have exclaimed,—“Confound him! He has as many lives as a cat or old Plutarch himself!” From the possibility of attributing to the sage of Chaeronea the aggregate vitalities of all the heroes whose story he has so charmingly told, we were fortunately saved in season. At the age of eleven (thanks to one whose wise and judicious care no length of years would ever enable us to requite) Plutarch's “Lives” were put into our hands for a winter's reading, and were faithfully read to the “Finis” at the end of the last volume. This was all we knew of Plutarch, till in the Cambridge Divinity School we threaded our way through the labyrinthine Greek of the De Sera Numinis Vindicta, under the genial guidance of one whose mantle has fallen on no Elisha—Prof. Noyes. Since that day we have had occasion to read portions of other treatises in the original; now we are permitted to roam at will over the full extent of the “Morals” in the translation just published in five noble volumes by Little, Brown, and Company, of Boston. Excellently printed and handsomely bound, they offer a temptation to all who are in love with delightful and profitable reading which it were almost a sin to resist. No one who can afford it should forego this opportunity of cultivating fellowship with one of the finest, purest, and most highly cultivated spirits of antiquity. Plutarch fascinates while he instructs; and all that can be gained from familiarity with the condensed lore of Greek and Roman wisdom awaits his readers, as the reward of a study that crowns itself with pleasure. The noble enterprise of giving such works as these to the world reflects the truest and highest honor upon our country; and the publishers are entitled to the gratitude of all who have at heart the elevation of public morality, the cause of good learning, and the dignity of American letters.

Prefixed to the first volume is a modest preface by the editor, Prof. William W. Goodwin, and an introduction by Ralph Waldo Emerson, written as only he can write. Nominally a “revision and correction” of earlier versions, the present translation shows on every page the evidence of the critical and profound scholarship which has given Prof. Goodwin so honorable a name in the literary world. No one who has occasion to use his “Greek Moods and Tenses” in practical instruction, as we had for several years, can fail to conceive the highest possible opinion, not only of the erudition, but equally of the analytic power and philosophical grasp of principles which characterize that remarkable work; and it is not too much to say that no scholar has ever done so much for the cause of Greek literature on this side of the Atlantic as Prof. Goodwin has done by throwing the light of his original and methodizing thought on the intricacies of the Greek verb. The admiration which we conceived for his learning and philological acumen, while engaged in the tuition of suspended college students and constantly obliged to subject the quality of his work to the severest practical tests, inspires us with absolute confidence in the thoroughness and exactitude of the present translation of Plutarch; and, except by such changes as may be necessitated by a more critical determination of the original Greek text than is possible at the present time, we suspect that few, if any, important modifications of it will ever be required. This version of the “Morals” will undoubtedly remain, for a generation at least, the standard translation of one of the most notable and permanently valuable classics which survive as monuments of the civilization of the wonderful Greek race. Mr. Emerson's appreciative reference to the fine quality of the present rendering will be enjoyed by all who know that the editor's rare qualifications for his task are excelled by his modesty alone:—“Professor Goodwin is a silent benefactor to the book, wherever I have compared the editions. I did not know how careless and vicious in parts the old book was, until in recent reading of the old text, on coming to anything absurd or unintelligible, I referred to the new text, and found a clear and accurate statement in its place. It is the vindication of Plutarch.”

There is a peculiar propriety in the republication of the writings of this sweet and pure thinker today. No grounds exist for believing Plutarch to have been at all acquainted with Christianity; yet he is remarkable for the loftiness and depth of his moral intuitions. At a time when men are eagerly comparing Christian thought with the confessedly “uninspired” teachings of other religions, the works of Plutarch acquire a fresh significance. To radical minds, in particular, they possess the highest value; for they are an irrefutable confirmation of the radical faith in natural and free religion. In an admirable critique of Plutarch contained in the March number of The Radical, Col. Higginson says:—“Born about 50 A. D., he was one of the remarkable group of stoics who, without concert, and often without personal acquaintance, were affirming to the world doctrines which varied from those of Jesus only in having a shade more of self-reliance and a shade less of self-sacrifice; and which, from that very difference, have always reached a class of minds for whom the Beatitudes do not contain quite all truth.” Mr. Towne, also, in the March number of his Examiner, says with great truth:—“Plutarch belonged to the generation second after that of Jesus. He was just coming to manhood when Paul ceased from apostolic labors. The essays which are called his ‘Morals’ were written at the moment when Christian teaching was fairly in the world, but before it had made any appreciable impression upon Paganism. If they contain lessons of rare and gracious wisdom, these lessons show what Paganism was capable of at the very hour when Christianity, as popularly interpreted, claims to have found the light of ethical and religious teaching clean gone out. The ‘Lives’ and the ‘Morals’ of Plutarch, taken together, form a large body of history and instruction, of chronicle, character, and catechism, retold and retaught, newly narrated and freshly expounded and enforced, at just the moment when our popular Christianity pretends that the world of ancient life and faith was without form and void, and darkness brooded over a chaos which waited the creating breath of Divine interference through Christ.” Viewed in this aspect, Plutarch invites the special study of those who would learn how far the “light of unassisted reason,” as the time-honored phrase goes, suffices to illumine the path of human life. He is a torch whose radiance is unexhausted still.

A LETTER FROM DR. BARTOL.

With the greatest pleasure we give place to the following letter from one who is known only to be honored and beloved:—

BOSTON, Feb. 8, 1871.

DEAR ABBOT:—You asked me to write for THE INDEX, and at the same time inquired my view of the subject of your lecture, the Intuitionist vs. the Scientific school of Radicals, respecting God and Immortality. Is it a proper case in court? If Intuition be anything, it is a part of Science, a mode of knowledge. The question would be of the knowing faculty. But, if God be, he is no outlying province, but so implicated in us that self-knowledge must be knowledge of him. It is con-science or consciousness. God is the common of our souls. There is no boundary between God and man, or between man and his brother. Atheistic theories exist, but actual atheism is not possible, more than actual Inhumanity. If by science is meant complete knowledge of the Infinite, it is absurd. We should be ashamed of a God we could comprehend. It would not be God; but smaller than we. This immense personality, parent of persons, to whom space is finite, as he contains it and it cannot contain him, is wherever is any person; and we cannot deny him without denying ourselves, or even try to wound him but through ourselves; for his nature with ours overlaps, interacts, and essentially blends.

I rather state than seek to prove the very notion of Being, to ascertain which we use or argue divers ways; for he is surer than any proof, nor do I want a probable God. Without unity of life, there were no universe,—and the relation of living beings is Truth. Matter is but Introducer or Introduction of spirit to spirit, and nothing without God, the Includer of all. What is the perception of him, or perceiving power,—how its eye is served with our senses and understanding as hands and feet,—I have no room here, were I competent, to show. I can only tell my faith that Love is the worker and Law the tool,—and that personal essence and substance is the In-all and Over-all of the creation. When this story mass of Nature we ignorantly fancy mother of all, melts in thought of communion of souls that touch unseen, we shall have a true philosophy. This contact we call inspiration, inward light and eye, inward voice and ear,—not so much a mode of knowledge as knowledge itself,—God and angels are our acquaintance so, as we each other's; or He informs us of himself and of one another.

That the science which observes and generalizes facts without and within, with the logic that writes its verdict, has a religious office, I gladly own; but it can only interpret this deeper sense, nor need mankind postpone, for its word, the assurance of a God. He is not so hard as to hide, worse than from Adam, in the thicket of this far-off speculative result, when he is necessary every moment to our peace.

The science of Immortality is con-science too. When certain qualities and dispositions rise, to make me their trustee and factor, I know they have nought to do with death. I cannot bring the two conceptions together. Dead spirit—what is that? As well say dead God! Person is Life, and he that feels his personality cannot conceive of annihilation. Time is his chariot, not stocks or pillory,— all chronology he holds in solution of his eternity.

If this be not Reason, will you take it for Belief, from your friend, who believes in you?

C. A. BARTOL.

"WHAT'S IN A NAME?"

It is in some respects unfortunate that from the name of the Free Religious Association—a name perfectly legitimate and apparently well chosen—there should be derived another term which is assumed to express in concentrated shape the beliefs of the Association,—the phrase "Free Religion." There are, to be sure, certain definite fundamental principles upon which the Free Religious Association is based; certain common aims and impulses which characterize all parts of the movement which the Association represents. And it is certainly very convenient to have some short name to apply to these common principles and aims. Nor would any harm be done, if it were understood that the name applied simply to principles and aims, and that these principles and aims were all in the interest of the most complete freedom of thought and the widest inquiry on all matters of religious belief. And it is only with this application that the term Free Religion is used or could be used by any one who believes in the movement and is a part of it.

But the misfortune is that the vast majority of people assume that a name which is applied as a proper noun to a religious movement—to any organized movement, but especially to one that is religious—must cover a certain definite system of opinions; that, at least, even if there be no statement of creed, the name must represent a well-defined agreement in certain beliefs, which become practically an authoritative standard of belief for the movement. Thus a good many people are now asking—What are the doctrines of this "new religion" which you say is to displace Christianity, Buddhism, and the rest? What do the "Free Religionists" believe? What are the statements of faith, what the forms of worship, which "Free Religion" advocates in distinction from those of the religious sects generally? And so the name comes to have a sectarian look, which those to whom it is applied would most strenuously avoid. People know what "Calvinism" says, what "Universalism" says, what this or that religion says, and now they want to know what "Free Religion" says, as if they expected to get all that it has to say in a succinct statement of propositions, which they can put in their pockets.

But those who believe in what is called "Free Religion" have a great many things to say; and one of the most fundamental of them is that "Free Religion" will never stop saying; and another that every man must "have his own say," and that no one has any right to say what "Free Religion" is for any other. Of course, on these principles there will be many views of "Free Religion," many aspects, and widely differing statements and deductions, among those who equally believe in the thing. It seems, therefore, to be best, and most consonant with the principles from which the free religious movement comes, that each should speak in his own name and not in the name of a system of truth which the term Free Religion is supposed to signify,—that each should say what he himself sees or believes on any matter, instead of attempting to report what "Free Religion says." Of course each one does speak only for himself, and no one using this phrase would think of binding others to his statement. Yet the phrase, however convenient and allowable to rhetoric, seems to carry an endorsement beyond one's own individual belief. Is it not a relic of religious dogmatism, which has been in the habit from time immemorial of securing for its assertions the authority of certain systems of truth whose "thus saith" was not to be questioned? In opposition to this authoritative, external standard in whatever form embodied, the believers in freedom as applied to religion assert the authority of the individual soul. The world now wants to know not what "Christianity says," or "Mohammedanism says," or what "Unitarianism" or "Calvinism" may have to say, but what individual men and women may have to say out of their own intelligence. And if what they have to say shall prove so broad and various and rich and many-sided that no name shall be found comprehensive or close-fitting enough to cover it all, so much the better for the world.

W. J. P.

THE SIN OF MONOTONY.

One of the most faithful critics of the Free Religious Association, in noticing the contents of the last Radical, commends Mr. Higginson's paper on the "Sympathy of Religions" as being scholarly and brilliant, but suggests that the topic is becoming stale, the idea common-place, and the argument threadbare. He thinks we have heard enough of the Sympathy of Religions, and that the Free Religionists had better bestir themselves and try to bring out some new thoughts.

In view of the practice of Christendom for some centuries past, this criticism has a cool air. The writer may possibly mean to whip other sects, his own included, over our shoulders,—intending a delicate sarcasm on the incessant iteration of dogmas with which our patient ears have this long time been afflicted; or he may be simply unconscious of the fact that religious bodies have never been in the habit of propounding new truths every month or two; or, finally, he may be misled by his antipathy to Free Religion into an innocent oblivion of that little piece of history.

The rule of "line upon line, line upon line," has been faithfully observed in Christendom. The Romanists keep their body of doctrines well in view; and if transubstantiation and the rest are not comprehended, it is not because they have not been heard of. The Calvinist is pertinacious in thrusting out and in his five points, no sermon being complete that does not contain the full series. How many times every Sunday may the deity of Christ be judiciously remembered, the trinity carefully defined, or the dogma of total depravity rolled as a sweet morsel under the "evangelical" tongue? There is an impression that the Unitarians have repeated with some frequency their belief in the dignity of human nature, and have not spared their audiences a somewhat exasperating tautology respecting the position of Jesus. Of the Universalists it may be said that they overwork the word "paternal" in speaking of God, and insist on the salvation of all mankind with a persistency that wears out its welcome with thoughtful people. A doctrine may fairly be repeated till it is understood, to say the least; how much oftener, will depend on the difficulty of making people believe it,—that is, on its importance.

Now this doctrine of the sympathy of religions is comparatively new and strange. To students it can hardly be called familiar; the scholars do not claim to have exhausted its significance or measured its boundaries; among the people at large it is startling, if it is not abhorrent. No sect admits it, or comprehends it. The most liberal sects still pursue the old polemical method of contrasting religions with a view of exhibiting the solitary grandeur of their own beliefs. The whole idea is yet to be unfolded and vindicated with a fulness at present unattempted and a power hitherto unfelt. For it is one of the radical ideas of our time, thrown up by men like Burnouf, Mueller, and a score more, the most eminent pundits of the generation, and elaborated in books that only the few so far have had opportunity to read. They that profess to be tired of hearing of it either do not know or do not want to know, and are anxious that nobody should know, what it means. There are deeper thoughts than this, no doubt,—thoughts more fundamental, more interesting to the philosophical mind; but among the thoughts that are to take hold of the next generation or two there is none more pregnant with spiritual issues than this one.

May not this be a reason why the mention of it is tiresome to some ears, and why even a single utterance of it is too much? What doctrine now advocated by the sects is so fraught with revolutionary power? What doctrine contains such wealth of spiritual import? It bodes the death and extermination of the sectarian organization and spirit. It disarms the great faiths, beats the ecclesiastical sword into the ploughshare and the priestly spear into the pruning-hook, turns libraries of controversial divinity into rubbish, silences the thunder of the pontifical cannonade, takes from Protestant and other missionary societies their occupation, and diverts from tract societies their much coveted funds. It hushes the anathema of the Pope and the sectarian exhortation of the preacher, and sows with wheat the old battle-grounds of theology.

Charity and piety vie with each other in heaping blessings on it. Charity loves it as the closest of its friends, for it promotes that deepest kindness which recognizes spiritual brotherhood among all the races of the earth, and it quenches that deadliest hate, the hate that religion cherishes towards religion. It introduces the Jew to the Gentile, makes Mussulman and Christian sit down at the same board, and heals the ancient feud between the philosopher and the devotee. The East and the West hold communion under its auspices. Pride is rebuked in the highest places, jealousy is discountenanced among elect people, a disposition to encourage and aid takes the place of the temper that quarrels and persecutes.

Piety honors the doctrine, because it renders complete justice to the universality of the divine wisdom and the competency of the heavenly love. We see now, for the first time, that God is indeed the Father of all his creatures, the true Father of spirits, the savior of all souls. The odious monopolies of faith which affront the divine nature as much as they disgrace the human are broken up.

The piety even of Christendom, I had almost said especially of Christendom, has certain very disagreeable features, conspicuous among which is the pharisaic tone which thanks the Lord it is not as other men are, unbelievers, misbelievers, superstitious idolaters, or even as these Mahommedans and Buddhists. The Lord will be better pleased when the Christendom of Europe shall acknowledge its debt to Asia; when Romanism shall thank the ancient faiths of India for their wealth of symbolism, and Protestantism shall return gratitude to Persia for the contribution it has made to its theory of evil, and Unitarianism shall hunt up its poor relations in Spain and Africa. When the doctrine of the sympathy of religions is established, the local idols will be overthrown, and the One God will be the sole object of human worship.

The Free Religious Association cannot do better for ten years to come than emphasize this doctrine—explain it, preach it, in season and out of season, make it quite familiar, not to the high intelligence of “liberal” editors who are able to scent a revelation afar off, and whom swiftness of apprehension enables to discount centuries of truth, but to the slower-paced souls who must hear a thing twice, yea, three times, before they understand it. Let us at all events not forego our inculcation till we have fairly justified our own faith in it.

O. B. F.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

“THE IMITATION OF JESUS.”

TITUSVILLE, PA., Feb. 9, 1871.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

I have most attentively read this most excellent sermon of Mr. Frothingham in No. 57 of THE INDEX, and—it staggers me. You are no doubt aware, sir, that I am much more radical than even Free Religion is; yet I like it, and had considerable faith in its success, and more yet in its ultimate results. At any rate, if we must have religion (which I very much doubt, however), Free Religion is certainly the best we can have. Its humanity and philanthropy are as genuine as refreshing; its liberalism and tolerance much too great for any “religion,” and its radicalism strong enough to inspire the hope that it may some day outgrow its “religion,” and be “free” and untrammelled, aiming for nothing but to improve, to educate, and to truly benefit Man, worshipping him in Humanity. But, as I said, this sermon of Mr. F.’s staggers me and my faith in Free Religion. If it is possible that even the liberal, the radical, the humane and amiable Mr. F. can be so—how shall I say?—mystified, even, by his “Free Religion,” is not then all religion inimical to progress, to humanity? I know that Mr. F. is very ideal, poetical, and if I did not know it, this splendid sermon would certainly have convinced me of it. But surely nothing else than his religion could have made such a visionary out of so fine a mind. Where does he find the vouchers for his Jesus? Beyond contradiction, not from the New Testament; for the New Testament Jesus is very different from the poetical one of Mr. F. Nor yet from profane History; for profane History does not know anything of the Jesus of John or Paul. Whence then did he conceive the outlines of his Jesus? Evidently from others, from two very different, though kindred, sources—from his lingering religious ideas of a past period, and from his fanciful imagination. For Religion, unlike Reason and Conscience, is no natural faculty of man, but only an acquisition like education, character, &c., resulting from external and contingent circumstances, like these, yet capable of gaining such an influence over the mind as to become the dominant, controlling sentiment even in the most cultivated, best educated, rational and unprejudiced men. The traces of its earlier impressions can never be entirely effaced, and gives, though often without the individual’s own consciousness, a lingering bias towards these earlier or earliest impressions. Mr. F.’s mind—fine, cultivated, and susceptible as it certainly is,—makes no exception. Born of Unitarian parents, brought up from his birth under Unitarian influences, reared and educated under Unitarian discipline, the religion his mind acquired—and it is strong in him—has been developed under these influences, so that, however his later individuality may have modified his earlier religion, the traces of the latter can still be noticed.

As a Unitarian, he was not trained to worship in Jesus the “Christ,” the “Savior,” the “God-man;” but to see in him an exalted man, an uncommon human being. These ideas, thus impressed on the young mind, were but slightly changed by the education and even radicalism of the mature man,—were even yet more fixed in him, but also beautified, by his creative imagination and poetical tendencies. His Jesus, as represented in the sermon in question, is the fanciful product of these tendencies. For, fine and delicately finished as this sermon and almost all products of his pen are, his Jesus is, after all, but a child of his imagination, a poetical vision, but not a true portrait of the man, Jesus of Nazareth.

I should like very much to analyze Jesus as his poetical fancy sketched him more in detail; but this would make my article much, very much, too long for THE INDEX. So I must forbear, whatever may be my temptation to do so. But, divested of this poetical, fanciful dress, how does the real man, the Jesus of Nazareth, compare with that of Mr. F.? How does he appear to a more prosaic mind, to an eye that sees him—not as History, for that is, as I said above, silent—but as even his thoroughly biased and prejudiced biographers, the Evangelists themselves, represent him? Let us see.

But here is the difficulty. The real Jesus is so mythical, we know so little that is reliable of the real man and his true character, and even the Evangelists themselves have so distorted him, are so contradictory with one another about him, his life, acts, teachings, that it is no more to be wondered that imaginative men can thus exalt him, than that some bold reasoners can, perhaps, too strongly criticize, or too uncharitably censure and find fault with him. But waiving the objections of critics, and setting aside the fancies of the imagination, the Evangelical Jesus is but, at best, a compassionate philanthropist, who, seeing the people suffer from their own ignorance, superstition and vices, but especially from the corruption, oppression and iniquities of those who ought to have been their teachers, counsellors, and guides, felt deeply for them. His soul is filled with pity for the suffering people, fired with indignation, aroused to wrath against their oppressors, the avaricious rich, the pitiless scribes, the hypocritical Pharisees; and he becomes a reformer. Yet, though having a soul full of pity, he lacks the determination and boldness requisite to make a successful reformer. Pity for the people made him wish for, and even make some attempts at, the amelioration of their condition; but too much sentimentality made him impractical, and we fail to discover a well-matured, feasible plan for his desired or intended reforms, if it be not that he hoped, by teaching the people, to make them patiently bear their miseries here below, and trust to a reward and future happiness in another world, in “the kingdom to come.” Certainly, strange doctrines for an earnest reformer! Instead, then, of urging the people to action, to reforms, with or against the consent of “the powers that be,” as a wise, practical and energetic reformer must have done, he taught them “to take no care for to-morrow;” to strive not after terrestrial good and pleasure; not to resist evil; if stricken on one cheek, to turn also the other; to be obedient to the powers that be, &c. True, he also said that “he had not come to bring peace, but a sword,” and admonished his disciples to provide themselves with swords, and that “he who had no sword should sell his garment and buy himself a sword.” But, as if he repented of this earnest appeal, he interdicted again the use of the sword, threatening them, that “he who takes the sword shall perish by the sword.”

But, perhaps, not only Mr. F. but also all those who harmonize with him and his views, will eulogize Jesus for his love and self-sacrifice, and say, as Mr. F. does,—“Jesus marched straight to his death. There was apparently no need of it. [I should think there was every need of it (John, 3: 16-18), or what could he be to Christians and Christianity?]; he might have withdrawn; the way was open; he could have escaped his pursuers and avoided arrest; he could have retired into Galilee among his friends; he might have lived, taught, ministered there, and done a world of good [as he, most assuredly, ought to have done, if we are to consider him as “The Son of God,” or “The Son of man;” as a reformer, or as Mr. F.’s “ideal”]; his career might have gone on to old age; every year in all that time being available to instill his principles, and infuse his life into generations. Yet he quietly marched to the cross and almost demanded to be put to death. [Not according to the Evangelists: Matt. 26:36, Mark 14:34, Luke 22:39. This is again but a fancy of Mr. F.] We glorify him for it.” These several sentences are a pleasant rhetoric, will do very well in Mr. F.’s sermon, but are not in harmony with the New Testament, or with the character it gives to Jesus, and are even against the rational character given him as a reformer. They are merely rhetoric—a fancy.

If we now turn from the character of Jesus—be it that given him by the Evangelists, or that of a reformer—to his teachings, we shall again find the Jesus of Mr. F. but a fancied, poetical ideal. His teachings, as a whole, are good; but neither perfect enough for a “Divine Being,” nor sublime enough for Mr. F.’s ideal. A great deal (and the best part of them) is not original with him. His highest, and really sublime precept—the so-called and deservedly so much lauded “Golden Rule,” is not original with him; for, although arrogated to him by those “who believe in him,” it is well known that it was a precept taught by Confucius 500 years before it was pronounced by Jesus. Others of his teachings again, though in themselves good, have become reprehensible by the manner in which they were pronounced, connected, as they are, with the violations of the most natural and sacred obligations. Instances of this kind are his unfilial behavior towards his own mother (Matt. 12: 46-50), and injunction to others to be equally regardless of this sacred duty (Matt. 3: 21, 22); his deception of his own brothers, "who [and it is no wonder] did not believe in him." (John 7: 7); his cursing a fig-tree (Matt. 21: 19), which quite reprehensible and foolish act speaks equally strong against him, in whatever character we may consider him; and so on. Another considerable part of his teachings and acts can even not be classed as good. Instances of this sort are Matt. 5: 29-40: 10; 34: 15; 24. In this category I include also his frequent equivocations, and his acts and teachings in relation to devils, demons, &c.

I believe I have now shown how unreal and fanciful the Jesus of Mr. F.'s sermon is, and given a rational and true character of Jesus, as rational and true as can be given, clouded as it is and ever will be by the contradictions of the Evangelists, the silence of history, and the want of other sources of information. And I ask now every unbiased, reasoning mind, and even Mr. F. himself, if there can be any other source than his fancy from which to draw such an ideal as his Jesus? If the real Jesus, the Jesus of Nazareth, was actually "not so much an individual as a Child of Heaven?" And if actually "a singular dignity, a supreme loftiness settles down upon him?" And if it is not inconsistent in a Radical, a Free Religionist, to speak of him in terms as glowing and exalted as those of any Christian sectarian?

MORRIS EINSTEIN.

[We think Mr. Frothingham will not object to so very courteous a criticism as the above, and we therefore publish it. Our individual opinions concerning the imitation of Jesus were so fully given in an essay entitled "Following Christ," in THE INDEX No. 22, that no comments of ours seem required. This only we should say, that it will not do to deny all exercise to the historic imagination, by which alone, provided all known facts are accepted with scientific impartiality, the great characters of the past, can be justly interpreted to a later age. The poet may be a truer historian than the mere chronicler. At the same time, we consider Jesus a man with faults of character, errors of opinion, and mistakes of conduct; and the spiritual greatness we discern in him is something entirely consistent with these.

Mr. Einstein thinks he is more "radical than Free Religion." We would inquire whether this is not a "fancy" of his own. No particular opinions make or unmake the radical, but rather the degree of his fidelity to universal ideas. If there is anything more "radical" than absolute liberty of thought and speech, what is it? But this is the ground-principle of Free Religion. With entire respect, we put an interjection point after Mr. Einstein's claim.—Ed.]

THE CLAIMS OF THE HEART IN RELIGION.

NO. III. [CONCLUDED.]

Finally: Christianity claims to be pre-eminently a religion of the heart.

There are, in the realm of reason, arguments in favor of Christianity, which have proved adequate to convince the intellect of a Matthew Hale, a Chief Justice Marshall, a Daniel Webster, a Napoleon, that Christianity is, in very truth, a divine revelation. And yet, valuable as these scientific arguments are, and serviceable as they are for certain purposes, they are not the proofs or evidences on which Christians profess mainly and finally to rely. The internal and moral, and not the historical (the argument founded upon miracles and the fulfillment of prophecy)—so much is it that induces, on the part of the great Christian body, unwavering trust in the fundamental doctrines of Christianity. The Gospel of the New Testament exactly meets the spiritual conditions and necessities of the soul. The heart, when it yields itself to obedience to it, finds, in the divine power and comfort of its truth, the strongest confirmations of its supernatural origin. The most interesting feature of Christian truth is, it is self-evidencing. "The entrance of his words giveth light." "Great peace have they who love thy law, and nothing shall offend them." No amount of cavilling or spurious logic or ridicule can make a well-fed family, sitting by a well-furnished table, believe that fruits, vegetables, and beef-steak are unwholesome, or anything but gratifying to the appetite. Faith in Christ, by leading one to a deeper knowledge of his own heart, to a profound, satisfactory peace, to a higher spiritual life, and a joy-inspiring hope of heaven, affords the most conclusive, because experimental proof of the divinity of the Gospel. A young Irishman, who a short time since was converted to a living faith in Christ, relates that, as he was crossing the Atlantic, he was accosted by a gentleman, himself an open disbeliever of the Christian religion and of all things connected therewith, and asked why he was so much interested in his Bible. The gentleman gave many seemingly strong arguments to show that this book was not the word of God. "Sir," said the young man, as soon as he was allowed to speak,—"I do not know anything about what you say; but this I do know, that this blessed book is now filling me with the Holy Ghost: Ever since I read where it said: 'Ye must be born again,' and learned what it is to be born of God, I have been filled with that peace and joy which the Lord Jesus promised; and, sir, although I do not understand what you say, I know that this book is true." The skeptic troubled him no more; and the young man went on his way rejoicing.

Is not this what Paul meant—this testimony of consciousness—this assurance of a satisfied and rejoicing heart, when (Heb. xi:1) according to the exact translation he represents faith as being—"the self-supporting foundation of invisible things,"—not the growth of reason, but of the living experience of a new creation of the whole soul,—that direction of our life to God which, as we can never realize it by our own mere knowledge, can never be either shaken or proved by any mere arguments of reason. This self-evidencing power of Christian faith is thus attested by that acute and profoundly thoughtful observer, Goethe: "No criticism will be able to perplex the confidence which we have once entertained of a doctrine, or a faith which has so stirred up and fructified all the vital energies of our soul." Go with me, doubting reader, to some sequestered glen amid our hills and valleys; visit the patriarchal occupant of some lonely cabin, and as you see him, with intermingled smiles and tears, at morning and noon and night, poring over that one book, ask him:—"Venerable friend, what makes you think that book is the word of God? Have you studied the arguments of a Butler, the 'Evidences' of a Paley, or the demonstrations of a Chalmers?" "How do I know? Why, bless you, I feel it in my heart and conscience. It has revealed to me truths I had never known before; it has given me a peace the world can never give; it has calmed my beating heart; it has quelled my anxious fears; it has banished every doubt, and enkindled within me the love of God and bright hopes of an immortal life. Why, sir, I am just as well satisfied that this Bible has come from God and that its religion is divine, as that I am here a living, thinking man." In the light of such experiences as the foregoing, may we not catch the meaning of that seemingly mystical utterance of Christ,—"Blessed are they that have not seen and yet have believed?"

Let me now observe,—

1. After what has been said, it can hardly be difficult to discern the nature of true Christian believing: that this consists in coming to Jesus, not merely to accept his ideas into an intellectual assent, or subscribe to certain dogmas ABOUT him, but to live from his life, to take power from our thorough sympathy and membership in him; to let his spirit transfigure, enlighten, purge, fathom, bind up our character. Not only does he tell us how to live, but, as soon as our souls are properly set open to him, he communicates to us the secret impulse, the spirit, the ability to live. His touch quickens us. His personality, through our sympathy with and ardent love of him, changes and transfigures our own; that is, just as far as we have faith and fellowship with him. This feature of genuine Christianity,—this "Christ formed within, the hope of glory,"—Christ, so to speak, imparting to his true disciples an inspiration, an inward power, a quickening impulse, rousing their spiritual nature from its lethargy and filling it with life and light, and withal yielding the fruits of daily righteousness, is an original and characteristic excellence.

2. This feature of Christianity accounts for its power. It addresses itself directly to the heart—it controls and fires that great original spring of action and emotion. Experience is the fountain of power. Ideas are good, but their influence, personal and social, is limited. It is the earnest man whose words take effect. The man of power is the man of convictions—convictions sending their roots down to and through the very base of his being. He is a man of mighty impulse; he is a man of generous, gushing sympathies. This is the typical Christian. It is such men that have thatched over this whole land with missionaries, religious societies, and moral agencies; that have lifted the Sandwich Islands out of the mud of sensuality and idolatry, redeemed Madagascar to civilization, and converted the savages and cannibals of Fiji to men "clothed and in their right mind." When God takes possession of men, he takes possession of their heart, their zeal, their enthusiasm, their manhood, rousing it from the very foundation. All great religious movements, revivals, reforms, &c., are but gigantic heart-throbs. No man is prepared to exert much influence over another, until awakened to a higher life that wraps itself irresistibly about the life of that other—until in his presence you feel that you are standing in the presence of one in whom God dwells, and to whom God has come.

This feature of Christianity accounts for the fact that true Christians are so happy under difficulties. Love only can reconcile us always to our lot. A few days since the writer received a letter from a Christian gentleman immersed to his very eyes in the most prosaic and exacting kind of worldly work. Still, late Saturday night, ere leaving his place of business, he could write:—"Somewhat weary, but very happy. Feel now and then an ache and a pain, but enjoy, on the whole, a tremendous undertow of health. Thank God! How he keeps me these days! Halleluiah!" Men are not apt to shout in that way out of the tide of life's vexatious cares. Only a heart glowing with love to God can enable them to do it.

4. Let it not be supposed that the prominence we assign this experimental element in Christianity in the least disparages, degrades, or overshadows the Reason. Experience does not supersede it, sanctifies the reason,—expands and enlightens it, and thus qualifies it to guide properly, and regulate the impulses of a regenerated soul. Power, unguided by wisdom, is a blind, destructive force. The typical man is one with a glowing soul, a clean conscience, an enlightened reason, and a "faith that works by love."

5. This feature of Christianity, moreover, accounts for the fact that the Christian can derive so much nourishment from, and forms such strong attachment for, the Bible. The teaching of the Bible can be appreciated only by those who have some moral sympathy with its utterances. It is only as divine truth comes in contact with a prepared mind—reason enlightened and sanctified by the Divine Spirit that it can be fully appreciated and understood, and produce abiding and salutary impressions. Tenets, indeed, may be drawn from the Scriptures by any man, but living truths only by prepared hearts. It is not surprising, indeed, that to the cold, unfruitful imagination, to the unsoftened, uninspired, unsusceptible, unthankful heart, to one destitute of a spiritual insight, the Bible should seem a dead letter,—that many, if not most, of the utterances of Christ should seem mystical and unmeaning. But to him who has so received the Scriptures into his heart that they have become to him God's revelation, the source and power of an immortal life, the deliverances of this book are "sweet, yea, sweeter than honey to their mouth."

6. As we have already seen, this experimental element involves conscious assurance,—certainty at once of the truth of our belief, and, if faithful, of the salvation of our own soul. He who has felt the power of Christ's salvation upon the heart, renewing his affections, reconstructing and revolutionizing all his aims and industries, as little cares for other "evidence" of the efficacy of this salvation as did Naaman for proof of the power of the Jordan, blessed by the prophetic word, after it had washed his leprous scales away.

A rough, illiterate backwoods preacher was once asked by an examining committee what were the "evidences of the divinity of Christ." The candidate for orders looked a little vacant. Varying the question somewhat, the committee asked: "What makes you think Christ was divine?" "What makes me think my Savior was divine?" "Yes," "Why, bless you," said he, "he's saved my soul." Evidence enough.

"'Twas great to speak a word from naught,
'Twas greater to redeem."

"And he that believeth hath the witness in himself."
R. H. HOWARD.

[The subjective experience of the heart is no proof whatever of the objective truth of any religion. Every form of fanaticism, the wildest and most extravagant, makes the same plea. The pure intellect alone must settle all questions of truth.

Mr. Howard's and Mr. Einstein's articles we print together as opposite extremes.—Ed.]

THE ORIGIN OF CONSCIENCE.

MR. FRANCIS E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—Will you permit me to give you a thought as a text for some future occasion? The other evening I listened to a sermon on the text—"What doth it profit a man if he gain the whole world, &c." I ask, what doth it profit a man if he strictly observe all the church rituals and ceremonies, and disregard the inherent, immutable, indestructible maxims of moral rectitude engraven by the Divine finger on the human soul? There is no possibility even of a man gaining either the whole, the half, the fourth, or the millionth part of the world. Yes, if he honestly pursues his vocation, pays for the necessary comforts and education of himself and family, his debts (if he has any) and his taxes, it will be as much as he will be able to perform; and three-fourths of the so-called Christians would hardly perform faithfully that. What sort of influence underlies this laxity is easy to conjecture. It is the "Savior" doctrine that is to a great extent the cause.

Some time last summer I read a discourse of yours in THE INDEX on "Following Christ," which refers to what it is thought the "Savior" would do, if he were here—that at any rate "he would do what is right." Then follows a remark somewhat like this: "Ah! what tells you that?"—an argument for the existence of conscience. Now, I think I have a stronger argument than that for the human conscience. You will find honor among horse thieves—principles of justice and equity governing themselves. You may have intercourse with a very dishonest man, and no sooner may you reciprocate his dishonesty by endeavoring to wrong him only out of five cents, he will instantly tell you that "that is wrong." I ask whence this spark of right. Are my premises correct? Please reply at your earliest convenience and oblige,

Yours truly,
LEWIS KURTZ.

[Conscience is a part of human nature, not the product of any religious teaching. It is the consciousness of our obligation to do right, and can only be developed by education, not created. Hence it appears to some extent even among "horse thieves," and criminals of all kinds. To find a deeper origin of conscience, we must inquire whence came human nature itself.—Ed.]

The way a Colorado deacon laid up treasure in heaven is thus touchingly recorded on his tombstone:—"When circumstances rendered it impossible for him to attend the stated preaching of the Gospel, he made it a sacred duty to kill an Indian every Sabbath."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX PROSPECTUS FOR 1871.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1860, and has just closed its first yearly volume.

We deem it proper, therefore, to submit the following Prospectus of Volume II for 1871, and ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if the matter was properly presented to them, and especially if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor. We cannot afford to send out travelling agents, nor would they succeed so well in getting names as persons of local influence. We therefore have determined to use the funds it would cost to get our paper before the people, in another way, namely, in the purchase of articles of value to be given as premiums to those who make up lists of subscribers; thus presenting to the friends of free thought and pure religion the double motive of doing good and getting paid for it.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two Dollars a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

PREMIUMS.

For Fifty Names, we will give one of PRINCE & Co's four Octave Melodcons (price $65,) or a complete copy of CHAMBERS' Encyclopedia of Universal Knowledge, in ten volumes (price $50).

For Forty Names, we will give a Wilson's Family Sewing Machine, one of the best Machines made.

For Twenty-Five Names, Webster's Royal Quarto Unabridged Pictorial Dictionary (price $12), or one of the following Chromos:

The Three Tom-Boys (Prang's), price..... $15.00
Winter in the Forest, 20x28..... 12.00
Watering the Horses, 21x29..... 12.00

For Ten Names, one of the following Chromos:

WHITTIER'S Barefooted Boy, (Prang's) price..... $5.00
The Unconscious Sleeper, 14x17..... 6.00
Mt. Blanc, 20x26..... 7.50
Or a copy of LOCKY'S History of European Morals, 2 vols 6.00
MAX MUELLER'S Chips from a German Work-Shop, 2 vols 5.00
EMERSON'S Prose Works, 2 vols..... 5.00
WEISS'S Life and Correspondence of THEODORE PARKER, 2 volumes..... 5.00

For Five Names, a bound volume of THE INDEX for 1870. (Price $2.50.) Or a copy of one of the following works, (post paid):

DARWIN'S Origin of Species, price..... $1.00
LUBBOCK'S Origin of Civilization, price..... 5.00
Essays in Criticism, by MATTHEW ARNOLD, price..... 2.00
Tablets, by A. BRONSON ALCOCK, with portrait, price..... 2.50
Any volume of the writings of THEODORE PARKER or HENRY D. THORNTON, each..... 2.00
On the Heights, AUERBACH..... 2.00

For Four Names, a copy of THE INDEX for 1871, or one of the following books (post paid):

EMERSON'S Society and Solitude, price..... $1.75
Nathan the Wise, a dramatic poem translated from LESSING by ELLEN FROTHINGHAM, price..... 1.75
HUXLEY'S Lay Sermons and Addresses..... 1.75
Speeches and Lectures, by WENDELL PHILLIPS..... 1.50
Historic Americans, by THEODORE PARKER, price..... 1.50
A copy of The Revolution..... 2.00
Or The Woman's Journal..... 2.00

CASH PREMIUMS.

For 75 Names,..... 50 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 50 Names,..... 25 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 25 Names,..... 15 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 10 Names,..... 5 Dollars in Greenbacks
For less than 10 Names, a Cash Commission of Twenty per Cent.

Any book in the above list will be sent by us post-paid upon the receipt of price.

N. B.—Names need not all come from one post office. We will send the paper wherever directed, and let the names be as clubs. Specimen Copies sent to all who enclose a three cent postage stamp. Address

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
Lock Box 38, Toledo, Ohio.

Guardian Mutual Life Ins. Co.,

ORGANIZED A. D. 1859.

M. O. Waggoner, Gen. Supt. for Ohio, Mich. & Ind.

John H. Hood, Assistant General Superintendent.

Office No. 154 Summit Street,
E. F. MUNGER, } General Agents.
CHAS. M. LANG, }

WALTER C. SCOTT, Local Agent, 152 Summit St.

Special Agents—Kolly Bros., 22 Summit Street.
Office Hours—From 7 in the morning till 9 at night.
Medical Examiners—Drs. Samuel S. Thorn and T. J. Eaton Toledo, O. [1871]

H. M. EDSON,

A. TERRY.

EDSON & TERRY, DENTISTS,

ROOMS 8 & 9 GRADOLPH BLOCK,

TOLEDO, OHIO.

ap16 1y

IMPORTER

Fine Chemicals, Drugs, and Toilet Articles.

Brandies, Wines & Liquors for medicinal purposes only. Also Proprietor of

Toledo Tonic Bitters,

Greatest Remedy known for general debility.

L. E. MULFORD,

23 Summit Street, Corner Perry, Toledo, Ohio
18-1y

THE CELEBRATED CRAIG MICROSCOPE

is an optical wonder, reveals thousands of the hidden Wonders of Nature; is of permanent use and practical availability, combining instruction with amusement, and never losing its interest. It magnifies

TEN THOUSAND TIMES,

a power equal to other Microscopes of many times its cost. Reveals countless little worlds all around us, teeming with life, which to the naked eye must forever remain a sealed book—as Eels in Vinegar, Animals in Water, Cheese Mites, Sugar and Ith Insects, Milk Globules, Claws and Hairs of Insects. Hundreds of eyes in a single eye of a Fly. Dust of a Butterfly's Wings to be perfectly formed Feathers, the much talked of Trichina Spirals, or Pork Worm, which was first discovered in America with this Microscope.

It is of infinite value to professional men, to teachers, and to students, but NOWHERE IS IT OF GREATER VALUE THAN AT THE FAMILY TABLE, within the reach of every member. It will delight yourself, your children, and your friends during the long winter evenings. It will show you adulterations or uncleanness of various kinds in food, as sugar, tea, bread, meat, etc.

It is of Inestimable Value to the Farmer

in examining insects which prey upon his crops. The power of a $50 Microscope, and so simple in its construction that any child can use it understandingly, and with appreciation.

A Beautiful Present—Elegant, Instructive, Amusing, and Cheap. Over 60,000 sold.

During the past six years its worth has been testified to by thousands of Scientific Men, Farmers, School Teachers, Students, Physicians, Heads of Families, and others.

PRICE, $3.00—Sent by Mail Post paid.

Every instrument is neatly boxed, and handsomely labelled with full directions for use. Thousands have been sent by mail. Address, W. J. LINESS & CO., Chicago.

FREE! FREE!

"THE MICROSCOPE," a Monthly Journal of Information for the People the mysteries of Nature explained—interesting information on the wonders of Creation—stories, sketches, etc. Terms $1.00 per year. This Journal will be sent FREE for one year to any one purchasing a Craig Microscope at the regular price, $3.00. (Craig Microscope will be sent post-paid.) For sample copy, and our beautifully illustrated and descriptive circulars, and eight pages of testimonials of Craig Microscope, send six cents for postage to

W. J. LINESS & CO.,

Opticians, and Sole Proprietors of Craig and Novelty Microscope, CHICAGO, ILL.

AGENTS and DEALERS, this Microscope sells in every family on its merits, when exhibited. LARGE PROFITS, send for terms. 58x26

THE GOLDEN AGE,

A NEW WEEKLY JOURNAL EDITED BY

THEODORE TILTON,

Devoted to the Free Discussion of all Living Questions in Church, State, Society, Literature, Art, and Moral Reform.

PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY, IN NEW YORK.

Price, $3.00 a Year, Cash in Advance.

Mr. TILTON, having retired from THE INDEPENDENT and THE BROOKLYN DAILY UNION, will hereafter devote his whole Editorial labors to THE GOLDEN AGE.

Persons wishing to subscribe will please send their names, with the money, immediately, to

THEODORE TILTON,

P. O. Box 2,848,

NEW YORK CITY.

60t4

BOYS' ADVERTISER, an amateur Monthly Journal, edited by a boy of 17. LIBERAL in opinions. REPUBLICAN in politics. WIDE-AWAKE in ideas. 30 cents a year. Address ADVERTISER, Birmingham, Conn. 68-64

COLE'S FIRST PRIZE BAKING POWDER.

The Best in the Market.

One trial only asked. Same price as the common kinds.

Sample sent free on Application.

63-75.

ALEX. COLE, BUFFALO, N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED—($225 A MONTH.) BY THE American Knitting Machine Co., BOSTON, MASS., or ST. LOUIS, MO. 58-68

Mr. Frothingham's New Book.

CHILD'S BOOK OF RELIGION, for Sunday Schools and Homes. PART I., Worship; PART II., The Good Life; PART III., Truth. In one Volume. New and revised edition. Forwarded free on receipt of $1.00.

55-68

DAVID G. FRANCIS,
17 Astor Place, New York.

WANTED—AGENTS, ($30 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock-stitch" (alike on both sides, and is fully licensed). The best and cheapest Family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Boston, Mass., Philadelphia, Pa., Chicago, Ill., or St. Louis, Mo. 38y1

THE HERALD OF HEALTH.

In the November number of THE HERALD OF HEALTH, we shall commence a series of articles upon the Temperance Movement. The series will embrace ten or twelve papers and continue during a considerable portion of the year 1871. The most important of the following subjects will be discussed:

Significance of the Temperance Movement.

The Effects of the use of Intoxicating Drinks on the Body, the Brain, and the Blood.

Its Effects on Offspring.

Its Effects on Religion.

Its Effects on Literature.

Its Effects on National Integrity (including Politics)

Moderate Drinking.

The Wine Question.

Mistakes of Temperance Reformers.

Total Abstinence.

Alcoholic Medication.

Relation of the use of Intoxicating Drinks to Poverty and Crime.

Restricting the Sale of Alcoholic Beverages.

Ministers and the Temperance Reform.

Physicians and the Temperance Reform.

Moral Responsibility of Liquor Dealers.

How best to Promote the Cause of Temperance.

The list of writers who will furnish this series will be from among our best thinkers and most earnest reformers. The first paper, on the "Significance of the Temperance Movement," will be by O. B. Frothingham, whose pen has often graced our pages. He puts the subject on the highest moral and intellectual grounds, and we are sure that his article will give great satisfaction.

The object of these papers is to do some honest, earnest work in a cause dear to so many hearts. Our friends will, we hope, help to spread the HERALDS containing these articles. Those who will secure for us new subscribers for 1871 at $2.00, may promise the October, November and December numbers free. By this means they will secure the entire series, which otherwise they would not.

WOOD & HOLBROOK, Publishers,
13 & 15 Light St., New York.

62-26

The Index.

VOL. 2.—No. 11.

TOLEDO, OHIO, MARCH 18, 1871.

WHOLE No. 64.

The Index,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION,

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, OHIO.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Editorial Contributors.

[For THE INDEX.]

EMMANUEL SWEDENBORG.

Emmanuel Swedenborg was born in Stockholm, Jan. 29, 1688. He was the son of Jesper Swedberg, Bishop of Skara, in West Gottland, who had the charge of the Swedish Church in England and her American Colonies. The family was ennobled in 1719 by Queen Ulrica Eleanora, and thenceforth he assumed the name of Swedenborg, and took his seat with the nobles in the Triennial Assembly of the State. He received a good education, took the degree of Doctor of Philosophy at the University of Upsal at the age of twenty-one, and afterwards travelled in foreign countries. He devoted himself to the study of mathematics and mechanics, and in 1716 was appointed Assessor of the Royal Board of Mines. In 1718, at the time of the siege of Frederickshall, he contrived, by means of machines of his own invention, to transport several large vessels over hills and valleys a distance of about fourteen miles. His knowledge of the sciences was remarkably active and profound. He published treatises on the Animal Kingdom, the Vegetable and the Mineral Kingdoms, on Tides, Coins, Construction of Vessels, Chemistry, Geometry, etc. The best Memorial on Finance was presented by him to the Swedish Diet in 1751.

His scientific knowledge was recognized and rewarded with honors at home and abroad. In 1724 he was offered the office of Professor of Pure Mathematics in the University of Upsal, which, however, he declined. In 1729 he was admitted member of the Academy of Sciences of St. Petersburg. He was also a member of the Royal Academy of Sciences at Stockholm. His acquaintance and correspondence were sought by the most distinguished scholars in Europe. It is confidently asserted by scientific men who have carefully studied his works that he anticipated a number of important discoveries in different departments of science, which have made other names illustrious. He seems to have been a man of calm temperament, virtuous life, and simple, unpretending manners, much esteemed and beloved by those who knew him.

Such was Swedenborg in 1745, at the age of fifty-seven, in the full maturity of his powers and fame. In this year, as he assures us, "he was called to a new and holy office by the Lord himself, who manifested himself to him in person, and opened his sight to a view of the spiritual world, and granted him the privilege of conversing with spirits and angels."

No one at all conversant with the writings and character of Swedenborg can doubt his sincerity. He regarded his previous studies as having been a means of preparation for the great work in which he was to be henceforth employed, and in his subsequent writings makes no allusion to his philosophical works. As his office was, in his opinion, to reveal the internal sense of the sacred Scriptures, he thenceforth made these his exclusive study; and he learned Hebrew that he might read the Old Testament in the original. There was no appearance of enthusiasm, and he proceeded with great deliberation, the divine assistance which he claimed to have not seeming to supersede the use of his own powers. There was no appearance of elation at the office to which he believed himself called. "This knowledge," he says, "is given to me from our Savior, not for any particular merit of mine, but for the great concern of the salvation and holiness of all Christians." He had no desire to connect his name with the New Jerusalem Church, which he said was about to be established.

He seems to have felt that he was addressing posterity rather than his own age; and his works were distributed by him gratuitously to the universities of Europe and among the learned. In 1747 he asked and obtained leave of the King of Sweden to retire from his office of Assessor. One half of his salary was continued to him through his life. After four years of labor he published his first theological work in 1749, under the title of "Heavenly Arcana, which are contained in the Sacred Scriptures or Word of the Lord, laid open, beginning with Genesis, together with relations of other wonderful things seen in the world of spirits and angels." This was followed by other theological works so numerous that I have not space even for their titles. This last work was published in 1771. Besides his published works, he left voluminous manuscripts, many of which have since been published. On Christmas Eve, 1771, he was struck with apoplexy, from which he partially recovered, and lived until the following March, when he died at the age of eighty-four.

Throughout his later writings he speaks continually of visits to the spiritual world, and conversations with men long dead. It is well attested by unimpeachable evidence that he possessed remarkable clairvoyant powers. Thus he told, it is said, the beginning and progress of a fire in Stockholm, and described all the details with the accuracy of an eye-witness, at the precise time the fire occurred, though he was three hundred English miles from the place. Such instances are said to have been familiar to his friends.

It is not strange that he came to be regarded as insane, though his manners remained always simple and serene, and his scientific conversations profound and rational. For a time his theological writings were regarded as the grotesque visions of a crazy man. Being in Latin, they were sealed books to the public in general, and their dry style was calculated to weary the few who looked into them. But by degrees, men began to say,—"There is method in this madness. These theories cannot be the product of insanity." This class of readers increased. He who had been styled contemptuously a crazy prophet, was seen to be a man of great learning and profound insight. He was ranked with Kant and Goethe, as one of the three minds which would permanently affect the coming ages.

In giving so brief a synopsis of Swedenborg's peculiar teachings as I am obliged to do, I shall, of course, be compelled to omit much that is necessary to give a full and perfect idea of his doctrines. I can only attempt a brief abstract. I will first mention his doctrine of the Trinity.

Swedenborg teaches that there is one God, even our Lord Jesus Christ. In Jesus is a trinity, but not of persons. It consists of his essential inmost Divinity, his Divine Humanity, and the Divine proceeding sphere or influence. These three are Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Man being in the likeness of God, there is in him also a corresponding trinity, soul, body, and outflowing life. In both cases, these three are one. There is no God besides the Lord Jesus Christ. We cannot know God apart from his divine humanity.

Swedenborg's doctrine of the Redemption also differs from the idea usually received as orthodox, for he rejects the vicarious atonement. At the time the Lord God came into the world, he teaches, men by their evil lives had so obscured their ideas of truth that the knowledge of right and wrong scarcely remained to them. Nearly all power of resisting evil was gone. Hell seemed about to be victorious and to gain for itself the whole human race. Men had once been in a state of innocence and peace; but, being endowed with freedom, they abused their power and began to yield to temptation. The fall was gradual, but the downward course continued till the coming of the Lord. Their human nature had become so perverted that, had he not come, there would have been no hope left. By taking on himself humanity, he engaged in direct personal warfare with hell and death. He thus restored to man spiritual freedom. He also gave to mankind a new revelation, and prepared the way for a purer religion and a better life. He did not wash away men's sins miraculously, or save any one from the natural consequences of wrongdoing; but he rendered it possible for every man who was willing to receive divine strength, and to overcome and subdue all evils. He redeemed man not only by his death, but by his whole life of temptation and conflict, and gave to him in the gospel a knowledge of the way of life.

Swedenborg also held that the Holy Scripture contained, besides the plain and literal meaning, a spiritual or internal sense. In order to understand his meaning clearly, we must know something about his grand doctrine of correspondences. This doctrine is not, as some suppose, founded on fancied resemblances. Swedenborg lays it down as a science, the pervading soul of all the sciences. He declares that everything in the universe is but the form of some variation of thought or affection; and if the thought or affection ceased, the form could not possibly exist. Thus ideas are the souls of which animals, vegetables, and minerals are the bodies. These ideas are few and simple; but as musical sounds by ever-changing combinations produce ever-varying harmonies, so from these sentiments and ideas are evolved all the forms of beauty and order in creation. This doctrine is not based on any natural analogy. It is founded on fact, as Swedenborg holds; the spiritual idea being the producing cause or soul of the form. For example, light corresponds to truth, and heat to love. Do we not, as Swedenborg might ask, speak intuitively of receiving light on a subject, when we mean that we have gained a truer view of it? Do we not speak of warmth of affection? As the light and heat of the sun sustain and vivify all things on earth, so do the Divine Truth or Wisdom and the Divine Love sustain and vivify the universe. Universal harmony corresponds to spiritual harmony. According to this idea, the music of a nation affords some index to its character, nor can we hope that any nation lacking a harmonizing religious sentiment will produce either the highest kind of music or the noblest forms of statuary.

Swedenborg carries this doctrine to great extremes. Some of his correspondences seem beautiful and poetical; others strike us as grotesque. Morning or dawn in spring-time corresponds to the state of the angels in heaven. Stone signifies truth; gold means celestial good. Cows and oxen correspond to the affections of the natural mind, sheep and lambs to those of the spiritual mind, and fowls to the intellectual things of the mind. An ass corresponds to scientific truth; trees mean perception; the moon means faith, etc. This internal meaning of outward things Swedenborg claims to have received as a revelation. He says that the scriptures are written in correspondences; and in order to understand them, we must be able to translate every natural object into its corresponding spiritual idea. This he endeavors to do to some extent in his writings. This inner sense does not affect the truth of the narrative of the historical portions. From the time of Abraham downwards, we read a story of earthly occurrences, notwithstanding that deep within that story is another relating to the verities of spiritual life. Prior to the time of Abraham, however, Swedenborg teaches that the narrative is not to be taken as literally true. The first part of Genesis he considers to be allegorical. Instead of teaching that the world was made in six times twenty-four hours, it reveals the seven successive stages by which man is regenerated. It is the Divine sense within the letter which constitutes the sacredness of the Bible; those books which lack this sense are not divine. The writings of Paul, the other Epistles, and the Book of the Acts of the Apostles lack this inner sense. They are good books for the Church, but not so peculiarly sacred as those which are written in correspondences. The way of life, according to Swedenborg, is to love the Lord, to love one's neighbor, and to shun evils as sins, not from motives of self-interest. He bitterly opposed the Lutheran doctrine of justification by faith alone.

His peculiar views of the life hereafter have probably attracted more attention than any of his other doctrines. Some persons consider Swedenborgians as another sect of Spiritualists. This is a mistake; for they regard it as specially disorderly and injurious to seek intercourse with departed spirits. This intercourse, they say, was permitted to Swedenborg for a special purpose; and even he declared that, though his eyes were opened to behold the spiritual world, still he received nothing pertaining to the doctrines of the church from any spirit or angel, but only from the Lord, while reading the Word. Swedenborg held that man has a natural body and also a spiritual body; and this spiritual body is substantial, although spiritual, and the eternal dwelling-place of the soul. When we die, resurrection takes place,—not ages hence. But this spiritual body now is, within the mortal body. While man's natural life continues, his spiritual senses are ordinarily closed; but for special purposes angels and spirits have appeared to men, as in the case of the disciple John at Patmos, as Swedenborg claims, in his own case. Although our eyes are holden that we may not behold spiritual beings, we are nevertheless living in the midst of them. We attract about us spirits resembling ourselves. By good and pure dispositions we attract to us pure and good spirits, who help us to become better; by evil dispositions we attract evil spirits or devils, who tempt us and make us more and more wicked. This we cannot see till death. When the spiritual body is raised,—in other words, when a man enters the other world after death,—he does not perceive any difference in his body, and at first does not know that he has died. He enjoys every external and internal sense that he enjoyed here; he sees as before, he hears and speaks, he also smells and tastes, and, when he is touched, he feels the touch as before; he also longs, desires, thinks, reflects, loves, and wills, as before. In a word, when a man passes from one life into the other, it is as if he passed from one place into another and he carried with him all things which he possessed in himself as a man; so that after death he cannot be said to have lost anything of himself except his mortal body. But still the difference between the life of man in the spiritual world and his life in the natural world is great. In that life space and time are mere states of mind. When two persons have similar affections, they are near together. Spiritual consanguinity can alone produce companionship there. At death, no man enters heaven or hell at once, but remains in the intermediate state. There the angels try to draw him out of the evils he has acquired on earth. If interior goodness and truth predominate in his soul, he is gradually regenerated. If interior evil and falsehood predominate, the soul comes under the influence of evil angels and becomes worse and worse, with constantly accelerating speed. In this state, those who have been friends and acquaintances in the life of the body meet and recognize each other; but those who pass from this intermediate state into heaven or hell see each other no more, unless they are of a similar disposition or love.

The joys of heaven consist in the subordination of self-love to the love of others. This by degrees becomes so perfect that the highest angels love others better than themselves. Of course, where each one brings his services as a free gift, no one can suffer any deficiency of service, so perfect is the mutuality of love. The heavenly life is not represented as a life of rest, but of progressive development by active usefulness.

As heavenly joy consists in the love of others, so the torment of hell consists in the opposite state of things. There self-love reigns and a mutual desire to provoke, annoy, and injure each other. This infernal reign of evil passions and their attendant consequences constitute the whole misery of the wicked. The sun of God's love shines on them, as on the angels in heaven; but by spiritual laws, fixed and unalterable, they cannot receive its pure influence. The state of their own will perverts it as it enters. He in whom heaven is, carries it with him; he in whom self-love reigns, carries hell with him. Swedenborg says that heaven is not denied by the Lord to any one; any may be let in that desire it, and tarry there likewise; but if an impure spirit is admitted, when he is at the first threshold, he is seized with such anguish of heart, from the access of heavenly heat (which is the love in which angels are) and from the influx of heavenly light (which is the divine truth), that he feels infernal torment instead of heavenly joy, and in consequence of the shock casts himself headlong thence.

But in the other life there can be no permanent disguise. A person must appear what he is. This applies not merely to his face and manners, but to all his surroundings. Here the law of correspondence is in full force. Whatever is without a man corresponds to his internal state,—his clothes, his habitation, and all the surrounding scenery. In earthly life a bad man may make delightful music, an impure woman can put on lilies of the valley; not so there. There a man is in the midst of forms of which his own thoughts and feelings are the producing cause. Angels dwell among forms and colors beautiful according to their state. The most intelligent have garments glittering as from flame, some shining as from light; the less intelligent have bright and white garments without splendor, and the still less intelligent have garments of diverse colors; but those in the inmost heaven are naked, because they are in innocence, and nakedness corresponds to innocence. Their garments do not merely appear to be garments; they are real. The angels put them off and on, and those that are not in use they preserve. Their garments are changed according to their state of love and wisdom. Their dwellings are like earthly habitations, but far more beautiful. Palaces of heaven have been seen which were so magnificent that they could not be described; but not only the palaces and houses, but each and all of the things that are within and without them correspond to the spiritual state of those who occupy them.

All in heaven have one language, and all understand each other. Language is not learned there, but implanted in every one, and the speech of angels is like music to the ear. Swedenborg says he once heard an angel speaking to a hard-hearted spirit, and he of the hard heart was so affected by the tones that he wept. He said he never wept before, but he could not help it now, for it was pure love speaking.

The spirits in hell, on the other hand, are deformed and hideous monsters. Their faces are direful, and void of life, like corpses; in some they are black, in some disfigured, with warts, pimples, and ulcers; in some no face is seen,—teeth only are exhibited. Such is their appearance, when seen in the light of heaven; but they appear to each other as men. This is of the Lord's mercy, lest they should seem as filthy to each other as to the angels. As soon as any ray of light from heaven is let in, they appear in their real and hideous forms. Hence they shun the light of heaven and cast themselves down into their own light, which is not the light of the sun, but like a light from burning coals, and in some cases as from burning sulphur; but if any light from heaven flows in thither, even this light is changed to thick darkness. Their voices are harsh and discordant in proportion to their degrees of evil. They dwell amid ruined houses and cities, wander through bogs, fens, and tangled forests. Some abide in sandy deserts; some flee to subterranean dens. Those who have been studious of religious doctrines, and have not applied themselves to holy living, dwell among heaps of stones. Those who have been avaricious dwell in cells and love swinish filth; those who were revengeful are surrounded by corpses; and so on. In short, all their environments flow out of and represent their internal state.

Some have imagined that Swedenborg teaches the immortality of animals. This is a mistake. Animals are not immortal, he says, because they are incapable of knowing God. Nevertheless, animals exist in the spirit world, though not the same ones that lived on earth. Bird and beast are emanations from the minds and wills of men there present, corresponding, like everything else, to those minds and wills.

Although the evil spirits are in homes of their own choosing, and less miserable than they would be anywhere else, still they are not happy. The self-love which burns within them is the fire which is not quenched. Restless and insatiable, it is ever impelling them to acts which are forbidden, and which, if committed, are followed by severe suffering.

Swedenborg also teaches that all angels and spirits were formerly men in mortal bodies. They have been and still are human beings. God, when he made man in his own image and likeness, stamped him with the highest mark any finite creature can receive. There can be none greater than the divine image, except the Divine Being. Swedenborgians claim that this is the teaching of the Bible, as when John in the Apocalypse was on the point of paying undue homage to an angel, who spake with him, and received the reply,—“See thou do it not, for I am thy fellow-servant and of thy brethren the prophets.”

Swedenborg's idea of marriages in heaven deserves mention. He teaches that sex is a permanent fact in human nature; that men are men, and women women, in the highest heaven, as here upon earth. It is the soul which is male or female. The smallest drop of intellect is inconvertible between the sexes. The union of wisdom and love in God is the divine marriage; the creation proceeds distinctly from them, and aspires to a marriage in every part. Male and female minds are so formed as to be counterparts of each other, and, when united by conjugal love, form one mind. In heaven conjugal love is a means of endless progression, by which husband and wife derive a continual increase of love and wisdom, and renew their youth.

Swedenborg's idea of the state of little children in heaven is very pleasant. As soon as their souls leave their bodies, they are folded in the arms of women who, while they lived on earth, were filled with maternal tenderness. Each angel has charge of as many little children as she desires from spiritual, parental love. The speech of the little ones consists, at first, of flowing tones of affection; but these gradually become more distinct and articulate, as ideas and thoughts enter. All things are taught them by delightful images, suited to their tender state. They learn fast, because no false principles, acquired in their earthly existence, obstruct their understanding of truth. Swedenborg assures us that he has often seen them in beautiful gardens with their angelic teachers.

Heaven is supremely human; nay, more, it is one man, according to Swedenborg. As the members of the body make one person, so before God all good men make one humanity. Every society of them is a heavenly man in a lesser form, and every angel in a least. This is because God is an Infinite Man, and shapes his own heaven into his own image and likeness. Therefore all its angel-inhabitants are in some province of the Grand Man. Some are in the province of the brain; some are in that of the heart; some are in the legs and arms; and all, wherever located, perform spiritually the offices of that part of the body to which they correspond. They all work together, however separated apparently, as do the parts of a single man. Hell, on the other hand, is one monster, compact of all evils, and in its collective capacity is the devil or Satan; the devil is the name of its evil, and Satan that of its falsehood.

Swedenborg devoted a great deal of time to an exposition of the Apocalypse, or Book of Revelation. Its spiritual sense is said to relate particularly to the consummation of the Christian Church, the last judgment, and the establishment of the new heavens and the new church, called the New Jerusalem. This is distinct from the first Christian, as the first Christian was distinct from the Jewish Church. To quote Swedenborg,—“The second coming of our Lord is effected by means of a man, to whom he has manifested himself in person, and whom he has filled with his spirit, to teach the doctrines of the New Church through the Word from him.” Of course, Swedenborgians hold that Christ's second advent has already taken place, and the New Jerusalem has descended from heaven.

Perhaps it may be of some interest to mention that Swedenborg claims to have visited the planets of our solar system. His accounts of his observations are not a little amusing. For example, he describes the moon as inhabited by a race of dwarfs, who do not speak from their lungs, but from a quantity of air collected in the abdomen, because the moon has no atmosphere. They make a thundering sound in speaking. They correspond in the Grand Man to the uniform cartilage of the breast bone. The spirits of Mercury correspond to the province of memory. They strive unceasingly to acquire knowledge, and are allowed to pass even beyond our solar system in pursuit of it.

I have endeavored in these few pages simply to report Emmanuel Swedenborg, without intruding any beliefs or theories of my own. Emerson has well said that “there is no such problem for criticism as the theological writings of Swedenborg,—their merits are so commanding, yet such grave deductions must be made. Their immense and sandy diffuseness is like the prairie or the desert, and their incongruities are like the last delirium. His moral insight, his correction of popular errors, his announcement of ethical laws, take him out of comparison with any modern writer, and entitle him to a place among the law-givers of mankind. His theological bias fatally narrowed his interpretations of Nature. But the interpreter, whom mankind must still expect, will find no predecessor who has approached so near the true problem.”

NOTE.—The following books were used in compiling this article:

“Life of Swedenborg,” by James John Garth Wilkinson.
“Heaven and Hell,” by Emmanuel Swedenborg.
New American Cyclopaedia.
Mrs. Lydia Maria Child's “Letters from New York.”
Emerson's “Representative Men.”
“Religion and Life,” by James Reed.

SUMMARY STATEMENT OF THE DOCTRINES OF THE NEW CHURCH.—I.—God is One in Essence and in Person, in whom there is a distinct and essential Trinity, called in the Word the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, and the Lord Jesus Christ is this God, and the only true object of worship.

II.—In order to be saved, man must believe on the Lord, and strive to obey his commandments, looking to him alone for strength and assistance, and acknowledging that all life and salvation are from him.

III.—The Sacred Scriptures, or the Divine Word, is not only the revelation of the Lord's will and the history of his dealings with men, but also contains the infinite treasures of his wisdom expressed in symbolical or correspondential language, and therefore in addition to the sense of the letter there is in the Word an inner or spiritual sense, which can be interpreted only by the law of correspondence between things natural and things spiritual.

IV.—Now is the time of the second coming of the Lord, foretold in Matt. xxiv., and the establishment of the New Church signified by the New Jerusalem in Revelation xxi., and this second coming is not a visible appearance on earth, but a new disclosure of Divine Truth and the promulgation of true Christian doctrine, effected by means of the Lord's servant, Emmanuel Swedenborg, who was specially instructed in this doctrine, and commissioned to publish it to the world.

V.—Man's life in the material body is but the preparation for eternal life, and when the body dies man immediately rises into the spiritual world, and, after preparation in an intermediate state, dwells forever in heaven or hell, according to the character acquired during his earthly life.

VI.—The spiritual world, the eternal home of men after death, is not remote from this world, but is in direct conjunction with it, and we are, though unconsciously, always in immediate communion with angels and spirits.—New Jerusalem Messenger.

A NEW PHASE OF ECCLESIASTICAL DICTATION.

[From the Boston Commonwealth.]

In illustration of the text so frequently used in these columns, it is pertinent to mention that Rev. J. L. Hatch, a Unitarian clergyman, residing in Mansfield, and preaching in Scituate, of this State, was arrested on Monday afternoon, in this city, while distributing tracts in front of Tremont Temple while the crowds attending Elder Knapp's meetings were passing in and out. The law he was charged with violating was the 26th section of the 31st chapter of the city ordinances, which says: “No person shall stand in any street for the purpose of grinding cutlery, or for the sale of any article, or for the exercise of any business or calling, unless duly licensed by the Board of Aldermen.” Mr. Hatch was circulating tracts entitled “The Atonement in Connection with the Death of Christ, by Rev. F. H. Hedge, D. D.” On Tuesday—having given bail in $200 for his appearance—he appeared before the Municipal Court, Judge Bacon presiding. Assistant City Solicitor Stackpole appeared for the prosecution. Policemen testified in relation to the times Mr. Hatch had distributed tracts; that he had refused to leave the vestibule of Tremont Temple when requested to do so; that several times during the last six months the officers of the “Young Men's Christian Association” had complained that he obstructed their doorway and “interfered with their business;” that he had sometimes collected such a crowd as to obstruct Tremont street and oblige the passers to step off the sidewalk into the mud in order to get by him—when requested to move on, replying that he had as good a right to stand there as any one; and that, when urged to move, he had changed his position by moving a few feet away. Mr. Hatch, in defence, testified that he was in front of the Tremont Temple at various times, from one to two hours, during the past six months. He had been at the Temple oftener since the beginning of the revival meetings, because there were more people going into the Temple to whom he could distribute tracts. He had always changed his position when requested. In no case had he received pay for his labors, believing that he was doing good, and making it not a business but a recreation for his noonday hours. The Mayor and Chief of Police had told him that no license was required. He did not do it as a professional act, and had never conversed with people who took the tracts, unless they asked him some question. He believed he had distributed 50,000 tracts on Tremont street. Rev. Mr. Bush, editor of the Christian Register, endorsed Mr. Hatch warmly. After brief arguments by counsel, Judge Bacon discharged the defendant, for the reason that his case did not properly come under the ordinance, which enumerated the grinding of cutlery and the sale of articles as specified offences, and the "calling" alleged did not bear any analogy to these matters of business, which would be required to hold the defendant. The well-known promiscuous character of the gatherings at the Temple, the Judge added, rendered it extremely doubtful if the defendant was the principal cause of the collection of crowds at the entrance. Of course, from a man of sense who rightly comprehends our institutions, no other decision than this could be expected. Had it been otherwise, the whole work of colportage, whether practised by the liberal or strict denominations, would have gone by the board, for, compared with distributing tracts in the street, leaving them at the doors of our residences, ringing-up the domestics or mistresses at unseasonable hours, by scrawny women, is ten-fold a nuisance and "unlicensed calling." But the real grief in this case is that Mr. Hatch is administering a counter-irritant to the prescriptions of the old schools, and it has a marked effect on the patient. The better way is to allow all who are sick to take such medicine as they prefer! It is the forcing process which disgusts, more than the doses. But what a ludicrous turn this denominational dictation takes when a treatise of Rev. Dr. Hedge is considered unsound and dangerous to morals!

THE CAR CONDUCTOR.

[The following story, told at the New York Fulton St. Prayer-meeting, and published in the N. Y. Observer, is interesting in connection with the preceding. A comparison of the treatment accorded to Mr. Hatch with that accorded to the evangelical tract-distributor will show that "sauce for the goose" is not always "sauce for the gander."]

A Sabbath school superintendent of one of the Reformed churches in Brooklyn asked prayer for a car conductor whom he had met that morning in coming over to New York. He took his position on the front platform, and soon the conductor came to him for his fare, which he handed him; and as he did so, he offered him a tract, which he declined to receive, saying:—

"It will do me no good."

"Oh, yes," said the passenger, "it will do you good."

"No, sir," he answered, "nothing of the kind will do me any good."

"But read this," said the traveller. "You may find something in it that will lead you into the way of salvation."

"Salvation!" answered the conductor. "There is no salvation for me."

"Yes, there is salvation for you—even for the greatest sinners."

"No, no; you do not know who you are talking to. Why, sir, I am the most wretched man alive, and have been for five years. I have wished myself dead a thousand times, and for five years I have been pursued with the temptation to destroy my own life. I fear I shall, some day. I tell you, there is no salvation for such a wretch as I am. No; keep your tracts. They may do good to some one else, but not to me."

The speaker said he afterwards persuaded the man to keep the tract, and made him promise to read it. "I am resolved to look after that poor man," he said. "I have come from the store to ask you to pray for this poor sinner, the car conductor." And then he fed the meeting in a very feeling, earnest prayer that the man might be converted.

A STORY OF MODERN HEROISM.—David Simmons was the engineer of the Pacific express train. He was a true man. For twenty years he had held a place on an engine. Years ago, while dashing past Yonkers, Simmons called the attention of his fireman to a train which was sweeping down upon them like the wind. A collision seemed inevitable. The frightened fireman shouted,—"Good-bye, Dave; I'm going to jump!" and sprang from the locomotive. Simmons stood with his hand upon the throttle of his engine, like a man of iron. In the face of startling peril he remembered his duty and stood at his post. A collision was averted, and the heroic engineer saved the lives of a hundred men.

On Monday night, David Simmons was driving his engine toward Albany, at the rate of forty miles an hour. Near New Hamburg a red light was swung out as from an approaching train. The engineer saw it. It was the signal of danger. David Simmons then whistled down brakes, in the vain hope of stopping the express in time. His fireman again took the alarm, and shouted to Simmons to leap for his life. The noble Simmons calmly answered,—"I won't! I'll stay with my engine!" Again he stood like a man of iron at his post. The fireman sprang and saved his life. The engineer saw a train on the bridge. He realized that his only hope of safety was to dash through the obstruction. He whistled off brakes, and crowded on all his steam. This was the work of an instant. Simmons peered into the darkness, shading his eyes with his hand, and was dashed into the jaws of death.

David Simmons was a hero. His fate is sad; but his noble behavior is the only bright page in the dark history of the awful accident at New Hamburg.—N. Y. Sun.

"THE VISITATION OF GOD.—Seldom could these words be more appropriately employed than in connection with the dreadful accident on the Hudson River Road, last week Monday. 'By visitation of God' is the name by which such a horror must be called."

The above is from Zion's Herald of last week. Now we thought the railroad "accident" referred to was caused by the fact that men have not learned to manage railway affairs with the necessary wisdom and caution. What more loathsome or cruel heathenism ever cursed the earth than this which makes a man believe that God roasts alive about twenty persons, men, women, and children, at New Hamburg, the other day? If He did it, it was done purposely and deliberately, and of course no human foresight or promptitude in running trains on time, and having danger-signals made in season to stop the approaching train, could have availed to thwart His plans for the collision, with all its horrible concomitants of crushing, drowning, and burning to death.

So we suppose that when men are too lazy to drain marshes, and too ignorant to provide for the ventilation of their dwellings, and the pestilential air breeds fever, we are to believe that they and their children die by "visitation of God." The principal usefulness of Zion's Herald is the exhibition, which it makes in almost every number, of the essential immorality of some of the chief dogmas of modern "orthodoxy."—Liberal Christian.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"There are all kinds of isms now in the world, and constantly there are new isms being formed, the last more absurd and false than the other. But the greatest of all humbugs that are known to me is the Association of the Free Religionists and its organ, THE INDEX. Whether the founders and leaders thereof are fools or knaves, insane or unprincipled villains, is hard for me to decide. Can it be possible that men, civilized and learned men, become so blind and infatuated, or has their ambition made them so degraded and unprincipled that they care neither for God, man, or the devil, so they gain their point to be at the head of a party or sect? The fools are not all dead. There never was yet any doctrine taught but it found some believers and adherents. What is the purpose of the so-called Free Religionists? It is to run down Christianity into the lowest hell, to defame and slander Jesus Christ, the great light of the world, the divine and perfect teacher, and to take from him and from his system everything, and to call it their own. The Fifty Assertions in THE INDEX are so absurd and false, that almost any one who has a very limited knowledge of Christianity can confute them. If thou wilt publish my criticism, I will write it, and confute every one of the Fifty Assertions. But in such a case thou hast to send to me a copy thereof, for I have none of them here with me; I left them in Boston which I had. It is for the instruction of the people I am laboring and wish to labor, not for any other purpose. I have no envy or hatred to any one; but I pity all false teachers. I suppose that my letter will be counted as insulting and rude; but I cannot recall anything in it. I do not think that such people can be or ought to be used with any kind of deference who defame and slander the greatest man the world has seen, and who misrepresent his sublime teachings in the most shameless way that can be possible. To call popery, and the other numerous sects and isms we now find in the world, under the name of 'Christianity,' 'natural outgrowth of Christianity,' is most ridiculous. How can a man that is endowed with reason and common sense make such silly assertions? Before defaming a person, seek to know him; and before criticising a system, seek to understand it. I have no hatred or envy against any one; but I do hate them who slander my best, greatest, and truest friend, who is my life, my light, my strength, and my all; and who wilfully pervert and misrepresent the most perfect system imaginable." [After the above specimen of the writer's style of criticism, we hardly dare solicit the offered confutation. Life is short, and THE INDEX is too small to contain the folio that would probably arrive. We trust our critic will be satisfied with being permitted to call us fool, knave, and villain in our own columns.—Ed.]

"Please erase my name from the book as a subscriber. I have ceased to take much interest in its contents. It is not such mental food as I relish, and, like a man at a table in a hotel, I shall call for something else that I relish hereafter, and change as often as I would food for the body."

"A bright little grandson in our house, and a 'bran new' little granddaughter,—plenty to do and think of, you see, attending to mother and children; yet with all these roses and their accompanying thorns, we must have THE INDEX. You can form some estimate of how essential it is to our peace, when I tell you we did not, from some cause, receive it yesterday, and the cry has been in verbal sounds (from my dear old sister) 'Oh! I do wish Eddie had not forgotten THE INDEX,' or 'we had asked Eddie if he went to the office for it.' Said Eddie being mostly reliable, we were forcibly reminded that our subscription was about out, and I (grandmother), in view of the fact that our dear daughter is too ill to write again for us, must needs do it myself or be minus our little gem pretty soon, (our husband, in business away from home, only visiting us semi-occasionally). Atheism is a 'bug-a-boo' to me, I must acknowledge; but I shall try to follow gladly wherever truth may lead. Am not ready to accept that only as real which we touch and handle. Thought so me seems the most real, yet it is the most intangible; and although we cannot prove its existence outside the human brain, yet I believe we are warranted in the hope and faith of its eternally individualized existence, thought, mind, soul. Not that any especial book has taught it, or any especial man died for it; but that it seems inherent in our natures to crave it, to aspire to it. In truth, it seems inextinguishable. We know the body dies; in my own I see and feel the gradual process going on, yet can never feel that the mind or soul has no longer lease of life. But we are only wanting THE INDEX now, hoping it will continue to feed us on bread which will nourish our souls in all upward tendencies,—hoping also that the loaves will be called for in sufficient numbers to feed many more and react on you in the way that will feed both soul and body. Have only been able to get you one subscriber in the past, but the future may have better luck in store.—INDEX all right; read 'The Incarnation.' Many Christmases have come and gone since I have been a 'come-outer' from the old faith in Jesus (as the Christ, yet he embodied more fully than any other the love element). Like you, I have never ceased to reverence his memory; and although I could not worship him as a God, I must ever hold him as a dear elder brother."

"The greatest obstacles in the way of getting subscribers to THE INDEX are indifference and fear of unpopularity. If a man wishes the votes of the people for any political office, he is afraid to take such a paper lest Christians, with characteristic illiberality, should refuse to vote for him, as very likely they would. Such trimming and truckling may be a choice of evils, but it seems pitiable. Some of the aforesaid subscribers are so without their knowledge and consent and may repudiate, but if I'll try to find other readers. As for myself I like the position of THE INDEX, editorially, on religious matters, better than that of any other periodical with which I am acquainted. Its courageous stand outside of Christianity (the great organized superstition, as you very justly term it) is refreshing amid the trimming and truckling which is so common. So long as THE INDEX occupies its present position, I mean to stand by it 'until death do us part,' and hope both of us may live to see its views predominate."

"I met a man in ——. Got into conversation with him. He said he thought I would like your paper. Please send specimen number."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—Regular meetings of this Society will be held during the winter on Sunday forenoons, at 10½ o'clock, in Daniels' Block, corner of Jefferson and Summit Streets, in the hall over the U. S. Express Office. The public are cordially invited.

FREE EVENING SCHOOLS.—The school for men and boys is held Monday, Wednesday, and Friday Evenings, from 7 to 9, in the hall over the U. S. Express Office, Daniels' Block. The schools for women and girls are held at the same time in Scott's Block, Cherry Street, and in Campbell's Block, St. Clair Street.

RECEIVED.

ORIGIN AND DEVELOPMENT OF RELIGIOUS IDEAS AND BELIEFS, as Manifested by History and Seen by Reason. By MORRIS EINHSTEIN. Titusville, Pa.: Daily Courier Steam Print. 1871. 12mo. pp. 270.

OLD AND NEW, for March, 1871. Published Monthly. Boston: ROBERTS BROTHERS, 143 Washington St. London: SAMUELSON, SON & MARSTON. Terms, $4.00 (in advance) per annum. Address GEO. A. COOLIDGE, care of the Publishers, Boston.

THE CATHOLIC WORLD, A Monthly Magazine of General Literature and Science. March, 1871. New York: THE CATHOLIC PUBLICATION HOUSE (P. O. Box 5,396), No. 9 Warren St. Terms, $5.00 per year, in advance.

PRAYER, A Sermon by Rev. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, preached in Lyric Hall, Jan. 29, 1871. New York: D. G. FRANCIS, 17 Astor Place. 1871. pp. 27.

FIFTEENTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR REFORM SCHOOLS, to the Governor of the State of Ohio. For the year 1870. Columbus: NEVINS & MYERS, State Printers. 1871. pp. 55.

MEDICAL REVOLUTION. A Lecture explaining the First Principles of Hygienic Therapy, or a True Medical Science, and exposing the fundamental fallacies of all Drug Systems. By Dr. D. CLINTON MOORE. Salem, O.: LUTHER W. SMITH, Printer. 1871. pp. 16.

Poetry.

THE RAILROAD HOLOCAUST.

[By W. M. Carleton, of Hillsdale, Mich., in the Toledo Blade.]

Over the length of the beaten track,
Into the darkness deep and black,
Heavy and fast,
Like a mountain blast,
With scream of whistle and clang of gong,
The great train rattled and thundered along.

Travellers, cushioned and sheltered, sat,
Passing the time with doze and chat;
Thinking of naught
With danger fraught,
Whiling the hours with whim or song,
As the great train rattled and thundered along.

Covered and still the sleepers lay,
Lost to the dangers of the way;
Wandering back,
Adown life's track,
A thousand dreamy scenes among;
And the great train rattled and thundered along.

Heavily breathed the man of care;
Lightly slept the maiden fair;
And the mother pressed
Unto her breast
Her beautiful babes, with yearning strong;
And the great train rattled and thundered along.

Shading his eyes with his brawny hand,
Danger ahead the driver scanned,
And he turned the steam;
For the red light's gleam
Flashed warning to him there was something wrong;
But the great train rattled and thundered along.

"Down the brakes!" was the driver's shout;
"Down the brakes!" rang the whistle out;
But the speed was high,
And the danger nigh,
And Death was waiting, with altar and pyre;
And the train dashed into a river of fire.

Into the night the red flames gleamed;
High they crackled and leaped and streamed;
And the great train loomed
Like a monster doomed,
In the midst of the flames and their vengeful ire,
In the glowing tide of a river of fire.

Roused the sleeper within his bed;
A crash, a plunge, and a gleam of red,
And the sweltering heat
Of his winding sheet
Clung round his form with an agony dire,
And he moaned and died in a river of fire.

And they who were spared from the fearful death
Thanked God for life, with quickened breath;
And groaned that too late
From their terrible fate
To rescue their comrades was their desire;
They sank in a river of death and fire.

Ity for those who woke and died,
And sank in the river's merciless tide!
And blessings enfold
The driver bold,
Who, daring for honor, and not for hire,
Went down with his train in the river of fire!

The Index.

MARCH 18, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

Contributors are requested to write on only one side of each sheet.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

INDUCEMENTS.—We would invite the special attention of our friends who cannot afford to give their services gratuitously in getting subscribers for THE INDEX, to the very liberal Cash Premiums offered in our Prospectus for 1871.

Whoever collects $150.00 for 75 subscriptions, is authorized to retain $50.00, forwarding $100.00.

Whoever collects $100.00 for 50 subscriptions, is authorized to retain $25.00, forwarding $75.00; and so on.

Now it cannot be very difficult, in a town of any considerable size, to get twelve subscriptions a day for one week, if the agent uses ordinary business energy. Yet he would be paid about $5.00 a day—as much as his representative in Congress receives for work not always, we fear, so useful!

"A word to the wise." Who will canvass for THE INDEX, and at the same time earn as much as the Hon. Mr. ———? Send for "Truths for the Times," and begin at once.

"TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES, OR REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX"—is the title of a neatly-printed tract of sixteen pages published by THE INDEX Association, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. One Hundred Copies will be sent for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate—one cent a copy. Packages will be sent free to those who will circulate them, but are unable to pay for them. Here is an excellent means of helping the cause of Free Religion and THE INDEX as an organ of it. Friends of Freedom, send for as many copies as you can use, and do your part in awakening an interest in ideas worthy of American institutions and the higher civilization of the future.

"PERSONAL GOVERNMENT."

The removal of Charles Sumner from the Chairmanship of the Committee on Foreign Relations in the United States Senate calls for the swiftest and most indignant rebuke from all who desire incorrupt and independent Congressional action. The sole reason advanced for this change is that Mr. Sumner is not in amicable "personal relations" with President Grant. Their "official relations" are well enough; it is only their "personal relations" that are complained of. The plain English of all this is that no Senator shall hold the most important position in the Senate who is not a personal friend of the President! No wonder that the Senators favoring the change shrank from any confession by Mr. Howe of the reasons for it.

If the Republican party have sunk to the level of mere lickspittles,—if they are determined to drown their noblest associates in a sea of abject political toadyism,—then, in the name of all that is manly and patriotic, let the Republican party be buried under mountains of popular indignation. No matter what its past record has been, it has no right to anything from the American people except a "hospitable grave." If this change for such reasons is persisted in, thousands and thousands of the best men in the nation will have cast their last vote for Republican candidates, and the time will have come for the dissolution of existing political parties. It is nobody's business but Mr. Sumner's what his personal relations with President Grant may be. So long as he is faithful to his official duties, he has absolute right to his own private sentiments, and may make his social intercourse with the President just what he pleases. That the Executive influence over Congress has assumed such alarming dimensions is cause for the greatest anxiety. Has the Second Empire migrated to Washington? We hope that the prime movers in this matter will receive such stern and summary handling from the people as will sicken them forever of their infamous servility. They and their outrage deserve to be abolished together.

Has President Grant no friend honest and brave enough to tell him frankly that he is flinging away his popularity, his party, and his usefulness, to gain the scrag-end of an island which the country wants about as much as a dog wants a tin-pan tied to his tail? His connection with Mr. Sumner's removal is not fully known; but he is probably at the bottom of it. Let him take heed to his steps. Let him shrink from the annihilation which follows swiftly on the heels of every attempt in America to ape the "personal government" of the ruined Napoleon. Let him remember Andrew Johnson, and be wise in season.

WHO IS TO BLAME?

The awful disaster at New Hamburg is a new rebuke to the public sluggishness and indifference with regard to the loss of life on railroads and steamboats. It would seem to be a very simple matter to prevent such terrible catastrophes in nine cases out of every ten. The apathy of the community is the real cause of their alarming frequency. Make it the interest of the railroad and steamboat companies to prevent them, and they will become exceedingly rare. Let the loss of every life, regardless of all excuses, whether just or unjust, be followed inexorably in every instance by a fine of ten thousand dollars,—let the simple fact of the accident, duly proved, be equivalent to a judgment of the court against the corporation, without the necessity of any preliminary suit,—and very few lives will be lost.

The criminality for these heart-rending scenes lies really with the public. No sufficient pressure of public opinion is brought to bear upon Congress or the State Legislatures to counteract the influence of the great corporations, which of course will labor to defeat by fair means or foul the enactment of any vigorous protective law. Venal legislation is the curse of our country. Until every possible precaution against disaster is enforced by statutes backed by the heaviest penalties, no adequate protection of life and limb can be secured; and though opposed on principle to all unnecessary legislation, we hold that the personal safety of travellers is a matter of such vital interest to society as to justify any conceivable rigor of punishment for neglecting it. No matter what the excuse, corporations to which are entrusted the lives of passengers should be made to smart severely for every loss of such lives. "Corporations have no souls," it is said; but they have nerves, chief of which is the pocket nerve. Whoever would cosset this sensitive nerve at the cost of such agony as was caused at New Hamburg, is guilty of murder. It is time for the community to protect its own members. Until the public has done its best to make it the money interest of every transportation company to avert accidents, it alone is responsible for the frightful anguish that results from its own criminal neglect. In the name of countless sufferers, we demand protection from the people for the people.

On Sunday, March 5, Mr. Parker Pillsbury, lately of Salem, Ohio, lectured twice to the Independent Society of Toledo, while we did the same to the Independent Congregational Society of Salem. The liberals of Toledo were greatly pleased, and desire to hear him again. The same energy and earnestness with which he worked for freedom in the old anti-slavery warfare he brings now to the battle against spiritual slavery. From Toledo he went to Indianapolis to lecture; and his Salem friends, as will be seen from an article in another column, desire him to renew his engagement with them.

In Salem we found a flourishing Society of out-and-out radicals, with audiences of two hundred and upwards. Nothing could be more cordial than our welcome; and we thank the clear-headed, warm-hearted people there for making our visit so pleasant. Their Society cannot fail to be a centre of liberalizing influences to all the surrounding country.

The exceedingly lucid and interesting paper on Swedenborg which we publish by special permission in our present issue, was written by a lady member of the "Odds and Ends Reading and Literary Club," of Northampton, Mass. Certain parts of it are taken bodily from other writers,—in accordance with the understood rules of the Club. We make the following extracts from a letter sent with the manuscript:—

"We have no organization, though we have found it necessary to have a President to open the meetings and conduct the proceedings, a Secretary to record our progress, and a committee of three to choose the subjects and the members who are to 'work them up.' The work done is more strictly editing than composing; and it is permitted to bring in books of reference, and to read from them whatever bears upon the subjects treated. We have, as a result, a condensed mosaic article which gives us a general idea of the subject under discussion, the main point being, not to go much into detail, but to present the most prominent features, giving the titles of the works consulted. We have each evening one major and two minor articles. To the first, forty-five to sixty minutes are allowed; to the others, from fifteen to thirty. Our plan has been a great success. We have grown from sixteen to nearly thirty members, and number among us some of the best talent of the town. In selecting subjects we choose, first, those the names of which are almost 'household words,' but about which very little is known or remembered; and secondly, subjects familiar to the literary world, but scarcely known to the general reader. We have up to this time held thirteen meetings, and presented the following subjects: the Moon Hoax, Peter Wilkins (reviewed), the Mississippi Scheme, the South Sea Bubble, Casper Hauser, Prester John, Swift's Tale of a Tub (reviewed), Wm. Tell a Myth, the Automaton Chess-Player, Zerah Colburn, Erasmus' Praise of Folly (reviewed), Johann Ziska, the Tulipomania, the Niebelungen Lied, Swedenborg, Baron Trench, the Lake-Dwellers, Vidocyr, Confucius, Rabelais, etc., etc."

We should be glad to print entire the lists of subjects; but the above must suffice. Enough are given to show that such a club, well sustained, must be an instrumentality of vast benefit in promoting the literary culture of any community; and general culture is perhaps the most efficient means of dissipating the fogs of a narrow and narrowing theology. Consecrated candles burn but dimly in the unobstructed daylight.

THE CHILL OF RADICALISM.

It might be supposed that, after the more than tropical fervors of the popular religion, the cooler airs of the temperate zone of theology would be grateful to the exhausted system of piety. But piety is too thoroughly acclimated in the torrid regions to enjoy a bracing atmosphere, and still the worst thing one can say of a faith is that it brings with it a fresh wind from the north west. As the inmates of a close room, especially if the air be foul, dread the issue into the brisk climate that sparkles and invigorates out of doors, so the occupants of stifling religious enclosures shrink from nothing so much as a walk over the breezy uplands of thought. Romanism, gorgeous and glowing, with rich robes and painted glass, pictures and images, fragrant smoke, silver symbol and shrine, thinks of Protestantism as freezing in its bare churches. Protestantism of the "evangelical" stamp alleges that Unitarianism must be cold, away from the warm breast of Jesus, and beyond the reach of the ever-burning furnace of the divine wrath. Unitarianism assures its constituencies that Rationalism is very cold indeed, having thrown off that faded remnant of doctrinal tradition which it wraps about its respectable form and which, though scant and threadbare, still retains a portion of the heat that two thousand years have put into it. And the moderate Rationalists fancy that the Free Religionists are shivering in a region of perpetual snow, lacking some invisible garment which they suppose themselves to wear. The writer of a recent admirable letter in THE INDEX thinks that the atmosphere of Mr. Abbot's views will be too chilly for people generally. He expresses the opinion that "most people will not get from Radicalism the warming of sympathies, the inspiring of conscience, and the comfort and hope that they get from their various Christian faiths."

'Now this is quite possible. We do not feel so sure about the "inspiring of conscience;" for inspiration implies fresh air, and moral inspiration, like animal vigor, is more common in northern climates where there is wind and frost than in the south, whose influences are all enervating. But of the rest, the "warming of sympathies," the "comfort and hope," we have no doubt it is true that Radicalism is at a temporary disadvantage as compared with the older forms of belief. People are more comfortable in Calvinism than in Unitarianism. People were more comfortable in Romanism than they were in Lutheranism. The pagans enjoyed more warmth of sympathy in their ancient faith than the early Christians did in their new heresy. It was not a very comfortable thing to belong to the small body of primitive believers in Jesus. Had men never disregarded their comfort, they never would have left their superstitions. In fact, they would never have had any religion at all.

The question is, how much is this comfort, this warmth of sympathy, this gratification of languid emotion, this luxury of sentiment, this feeling of snugness and peace, how much is it worth? Has it not been overestimated and overdone?

Somewhere in his "Catechism," Comte says to his female questioner who feels a not unnatural chill creeping over her as the exposition of the Positive Creed goes on, that up to that time religion had comforted people a great deal more than was good for them, had encouraged them to be passive, inert, and spiritually self-indulgent. The new religion would correct that unwholesome tendency by giving primacy to the active sentiments. Whatever we might have thought of other opinions expressed in the book, this one met our conviction directly.

In another mood of mind, Professor Denton, lecturing on the Bible, pronounced it a masculine book, and went on to say that the new religion must be more feminine in cast. But for a thousand years Christianity claimed to be a feminine religion. The Christians of Southern Europe worshipped the Virgin. Jesus was the feminine side of God. Even Protestantism loves to call him the "man of sorrows." His blessing was for the miserable, his promise for the disconsolate, his hope for the lowly and the poor. His intimate friends were women. Woman was not only last at the cross and first at the grave of the gentle Nazarene, but she followed him everywhere, drawn by sympathy of sex. How often is Christianity called the "religion of sorrow"? At present the sentimentalists have fairly appropriated it, ritualists on the one hand toying with its pitchers and lamps, people of tender sensibilities on the other cosseting themselves with its enervating Utopias. The former gaze at heaven through stained glass; the latter look at God through tears: both forget that sentiment and sentimentality are different things; both forget that without red blood there can be no vigorous life.

Precisely what we want and what radicalism means to give is less heat, more light; less comfort, more courage; less sympathy, more self-reliance. Some of our excessive yearning may be profitably exchanged for endeavor; and we shall be no losers if, in place of a little superfluous looking forward in hope, we acquire a habit of serious questioning for knowledge. Let it be distinctly understood that Radicalism does not make a point of smoothing people down and making them feel comfortable. The Christian sects do that already, and more than suffices. Radicalism means to tone people up, to make them uncomfortable by making them think. It is philosophic and stoical, and nothing would rejoice it more than to see the idle souls whom the church has nicely covered up in downy beds, routed out of their warm quarters at the cry that the house was coming down about their ears. It might take for its motto a fine passage in the Ramayana,—“A man's deeds are more memorable than his sufferings. He may soon cease to feel, and then his joys and griefs are as though they had not been. But his actions, which are the reason of his life, remain.”

We want no sluggards, and therefore we promise no ease. Let none come to us who are fond of siestas, or are so fearful of taking cold that they will not encounter the surly wind of a spring day. The preaching of hardness is not yet obsolete.

O. B. F.

THE EMANCIPATION OF RELIGION.

A few remarks were made in THE INDEX last week on possible misunderstandings and differences of understanding in the use of the phrase "Free Religion" as a proper noun. Caution is evidently required lest the term should come to have to the popular mind a sectarian meaning. The words have, however, in their simple generic meaning a deep significance. They accurately indicate the central and predominating aim of the movement to which they have been applied. Were we to say that "Free Religion," whatever else this or that person may include within it, means the emancipation of religion from every kind of ecclesiastical and theological bondage, we should probably indicate a use of the words in which all would agree.

At present religion in its popularly organized forms throughout the world is enslaved. It is in bondage. It needs to be set free; needs to be emancipated. In itself religion is that which sets free; that which emancipates human nature from bondage to its surroundings. But it may be checked in its career; may be prevented from its own proper development; may become the slave of superstition and fanaticism. So it has been historically; so it still is today. Religion is enslaved to ecclesiasticism,—of which the most conspicuous example is the Roman Catholic Church. It is enslaved to dogma, as in most of the sects of Protestant Christendom. It is enslaved to ceremonies and forms, as among the Ritualists. And still again, it is enslaved to belief in a supernatural book or person, establishing an authoritative and final standard of truth and duty; as is the case in every organized historic faith.

Hence religion in its specific organized forms throughout the world is spending its main energies in defining and extending ecclesiastical lines and defending ecclesiastical authority; in inculcating systems of dogmas; in maintaining certain forms of worship; in upholding the doctrine and illustrating the evidence of some past oracle of infallible revelation. What vast sums of money, what an array of machinery, what an array of priests, preachers, and devotees, what a mighty combination of spiritual, mental, and material power, are being used for these ends!

Now Religion needs to be emancipated from these ends and objects. Its energies need to be loosed from these chains of dogma and ecclesiasticism and ritual and superstitions regard for ancient oracles, in order that they may be directly applied to the discovery of truth and the well-being of man. If the force which is now devoted to building up sectarian churches, and to the spread of certain doctrines about religion as the unalterable truth of religion, were to be set free from this service and put to use at once on the great practical social and moral problems that agitate the civilized world, who can attempt to estimate the direct advantage that would accrue to mankind? Take for illustration the foreign missionary operations of Christendom. If the same power of denominational activity, talent, money, which has been spent in the effort to convert the heathen theologically had been applied to educating them,—had been devoted to efforts to lift them to a higher level of mental, moral, and social life,—what an impetus might have been given to civilization and to the cause of human unity and brotherhood! Better yet, perhaps, if the same zeal and wealth, or a large portion of it at least, had been used in civilizing the heathen and barbarous districts of Christendom itself—if the money which has been spent by Tract Societies and Bible Societies had been spent in disseminating the spelling-book and arithmetic and in practical methods of exorcising the vice and crime that are rampant in Christian cities, and are more corrupting than heathen idolatry. Whatever else the phrase "Free Religion" may be understood to mean, it must not be forgotten that its simple and most primary meaning is this: Religion set free to discover and proclaim truth without let or hindrance from any external authority, and to apply its powers directly and practically to the great problems of improving the condition of individual and social life.

W. J. P.

Dr. T. A. Bland, of Indianapolis, favors us with the following slip from the Daily Journal of that city. It is encouraging to see such signs of vigorous growth in the direction of liberal ideas. Every town should have its Radical Club; and we trust that our Indianapolis friends will find a host of similar associations springing up spontaneously throughout their State. Thousands of people, now isolated and practically cut off from sympathy in their best thought and aspiration, will hail their establishment as the beginning of a brotherhood among all men regardless of theological opinions.

THE INDIANAPOLIS RADICAL CLUB.—The meeting held last Sunday in Temperance Alliance Hall, for the purpose of organizing a Radical Club, proved quite a success. The attendance, though not large, was good, and composed of thinking people who manifested considerable interest in the subject of free discussion. The following declaration of principles was adopted and signed by a large number of those present:—

ARTICLES OF ASSOCIATION OF THE RADICAL CLUB OF INDIANAPOLIS.

ART. 1. This Association shall be known as the Radical Club of Indianapolis.

ART. 2. The object of this Association shall be to encourage the freest expression of opinion upon religious, scientific, and moral questions, to disseminate information upon these questions, and to engage in works of social reform that have for their object the improvement and elevation of humanity.

ART. 3. The meetings of this Club shall be held at such times and places as the members, by vote, appoint.

ART. 4. Any person may become a member of this Club by subscribing to these articles of association.

ART. 5. The officers of this Club shall be a President, a Recording Secretary, a Corresponding Secretary, and a Treasurer, to be elected by ballot at the first meeting in February and August of each year. Their duties shall be those usually pertaining to these offices, and such other duties as the Club may require. Vacancies in any of these offices may be filled pro tem. by a vote of the members.

ART. 6. No liabilities shall be incurred by the Club until provision has been made to meet them. All sums of money shall be raised by voluntary contributions from the members.

ART. 7. These articles may be amended at any regular meeting of the Club, notice of such amendment having been given at a previous meeting.

The next meeting will be held at the same place, 37 Virginia avenue, at 3 P. M., next Sunday. Subject for discussion, "Creeds." Dr. Bland is to open the discussion with an address.

Mr. Morris Einstein, who has not infrequently sent good communications to THE INDEX, advertises in another column a new book, entitled "Origin and Development of Religious Ideas and Beliefs." He discusses in his "First Period" the various beliefs of the "Primitive Men," the Babylonians, Persians, Egyptians, Hindus, Chinese, Japanese, Romans, Greeks, Jews; and, in his "Second and Third Periods," treats of the Jews and Judaism, Christians and Christianity, the Greek Church, Mohammedanism, Paganism, etc. The author expresses the boldest opinions, of the class so fearlessly advocated in the Boston Investigator; and though we cannot wholly agree with him, and think he has insufficiently prepared himself for the gigantic task he has undertaken, we respect the earnestness with which he opposes prevalent superstitions. The Titusville (Pa.) Courier says:—

"In our advertising columns of today will be found a notice of a new book with the above title, written and published by our townsman, Mr. Morris Einstein, and which he very correctly styles an interesting book. Mr. Einstein is, as everybody knows, a well-educated man, and quite capable of writing a good book. He is, however, too radical for us to accept his views without reserve. But while we are far from agreeing with him, candor compels us to say, his reasoning is as strong as his logic is sharp. He is undoubtedly master of his subjects, and his argumentation is based on facts, history, and science. But his book must be read thoughtfully to be appreciated, and if thus read, it will certainly be found 'interesting' to the thinking reader, whatever his views on the subjects treated may be. Typographically, it is beautiful. We printed it, and, of course, ought to know. The book is for sale at B. N. Hurd's bookstore. Price $1.50."

The following vigorous rebuke to clerical impertinence, administered by Henry Ward Beecher, is so thoroughly in the spirit of Free Religion that our readers will unquestionably enjoy it:—

"There is nothing more offensive to me than to be greeted in that rough religious way.—'Well, brother Beecher, how is your soul today?' None of your business. It is a kind of familiarity that I don't relish. If my father were to come to me on the ferry-boat and put his arm around my neck, I should look up with pleasure; but should a stranger do the same thing, I should resent the action as an insult. And what I won't permit to be done to my body I shall not tolerate on my soul."

The most intolerable thing in orthodoxy is its perpetual perpetration of this very insolence. What are evangelical exhortations but bare-faced meddling with a man's most private concerns? We have listened repeatedly to appeals to the "unconverted" characterized by the same offensive familiarity against which Mr. Beecher so pungently protests. In any form, the "how-are-you" style of religion is insufferably insolent.

Mr. Darwin, in his "Descent of Man," just published, gives incidentally the best definition we have ever seen of animal instinct, when he calls it "inherited habit."

Many "poems" are sent to us which have no recommendation but that of radicalism, being devoid of imagery, metre, and music. Prose is better than poetry of this class.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

COUNSEL WANTED.

In an excellent little allegory concerning a "stranded anchor," recently published in the Revolution, the author, after mentioning several arguments used by the friends of the enlightened Kaffir, to convince him that he should desist in his intention of breaking to pieces the anchor which his countrymen ignorantly worshipped, says:—

"But the only arguments that caused him any hesitation, and which did give him some pain, were from certain women who implored him not to destroy their anchor idol. 'We cannot judge,' said one of these, 'between your arguments and the conclusions we have been brought up to reverence. The anchor may not be a god but only a symbol, but how beautiful a one! Does not the anchor save the ship? And are not our lives, too, like the storm-tossed vessel? That anchor is associated with all we have felt, suffered, prayed for. Destroy that symbol, and you would wound and endanger the deepest elements of religion in our hearts.'"

Now, this touches a point concerning which little, if anything, has been said by Radical writers, but upon which much might profitably be written.

It is not at all difficult for a vigorous thinker to discuss Radical ideas with strong men; or even with women in whom he has no particular interest. In fact any woman who will argue upon these subjects is strong enough to bear the plainest language. But the ideas of a Radical thinker cannot long remain unknown to his immediate relatives, his mother, his sisters or his wife; women, in many cases, who have been brought up to believe, and have unreasoningly accepted, the "orthodox" doctrines of religion, and to whom many of his ideas appear but little better than blasphemy, and who have no disposition to reason upon or examine the grounds of their belief. They look upon their friend with pity and concern, and "pray for his conversion from the error of his ways."

In a recent number of the Boston Recorder, I notice an article entitled "The Mother of Hume," in which the writer, Hezekiah Butterworth, says:—

"The mother of Hume was a pious woman in her early life, and she brought up her orphan children with great strictness, tenderness, and frugality. But she seems to have been easily influenced by those she loved. Hume discovered a fondness for books and the refinements of culture, in childhood, and following the prudent counsels of his mother, he became interested in religion, and deeply concerned for the welfare of his soul. He seemed to be about to consecrate his life to God. But his mind was restless, led hither and thither by a truant fancy, and he thirsted for fame."

At the age of sixteen he had become a skeptic. His mother viewed the change with deep concern, and strove to bring back the imaginative boy to the way of truth. Hume loved and respected his mother, but he understood her susceptible nature, and, in the heat of youth, he determined to win her over to his opinions, and to destroy her faith in God. She admired his young genius, already gathering around it the lustre of fame. It dazzled her. She gave herself up to the influence of his opinions, and lost forever her faith in religion.

David Hume became distinguished as a writer, and, after travelling abroad for some years, he arrived at London on his way to his home in Scotland, and there met him an express with a letter from his mother. It read substantially as follows:

"My Dear Son,—My health has failed me. I am in a deep decline. I cannot long survive."

"My philosophy affords me no comfort in my distress. I am left without the hopes and consolations of religion, and my mind is sinking into a state of despair."

"You can afford me some substitute for the loss of the hopes of religion. I pray hasten home to console me, or at least write to me the consolations that philosophy affords at the dying hour."

The philosophy of the young atheist was put to the severest test. His mother was dying without comfort or hope; she asked him for a support like that which religion once supplied, and what had he to offer? Nothing. Hume hastened to Scotland, travelling night and day, and found his mother dead."

Thus, says Mr. Butterworth, "Providence pointed out to him the emptiness of his philosophy, but he was wedded to his idol, and he shut his eyes against the warning." And then the writer proceeds to show what a miserable man was he of whom Dr. Adam Smith, in speaking of "our late excellent friend, Mr. Hume," said:—

"Upon the whole, I have always considered him, both in his lifetime and since his death, as approaching as nearly to the idea of a perfectly wise and virtuous man as perhaps the nature of human frailty will permit."

Of course we do not all propose to be as bad (?) as David Hume; but what course should a man of a scientific or skeptical mind take, concerning those who are near and dear to him, and who so widely differ from him upon matters of religious opinion?

Must he, in deference to their "feelings," refrain from all conversation upon those subjects—to him of more importance than all others—and make the gossip of the town the staple of home conversation; treating them, by so doing, as a Mohammedan would treat the women of his household?

Must he always, in sickness and in health, enact the part of one who "hopes one day to become a Christian," when in point of fact such a thing is as impossible, unless his intellect fails, as it would be for him to go back to the views of the world he held in childhood?

Pardon the length of this article, but I am convinced, from many conversations I have had with men who are extremely radical in sentiment and yet do not express themselves, except to congenial spirits, as well as from my own feelings, that this is one great obstacle to the spread of scientific ideas upon the subject of religion.

Will not the editor of THE INDEX, or some of his contributors, give us counsel in the matter? *

[The case put by our correspondent is one that is by no means a purely hypothetical one. Many a man of enlightened views and kindly heart has been perplexed as to his duty under such circumstances as are above described. Without venturing to give officious advice to any one, we will nevertheless say a few words on the subject.

1. For the same reason that we omit to instruct very young children in chemistry or geology, it is proper to refrain from instructing "children of a larger growth" in subjects beyond their comprehension. Nothing would be more mistaken, for instance, than to interfere with the religious notions of a simple-minded Catholic Irish girl. There is a kind of religious childishness in many persons otherwise quite mature which is proof against all instruction, and with which it would be folly or cruelty to meddle. In such cases entire silence is the wisest and best course.

2. Further, unless we are in some way invited to express our convictions, it would be an act of impertinence to intrude them upon others. We are not in love with the fanaticism of orthodox believers who rudely undertake to "convert" us unasked; and we equally disapprove of radical fanatics who go out of their way to re-convert the orthodox. Great respect is due to the rights of privacy. A disposition to "shock" others unnecessarily, or to trample on their sensibilities, is coarse, vulgar, and impudent. Without an expressed or implied invitation, the proclamation of startling opinions is justified only by special emergencies.

3. Whoever voluntarily enters into conversation with us, however, invites us to a free utterance of thought, and has a right to sincerity on our part. Nothing could justify a radical in pretending "hopes of one day becoming a Christian." Truthfulness is the law in all dealings between man and man. Deference to the feelings of others has its limit in the obligation of honesty. It may be best not to speak at all—on this point each must judge for himself; but if he speaks, no one should play the hypocrite even out of kindly motives.

4. In talking with near and dear friends on religion, the above principles will still hold good. In all conversation, tone is everything. Invited to speak on this subject by being himself addressed concerning it, a truth-loving radical can do no better than to state his deep convictions in the spirit of respectful friendship. Nor is it best to shun such conversation, except in rare cases. Religious childishness is often superficial, and can be corrected; and we have no right to withhold the truth from those who seek it. Men often misjudge women in supposing them incapable of comprehending radicalism. Our own experience has convinced us that women welcome it as cordially and about as generally as men.

5. We have no sympathy whatever with a purely destructive spirit, and believe that truth, if presented fairly, is infinitely more beautiful than delusion. Delight in demolition for its own sake, as attributed (we doubt not falsely) to Hume in the above story, is certainly unlovely. But the substitution of great, inspiring ideas for the pinched and frightful imaginations of orthodoxy does not blight, but vivify. In contrast with the alleged despair of Hume's mother at death, we have repeatedly seen Free Religion tested in the sick-room, filling it with cheerfulness and peace. We have stood by the death-bed of a wife and mother, called to leave those whom she dearly loved by the path of a most painful disease; and though she had come to see that the faith of her childhood was mistaken, and no longer leaned on the Bible or Christianity for support, never was there a deeper serenity of soul than hers. It is too late to paint the despair of "unbelievers" in the hour of death. The trick is stale. Experience gives the lie to the dismal picture. Believing that radicalism is as good to die by as to live by, we think it wise to share its great inspirations with all who do not choose to turn their backs upon it. Radicals need a greater faith in their own ideas, a greater faith in the capacity of men and women to receive them; and when they have it, they will not always sink home conversation to the level of "the gossip of the town."

—Ed.]

THE INDEPENDENT CONGREGATIONAL SOCIETY OF SALEM, O.

In 1865 there was organized in Salem, Ohio, a society calling itself a "Congregational Church," but independent of all other religious organizations, and in its constitution announced its objects to be "the cultivation of personal goodness and the promotion of practical righteousness among men."

Subsequently the word "Church" was discarded from its name, and the word "Society" substituted therefor, as more distinctively characterizing it; for its members had no desire to be thought one with the popular Christian organizations. Persons of whatever religious opinions were cordially welcomed, and the Society includes those of all shades of opinion which mark the various styles of religious inquiry. The Society has a pleasant and comfortable house. Its audiences compare well in numbers with the Christian churches of the town, as they also do in intellectual standing and moral worth. Parker Pillsbury, of New Hampshire, concluded a six months' engagement with the Society as its public speaker on Sunday, Feb. 26. After the close of his discourse, the audience gave expression to their estimate of Mr. Pillsbury's services by the adoption of the following resolutions:—

Whereas, The time has arrived when Mr. Pillsbury's engagement terminates with this Society, and we deem it a duty and a pleasure to express our appreciation of his faithful labors with us:

Resolved, That it has been one of our highest privileges to listen to the course of Sunday lectures delivered by him before this Society during the last six months; embracing, as they have, the facts and conclusions of years of careful observation, of diligent study, and the experiences of an earnest life.

Resolved, That treating as they have done of subjects of highest human interest, personal, social, political, practical, and religious, our regret is that so few of our citizens have availed themselves of this rare opportunity of improvement.

Resolved, That we view Mr. Pillsbury's course in these lectures as worthy of all commendation, in that he gave full credit to our orthodox brethren for honesty, zeal, and incidental good, while with unflinching fidelity he applied the scalpel of eternal truth to the church as a diseased body.

Resolved, That we are deeply impressed with the great thoughts and principles of Mr. Pillsbury's discourses, which go to the very foundation of human society, and, if practically carried out, would convert this world from discord and strife to harmony and love.

Resolved, That we part with him with regret, but with most pleasant remembrances of his society and labors among us, and, if he must leave us, hoping for him a wider and more commanding field of labor and usefulness.

Resolved, That we cordially invite Mr. Pillsbury to visit us again on his return from the West, and spend with us as much time as he may find possible, in consistency with his duties to the cause of truth and improvement.

M. R. ROBINSON, President.

M. V. BONSALE, Secretary.

POSITIVISM.

GREENVILLE, S. C., Feb. 23, 1871.

REV. F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—It is refreshing to me to read your recent lecture at Boston. I have heard Beecher, Cheever, Chapin, Thornwell, Palmer, et id omne genus; and though comparisons are odious, I cannot withhold my admiration of your advanced position.

The study of Comte will give you all the light that you demand of the future. Our convictions are a growth, as our bodies are; and it is in vain to attempt to impress the stage of Positivism on the youth of ten summers. I have passed through the preparatory stages—denominated by Comte the "Theological" and "Metaphysical"—and find a safe anchorage for my convictions in the "Positive." In the "Theological" stage we make our gods many or one, our conceptions of whom are derived from our own consciousness.

The "Metaphysical" stage, proud of its reasoning faculties, advances into the realm of speculation, substituting entities, essences, principles, agencies, capable of producing phenomena without the direct intervention of a Divinity; but it reasons without proofs. However lightly we may esteem its inexplicable entities, it is a very necessary stage to bridge over the chasm to the "Positive." The "Positive" stage, beyond which it is utterly useless to penetrate, accepts Nature as she presents herself, restricting our studies to the LAWS of phenomena, without trying to account for causes.

Well, you are waiting on science. She no doubt will be the "coming religion;" she will give us a new culture.

Are not Astronomy, Physics, Chemistry, etc., freed from theological creeds and metaphysical entities? But Biology and Sociology are wonderfully mixed with both.

Familiar illustrations of the three stages (say, for simplicity, that of Credulity, Opinionism, and Certainty) will readily occur to you. The roar of thunder, to the child, is the voice of a mighty God. That explanation suits its age. The "Metaphysical" would substitute a subtle fluid. The Positivist accredits it to the phenomena of electricity, which by the aid of science he conducts harmless to the earth.

We must have explanations; it is our nature.

Why will learned men continue to interpret the allegories of "Scripture" as literal truths? As well advocate the use of the Roman galley instead of our magnificent steamers, or the Indian's bow and arrow for rifled cannon. Let us have science to rule in religion, politics, and sociology.

Most respectfully yours,

B. F. STANLEY.

There is a Hard-shell Baptist preacher in Kentucky who positively declines to have his life insured, on the ground that "it would be jest straight bettin' against the Lord Almighty." He should refuse to wear overshoes or carry an umbrella for the same reason.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Nature's Gifts, SCIENTIFICALLY DEVELOPED.

As mankind, from indiscretion or other causes, have been doomed to suffer from disease, so also has remedy for disease been provided. Our hills and valleys abound with roots and herbs, which if scientifically prepared and compounded, will restore health and vigor to the invalid. To find such a remedy we should seek one that has stood the test of age.

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

Sure Cure for Liver Complaint, Sure Cure for Dyspepsia, Sure Cure for Debility, Sure Cure for Jaundice, Sure Cure for Marasmus,
And all affections arising from weakness or want of action in the Liver or Digestive Organs. The great remedy for

IMPURE BLOOD, FEVER AND AGUE!

It is an impossibility for any one to have fever and ague, if they will use a few bottles of this remedy each spring and fall.

$100 $100 $100
Will be given for any case of this disease that occurs to any one that uses the Bitters or Tonic as a preventive.

Those who have the Fever and Ague will find, after the chills have stopped, that by using a few bottles of the Bitters or Tonic, the disease will not return.

These remedies will rebuild their Constitution faster than any other known remedy.

The remedies were placed before the public thirty years ago, with all the prejudices of so-called "patent medicine" operating against them, but gradually their virtues became known, and now, to-day, they stand at the head of all preparations of their class, with the indorsement of eminent judges, lawyers, clergymen and physicians.

Read the following symptoms and if you find that your system is affected by any of them, you may rest assured that disease has commenced its attack on the most important organs of your body, and unless soon checked by the use of powerful remedies, a miserable life, soon terminating in death, will be the result.

H

Constipation, Flatulence, Inward Piles, Fullness of Blood to the Head, Acidity of the Stomach, Nausea, Heartburn, Disquiet for Food, Fullness or Weight in the Stomach, Sour Eructations, Sinking or Fluttering at the Pit of the Stomach, Swimming of the Head, Hurried or Difficult Breathing, Fluttering at the Heart, Choking or Suffocating Sensations when in a lying posture, Dimness of Vision, Drops or Webs before the Sight, Dull Pain in the Head, Deficiency of Perspiration, Yellowness of the Skin and Eyes, Pain in the Side, Back, Chest, Limbs, etc., Sudden Flushes of Heat, Burning of the Flesh, Constant Imagining of Evil and Great Depression of Spirits

All indicate disease of the Liver or Digestive Organs, combined with impure blood.

O

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

Is entirely vegetable and contains no liquor. It is a compound of Fluid Extracts. The Roots, Herbs and Barks from which these extracts are made, are gathered in Germany, all the medicinal virtues are extracted from them by a scientific chemist. These extracts are then forwarded to this country to be used expressly for the manufacture of this Bitters. There is no alcoholic substance of any kind used in compounding the Bitters; hence it is free from all the objections incident to the use of a liquor preparation.

O

Hoofland's German Tonic

Is a combination of all the Ingredients of the Bitters with the purest quality of Santa Cruz Rum, Oranges, &c. It is used for the same disease as the Bitters, in cases where some pure alcoholic stimulus is required.

TESTIMONY

Like the following was never before offered in behalf of any medical preparation:

HON. G. W. WOODWARD,
Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, writes Philadelphia, March 16th, 1867.

I find "Hoofland's German Bitters" is a good Tonic, useful in diseases of the digestive organs, and of great benefit in cases of debility and want

F

of nervous action in the system.

Yours, truly,

GEORGE W. WOODWARD.

HON. JAMES THOMPSON,
Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania.

Philadelphia, April 22d, 1866.
I consider "Hoofland's German Bitters" a valuable medicine in case of attacks of Indigestion or Dyspepsia. I can certify this from my experience of it.

Yours, with respect,

JAMES THOMPSON.

HON. GEO. SHARSWOOD,
Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania.

Philadelphia, June 1st, 1868.

I have found by experience that "Hoofland's German Bitters" is a very good tonic, relieving dyspeptic symptoms almost directly.

L

HON. WM. F. ROGERS,
Mayor of the City of Buffalo, N. Y.

Mayor's Office, Buffalo, June 23d, 1869.

I have used "Hoofland's German Bitters and Tonic" in my family during the past year, and can recommend them as an excellent tonic, imparting tone and vigor to the system. Their use has been productive of decidedly beneficial effects.

A

HON. JAMES M. WOOD,
Ex-Mayor of Williamsport, Pennsylvania.

I take great pleasure in recommending "Hoofland's German Tonic" to any one who may be afflicted with dyspepsia. I had the dyspepsia so badly that it was impossible to keep any food on my stomach, and I became so weak as not to be able to walk half a mile. Two bottles of Tonic effected a perfect cure.

N

J

JOHN EUTERMARKS, ESQ.,
Law Partner of Judge Maynard, Williamsport, Pennsylvania.
This is to certify that I have used "Hoofland's German Bitters" for dyspepsia, and found it an invaluable remedy.

CAUTION.—Hoofland's German Bitters are counterfeited. See the signature of C. M. JACKSON is on the

D

wrapper of each bottle. All others are counterfeit.

Principal Office and Manufactory at the German Medicine Store, No. 631 ARCH STREET, Philadelphia, Pa.

CHAS. M. EVANS, Prop'r.
(Formerly of C. M. JACKSON & CO.)

Prices.—Hoofland's German Bitters, per bottle, $1; Hoofland's German Bitters, half doz., $5; Hoofland's German Tonic, put up in qt. bottles, $1.50 per bottle, or half doz. for $7.50. Do not forget to examine well the article you buy in order to get the genuine. For sale by all druggists and dealers in Medicines everywhere.

24—cowly

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX PROSPECTUS FOR 1871.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869, and has just closed its first yearly volume.

We deem it proper, therefore, to submit the following PROSPECTUS of Volume II for 1871, and ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if the matter was properly presented to them, and especially if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor. We cannot afford to send out travelling agents, nor would they succeed so well in getting names as persons of local influence. We therefore have determined to use the funds it would cost to get our paper before the people, in another way, namely, in the purchase of articles of value to be given as premiums to those who make up lists of subscribers; thus presenting to the friends of free thought and pure religion the double motive of doing good and getting paid for it.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two Dollars a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

PREMIUMS.

For Fifty Names, we will give one of PRINCE & Co's four Octave Melodeons (price $65,) or a complete copy of CHAMBERS' Encyclopædia of Universal Knowledge, in ten volumes (price $50).

For Forty Names, we will give a Wilson's Family Sewing Machine, one of the best Machines made.

For Twenty-Five Names, Webster's Royal Quarto Unabridged Pictorial Dictionary (price $12), or one of the following Chromos:

The Three Tom-Boys (Prang's), price..... $15.00
Winter in the Forest, 20x28..... 12.00
Watering the Horses, 21x29..... 12.00

For Ten Names, one of the following Chromos:

WHITTIER's Barefooted Boy, (Prang's) price..... $5.00
The Unconscious Sleeper, 14x17..... 6.00
Mt. Blanc, 20x26..... 7.50
Or a copy of LECKY's History of European Morals, 2 vols 6.00
MAX MUELLER's Chips from a German Work-Shop, 2 vols 5.00
EMERSON's Prose Works, 2 vols..... 5.00
WEISS's Life and Correspondence of THEODORE PARKER, 2 volumes..... 6.00

For Five Names, a bound volume of THE INDEX, for 1870. (Price $2.50.) Or a copy of one of the following works, (post paid):

DARWIN's Origin of Species, price..... $9.00
LUBBOCK's Origin of Civilization, price..... 2.00
Essays in Criticism, by MATTHEW ARNOLD, price..... 2.00
Tablets, by A. BRONSON ALCOTT, with portrait, price..... 2.00
Any volume of the writings of THEODORE PARKER or HENRY D. THOREAU, each..... 2.00
On the Heights, AUERBACH..... 2.00

For Four Names, a copy of THE INDEX for 1871, or one of the following books (post paid):

EMERSON's Society and Solitude, price..... $1.75
Nathan the Wise, a dramatic poem translated from LESSING by ELLEN FROTHINGHAM, price..... 1.75
HUXLEY's Lay Sermons and Addresses..... 1.75
Speeches and Lectures, by WENDELL PHILLIPS..... 1.50
Historic Americans, by THEODORE PARKER, price..... 1.50
A copy of The Revolution..... 2.00
Or The Woman's Journal..... 2.00

CASH PREMIUMS.

For 75 Names,..... 50 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 50 Names,..... 25 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 25 Names,..... 15 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 10 Names,..... 5 Dollars in Greenbacks
For less than 10 Names, a Cash Commission of Twenty per Cent.

Any book in the above list will be sent by us post-paid upon the receipt of price.

N. B.—Names need not all come from one post office. We will send the paper wherever directed, and let the names count as clubs. Specimen Copies sent to all who enclose a three cent postage stamp. Address

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
Lock Box 38, Toledo, Ohio.

Guardian Mutual Life Ins. Co.,

ORGANIZED A. D. 1859.

M. O. Waggoner, Gen. Supt. for Ohio, Mich. & Ind.

John H. Hood, Assistant General Superintendent.

Office No. 154 Summit Street,

E. F. MUNGER, } General Agents.
CHAS. M. LANG, }

WALTER C. SCOTT, Local Agent, 152 Summit St.

Special Agents—Kelly Bros., 22 Summit Street.
Office Hours—From 7 in the morning till 9 at night.
Medical Examiners—Drs. Samuel S. Thorn and T. J. Eaton Toledo, O. [1871]

H. M. EDSON,

A. TERRY.

EDSON & TERRY, DENTISTS,

ROOMS 8 & 9 GRADOLPH BLOCK,

TOLEDO, OHIO.

ap16 1v

IMPORTER

Fine Chemicals, Drugs, and Toilet Articles.

Brandies, Wines & Liquors for medicinal purposes only. Also Proprietor of

Toledo Tonic Bitters,

Greatest Remedy known for general debility.

L. E. MULFORD,

23 Summit Street, Corner Perry, Toledo, Ohio
18-1y

THE CELEBRATED CRAIG MICROSCOPE

is an optical wonder; reveals thousands of the hidden Wonders of Nature; is of permanent use and practical availability, combining instruction with amusement, and never losing its interest. It magnifies

TEN THOUSAND TIMES,

a power equal to other Microscopes of many times its cost. Reveals countless little worlds all around us, teeming with life, which to the naked eye must forever remain a sealed book—as Eels in Vinegar, Animals in Water, Cheese Mites, Sugar and Itch Insects, Milk Globules, Claws and Hairs of Insects, Hundreds of eyes in a single eye of a Fly, Dust of a Butterfly's Wings to be perfectly formed Feathers, the much talked of Trichina Spiralis, or Pork Worm, which was first discovered in America with this Microscope.

It is of infinite value to professional men, to teachers, and to students, but NOWHERE IS IT OF GREATER VALUE THAN AT THE FAMILY TABLE, within the reach of every member. It will delight yourself, your children, and your friends during the long winter evenings. It will show you adulterations or uncleanness of various kinds in food, as sugar, tea, bread, meat, etc.

It is of Inestimable Value to the Farmer

in examining insects which prey upon his crops. The power of a $50 Microscope, and so simple in its construction that any child can use it understandingly, and with appreciation.

A Beautiful Present—Elegant, Instructive, Amusing, and Cheap. Over 60,000 sold.

During the past six years its worth has been testified to by thousands of Scientific Men, Farmers, School Teachers, Students, Physicians, Heads of Families, and others.

PRICE, $3.00—Sent by Mail Post-paid.

Every instrument is neatly boxed, and handsomely labelled with full directions for use. Thousands have been sent by mail. Address, W. J. LINESS & CO., CHICAGO.

FREE! FREE!

"THE MICROSCOPE," a Monthly Journal of Information for the People—the mysteries of Nature explained—interesting information on the wonders of Creation—stories, sketches, etc. Terms $1.00 per year. This Journal will be sent FREE for one year to any one purchasing a Craig Microscope at the regular price, $3.00. (Craig Microscope will be sent post-paid.) For sample copy, and our beautifully illustrated and descriptive circulars, and eight pages of testimonials of Craig Microscope, send six cents for postage to

W. J. LINESS & CO.,

Opticians, and Sole Proprietors of Craig and Novelty Microscope, CHICAGO, ILL.

AGENTS and DEALERS, this Microscope sells in every family on its merits, when exhibited. LARGE PROFITS. Send for terms. 53t:6

A NEW RADICAL BOOK.

"Origin and Development of Religious Ideas and Beliefs,"

As Manifested in History and Seen by Reason.

By MORRIS EINSTEIN.

For sale at the office of the Boston Investigator, 84 Washington St., Boston, or by the Author, Titusville, Pa.

PRICE, - - - $1.50,
64-78

SERMONS

By Rev. O. B. Frothingham.

Forwarded free on receipt of five cents for each.

What is it to be a Christian?
Taking God's Name in Vain.
The Issue with Superstition.
Infernal and Celestial Love.
The Sin Against the Holy Ghost.
Pilate and Jesus.
The Dying and the Living God.
The Foes of Society.
The Living Spring of Water.
Elective Affinity.
Religious Irreligion.
Experience and Hope.
The Radical Belief.
The Eternal Gospel.

DAVID G. FRANCIS,
17 Astor Place, New York.

49t3]

BOYS' ADVERTISER, an amateur Monthly Journal, edited by a boy of 17. LIBERAL in opinions. REPUBLICAN in politics. WIDE-AWAKE in ideas. 30 cents a year. Address 68-64 ADVERTISER, Birmingham, Conn.

COLE'S FIRST PRIZE BAKING POWDER.

The Best in the Market.

One trial only asked. Same price as the common kinds.

Sample sent free on Application.

63-75.

ALEX. COLE, BUFFALO, N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED—($225 A MONTH.) BY THE machine Co., BOSTON, MASS., or ST. LOUIS, MO. 56-63

Mr. Frothingham's New Book.

CHILD'S BOOK OF RELIGION, for Sunday Schools and Homes. PART I., Worship; PART II., The Good Life; PART III., Truth. In one Volume. New and revised edition. Forwarded free on receipt of $1.00.

55-68

DAVID G. FRANCIS,
17 Astor Place, New York.

WANTED—AGENTS, ($20 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock-stitch" (alike on both sides, and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest Family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Boston, Mass., Pittsburgh, Pa., Chicago, Ill. or St. Louis, Mo. 38y1

THE HERALD OF HEALTH.

In the November number of THE HERALD OF HEALTH, we shall commence a series of articles upon the Temperance Movement. The series will embrace ten or twelve papers and continue during a considerable portion of the year 1871. The most important of the following subjects will be discussed:

Significance of the Temperance Movement.

The Effects of the use of Intoxicating Drinks on the Body, the Brain, and the Blood.

Its Effects on Offspring.

Its Effects on Religion.

Its Effects on Literature.

Its Effects on National Integrity (including Politics)

Moderate Drinking.

The Wine Question.

Mistakes of Temperance Reformers.

Total Abstinence.

Alcoholic Medication.

Relation of the use of Intoxicating Drinks to Poverty and Crime.

Restricting the Sale of Alcoholic Beverages.

Ministers and the Temperance Reform.

Physicians and the Temperance Reform.

Moral Responsibility of Liquor Dealers.

How best to Promote the Cause of Temperance.

The list of writers who will furnish this series will be from among our best thinkers and most earnest reformers. The first paper, on the "Significance of the Temperance Movement," will be by O. B. Frothingham, whose pen has often graced our pages. He puts the subject on the highest moral and intellectual grounds, and we are sure that his article will give great satisfaction.

The object of these papers is to do some honest, earnest work in a cause dear to so many hearts. Our friends will, we hope, help to spread the HERALDS containing these articles. Those who will secure for us new subscribers for 1871 at $3.00, may promise the October, November and December numbers free. By this means they will secure the entire series, which otherwise they would not.

WOOD & HOLBROOK, Publishers,
13 & 15 Light St., New York.

62-66

The Index.

VOL. 2.—No. 12.

TOLEDO, OHIO, MARCH 25, 1871.

WHOLE No. 65.

The Index,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION,

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, OHIO.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Editorial Contributors.

"RADICAL CHRISTIANITY."

A REPLY TO THE CRITICISMS OF REV. E. C. TOWNE.

[Read to the First Independent Society of Toledo, Feb. 19, 1871.]

In the December and February numbers of The Examiner, the monthly magazine edited with so much earnestness and ability at Chicago by Rev. Edward C. Towne, there are some articles to which I propose to give a reply this morning, inasmuch as they bear directly on points which I hope are not uninteresting to you. We have taken together a position outside of all the organizations which are commonly regarded as "Christian;" and while there is nothing in our own organization which commits any one of our members either to or against the Christian name, the acceptance or rejection of which is left to the private decision of each individual, I have considered myself as entirely outside of Christianity, and believe that in this I more or less enjoy your sympathy. The wisdom, nay, the very possibility of such a stand has been called in question by Mr. Towne, in a manner which entitles his strictures to the most serious and respectful attention. If we are in the right, it will be none the less proper to reconsider the reasonableness of our action; and if we are in the wrong, I feel safe in saying that we shall make haste to repair our error.

First of all, let me express my admiration of the spirit in which these articles, especially the first, have been written. So many kind and generous and (I cannot but add) extravagantly commendatory things have been said about me by Mr. Towne, that I feel myself greatly embarrassed in expressing the opinion I honestly hold concerning him. Radical thinkers, laying at all times the supreme emphasis on ideas, should have as little as possible to say about persons—especially about each other. If anything is rightly offensive to an uninvited taste, it is personal abuse, on the one hand, and, on the other, the sickening flattery of Mutual Admiration Societies. It has always been my aim to avoid both. But because Mr. Towne has been more than just to me, that is no reason why I should be less than just to him. There are times when to be silent is to be unjust; and if I were to reply to Mr. Towne without saying that in not a single expression has he seemed to me in these articles to fall short of entire courtesy and kindness, I should withhold a tribute which is justly his due. Some of his expressions, especially in the third number of The Examiner, are severe; but I am not one to complain of severity, when deserved, and nothing is clearer than that Mr. Towne's severity is (in my own case, at least) owing to a transparent misapprehension. He wields a caustic pen, and, to be frank, I have regretted not a few of the cutting things he has said of others; but I regard sarcasm as a strictly legitimate mode of intellectual warfare, and regret no criticism he has made on statements of mine. The burning enthusiasm, the intense moral conviction, the consuming love of truth, which mark his writings, should be his shield against the poisoned arrows which have been shot at him from all quarters of late. He hits, and hits hard; but, for one, I would rather be scourged by such a critic than bedaubed with oily praises by those who have lifted their heels against him. Pitiless to hypocrisy, no man has a warmer or deeper admiration of what seems to him sincere and brave; and I envy nobody with whom that temper would not atone for a multitude of indiscretions. To every man his own method, provided it be honest; and while I think it abstractly better to avoid all personalities as much as possible, as tending invariably to extinguish reason and kindle passion, I believe that the sting of those in which Mr. Towne has allowed himself has been their terrible truthfulness in the main. At any rate, no one who excuses Jesus for calling men "vipers" and "hypocrites" has any right to blame Mr. Towne for transfixing modern Pharisees with similar epithets.

It is my intention, in replying to what this most earnest thinker has urged against my views, to pass over at present what he says concerning my idea of religion and its proper definition, inasmuch as I shall take up this subject hereafter in another connection. At present I shall confine myself to his strictures upon my conception of Christianity, and the stand outside of Christianity which inevitably results from it.

In the first place, Mr. Towne intimates that the motive which has led to this stand is a moral one—a concern for "personal integrity," and a desire to save "appearances" before the world. He thinks that the taking of this stand was an act of "self-vindication," prompted by "an outbreak of honest concern for repute for his [my] own integrity."

It has been a matter of much regret with me that public attention should be turned from the really important question, namely, the true position of free men with regard to Christianity, to a wholly different and comparatively unimportant question, namely, the motives which have led a particular individual to take a position outside of Christianity. This question of motives in no wise concerns the public. Whether an individual was honest or dishonest in a particular act, is a matter of mere curiosity,—a matter of no lasting interest. Most certainly I never intended to take the public into my confidence in a question of private morals. All the talk about honesty or dishonesty in the premises is wasted breath. It would be well to take for granted that all men are honest, until proved otherwise, and to plaster no man with undesired compliments concerning whose integrity no public question has ever been raised. It would be a cause of sorrow to believe that the simple following of conviction in a matter of conduct is proof, as Mr. Towne has represented it, of "a singular honesty." I think better of my fellow-men. I believe that the vast majority of them are just as honest as I am with respect to Christianity; and it is exceedingly painful to be singled out from them in a way which is practically an accusation of mankind. But since Mr. Towne, like so many others, has referred to a very unpretentious action in this manner, let me say, once for all, that in adjusting my practical relations towards Christian organizations in strict accordance with my conception of Christianity, I did what Mr. Towne has done, and what I believe ninety-nine out of every hundred men do about us. It is true, I have taken some pains to show that disbelief in the Christ-idea properly and logically leads to a position outside of Christianity; but this has been solely to make the modern transition more intelligible, and to do something towards dissipating the fog now bewildering the public mind as to its own drift. But as to saving "appearances," or "vindicating" myself before the world, in the sense of proving to it that I was actuated by honest motives, I have done nothing of the sort. Whether my conscience is at peace with itself or not, is a very important question to me, but wholly unimportant to the world; nor do I care enough for the world's opinion to enter on any discussion of that question. Whoever doubts my motives, is quite welcome to do so; and his doubt will not make my slumber any the less sweet. I am exceedingly sorry that what appears to me a matter of universal interest should be thus belittled to an absolutely uninteresting question of private morals. Does not the conscious rejection of the Messianic claim of Jesus make morally and logically necessary the disavowal of the Christian name and connection?—that is a question that concerns all free minds, a question of general morality; and it is the only one I have sought to make in any degree prominent before the public. If my own stand outside of Christianity entitles me to any praise at all, it is such praise only as is due to the perception of the logical relation of ideas,—a praise to be expected only from the few who also perceive. It is true, I would square my conduct with this mental perception; but men whose conduct is diametrically opposite are just as scrupulous. What I would make plain is this, that the main point is the universal relationship of certain ideas, rendering proper a stand outside of Christianity; and not the motives of any individual who takes it. Nobody can care much whether an individual was honest or dishonest in this act; but every liberal, at least, is concerned to know whether the act itself is a universal duty.

After his generous but mistaken attribution of motives, Mr. Towne passes to the main question, to which I am very glad to pass with him.

His chief argument against a stand outside of Christianity, with regard to the practical duty of radicals in religion, is substantially as follows. God has set us in certain actual relations, as in a post of divine duty. Whether we are born as Moslems, or Jews, or Buddhists, or Christians, it is a crime against human brotherhood to sever these relations, or to take a stand which separates us from our brother Moslems, or Jews, or Buddhists, or Christians. Each in his assigned post, we are bound to remain, and be faithful to it, holding fast to the ties that bind us so sacredly together. If we are by circumstances transferred to a different brotherhood,—if, for instance, we Christians are cast into a radical Hindu community (Mr. Towne is careful to say radical Hindus, though for what reason I cannot see, his argument being equally good in the case of the rankest idolaters),—then we are under obligation to join this community, and thus preserve the close fraternal bonds that exist in our new abode.

Now my first objection to this argument is that it sets greater value on the ties of a merely historical faith than on the ties of a universal humanity. Here in America, for example, I owe brotherhood to those about me, not as Christians, but as men and women; and in stepping outside of the artificial, ecclesiastical, or merely historical ties that once bound me to them, I have not stepped outside of any natural or universal relationship. On the contrary, when the human ties become in my thought stronger than the Christian ties, I am far better fitted to discharge all the duties of a really human brotherhood. I give up the weaker for the stronger bond—that is all.

My next objection is that by remaining in the merely Christian brotherhood, which is limited to Christians, and by its fundamental exclusiveness cannot be made to cover all mankind, I really violate that very human brotherhood the preservation of which is Mr. Towne's chief aim. The Christian cannot meet the Jew or the Moslem or the Buddhist, as such, on equal terms; he can only meet them on equal terms as brother men. He cannot meet them at all as Christians, which of course they are not. Remaining inside of Christianity, I am true to a limited and exclusive fraternity, which denies equal fellowship to those of another faith. Stepping outside of Christianity, I am true to a universal fraternity, which includes Christians and Jews and Moslems and Buddhists alike, showing partiality to none, but ignoring absolutely their Christianity, Judaism, Moslemism, Buddhism, and extending love and sympathy and help and equal rights to all, simply because they are all men, endowed with our common humanity. Thus the very duty of human brotherhood, which Mr. Towne urges as his strongest reason against stepping outside of Christianity, becomes the very strongest argument for it.

Lastly, Mr. Towne leaves out of view (apparently) the great obligation of being true to our own thought. How could Mr. Towne himself, going to dwell in India, join, as he suggests, a radical Hindu communion? He believes in radical Christianity; does his faith in radical Christianity count for nothing, as compared with the duty of fellowship? If the radical Hindu communion were not radical enough to admit him without requiring him to take its name of Hindu, would it be radical enough for him? If it would, what hinders him now from joining the Catholic communion here, which requires a sacrifice no greater? Brotherhood can be had on very cheap terms, if one holds fidelity to conviction as above all price, he may be obliged to get along without any brotherhood but that of which no sect or church can rob him—the brotherhood of humanity.

Perhaps Mr. Towne will argue, as in fact he seems to do, that the Free Christian will meet the Free Hindu and Free Moslem and Free Jew and Free Buddhist on equal terms, as brothers on the broad ground of a common humanity. If so,—if Free Christianity means Free Hinduism and Free Judaism and so forth,—what force or meaning is there in this array of names without distinction? Why argue so stoutly for the retention of a name which means absolutely nothing, as the condition of a connection which is equally retained if the name is discarded? For he who is outside of Christianity escapes the necessity of keeping up this tedious mummery of meaningless names, and yet enjoys that very brotherhood with all mankind which Mr. Towne so well urges and so truly values. Simplicity is great gain. Let us be content. We are men—that is enough. We can well dispense with names which mean absolutely nothing, unless they mean division and pride and restriction of human sympathies within sectarian bounds.

Leaving the discussion of external attitude, Mr. Towne next passes to the examination of my essential conception of Christianity. He quotes from THE INDEX the following words:—

"Free Religion is a development of Humanity in Christianity. The universal element in Christianity gradually sloughs off the special element altogether."

"This," says Mr. Towne, "would naturally mean that Christianity, having a heart and life of true humanity and pure religion within an envelope of varied error, grew inwardly to the extent of bursting off and losing altogether this error, and thus became a really free and wholly true Christianity [Religion]. Mr. Abbot admits constantly that Christianity has always had a heart and life of true humanity and pure religion. Yet he insists that it ceases to be Christianity when it sloughs off its Christism, thus assuming that it was the fallen husk which made it Christianity, as if one should say a chestnut out of the burr is not a chestnut, or that an oyster out of the shell is not an oyster."

Mr. Towne has not quite understood me, in the words he quotes and thus comments on. I meant that universal religion develops within every historical religion as the best and truest part of it; that by degrees the errors and limitations of the historical faith decay, as the truth it contains slowly expands in the human consciousness; and that at last, when the outermost layers of error, as it were, drop away, the interior truth becomes free from the limitations of the historical envelope, and appears as the truly universal religion, emancipated from its old traditions, associations, and name. Thus all the world's great religions enclose the seed or germ of the same great principles and ideas, although in a restricted form; and that at last, the restrictive coverings all perishing, these ideas come into the human consciousness in all the universality of eternal truth, unlocalized and independent of individual prophets. To improve Mr. Towne's illustration, the fruit of the chestnut-tree is known as the chestnut-burr, so long as the prickly envelope alone is visible; but so soon as the burr cracks, and lets fall the real fruit which it has simply protected, the contents then are ripe enough to be gathered, and are known as the chestnut itself. So the finest fruit of the human soul, while still enveloped in its prickly historical wrapping of myths and dogmas, rites, priesthods, and exclusive claims,* is known as Judaism, Buddhism, Christianity, and so forth; but when these limitations and errors perish under the influence of gradually increasing civilization, the real fruit becomes mature, and is known as free or universal religion.

In other words, I mean that the special, historical faith expires in giving birth to the universal, spiritual faith that will succeed it, as the acorn perishes in giving birth to the oak; and that the special name, whether Moslemism or Christianity or any other, will pass away with it. The simple fact that the world's various special faiths are all gradually developing the same universal ideas which are to constitute the faith of the future, proves that no one of the special names can remain its permanent designation. For lack of a better, I call this universal faith of the future Free Religion; but when it comes it may have a better name, or, perhaps, no name at all. Freedom, aspiration, upward endeavor, the worship that is action rather than words,—these will be its essence; and perchance it will bear no narrower name than HUMAN LIFE. That, indeed, if it shall truly embody the faith of the Coming Soul, would be its fittest and its grandest name.

Again, Mr. Towne thinks I have fallen into confusion of thought, because I speak of faith in Jesus the Christ as the special element of Christianity, and yet make it the core and essence of the Christian religion; whereas Mr. Towne would hold that the universal element of Christianity is its real core and essence. But I think the confusion is not mine. By sufficiently attending to the qualifying words I used in the passage criticized, Mr. Towne would have perceived my meaning to be this. The core and essence of all the great religions, looked at in their universal element, apart from all their exclusive claims and special limitations, is the upward struggle of the human soul into the better, the purer, the truer,—in a word, the effort of man to perfect himself, whether he is or is not aware that this effort is the Universal Divine Life stirring in his heart. But the core and essence of each one of these great religions, looked at in its radical distinction from all the others, is its special element, which, though not the essence of religion itself, is the essence of the distinction between the separate religions. Faith in Jesus as the Christ is thus the essence and core of Christianity, "as distinguishable from the other great religions of the world;" but the effort of the soul to reach perfection is its essence and core, when its distinction from other religions is disregarded. In other words, that fundamental struggle towards the Better, which is the essence of all religion in general, assumes in Christianity the form of an humble, passive, emotional reliance on Jesus as the sole and sufficient Savior, which becomes the essence of Christianity in particular. There is here no confusion of thought, but rather thought deeper than Mr. Towne has followed.

Hence I am perfectly justified, when I am studying the characteristics of Christianity as a distinct historical religion, in passing by the universal spiritual truths which Christianity shares with Buddhism, Mosaism, and so forth, for the purpose of concentrating attention on the special forms which these universal spiritual truths have assumed in the Christian consciousness. Take, for example, the grand precept—"love your neighbor as yourself,"—which in some form or other reappears in all the chief religions of the world. How does the devoted Christian love himself? Not as intrinsically worthy of love (which is the teaching of Free Religion), for he believes himself naturally depraved; and, consistently, he can only love himself as a mere recipient of the Divine Love of his Savior. Consequently he will love his neighbor in the same way, as a recipient of the same love. But if his neighbor is a Pagan, or a heretic, or an unconverted sinner, he cannot love him as he loves himself; he will either hate him for refusing the Savior's love, or pity him for not appreciating it. Study the history of the Christian Church; observe the character of the earnest Christians about you; and then tell me whether I have not rightly explained the course and limits of "Christian love."

In the same way, every universal truth of Christianity is cast in the peculiar mould of its special element; and it is perfectly idle to attempt to study the Christian religion by excluding what Mr. Towne calls its "Christism." Christianity is all Christism, in form of thought and mode of feeling; and the sooner our radical thinkers recognize this fact, so much the sooner will they perceive their own true attitude toward Christianity itself. All the universal truths of the New Testament acquire a peculiar form and coloring in the Christian consciousness, and appear quite otherwise than the simple, natural morality which they appear to unchristianized readers. Hence I cannot recede from the position that the doctrine of Jesus the Christ is the one corner-stone of the Christian religion, and that, in studying this, the universal truths it contains must all be viewed as shaped and hewn to fit into the Christian edifice. What Mr. Towne cleaves to as the "pure truth" of Christianity, he has cleansed from this Christism; but in so doing he has washed off every trace of its Christian imprint, and now holds the elements of natural, universal, Free Religion alone.

When, therefore, Mr. Towne complains that I omit from Christianity the "Fatherhood of God" and the "Brotherhood of Man," he fails to see that I include both in their special Christian forms. That is, the Fatherhood of God is part of the Christian doctrine of the Trinity, and limited thereby; and in the fact of this limitation I see the reason why the Christian Church teaches that God is really a Father to those only who "believe in Christ," relentlessly damning all the rest of mankind. In the same manner, the Brotherhood of Man is part of the Christian doctrine of the Church, the divinely established fellowship of the faithful, and limited thereby; and in the fact of this limitation I see the reason why Christian love fails to expand beyond the circle of believers. Christianity as such has never taught, and can never teach, these two great doctrines of the Divine Fatherhood and Human Brotherhood in their true universality. It runs them both into the narrow mould of "Christism," and thus alone makes them "Christian" doctrines.

In criticising our statement that "the Fall of Adam, the Total Depravity of the human race, the Everlasting Punishment of the wicked, and Salvation by Christ alone" [Modern Principles, 3.] are the chief features of systematic Christianity, Mr. Towne fails to see that from these, as premises, follows every other doctrine of the Christian scheme. If salvation is offered through Christ alone, it must be offered by some definite means, available in all times and places; hence the supposed sanctity of the Church among Catholics and of the Bible among Protestants. If totally depraved humanity is to be saved, it must be saved by a divine, superhuman Savior; hence the Godhead of Jesus, and the agency of the Holy Spirit after the disappearance of Jesus from human sight. And so on. These four great doctrines are the four corners of the Christian edifice; and to invalidate any one of them must bring the whole structure to the ground.

If this be so, then I was entirely right in characterizing Christianity as "organized despair of man," notwithstanding Mr. Towne's dissent. For on the Christian theory man is by nature absolutely hopeless; he is absolutely powerless to save himself. His only hope is in a salvation supernaturally offered to him by the grace of God. Thus Christianity despairs of man, and hopes in God. But Free Religion believes in man, denies his depravity and his danger of hell-fire, and bids him work out for himself his own salvation from all the evils to which he is really exposed; and if God be in humanity, it believes in God too. Hence I am entirely right in characterizing it as "organized faith in man;" and I confess to some surprise that Mr. Towne should so utterly miss the plain meaning of my words. They do indeed present the "darker side of Christianity;" but to all who cannot "believe in Christ," Christianity, dooming them to hell, is darkness itself. Its "brighter side" is hidden from all but believers in dogmas which are the stultification of reason and the lie direct to all human experience.

In common with a large class of modern radicals, Mr. Towne fatally underrates the importance of the Christ-idea to Christianity. He fails to see that it is the one root, the great tap-root, out of which grows the entire Christian religion, so far as distinguishable from other religions. This want of appreciation of the historical, logical, and spiritual relations it bears to the subsequent development and present character of Christianity, prevents a truly philosophical estimate of it, and causes the immense vagueness and confusion of thought inherent in radical Unitarianism. I think I understand the state of mind characteristic of this phase of belief, because I have myself passed through it. Singularly enough, the very words which Mr. Towne has selected to describe the theological position of The Examiner—"Radical Christianity,"—I used about four years ago to describe my own. In a sermon preached before the New Hampshire Unitarian Association, and published in the Christian Register of June 29, 1867, I said:—"The great streams of ancient piety and modern discovery have made a junction in RADICAL CHRISTIANITY [the capitals are copied], and will, I profoundly believe, henceforth mingle their waters in a purer, deeper, more spiritual civilization than the world has yet known." It is because I found this radical position inside of Christianity untenable, alike on historical, logical, and spiritual grounds, that I felt myself forced to sunder relationships I deeply loved, and push my little shallop out upon the boundless seas of human thought. Others will yet experience the same necessity; and the time will come when they will wonder at the strength of the old associations which prevented their earlier perception of it.

The great defect of Mr. Towne's view of Christianity, and that of all who substantially agree with it, is non-apprehension of the fact that Christianity is an organized system of belief which has created the Church as its historical self-expression and embodiment. It is as much a system as the great slave-system of the South. Like that, it is based on the idea of "property in man." As the slaves belonged bodily to their masters, Christians belong spiritually to Jesus, their Master, Savior, King, and God. Free Religion is, as I have elsewhere called it, a "declaration of independence," a stern rejection of the principle of personal chattelhood, a protest in defence of personal freedom. On this idea that all souls by right belong to Christ, the Christian theology damns forever all rebellious slaves, all fugitives from his service. At once a system of thought and a system of government, Christianity has been in history the most imposing, the most successful, the most terrible and crushing despotism ever set up on earth. Perfected in Roman Catholicism, it is simply going to pieces in Protestantism. Not to perceive these vitally important truths is to be blind to the facts on which must be grounded a just philosophical judgment concerning the merits and demerits of the Christian religion.

There is today a very noticeable repugnance to the idea of "system" in the minds of many of our best radicals, appearing on the one hand as an unwillingness to admit that Christianity is indeed a definite system of dogma and ecclesiastical polity, and appearing on the other hand as failure to perceive that modern civilization is steadily building itself up in accordance with principles which are equally reducible to system and intellectual order. This repugnance is simply an indication that the conscious thought of our age is largely chaotic, and has hardly yet begun to comprehend the direction in which it is in fact very rapidly and very really advancing. But the forces of growth are at work, and the laws of growth will most certainly be perceived by and by. In the "Modern Principles," to the importance of which as a tentative statement of these laws Mr. Towne seems entirely insensible, I have endeavored, not to create a system for the purpose of impressing my own thought upon the times, but to state as well as may be the system which modern civilization, so far as emancipated from the domination of Christian ideas, is actually, though unconsciously, obeying. The only effective way of disposing of my statement is, not to call it a "creed," but to show that the "Modern Principles" fail to express the real spirit and tendency of the times, either by the incorporation of merely personal crotchets or by the omission of universal principles actually guiding the progress of the age. Unless open to one of these two objections, the statement ought ultimately to accomplish its object, namely, the awakening of America to the fact that she is today really living in obedience to an elastic scientific system which is utterly irreconcilable with the rigid Christian system.

Charged as radicals often are with pure destructiveness, and challenged to show what they can do in the way of construction, it is time that they rouse themselves to a true comprehension of the situation, and prove themselves able to meet the emergency. The demand made is reasonable. The world is not going to dwell in a heap of ruins. Anarchy is no more tolerable in the world of thought than in the world of action. The common idea of "construction," especially the Christian idea of it, is the building up of a system of dogmas. Even liberal minds often seem to think it consists in inventing demonstrations of God or immortality. Such constructions I regard as of minor value. God and immortality will take care of themselves. What I aim at in the way of construction (and it is about all that can be attempted in the present state of science) is carefully to determine and state the true laws by which the emancipated mind of modern times is unconsciously thinking and living. I would construct a road, and not a prison. This generation is on the march, and I would help it travel. Good intellectual roads are the most pressing want of the times; and the best possible constructive work is to build roads leading to Freedom, Knowledge and Virtue. If mankind fail to find God at the end of the route, they can well afford to dispense with him altogether. We who believe him to be there, as here in the midst of slavery, ignorance, and vice, shall not lose him on the way.

The difference between Mr. Towne's view of Christianity (I admit that he represents a far larger constituency than I do) and the view I advocate in THE INDEX, is more than a verbal one, and it would not be correct to say that we present the same thought under different names. Judging the Christian religion as an objective fact in the world, he thinks that the Christ-idea has been an excrescence upon it, and can now be cut off without impairing its vitality; while I should say that the excision of this idea would be the digging out of its heart. The difference in our understanding of the word Christian, which makes him retain and me drop it, is the consequence of this deeper difference in our understanding of the thing. An illustration will make this plain.

Spiritualism, I should say, is, fundamentally, belief in the actual communion of departed spirits with living men and women; and the various liberal ideas of a universal character which are found clustered about this distinctive belief in what is called the "spiritual philosophy," are in no sense Spiritualistic ideas, but rather the common property of liberal minds the world over. These general progressive ideas, which personally I find to be the most interesting feature of Spiritualism and which I sympathize with wherever found, constitute the universal element of Spiritualism; while the belief in spirit-intercourse, with its affiliated beliefs of mediumship, spirit-control, and so forth, constitutes its special element. Now, supposing Mr. Towne not to be a believer in spirit-intercourse, he would say, if he should treat Spiritualism as he now treats Christianity, that true Spiritualism consists in general progressive ideas; that the belief in spirit-intercourse is no essential part of it, and could be cut off as a mere excrescence without impairing the vitality of Spiritualism at all; that the believer in general progressive ideas is the true Spiritualist, although he should emphatically disavow all belief in spirit-intercourse. On the contrary, I should say that nobody is a true Spiritualist who disbelieves in spirit-intercourse, just as I say that nobody is a true Christian who disbelieves in the Christ-idea; and that the name Spiritualist loses all significance the moment it is dissociated from the central Spiritualistic tenet. In this case, I think the general verdict would be in my favor. But a contrary verdict is rendered by Christian radicals in a precisely similar case. Can I not afford to wait till prejudice is outgrown? The main question concerns the true nature of Christianity; and when that is settled, the question of names is already answered.

Notwithstanding the divergence of our views on several important points, I am exceedingly glad that The Examiner, which is conducted with so much ability and self-sacrifice, has entered the field; and I wish it may find a large support. The ideas it represents demand a public organ, now that the Unitarians no longer favor the freest Christian thought; and Mr. Towne's enterprise is therefore a strictly legitimate one. The discussion he carries on is elsewhere neglected in a great measure; and I rejoice that his peculiar defence of Christianity has been laid before the public. It needs a thoughtful and careful consideration—a better one, in fact, than I have been able to give it. But I have at least tried to be as just as plain and as friendly as outspoken; for I do not believe that the courage and determination and moral earnestness shown by Mr. Towne have often had their parallel,—least of all among those who, stung by his sarcasm, have retaliated with slanders. If I differ from him, it is with respect for his scholarship and his character; and I trust that nothing I have said will wound, when I hoped to convince.

The first church organ ever put up in Boston was in the well-known King's Chapel—once Episcopalian, now Unitarian. Great was the prejudice against it. It stood unpacked over six months, and when at last it was in place, a good old lady remarked, "It is a pretty box of whistles, but an awful plaything for the Sabbath." By a slight change of sentiment, no church can now live without such an "awful plaything." There can be no modern worship without "a pretty box of whistles."

L'EAU!—(Milkman's Cry). We read in the Christian World, that there is wanted a "General servant, immediately, in a small family, where two cows is kept. One of good character. A Baptist preferred.—Apply B. C., &c."—An applicant will do wisely to stipulate that she shall milk the cow only of good character. But why a Baptist? Does the advertiser vend milk? In that case, he should be aware that there is such a thing as a Lactometer. Still B. C. may mean a Baptist Cow-keeper, who may desire a servant of his own faith. In that case, we may remark that a presumably religious person has no business to keep one cow of other than good character.—Exchange.

A worthy old clergyman in a neighboring town is very absent minded and has a short memory. It is a common habit with him in the pulpit to forget something, and then after sitting down to rise again and begin his supplementary remarks with the expression, "By the way." A few Sundays ago he got half-way through a prayer, when he hesitated, forgot what he was about, and sat down abruptly without closing. In a minute or two he rose, and pointing his fore-finger at the amazed congregation, he said:—"Oh! by the way—Amen."

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"Having leisure now, I have a few things to say; and, little accustomed as I am to address the public by tongue or pen; I can write more freely and satisfactorily when writing to you alone. If, however, I should at any time write anything you may wish to print, put it into your 'Extracts from Letters' in your column of 'Voices from the People.' And first, as to THE INDEX: the press is to be for the present and probably for the future (at least that near future about which we may presume to form opinions) the chief, though not the only means of spreading Free Religion. Now, an independent, paying paper is a greater power than a subsidized paper; and therefore THE INDEX should aim at independence, and if that can be best and soonest secured by its present plan and size let it go on unchanged. But if it be thought that an increased number of pages and an increase of price (for truly a larger paper cannot be afforded for two dollars) will afford as good prospect of independence, then let it be larger and dearer. Still I would here advise caution lest a considerable number of subscribers say they cannot afford to pay more, and another considerable number say they do not wish to read more. If, at last, increase of pages is determined on, I would suggest the size and form of the Nation; say 16 pages like those of the Nation. Such size and form, and only such, will secure its permanent preservation. Second, Organization. This should be as simple as possible, and there should be as little of it as possible. There should be some organization; but it can be varied from time to time as circumstance, place, reasons, changes, may require. I like all that has been said on this subject by yourself, by Potter, and by several others. I quite agree with you that 'the functions of radical instructors is to make themselves unnecessary as soon as possible.' There is an excellent letter bearing on this point in THE INDEX of Oct. 15th, No. 42, page 5, signed 'Libertus,' which I have just read a second time, and with increased pleasure. This letter, like many others, shows how large is your constituency, and how varied, and how thoughtful, and how hopeful. Third, your selection and reprint of Mrs. Child's admirable paragraph on 'Freedom of Labor,' on page 3, No. 43, October 22d of THE INDEX pleased me greatly, as it relieved me of the fear that you might be misled by the sophistry of Wendell Phillips on this subject. Massachusetts has now before the nation four politicians (I will not call them statesmen) whom I wish to see rebuked: Butler, Phillips, Wilson and Banks. The last three I still have hope of; of Butler, none. Fourth, Thanks for your fairness in reproducing from Mr. Towne's Examiner (which I have not yet seen) his defence of his position. I can see no reason why he and you should not fraternize and be fast friends."

—"I am a reader of THE INDEX. I am in sympathy with its spirit and tone. A few years ago I would have cried out in horror, and applied to you the epithet 'Infidel,' in the general acceptance of that term. The influence of Spiritualism has enabled me to see goodness, honesty and purity in others, where then I would think none could exist. I now apply a different test when measuring myself and others. The best faith is that which prompts to the purest life, and the best religion that which strengthens confidence in humanity, and stimulates desire for its happiness. I am more hopeful and happy in the evidence I have of a future life and improved conditions for all, and am thereby stimulated to believe in, and work for the improvement of conditions here. I now believe all must be good in order to be happy; then, all must be Christian to go to heaven. Considerable of heaven might be had here, if conditions were as good as it is in the power of man to make them. Poverty and crime, why do we have them, what would we be without them—where is their remedy? Answer—love and purity."

—"The people are all so good about me that they won't one of them read it but under protest, and when I hear that my father is coming down (and like Mr. Makegood he may come any minute and catch me reading it), I issue strict orders for the paper to be secreted on its arrival, and for nobody to say a word that ends in z. There are a thousand good things in the paper—five hundred of them Eastern people are familiar with—I mean the struggle of progressive ideas. The paper must do a world of good and you are a single-hearted man (that's a good deal); but I am tired of controversy, and want freedom without fighting for it."

—"Inclosed is two dollars for THE INDEX another year. I am pleased with it, and hope that you and the cause you advocate will prosper. I should be exceedingly glad if the people of — would patronize THE INDEX. Many would be glad to read it if it cost nothing, but are not willing to subscribe for it. They don't seem willing yet to take a stand outside of Christianity. I find the idea a new one to most people, and they are very naturally a little afraid (although progressive men and women) to look at it. When I tell them they will have to submit to the inevitable, they shake their heads. One lady said to me the other evening, that she did not want to live to see it."

—"I suspect these men will become subscribers after reading the truth for three months, at all events I think it will be as a nail in a sure place (as the preachers say), and it will be only one dollar loss for me. I have not now time, and perhaps not the ability, to say much to encourage you in your good work; but I have often thought I would do so, and may hereafter. I know that your religious doctrines are true, and will sooner or later become general. In fact, more of the educated and thinking men and women, in and out of the church, believe as you do, and are deterred from owning it by various reasons wholly unconnected with the questions in hand."

—"I am glad to see that you have ceased to advertise that bane of childhood, 'Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup.' I conceive that many future drunkards may trace their ruin to this abomination. In the London Medical Times and Gazette, of March 19th, 1870, an analysis of the articles may be found, from which the following is extracted: 'It contains a considerable quantity of alcohol, equal to a quarter of a teaspoonful of sherry wine, a quantity quite adequate to produce an effect on an infant.' The effect produced by the syrup is due to the alcohol entirely. There is no other active agent in it according to the analysis referred to. The other ingredients are simple syrup and anis seed."

—"It is with the greatest satisfaction that I send you the name of another subscriber to THE INDEX. This is, on the whole, rather an orthodox city, and not easy to get a subscriber for a liberal paper; and yet I am not without hopes to get you one, or perhaps two, more subscribers; but if I should fail in this, believe me, my dear friend, it will not be on account of my not having tried hard enough. If THE INDEX will be but supported as well as it deserves to be, you and your friends will have but little to complain of."

—"I would like to get up a club but cannot in this God-forsaken place. May success attend your efforts."

—"I wish you would send — during January THE INDEX. He made a speech at a Bible Society meeting last Sunday evening, that startled the little town, seeing that he is an orthodox church member and chairman of their school committee. He replied strongly to disparaging remarks made concerning Theodore Parker, declared many portions of the Bible unfit reading for schools or families and denied that Christ was the Savior of mankind, or that need for that 'plan of salvation' existed."

—"I was a six months trial subscriber and did not intend to lose a number, but I have been delaying with the hope of sending you quite a list from here. And, although you have many sympathizing with your position and sentiments, they are mostly feeding on the pap of spiritualism and can't stand your strong food."

—"I send you herewith $5.00—$2.00 to renew subscription to THE INDEX, (hitherto sent) $2.50 for bound volume, and 50 cents for a Christmas present, which, for the want of better use, you can invest in printer's ink, and open a broadside on this 'hoary relic of barbarism.'"

—"I always have felt sympathy even for a hog with a yoke on his neck; how ought a human man to work to get the yokes off from the necks of the people when he sees them not only yoked like vicious brutes, but fenced in with scorpions and fires of hell to keep them out of the clover and luscious fruits which grow in the broad fields of science, as in the gardens of God."

—"If you ever 'Mr'-fy me again, I will have my 'Rev'-enge on you."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—Regular meetings of this Society will be held during the winter on Sunday forenoons, at 10½ o'clock, in Daniels' Block, corner of Jefferson and Summit Streets, in the hall over the U. S. Express Office. The public are cordially invited.

FREE EVENING SCHOOLS.—These schools were closed for the present season Friday evening, March 17.

RECEIVED.

RELIGIOUS MEDITATIONS, and other Poems, Liberal, Reformatory, and Miscellaneous. By C. L. JAMES, Author of the "Law of Marriage," "Manual of Transcendental Philosophy," &c. St. Louis, Mo.: BOWMAN & MATTHEWS, Printers. 1871. 16mo. pp 99. For sale by the Author, Louisiana, Mo., postpaid for 50 cents.

COMPLAINT AGAINST THE PRESBYTERIANS AND SOME OF THEIR DOCTRINES. By SAMUEL J. MAY. Syracuse, N. Y. 1871. (Third Edition. Published by the RADICAL CLUB.)

HEALTH AND HOME. A Monthly Magazine devoted to Health and the Home Circle. W. R. DE PUT & BROTHER, Publishers, 805 Broadway, New York. Terms, $1.50 per annum in advance. Vol. I, No. 1. March, 1871.

THE TRUTH-SEEKER. Edited by the Rev. JOHN PAGE HOPPS. London: TRUEBNER & Co., Paternoster Row. March, 1871.

Poetry.

DOUBT.

You say, but with no touch of scorn,
Sweet-hearted you, whose light-blue eyes
Are tender over drowning flies,
You tell me, doubt is Devil-born.

I know not! one indeed I knew
In many a subtle question versed,
Who touched a jarring lyre at first,
But ever strove to make it true.

Perplexed in faith, but pure in deeds,
At last he beat his music out:
There lives more faith in honest doubt,
Believe me, than in half the creeds.

He fought his doubts and gathered strength,
He would not make his judgment blind,
He faced the spectres of the mind,
And laid them; thus he came at length

To find a stronger faith his own;
And power was with him in the night,
Which makes the darkness and the light,
And dwells not in the light alone.

TENNYSON.

The Index.

MARCH 25, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

Contributors are requested to write on only one side of each sheet.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

INDUCEMENTS.—We would invite the special attention of our friends who cannot afford to give their services gratuitously in getting subscribers for THE INDEX, to the very liberal Cash Premiums offered in our Prospectus for 1871.

Whoever collects $150.00 for 75 subscriptions, is authorized to retain $50.00, forwarding $100.00.

Whoever collects $100.00 for 50 subscriptions, is authorized to retain $25.00, forwarding $75.00; and so on.

Now it cannot be very difficult, in a town of any considerable size, to get twelve subscriptions a day for one week, if the agent uses ordinary business energy. Yet he would be paid about $8.00 a day—as much as his representative in Congress receives for work not always, we fear, so useful!

"A word to the wise." Who will canvass for THE INDEX, and at the same time earn as much as the Hon. Mr. ———? Send for "Truths for the Times," and begin at once.

"TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES, OR REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX"—is the title of a neatly-printed tract of sixteen pages published by THE INDEX Association, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. One Hundred Copies will be sent for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate—one cent a copy. Packages will be sent free to those who will circulate them, but are unable to pay for them. Here is an excellent means of helping the cause of Free Religion and THE INDEX as an organ of it. Friends of Freedom, send for as many copies as you can use, and do your part in awakening an interest in ideas worthy of American institutions and the higher civilization of the future.

We are surprised that a paper of the reputation enjoyed by Hearth and Home should allow itself to copy from our columns the beautiful poem by "Mignonette," entitled "Thanksgiving," without giving due credit. It is a fundamental principle of our editorial ethics to give credit scrupulously, except in the case of floating paragraphs whose origin we do not know. There are papers that live by preying on their neighbors, and we often discover articles pirated from THE INDEX in those that come to us; but we did not expect such a discovery in Hearth and Home, and trust it was only a mistake.

SCIENCE AND INTUITION.

Dr. McCosh has been again attempting to criticise what he calls "Boston Theology." A late lecture of his in New York has the following passage, as reported in the N. Y. World:—

"To what, then, is the appeal to be? To science, say some. To what science? To physical science. Physical science has its own grand domain, but it discovers nothing to throw light on the great question as to the relation in which man stands to God, and the existence of the soul after death. All our wiser expounders of science confess this. A lecturer in Boston allows that at present science cannot answer the question as to the immortality of the soul. But the same lecturer hints, and another states plainly, that what physical science cannot establish, what the alleged resurrection of Jesus cannot prove, may be founded on certain moral ideas, in a sense of virtue and moral obligation, in the faculties which distinguish between right and wrong. But meanwhile they are aware that the school which can generate life and plants and animals out of star dust, can develop these ideas by natural law out of sensations and impressions. I believe that we are entitled to appeal to these ideas in constructing a reasonable religious conviction. Dr. McCosh expressed pleasure at finding the most advanced of the Boston school still cleaving to these moral ideas, and hoped that they might thereby be led to look back and retrace their steps. But, he continued, if there be no truth set before the faith, it may become the weakest credulity, and the feelings may change quicker than the winds, which are an emblem of human wishes and passions. If I dream one way and you dream another, which is a third party to follow? Some are inclined to believe their own dreams, but few are disposed to believe in the dreams of their neighbors. So, in the end, every one will take the way which his whim, his impulse, his fancy, or his self-interest may lead him. The whole party is at present in a state of unrest, discontented with their position, and quarrelling with one another."

The appeal is not to "physical science," but, as we said at the time, to "universal science." If physical science can prove itself to be all the science possible to man, the intelligence of the race, as distinguished from its unreasoning sentiment, will accept the result. But the position we take is this. Until the universal scientific method has been patiently and thoroughly applied to all facts without exception, it is arrogant pretension to set up dogmatic conclusions of any sort, positive or negative, concerning subjects not yet scientifically investigated. If the existence in human nature of an intuitional faculty which immediately certifies a personal God and immortality can be proved, science herself must recognize it; but if, as we believe, no such faculty exists, these questions must be answered on other grounds. The Bible cannot answer them, nor any other authority which suppresses thought. No appeal remains but to the ordinary faculties of the mind, applied to these as to all other problems.

Authority or science—these are the only alternatives; for theological intuition can have no validity, until scientifically shown to exist. For years we have felt the imperative necessity of a philosophy which shall assign to intuition its true place among the mental faculties, and clear the ground for a truly scientific treatment of the greatest of all questions. The work of Dr. McCosh—"The Intuitions of the Mind Inductively Investigated,"—on which his reputation rests, is superficial and shallow, though, as the title shows, it is an effort in the right direction. Having given much thought and study to this matter in former years, and reached conclusions which we believe to be profoundly important, it has been a cause of deep regret that the pressure of other duties has prevented their full development. That there is an intuitive element in human knowledge, is certain; but its nature and function, the laws that govern it and the part it plays in science itself, have never yet been so explained as to meet the requirements of philosophy.

We would add a word on one or two points made recently in these columns by Mr. Hallowell, in criticising the same lecture to which Dr. McCosh refers.

Nothing was farther from our purpose and (we think) from our performance, than to "abuse our opponents;" as will appear when the lecture is printed. Nor did we refer to the Free Religious Association in anything we said, having in mind a conflict of ideas, and not of persons. The title of our lecture was perhaps unfortunate, and may have suggested personal antagonisms rather than contrarieties of thinking. What we meant to suggest was the unreconciled and irreconcilable differences of method among radicals themselves in treating the deepest questions connected with religion. We are very glad that Mr. Hallowell is "not willing to accept Mr. Abbot's declaration of war," since we made none. On the contrary, we spoke entirely in the interests of peace, hoping to heal the old feud between theists and atheists by vindicating the true authority of science, from which no sustained rebellion is possible except by the ignorant and the bigoted. They who claim this authority for dogmatic negations, on the one hand, and they who claim it for dogmatic affirmations on the other, both need to be reminded that the dogmatic spirit is the one thing which science finds inadmissible. The opinion we tried to express that the tendencies of science are directly to confirm the theistic interpretation of Nature, and indirectly our hope of immortality, was by no means, as Mr. Hallowell supposes, an unguarded return to the intuitional ground, but a simple anticipation of the final decisions of science, based on our application of scientific ideas to the problems treated. If we had had time to do so in an hour's space, we should have sketched the outline of our reasoning; but this must be deferred. Mr. Hallowell, however, did us no more than justice in supposing that we should cordially welcome his trenchant criticism; and, despite our supposed "declaration of war," we trust he will always count us in the number of his friends.

JESUS AND FREE THOUGHT.

The N. Y. Independent has the following extraordinary paragraph:—

"The New York Globe glories in the tolerance by which the Rabbi Wise is allowed to proclaim, without molestation, opinions which, if they were accepted, would overturn Christianity. In a city where nearly all the people believe—at least, nominally—in the divinity of Christ, the great Jewish rationalist publicly asserts that Jesus was only a man, and rather a weak-minded man at that; yet nobody disturbs him, and hardly any notice is taken of his utterances. The fact is indeed significant; but its full meaning is not apprehended until we reflect that this lesson of toleration was first clearly and effectually taught by Jesus himself. Doubtless other teachers before his day had conceived of this great idea, and doubtless many of the disciples of Christ in his own day and the days following failed to comprehend it; yet the fact remains that the world has learned toleration from the New Testament, and it is not too much to say that the Rabbi Wise owes to this Jesus whom he disparages the free speech which he enjoys."

The kind of toleration which the New Testament represents Jesus as teaching may be learned from Matt. X, 14, 15, where he gives instructions to the twelve disciples before beginning their missionary tour:—

"And whosoever shall not receive you, nor hear your words, when ye depart out of that house or city, shake off the dust of your feet. Verily I say unto you, it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment than for that city."

Remembering that, according to Matt. XXV, 31—46, Jesus himself is to be the Judge at the "last day," it can be readily seen what sort of "toleration" Dr. Wise may expect at the Messiah's cloudy throne. The damnation hurled against Sodom and Gomorrah will be mild, compared to that which awaits the editors of The Israelite and THE INDEX.

The usual passage quoted by "Liberal Christians" to prove the toleration of Jesus is in Mark, IX, 38, 39, (cf. Luke IX, 49, 50):—

"And John answered him, saying, 'Master, we saw one casting out devils in thy name, and he followed not us, and we forbade him, because he followeth not us.' But Jesus said, 'Forbid him not; for there is no man which shall do a miracle in my name, that can lightly speak evil of me.'"

Let it be noted that this man is represented as casting out devils "in the name" of Jesus,—that is, as a believer in him. It does not require much liberality to tolerate those who believe in us; the test comes when we are called upon to tolerate those who do not believe in us. And the previous passage shows what was the temper of Jesus towards disbelievers. He tolerated them only until he should come into his kingdom.

According to the uniform teaching of the New Testament, "faith in the Lord Jesus Christ" is the one essential thing, even constituting the condition of miracles themselves; while want of faith in him is the one fatal lack. How, then, was toleration possible to Jesus, except as a temporary postponement of the condemnation already incurred by simple disbelief? His forbearance was only a respite. The guilt of disbelief remained.

To say that the Jesus of the New Testament taught the right of free thought and free speech, is to insult the common sense of mankind. This right has been and still is persistently denied by Christianity; and this denial is the spirit of the New Testament. Jesus and his followers taught love, purity, forgiveness, mercy, and a thousand good things beside; but they never taught freedom. And freedom is what the world wants now.

"THE GOLDEN AGE."

At present writing we have received three numbers of The Golden Age. They are eminently spicy and readable. Mr. Tilton, as a "paragraphist," has few equals; and nothing escapes his notice. There is a vein of humor (and good humor, too,) in his comments on men and things which makes the department headed "Signs of the Times," the most attractive part of the paper. But when we inquire, what is the main purpose for which The Golden Age is published, we are somewhat puzzled. The terse editorial prospectus states that "this journal is devoted to the free discussion of all living questions in church, state, society, literature, art, and moral reform;" and Mr. Greeley's prospectus, which is endorsed by the editor, declares that the paper will be "the exponent of no theory." Why then have, as a distinct department, a "Free Parliament" which is "open to the widest latitude of discussion?" We should imagine from the prospectuses, that the whole paper would be as "open, &c.," as the "Free Parliament." We cannot help inferring that the paper itself must be understood as taking editorially a distinct position of some sort, and as having after all a "theory" of its own, while allowing unlimited scope of expression to its contributors. This is as it should be; but we can give a more positive answer to Mr. Tilton's request for an outspoken opinion, when we are informed what this implied position is. On the margin of No. 1, we find the following printed legend:—"If you like this paper, please say so; or if you don't like it, say so." A lisping lover from the rural districts said to his sweetheart:—"Thally, if you love me, thay tho; if you don't love me, thay tho; if you do love me, and don't want to thay tho, jutht thqueeze my hand!" We like very much that we find in The Golden Age; but whether we are to like The Golden Age itself, we cannot tell till we find out where it stands. Under the circumstances, however, we cannot help giving its hand a gentle "thqueeze."

THE DOCILE MIND.

Dr. Bellows is giving, during Lent, a course of Wednesday afternoon lectures on the Evidences of Christianity. They will, of course, be ingenious and brilliant, and will set the old arguments in such new lights as his fertile wit will suggest. They will be apologetic, no doubt, but will aim at being fresh, and will mean to be reasonable. The opening discourse intimated a purpose to rest the religion on its practical merits and to make it evidence itself,—plainly, the only course that will commend itself to thoughtful minds in this generation. A thorough treatment of the subject on this plan would be very interesting and valuable; but a remark or two, in opening, raises a question whether a thorough treatment is to be expected.

The lecturer began by recommending to his hearers a docile attitude of mind; an attitude not precisely of acquiescence in what they are told by the teacher (Dr. Bellows would hardly endeavor or wish to secure that), but an attitude of acquiescence in the claims of the religion as a providentially organized and instituted faith. He asks them to bend their heads before the grand historic fact, to concede to possession the full right to possess, and forbear to press inquiry beyond the line that separates the humble believer in the church from the eager investigator of its claims.

This attitude the Christian apologists have taken, from Raymond Martin and Ludovico Vives to Bishop McIlvaine and the Earl of Rosse; and it was an attitude perfectly justifiable on the part of those who regarded the religion not only as providential, which every religion is, or as divinely instituted, as we may suppose it once to have been, but as a final fact in history, instituted for all time, planted forever on the solid rock which is immovable among the drifting sands of time. The merit of the docile mind has consisted in its willingness to receive that view of the case, in its teachableness by those who assumed and enforced it.

But since those days a new science has been born, the science of history, and we see the church floating on the same stream that has borne other churches which supposed themselves to be built for eternity, but which stranded and went to pieces,—the same stream that carries states and communities on its bosom till their stopping-place is reached, and there leaves them. We see the Christian religion going into harbor for repairs, newly rigged, ballasted, coppered, refurnished in fact, and preserving none of its original features except the name. The immediate officers of the vessel impress on the sailors and passengers the belief that the ship they sail in is the original structure which the apostles launched; but as there are several ships bearing the same name, and the commanders of each deny the genuineness of any but their own, the demand for acquiescence in the claim of authenticity is bold.

Docility must now change its attitude. Docility is teachableness, but teachableness asks for a change of teachers. The docile mind is willing to be taught something about the origin of Christianity, its changes, its growth, and possible decline. It sits meekly at the feet of the historian who recounts its variations, the critic who can tell the date of its natural origin, the philosopher who resolves it into its elements. It is very humble in the presence of truth, but it raises its meek eyes to a larger truth. It puts faith in no individual expounder, or order of exponents, but in him who offers the highest knowledge from the most commanding position. It is ready to sit and listen, but only at the feet of the Teacher of teachers.

To inculcate docility on others is to limit investigation. This is done always in the interest of a church or a dogma,—some form of foregone conclusion. The peculiarity of the new faith is that its teachers never inculcate docility, but lay on themselves the duty of practising it. They assume the attitude of learners in a larger school. Compare, for an instant, in the mere matter of docility, men like Brownson, McCosh, or Tyng with men like Huxley, Tyndal or Spencer. Nothing in Darwin's last volume on "The Descent of Man" is more remarkable than the author's teachableness, modesty, shrinking of himself behind his observations, submission of his observations to the love of truth, willingness to be instructed by men of far less pretensions to omniscience than he. One of the greatest living observers, he will not impose himself as our authority, nor will he out of his capacious knowledge build anything but a bridge over which the humblest seeker may pass to nobler generalizations.

The fact is that the sincerest teachers are the humblest. The three most emphatic and most touching confessions of teachableness, confessions that are even child-like in their simplicity while they are sublime in their greatness, fell from the mouths of men who were revolutionists in thought. They are Socrates' declaration that the persuasion of one's ignorance is an indispensable condition of knowledge, Newton's saying that he felt like a child picking up pebbles on the sea-shore with the whole ocean of truth spread out before him, and Lessing's avowal that the love of truth was more desirable than the possession of it.

If the word docile means anything, it means teachable. But only inquiring minds are teachable. The food we are hungry for is the food that nourishes. Questions must be asked before they can be profitably answered. To answer unasked questions is to prevent inquiry. This is what the theological doctors have been doing for the better part of two thousand years. Is it not timely now for religious teachers to inaugurate the new method of provoking inquiry, piquing curiosity, tempting minds out of their submissive moods, and, in a word, to give to docility its active significance? Stupid minds are not teachable. Minds are not teachable that think they know everything already. Timid minds are not teachable; neither are dictatorial, dogmatical, or imperious minds. We talk of the docility of the child. The genuine child is the most inquisitive of creatures. Newton was twenty times the child that Bossuet was, because he asked twenty times as many questions, and "intended his mind" till they were answered. We are afraid that Dr. Belows's acquiescent auditors are not in the way to become little children.

O. B. F.

THE BOSTON LECTURES.

The third course of Sunday afternoon lectures in Horticultural Hall, Boston, is completed. This season the course has been under the conduct of the Executive Committee of the Free Religious Association. The character of the lectures, however, has been essentially the same as in the previous years. With two or three exceptions the same lecturers have been employed, and the range of topics and the difference in point of view have been equally wide. The audiences have been more uniform in size and composition, a larger number of season tickets having been sold than for the preceding courses. The lectures have been liberally reported in the newspapers; and the course has been pronounced a success. Whether it has been a financial success or not, the Lecture Committee have not yet been informed. But financial success is not the main object.

And since financial success is not the main object, there may be a question whether these lectures have thus far been conducted on the best financial plan for reaching the main object. The easiest way, doubtless, to meet the expenses of the course is that which has been adopted,—the sale of tickets; and, adopting this way, it is probably safest to put the price of tickets pretty high,—say, fifty cents for a single ticket and three or four dollars for the course. But the main object, certainly, is to convey the ideas which the speakers may have to utter to as many minds as possible capable of appreciating them. And there are hundreds of people in Boston and vicinity who would thoroughly appreciate these lectures and who need and long for them, who yet are excluded from them by the cost of admission. There is a large class of persons supporting themselves and families on small salaries, engaged, perhaps, in mechanic employments, who want just the kind of religious thought that is presented in these lectures, but to whom three dollars is a large sum: just at the time the lectures begin, the saved dollars probably have to go for food or rent or fuel. There are many poor students in the same condition. They would prize the lectures beyond all pecuniary calculation, but how to hear them when they have only three dollars in their pocket and their bread-and-milk bill is due, is a difficult problem. We appreciate the witticism (and there was sense in it, too,) of one who was greatly interested in inaugurating this course of lectures, who said that the special need in Boston is to preach the gospel to the rich. But provision having now for three years been made to supply the gospel of free thought in religion to the rich, it may be suggested whether the time has not come to ask the rich to show some fruit of this missionary operation by making similar provision for their poorer brethren of the same household of faith.

In a word, ought not these lectures to be made free? But to do this the expenses must be met by a subscription fund. To raise such a fund may be a harder task than to sell tickets. But it will be labor in a good cause; and it seems certain that the main object of the lectures would in this way be more successfully reached than by the present method.

The wealth of Boston radicalism should not only sustain this miscellaneous course, but other courses in the same direction of thought, and open them gratuitously to the public. The Sunday afternoons for not merely ten weeks, but for nine or ten months, should be occupied. John Weiss should be asked to give his course on the philosophy of the Greek Religion; Samuel Johnson should be invited to read a course on the Oriental Religions; Prof. Fiske on Religion and Positive Philosophy; Mr. Wasson on Religion and Intuition-Philosophy. Inducements should be offered so that these and other persons should give their best thought, in connected and completed form, on the subjects with which they are specially conversant. In the first Annual Report of the Executive Committee of the Free Religious Association (1868), among the practical measures commended to the attention of its constituency was the following:—"A system of permanent lectures, on the basis of the principles of this Association, might advantageously be established in Boston, open and free to all comers, but designed especially for the students of the various theological schools situated in Boston and vicinity. The lectures should be by the ablest men to be found for the purpose, and the arrangement for them might be somewhat after the manner of the Lowell Institute." Saying nothing of special adaptation to theological students, cannot a beginning be made in such a Lecture-system? W. J. P.

The Liberal Christian complains because the Rev. Vance Smith, an English Unitarian, has been excluded by the bishops of the English Church from the commission for revising the authorized version of the Bible. It thinks his rejection of the Church doctrines should be no objection to his serving on the commission, and censures the bishops because—

"The question of the essential dogmas of the religion of Christ is begged. There must be no dispute about these, and nobody who does not admit the trinity and the vicarious atonement is a proper judge of Greek or Hebrew roots."

If the Unitarians were masters of the commission, who believes that they would admit a heretic obnoxious to themselves? They "beg the question of the essential dogmas of the religion of Christ," as flagrantly as the English Church. The complaint of the Liberal Christian is childish. When it ceases to "beg the question" of its own pet dogma that Jesus is the Christ, and allows fair discussion on this point in its own columns, it will have a show of reason for its dissatisfaction. It is a fact recognized by the common sense of mankind that dogmatic opinions bias the exegesis even of the best scholars; and the bishops, believing firmly in the deity of Christ, are shrewd enough not to run the risk of letting Unitarian translations of disputed texts get into the new version. So long as the Unitarians are determined to hold that Jesus is the Christ, and determined not to allow among themselves any fearless inquiries on this subject, they manifest the same spirit as that of the bishops, and would doubtless act in the same way under similar circumstances. It is rather ridiculous for "the pot to call the kettle black."

STORY OF AN IRISH ADVOCATE.—He would go on speaking after the learned Judge had cautioned him to desist, till at last his irritated lordship cried, "Sir, 'tis no use you speaking; what you say to me goes in at one ear and out at the other." The advocate would not be silenced. "My lord," he said, "it's no wonder, when there's nothing between 'em to stop it."

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

"OUTSIDE OF CHRISTIANITY."

CANASTOTA, N. Y., Feb. 24, 1871.

F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—In answer to my criticisms upon your position "that a stand unequivocally outside of Christianity is, in our opinion, the absolutely necessary condition of an impartial estimate of it," you acknowledge the propriety of what I said; or, in other words, acknowledge you were justly obnoxious to the criticisms I made. Then you explained and qualified your position, which of course was proper for you to do, and now say,—"The true critic must be at once inside and outside, and know his subject as it appears from every point of view."

Then again you say,—"If what we (you) have said thus far is correct, we have no right to expect a true appreciation of Christianity from any one who has viewed it either from the inside alone, or from the outside alone."

Thus you now assume that the critic, to be a just and true one, must view the subject from both sides.

You compliment my "ingenuity" in applying my principles to Free Religion, and say,—"If Mr. Barlow, or any one else, can discover the limits of Free Religion, we pledge our word to go outside of it at once." You assume that Free Religion has no outer walls, is boundless,—"the boundless temple of the universe." You would thus attack my criticisms by conveying the idea that there is no outside view to be taken of it, without seeming to see that by this assumption you impeach yourself, and sustain me, when my position has been, and is, that it is from a standpoint within the subject that we are to pass our judgment or criticisms upon it. I beg you will not set me a-straddle of your own dilemma. If the true critic must be "at once inside and outside," and there is no outside to Free Religion, will you please inform me how it is possible for you or any one else to be a true critic or judge, or have a true appreciation of your own system of Free Religion?

It seems to me you have got yourself into even more troublesome waters than when you first erred in making the outside the exclusive standpoint; for you now take the position of no outside of your religion from which to view it. Therefore no judgment can be given of it. The trouble has been in your ambition to combat Christianity, whereby you were made to hurl a shaft which, like the boomerang, has taken a turn and struck down your own theory far behind you.

Will you please explain yourself, and much oblige

Yours truly,

THOMAS BARLOW.

[We have no objection whatever to admitting that we are in the wrong, when convinced of the fact; but Mr. Barlow goes much too fast and too far in fancying we made any such admission in his case. We simply explained the "real meaning of our former statement," and did not concede the substantial correctness of his criticism. To our previous position that the true critic of Christianity should stand outside of it, we only added what might naturally be taken for granted in a "Christian land"—that he should previously have been within it, "by intellectual sympathy, at least, if not by actual experience," Mr. Barlow's criticism merely called our attention to the propriety of expressing what we had already implied.

To criticise any subject fairly, it should be viewed from all sides—from all the sides it has. But we are not called upon to invent sides it has not, which Mr. Barlow is desirous of doing. Christianity is a fenced field, and has therefore inside and outside. Free Religion has no fences,—is as limitless as absolutely universal principles. The only way of getting outside of Free Religion is to get back into Christian or other limitations of those principles. Christianity, Moslemism, and so forth, are thus the only outside there is to Free Religion; and he who, having been a Christian, becomes a logical believer in Free Religion by passing outside of Christianity, becomes qualified to criticise both, so far as mere position can qualify him. To have been a Christian, Mohammedan, etc., is to have had the only "outside" view of Free Religion that is possible; and this is really to have believed in principles under limitation which are subsequently believed in without limitation. For instance, the Christian believes in free thought within the circle of traditional authority; whereas the radical believes in free thought without any restriction. Whoever believes first in the one and then in the other sees all the sides there are to free thought.

This simply re-states what we said before. There is no inconsistency in it to one who can look sharp enough.

The ground Mr. Barlow takes, however, is equivalent to saying that the man who has never passed the boundaries of his own farm is better qualified to estimate its magnitude than he who has circumnavigated the globe. No one can justly criticise a religion, he argues, who does not take his stand within it. Not himself believing in Free Religion, he cannot, therefore, justly criticise the opinions of those who do. How comes he, then, to criticise our opinions? By his own principles, his criticism is worthless,—though not by ours.

Whose theory is hit by his own boomerang, we leave to our readers to judge.—ED.]

CHRIST-WORSHIP.

ALBANY, Feb. 25, 1871.

F. E. ABBOT:—

Dear Sir,—THE INDEX of Jan. 28, 1871, came duly to hand, and on reading the several editorials, communications, &c., contained therein, I have drifted into a strange state of thought.

From my early boyhood I have taken a great interest in all theological discussion, and have ever been on the look-out for light on religion.

At an early age I was baptized in, and attended for a number of years afterwards, the Episcopal Church. When quite young, I wondered why they stood up and sat down so often, and thought I would rather attend the Baptist or Methodist Church on that account. As I advanced in age and at the same time in understanding, I naturally asked myself which sect was right, or came the nearest thereto. After a great deal of study and thought for one so young, I arrived at the conclusion that God should be worshipped with all the pomp and glory of the Roman Catholic Ritual, or in the simple style of the Methodist; and that no intermediate form was or could be right. After arguing this in my own mind, I was so befogged that I concluded that none of them was right, and so quit going to church altogether.

In conversing on religion one evening, I heard "Tom Paine" and the "Age of Reason" mentioned, and to one of my proclivities that was enough to engage my entire thoughts, and I determined to obtain that book. After a twelve-month of fruitless search and inquiry among all my friends and acquaintances, a copy of Paine's "Age of Reason" fell into my hands. I read it through with rare interest, and then was not satisfied. It startled me. If (I thought) the Bible is false, as Paine argues, what shall we believe? The only reasonable argument I could advance against his assertions was,—"Are not all things possible with God?"

As in Milton and Shakespeare we can reasonably recognize God in Man more than in the average of men, so in Christ, taking his life and language, we must also recognize God pre-eminently. If we cannot conceive rationally and reasonably of the Spirit of God in Man, what shall we believe, and what are we created for? If we can conceive rationally and reasonably of the Spirit of God in Man, why not worship Christ as the nearest approach to the idea of the All-Perfect?

Trusting I have not trespassed too much on your valuable time, and hoping to read something in THE INDEX which will answer consistently with reason the questions set forth in this letter, and thus enlighten me, I remain,

Very truly,

J. E. A.

[To our mind, God is in all Nature, and therefore in Man. To worship him exclusively in any limited part of Nature, as the sun or stars, would be practically to exclude him in our thoughts from the rest, and therefore deny that he is in all Nature. So to worship him exclusively in any one man is practically to deny that he is in all men—in humanity itself. Orthodoxy consistently enough makes this denial in its doctrine of "total depravity." Human nature, however, in our own thought, is the least inadequate hint of God.—ED.]

OLD FOGYISM VS. RADICALISM.

F. E. ABBOT, ESQ.:

Dear Sir,—By the courtesy of the editor or some other man, I am, and have been, for months past, in receipt of your brave little paper, THE INDEX. And I wish, in this way, to thank you or the donor, whoever he is, for the courtesy thus extended to me. I read THE INDEX with interest, but of course, I do not agree that all it contains is "truth." Yet I am well satisfied that it is doing good by awakening thought, and arousing the people to investigation. You would not want everybody to agree with you, I take it. I should not at least. In this respect I am much like Pope, the poet. It is said of him that, on one occasion, when riding in a carriage with a gentleman, he talked much on general subjects, and his friend only answered in monosyllables, agreeing with Pope in everything; when the poet, quite irritated, broke out and said:—"For heaven's sake, contradict me in something!"

But I write this not to contradict what I disagree with, but rather to give your readers a clew to what has been going on in this frontier city, in matters of religion.

There are here the following churches:—Colored Methodist—greatly needing "more light;" Colored Baptist, in the same destitution; Roman Catholic, with the usual priestly domination, degradation and immorality among the laity—to which there are, however, some exceptions: Episcopalian—old foggy, as usual (the Rector, I am told, takes the ground in Geology that the fossil remains found in the different strata of the earth were created and placed as we now find them, by the Creator during his six days' work of creation); Baptist (white); with the usual humdrum on the mode of the "beautiful ordinance"; Presbyterian, with ordinary "respectability," a good young man as pastor, with views circumscribed within the narrow and unreasonable limits of the catechism; Congregational, with the usual puritanic selfishness and "witch-burning" propensity. These all have houses of worship, completed or in process of completion, with each a small congregation. The Methodist church is the leading church in the city, as to numbers, and especially as to the size of the congregation during the past year.

But this is owing, no doubt, to the fact that they have a regular, straight-out radical as the pastor of the church. Every Sabbath evening the church, the largest room by far in the city, is crowded to its utmost capacity with the best minds of the city, to listen to the lectures of the pastor who, by some of the "slow-coaches," is called a "Spiritualist," "Swedenborgian," "Infidel," &c.

It is said that "he has managed the case with most consummate skill,—has preached truth in its most rugged form," and yet has not been silenced.

But his day is approaching. He has been preaching the terrible heresy that "man cannot escape the consequences of his own actions;" that "the reason why good men and bad, the virtuous and vicious, the just and the unjust, suffer together, in the same accidents or by the same epidemic, is because they are all subject to the same laws;" that "men need not expect to live all their natural lives in the transgression of law, and then, at the end of life, shed a few crocodile tears, offer a prayer and say they believe in Christ, and go into heaven on a white horse with a great flourish of trumpets;" that "heaven is a condition or state rather than a gilded prison where the convicts (those convicted of faith in Christ) are sentenced to the arduous work of singing Psalms forever;" that "hell is discord, and may be found anywhere, at any time, where a soul is found out of harmony with itself, with the pure, the good." But the crowning iniquity in this gentleman's administration is this:—he has delivered a course of "Sabbath Evening Lectures on the Resurrection of the Dead." In these lectures he has turned old Theology upside down, and will answer for the same and similar improprieties at the Conference in March.

But there is one thing pretty generally conceded, and that is, he is fully able to take care of himself, and only wishes for an opportunity to declare for a free pulpit and Free Religion. His Lectures are soon to be published in book form, and will serve as an "eye-opener."

FRIEND OF PROGRESS.

FORT SCOTT, Kansas.

NATURAL THEOLOGY.

Naturalists class the animal kingdom, with its apparently endless varieties, in four divisions, based on the plan of nervous distribution,—the radiata, of which the star-fish is the type; the mollusca, to which the shell-fish belong; the articulata, of which the lobster may serve as an illustration; and the vertebrata, to which belong all animals having a brain and spinal cord. The plan of structure is so different in each of these that, once pointed out, it is easy to refer any possible variety of animal life to the division to which it belongs. The innumerable extinct species, the fossil remains of which are found in the different strata of the earth, are subject to the same law.

In the same manner, the religions that have existed and still exist among men may be classified in four divisions. First, fetich-worship, the worship of some material object or idol, the first and simplest form of religion that the undeveloped mind apprehends; secondly, the deification and worship of objects of nature, of which the religion of the Greeks and Romans was an example; thirdly, the worship of men renowned in life for their wisdom and virtue, and deified by their admirers after their death, to which class belong the Bramin, Buddhist, and Christian faiths, deifying Krishna, Sakya-muni, and Jesus; and, fourthly, monotheism, the highest type of religion, the acknowledgment of one God, the ruler and soul of the universe, governing all the realms of mind and matter by fixed and immutable laws.

As the animal kingdom may be traced from the polyps up to man, so by the degree of intellectual development of an individual or a people their religious status may be determined. The rudimentary principle of fetichism clings to the second and third type of religion, but disappears in the fourth, which marks an advance over the others as great as that of man over the highest order of animals resembling him in form. Thus the educated Greek worshipped Jupiter (Zeus-pater), God the Father as a deity residing in Olympus, his heaven; but for the multitude it was necessary to have the statue of the God in a temple dedicated to his honor. In the third type of religion this is also seen in the countless images to be found in Bramin, Buddhist, and Christian temples, and also in the divine honors each pays to a book containing their sacred writings, declared to be miraculous revelations from the Deity. The third type of religion is extremely complicated, as to explain the deification of men required the invention of the doctrines of the Trinity and the Incarnation and the immense machinery of dogmatic theology. The Jews worshipped one God, but they conceived of him as a man, a kingly and all-powerful Jew. Mahomet made one leap from fetich-worship to monotheism, exclaiming,—"God is God, there is none other; I his chosen prophet am!" and barely escaped being deified after his death by the prominence he had given to this doctrine.

The reverence paid to the collection of books known as the Bible is a remnant of primeval fetichism. As chemical analysis resolves water into its gaseous elements; as anatomy dissects and lays bare every nerve, vessel, and cell in the human body, so does modern criticism analyze and dissect this collection of books, the product of a semi-barbarous age and people, by writers whose very name and age are admitted by every scholar to be unknown, showing that some are clumsy compilations of Oriental legends, the first three Gospels all prepared from a common source or pre-existing documents, chapters being prefixed or added long after the completion of the original work, and verses interpolated for special purposes. Some of these books are of great beauty, as the book of Job; others are beneath criticism. Yet, although every one whose education has advanced beyond a certain point knows this, the majority of the people are led by the clergy to give an unquestioning belief to all the impossible stories contained therein, thereby destroying in their minds the basis of truth upon which integrity of character rests, and producing a deeper demoralization in the community than mere physical vice is capable of creating. Psychology, the science of the mind, comparative theology and modern criticism explain all the so-called mysteries of religion. The minds of the clergy, with a few noble exceptions, are decidedly fetich-worshipping in character, and are scarcely in this respect of a more elevated type than that of the Congo negro, who endows rocks and trees with higher mental attributes than he claims for himself. The monotheist looks upon the man-worshipper without anger or pity, but with hope and confidence that the law of physical advance will ultimately bring him up to his own level. The time will come when all will recognize God, unite in studying his laws, and, by acting in harmony with them, bring mankind into communion with Him in whom we live and move and have our being.

P. ROOSEVELT JOHNSON.

AN INFIDEL.

Seventy years ago, there lived in this country a man by birth an Englishman, who devoted all that was best in his life to the great cause of American independence. An "Evangelist" met him one day in the street.

"What do you believe?" asked the minister.

"I believe in one God, and no more; and I hope for happiness beyond this life. I believe in the equality of man; and I believe that religious duties consist in doing justice, loving mercy, and endeavoring to make our fellow-creatures happy."

(This sentence has weight, when we know that the speaker practised what he preached.)

"You are, then," said the Christian minister, "damned to everlasting torment in hell, according to the letter and spirit of every Christian Church."

"Indeed!" said the man.

"Yes. You are an infidel, which means unbeliever; and the Bible shows that all such shall be consigned to everlasting torment."

"I am sorry that you believe that," said the infidel; "for it must make you very unhappy, unless you are so wicked as to rejoice in the destruction of four-fifths of the inhabitants of the globe."

"I cannot accept the Bible's teachings, however, unless I accept that. You, I see, do not believe in the Bible. Therefore you are condemned to eternal punishment in the lake of fire."

"Thank you for your frankness," said THOMAS PAINE; "rather hell with Goethe, Shakespeare, Christ—"

"What!" shouted the divine.

"God is everywhere," said Paine, "and is not Christ God?"

"Yes."

"Rather hell, then, I say, with all the noblest souls that ever lived, than heaven with such thoughts as yours."

The minister turned away sadly. His mind was full of the superstition of Christianity, and for years after the infidel was gone, he denounced him from pulpit and press as an accursed unbeliever. But the gospel of the nineteenth century reverences the memory of the man who came upon the earth a century before the times were ripe.

W. H. D.

PHILADELPHIA, Jan. 18.—A convention in favor of the recognition of the Almighty in the Constitution met here to-day. The calls were signed by Hon. William Strong, of the U. S. Supreme Court, Gov. Geary, Gov. Harvey, of Kansas, Gov. Stewart, of Vermont, Gov. McClurg, of Missouri, Ex-Gov. Jewell, of Connecticut; Amos A. Laurell, of Boston, Jay Cook and the late Stephen Collwell, of Philadelphia, Felix R. Brunot, of Pittsburgh, Bishops McIlvaine and Huntington, of the Episcopal church and others.—Toledo Blade.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX
PROSPECTUS FOR 1871.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869, and has just closed its first yearly volume.

We deem it proper, therefore, to submit the following PROSPECTUS of Volume II for 1871, and ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if the matter was properly presented to them, and especially if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor. We cannot afford to send out travelling agents, nor would they succeed so well in getting names as persons of local influence. We therefore have determined to use the funds it would cost to get our paper before the people, in another way, namely, in the purchase of articles of value to be given as premiums to those who make up lists of subscribers; thus presenting to the friends of free thought and pure religion the double motive of doing good and getting paid for it.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two Dollars a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

PREMIUMS.

For Fifty Names, we will give one of PRINCE & Co's four Octave Melodeons (price $65,) or a complete copy of CHAMBERS' Encyclopædia of Universal Knowledge, in ten volumes (price $50).

For Forty Names, we will give a Wilson's Family Sewing Machine, one of the best Machines made.

For Twenty-Five Names, Webster's Royal Quarto Unabridged Pictorial Dictionary (price $12), or one of the following Chromos:

The Three Tom-Boys (Prang's), price..... $15.00
Winter in the Forest, 20x28..... 12.00
Watering the Horses, 21x29..... 12.00

For Ten Names, one of the following Chromos:
WHITTIER'S Barefooted Boy, (Prang's) price..... $5.00
The Unconscious Sleeper, 14x17..... 6.00
Mt. Blanc, 20x26..... 7.50
Or a copy of LECKY'S History of European Morals, 2 vols 6.00
MAX MUELLER'S Chips from a German Work-Shop, 2 vols 5.00
EMERSON'S Prose Works, 2 vols..... 5.00
WEISS'S Life and Correspondence of THEODORE PARKER, 2 volumes..... 6.00

For Five Names, a bound volume of THE INDEX, for 1870. (Price $2.50.) Or a copy of one of the following works, (post paid):

DARWIN'S Origin of Species, price..... $2.00
LUBBOCK'S Origin of Civilization, price..... 2.00
Essays in Criticism, by MATTHEW ARNOLD, price..... 2.00
Tablets, by A. BRONSON ALCOCK, with portrait, price..... 2.00
Any volume of the writings of THEODORE PARKER or HENRY D. THOREAU, each..... 2.00
On the Heights, AUERBACH..... 2.00

For Four Names, a copy of THE INDEX for 1871, or one of the following books (post paid):

EMERSON'S Society and Solitude, price..... $1.75
Nathan the Wise, a dramatic poem translated from LESSING by ELLEN FROTHINGHAM, price..... 1.75
HUXLEY'S Lay Sermons and Addresses..... 1.75
Speeches and Lectures, by WENDELL PHILLIPS..... 1.50
Historic Americans, by THEODORE PARKER, price..... 1.50
A copy of The Revolution..... 2.00
Or The Woman's Journal..... 2.00

CASH PREMIUMS.

For 75 Names,..... 50 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 50 Names,..... 25 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 25 Names,..... 15 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 10 Names,..... 5 Dollars in Greenbacks
For less than 10 Names, a Cash Commission of Twenty per Cent.

Any book in the above list will be sent by us post-paid upon the receipt of price.

N. B.—Names need not all come from one post office. We will send the paper wherever directed, and let the names count as clubs. Specimen Copies sent to all who enclose a three cent postage stamp. Address

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
Lock Box 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Guardian Mutual Life Ins. Co.,

ORGANIZED A. D. 1859.

Mr. O. Waggoner, Gen. Supt. for Ohio, Mich. & Ind.

John H. Hood, Assistant General Superintendent.

Office No. 154 Summit Street,

E. F. MUNGER, } General Agents.
CHAS. M. LANG, }

WALTER C. SCOTT, Local Agent, 152 Summit St.

Special Agents—Kolly Bros., 22 Summit Street.
Office Hours—From 7 in the morning till 9 at night.
Medical Examiners—Drs. Samuel S. Thorn and T. J. Eaton Toledo, O. [1871]

H. M. EDSON,

A. TERRY.

EDSON & TERRY,
DENTISTS,

ROOMS 8 & 9 GRADOLPH BLOCK,

TOLEDO, OHIO.

ap16 1v

IMPORTER

Fine Chemicals, Drugs, and Toilet Articles.

Brandies, Wines & Liquors for medicinal purposes only. Also Proprietor of

Toledo Tonic Bitters,

Greatest Remedy known for general debility.

L. E. MULFORD,

23 Summit Street, Corner Perry, Toledo, Ohio
18-1y

THE CELEBRATED
CRAIG
MICROSCOPE

is an optical wonder; reveals thousands of the hidden Wonders of Nature; is of permanent use and practical availability, combining instruction with amusement, and never losing its interest. It magnifies

TEN THOUSAND TIMES,

a power equal to other Microscopes of many times its cost. Reveals countless little worlds all around us, teeming with life, which to the naked eye must forever remain a sealed book—as Bees in Vinegar, Animals in Water, Cheese Mites, Sugar and Itch Insects, Milk Globules, Claws and Hairs of Insects, Hundreds of eyes in single eye of a Fly, Dust of a Butterfly's Wings to be perfectly formed Feathers, the much talked of Trichina Spiralis, or Pork Worm, which was first discovered in America with this Microscope.

It is of infinite value to professional men, to teachers, and to students, but NOWHERE IS IT OF GREATER VALUE THAN AT THE FAMILY TABLE, within the reach of every member. It will delight yourself, your children, and your friends during the long winter evenings. It will show you adulterations or uncleanness of various kinds in food, as sugar, tea, bread, meat, etc.

It is of Inestimable Value to the Farmer in examining insects which prey upon his crops. The power of a $50 Microscope, and so simple in its construction that any child can use it understandingly, and with appreciation.

A Beautiful Present—Elegant, Instructive, Amusing, and Cheap. Over 60,000 sold.

During the past six years its worth has been testified by thousands of Scientific Men, Farmers, School Teachers, Students, Physicians, Heads of Families, and others.

PRICE, $3.00—Sent by Mail Post paid.

Every instrument is neatly boxed, and handsomely labelled with full directions for use. Thousands have been sent by mail. Address, W. J. LINESS & CO., CHICAGO.

FREE! FREE!

"THE MICROSCOPE," a Monthly Journal of Information for the People—the mysteries of Nature explained—interesting information on the wonders of Creation—stories, sketches, etc. Terms $1.00 per year. This Journal will be sent FREE for one year to any one purchasing a Craig Microscope at the regular price, $3.00. (Craig Microscope will be sent post-paid.) For sample copy, and our beautifully illustrated and descriptive circulars, and eight pages of testimonials of Craig Microscope, send six cents for postage to

W. J. LINESS & CO.,

Opticians, and Sole Proprietors of Craig and Novelty Microscope, CHICAGO, ILL.

AGENTS and DEALERS, this Microscope sells in every family on its merits, when exhibited. LARGE PROFITS. Send for terms. 331:6

A NEW RADICAL BOOK.

"Origin and Development of Religious Ideas and Beliefs,"

As Manifested in History and Seen by Reason.

By MORRIS EINSTEIN.

For sale at the office of the Boston Investigator, 84 Washington St., Boston, or by the Author, Titusville, Pa.

PRICE, - - - $1.50,
64-78

or Cincinnati, O.

65-77

A Few More Agents Wanted For
THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD

A new religious work of unsurpassed interest and value. For terms, address W. FLINT & CO., No. 26 S. 7th St., Philadelphia, 5 Custom House Place, Chicago, and 176 West 4th Street, Cincinnati. 65-77

COLE'S FIRST PRIZE BAKING POWDER.

The Best in the Market.

One trial only asked. Same price as the common kinds.

Sample sent free on Application.

63-75.

ALEX. COLE, BUFFALO, N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED--($225 A MONTH.) BY THE
Machine Co., BOSTON, MASS., or ST. LOUIS, MO. 66-68

Mr. Frothingham's New Book.

CHILD'S BOOK OF RELIGION, for Sunday Schools and Homes. PART I., Worship; PART II., The Good Life; PART III., Truth. In one Volume. New and revised edition. Forwarded free on receipt of $1.00.

55-68

DAVID G. FRANCIS,
17 Astor Place, New York.

THE FIRST VOLUME OF THE RADICAL.

Persons wishing to complete their sets of THE RADICAL by adding the FIRST VOLUME, which has been for some time out of print, can do so by at once sending me their orders. By reprinting this volume in part, I can supply 100 copies. To be able to do this, I am obliged to fix the price at $5.00. This will secure a copy, sent to any address post paid.

Volume 2, 3, 4, and 5, will be sent, post paid, for $3.50 each. Single copies of THE RADICAL 35 cts.

The May number contains Mr. Wasson's review of Mr. Abbot's Religion.

The June number contains Mr. Frothingham's article on "What is Religion for?"

Address S. H. MORSE, office of "The Radical," Boston, Mass.

WANTED--AGENTS, ($20 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock-stitch" (alike on both sides, and is fully licensed). The best and cheapest Family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Boston, Mass., Pittsburg, Pa., Chicago, Ill. or St. Louis, Mo. 88y1

THE HERALD OF HEALTH.

In the November number of THE HERALD OF HEALTH, we shall commence a series of articles upon the Temperance Movement. The series will embrace ten or twelve papers and continue during a considerable portion of the year 1871. The most important of the following subjects will be discussed:

Significance of the Temperance Movement.
The Effects of the use of Intoxicating Drinks on the Body, the Brain, and the Blood.
Its Effects on Offspring.
Its Effects on Religion.
Its Effects on Literature.
Its Effects on National Integrity (including Politics)
Moderate Drinking.
The Wine Question.
Mistakes of Temperance Reformers.
Total Abstinence.
Alcoholic Medication.
Relation of the use of Intoxicating Drinks to Poverty and Crime.

Restricting the Sale of Alcoholic Beverages.
Ministers and the Temperance Reform.
Physicians and the Temperance Reform.
Moral Responsibility of Liquor Dealers.
How best to Promote the Cause of Temperance.
The list of writers who will furnish this series will be from among our best thinkers and most earnest reformers. The first paper, on the "Significance of the Temperance Movement," will be by O. B. Frothingham, whose pen has often graced our pages. He puts the subject on the highest moral and intellectual grounds, and we are sure that his article will give great satisfaction.

The object of these papers is to do some honest, earnest work in a cause dear to so many hearts. Our friends will, we hope, help to spread the HERALDS containing these articles. Those who will secure for us new subscribers for 1871 at $2.00, may promise the October, November and December numbers free. By this means they will secure the entire series, which otherwise they would not.

WOOD & HOLBROOK, Publishers,
13 & 15 Light St., New York.

63-66

The Index.

VOL. 2.—No. 13.

TOLEDO, OHIO, APRIL 1, 1871.

WHOLE No. 66.

The Index,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, OHIO.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.

OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Editorial Contributors.

RELIGION AND SCIENCE.

F. E. ABBOT:

My Dear Sir,—Thy kind and generous notice of my remarks has deeply stirred the emotions of my spirit, producing feelings of sweetness and increased brotherly love. That we may clearly understand each other, and that no misunderstanding may obtain on the part of others, let me here say, that my criticism of the "Modern Principle" was not predicated on an apprehension that thou wast not a believer in God. Far from it. But on what appeared to me the tendency and results of propositions and postulates which I deemed hurtful and untenable. I had not forgot that in previous numbers of THE INDEX were implied and distinct avowals of thy belief in Deity, as in the present article. But I could not help noticing, then as now, what seemed to me a deficiency, the failure to make the recognition of God the great primary Principle, indispensable to a perfect or approximate human development, indispensable to a large philanthropy, to absolute morals and religion, and to a true civilization.

In examining the "Modern Principles," I took them on their own merits, basing my objections on the inferences naturally deducible from them. I remembered, too, that the first of the Fifty Affirmations, which asserts that "Religion is the effort of man to perfect himself," had always appeared to me objectionable, as conveying in its natural and obvious import the idea that man has within himself, as constituent of his being, independent of Divine aid or illumination, all that is necessary not only to put him in possession of religion, but to perfect him in every excellence of which his nature is capable. And while Affirmation forty expresses a great and glorious truth, viz: that "the great peace of Free Religion (I would say, true religion) is spiritual oneness with the infinite One," I perceive nothing in the whole fifty leading to a different conclusion than that all this is attainable by the unassisted action of the human faculties.

It has long been a cherished view with me, that REASON—meaning by the term the combined action of all our intellectual and spiritual faculties—reveals nothing; that it is the recipient of inspiration and revelation, not the revealer; that its high office is to examine and judge of all that is revealed according to Divinely ordained laws, in both the universe of matter and the universe of mind. I deem that the all-wise and loving Parent has not isolated his children, by conferring on them self-sufficiency; but having made them for communion with himself, it is their glory to be ever dependent on him for guidance and direction. Hence, I was naturally jealous of any views implying such self-sufficiency.

Since reading thy notice of my remarks, I have made a further scrutiny of thy views, as elaborated and unfolded in thy other published articles, and in particular in thy discourse on Free Religion in No.

three of last year's issue of THE INDEX, in which I find them more full and definite on the points in question than any I have met with; and I am happy to say that in most of their aspects they are highly satisfactory. Accepting them as exponents of the "Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," it is pretty evident that some of my inferences are not warranted by the premises, at least as intended by thee. If so, may not my mistake be chargeable to want of care in wording them? Basic propositions and principles should admit of but one meaning.

Some of the passages in the discourse mentioned, and in thy response to my former article, I propose now to notice. And while there will be much in which we agree, it is possible that points of difference of some moment may be found between us. I begin with thy more enlarged definition of religion, viz: "Religion, taken in its essence, is man's obedience to something within him which ever impels him upward to the Better. Divers names have been given to this something in man,—conscience, the ideal, the moral sense, the inner light, the Holy Spirit, the grace of God, and countless names besides. I care not what name is applied to it; he is religious who obeys this impulse to the better, and no one is so who does not obey it. This aspiration and endeavor after perfection,—this unconquerable resolve to reach upwards,—this hungering and thirsting after ideal good,—is the very essence and central verity of all religion. The rational theist believes it to be the life of God in the human soul; the atheist believes it to be the result of impersonal forces and laws. But theist and atheist, so far as they aspire and strive to realize their own highest ideal, are religious men. It was one and the same spirit that dwelt in the heart of Fenelon, the saintly Catholic, and Holyoake, the saintly Atheist. It is this pursuit of the Ideal, this honest endeavor to realize it in character and life, which constitutes the soul of religion."

Save one or two adjuncts following it, I heartily agree with thy definition of religion. It has the merit that it does not leave man to his unassisted faculties, but requires his "obedience to something within him"—inner light, Holy Spirit, or grace of God—"which propels him upward," &c. I cannot say with thee, "I care not what name is applied to it." The idea entertained on this point, as a practical fact, is in my views far from being unimportant. Let me ask thee, my friend, has not the "rational theist" whose ideal is infinite God, vastly the advantage, in a practical point of view, over the "atheist" whose ideal is mere "forces and laws," regarding the origin of which he has no belief? The first has the sanction of omnipresent, all-comprehending Wisdom, Goodness, and Power, to warm his soul and energize his actions, while the second has a bare ideal of "forces and laws," without the recognition of any living mover or law-giver, to energize and propel him to act. It is because of the inadequacy of a bare ideal to make man and society what they should be, that I define religion to be the tie which binds the finite to the Infinite.

Let us look at the two next sentences. "But theist and atheist, so far as they aspire and strive to realize their own highest ideal, are religious men." Now religion, in the legitimate meaning of the term, it seems to me, necessarily implies the existence of God. Had the conception of such an existence never presented itself to the human mind, I apprehend no word expressive of the idea ever could have existed. That persons claiming to be atheists may exhibit in practice works which are the legitimate fruits of religion, even beyond many who make high profession of it, I can very readily believe. Their skepticism does not place them beyond Divine influence. They feel the sentiment of goodness which flows into their spiritual and moral nature from the everlasting Fountain, and, like others, they feel better and happier in its exercise, though they may not recognize the source whence it comes. Of such it may be said, "They are not far from the kingdom of God." I doubt, however, if such a person as a really intelligent and thorough atheist can be found. I can readily admit, too, that "it was one and the same spirit that dwelt in the heart of Fenelon, the saintly Catholic, and Holyoake, the saintly atheist;" for that infinite presence is "over all, through all, and in all." And if humanity and works of justice and goodness abounded in each, and were paralleled in each—of which, however, I am uninformed—they are of course attributable to the same cause. We have a similar remarkable example in the person of the venerable Robert Owen of near Lanark, in Scotland—the father of the present Robert Dale Owen—who, as I understood, had for the greater part of his life, perhaps 60 or 70 years, thought himself an atheist, yet meanwhile spared neither time nor money in endeavors to benefit his fellow-beings. Hearing of the reported facts of what is called "modera spiritualism," he felt impelled to inform himself on the subject, with the design of exposing it as a pernicious superstition. But after a careful examination of facts which came under his own observation, he was convinced of his error, and published a careful circumstantial statement of his change of sentiment. Now as to the philanthropy and virtues exhibited by Holyoake and Owen, while unbelievers in Deity and continued existence, I think Theodore Parker somewhere says, that some men are so naturally good, that they seem to have been born aborigines of heaven. Supposing this to have been their case, that so finely were they organized, mentally and physically, that they could be saints without piety, and religious without adoration (!), they must be regarded as exceptions to the general rule. The argument is none the less valid in regard to the mass of the human family, that a recognition of God and immortality are mighty auxiliaries in the promotion of the higher virtues and affections—in short, of every thing that can permanently minister to human brotherhood and spiritual unity.

I will now address myself to some of the points in thy answer to my article. I agree with thee that society needs "natural organization—an organization on the basis of reverence for the individual, and, as a necessary condition of this, the organization of human thought on the basis of truth and right." And "that mankind to-day need nothing so much as a true intellectual system." And now the inquiry presents itself, How are these objects to be secured? I answer, By the introduction into society of correct views of the Divine and human natures, and of man's relations and duties. To give force and definiteness to this proposition, the solution of a few important questions is necessary.

First, what are correct views of the Divine nature? I answer, the recognition of God's infiniteness in all speakable and unspeakable perfections; the recognition that he is infinite in Wisdom, Goodness, Power;—in Justice, Mercy, Love, Truth, Fidelity and Holiness.

Second. What are correct views of human nature? I answer, that man, in the faculties of his soul or spiritual nature, is a finite transcript of the infinite Divine nature. Others may verbally differ in their answers to this question, but the likeness of man in the higher elements of his being to the properties of the Divine Being, seems to be required by fact and experience.

Next, what relation does man stand in to God? God is the Infinite Parent, man the dependent child, who owes his existence, and all the blessings of that existence, to the Divine Parent. God being infinitely perfect and therefore complete in happiness within himself, I can conceive of no other motive in the creation of conscious intelligent man, but to make him a partaker of his own blessedness. And all God's infinite perfections conspire to affirm that he endowed man with a nature precisely adapted to the participation of the happiness intended for him. His immortality is guaranteed to him by the capability with which he is endowed to contemplate being without end, and the desire which, in the contemplation of the vast idea, spontaneously wells up in him from the deepest depths of his nature, to be made the possessor of that eternal life; and by the horror with which he shrinks from the thought of annihilation. So the fact of man's immortality rests on the immovable basis of the existence and perfections of God, who could not, consistently with those perfections, have given to him such capacities, desires and hopes, only to be cruelly disappointed. Hence the truth of the aphorism,—"If man is not immortal, God's not just." But such an event is not possible in a government of infinite Love and Power; and would form an anomaly to all the analogies of nature, which exhibits no superfluity in her mechanism.

By reason of man's likeness to God in the properties of his nature, there exists an inter-communion of the Divine and human natures. God can give and man can receive, all that his nature requires, individually and socially—Wisdom, Love, Power. Individually, to bind and unite him to God; socially, to bind and unite him to his fellowmen.

First, individually, the consciousness of his relation to God-ward. He feels love and reverence poured into his soul and expanding it in affection to the author and sustainer of life. He feels his obligation to do God's will. He feels the impulse of worship, filling his soul with thanksgiving and praise. He feels the impulse of prayer for the continuance of the love that has blessed him, and for preservation in obedience to the Divine will—to the laws of his soul and body, so far as he has perceived them. God needs not man's love or reverence; but man needs to love and reverence God. God needs not man's worship or prayers, but man needs to worship and pray: not that God is or can be changed, or made more loving and benevolent by any of these, but because, when they are the sincere out-gush of the soul, they help man to a condition of nearness and unison with God—a condition of fitness to receive the inflowing of the Divine nature—the light, the life, and love of God. What man needs is a state of fitness to receive truth and goodness. That state existing, the supply from Omnipresent God can never fail. God needs not man's obedience, but obedience to the laws of his being is the one and only condition of man's enjoyment of the measure of happiness of which, in the present stage of being, his nature is capable. Hence the beneficent arrangement of the Creator, that every violation of law, physical or mental, brings its appropriate penalty of praise or remorse, that all may "learn obedience by the things they suffer." All is done for man's sake; not from any ulterior object outside of the Divine benevolence.

"God is paid when man receives,—
To enjoy is to obey."

Second. Socially—man's relation and his duties to his fellow men. If by reason of man's likeness to God there exists an inter-communion, sublime and beautiful, by which man receives a supply for the aspirations and wants of his high and imperishable nature, so his likeness to man, his identity, in the constituent elements of his being, with universal humanity, brings with it an inter-communion broad and beautiful, in the right exercise of which his happiness is most intimately involved. Children of our common Parent, with like natures and wants, he has made them, as social beings, mutually dependent on each other for the exercise of those beneficent offices which the supply of their wants requires. The necessity of these offices, in the various relations of life, is apparent to all, and their fulfillment comprises the duty of man to man. To facilitate the performance of these duties, he has conferred on the race, as inherent in their being, common feelings, sympathies, and affections, and has written, in characters of living light, on the tablet of the soul, his own Law of Love. By obedience to this law, as it operates on the Divinely adjusted principles of his nature, man loves his fellow man with God's love, as it is poured into his being from the eternal Fountain. The beautiful ends of life, in this mundane sphere, are attained—unity and fellowship grow and flourish in their own congenial soil, provided by the great Husbandman. Selfishness, the bane of human society, cannot grow in that soil. But without obedience to this law of love, the principles of man's nature unfailingly become deranged and perverted. Selfishness takes the place of philanthropy,—and the language of the selfishly enslaved is, "Let the world wag—I will take care of myself and my own." These are the sad results of a want of correct views of the Divine character, and of human relations and duties. The latter are the natural sequences of the former.

I am persuaded that, in all periods of human history, and among all nations and peoples, nothing has been so prejudicial to human welfare and social happiness, so fruitful of misery and cruelty, persecution and oppressions, as false views of religion, in association, as they have ever been, with ignorance—the want of intellectual culture. It seems to be a principle applicable to all the relations of life that the best things, when perverted, become the greatest evils, that is, causes of the greatest suffering and anguish. The history of the race demonstrates that this has been eminently the case in respect to religion. Even intellectual culture, when not associated with truth in the department of religion and morals, forms no exception to the general fact. The religious is one of the strongest elements in man's nature. Hence the indispensableness, in all our efforts to bring about a true "social system," that, while not neglecting education in natural science and general knowledge, every accessible mind be richly imbued with correct ideas of God, and our relations to God, in connection with our relations and duties to our fellow-beings,—as conditions precedent to the realization of that "true unity and fellowship" for which the noblest men and women are earnestly yearning." Without the existence in the human consciousness of those eternal and immutable principles which are recognized by all religions as attributes and perfections of Deity,—such as Wisdom, Power, Goodness, Justice, Mercy, Truth, Benevolence, &c.,—where shall we find the materials for the construction of a perfect intellectual system? Where shall we find the materials by which a permanent unity and fellowship and a "homogeneous civilization can be built up," and a world-wide religion established? Are not these the principles, and the only principles, which, being inherently unchangeable, and in harmony with both the Divine and human natures, can be universally recognized?—and which are in perfect adaptation to human progress in the unfolding of "new truths."

In the conception of Deity there is one fact of primary importance—God's INFINITENESS, IN ALL DIVINE AND GLORIOUS PERFECTIONS. To what but the want of an intelligent recognition of this sublime truth, in the earlier ages of the human race, and the prevailing ignorance in regard to the character and immensity of the external universe, are we to attribute the puerilities, errors, and absurdities which abound in the Hebrew Scriptures, in regard to the six days' creation; God's possession of the characteristics of finite men, deciding to do things, then changing his mind; delighted with the smell of burning flesh (Gen. 8. 21.); placing a "bow in the cloud" that he might not forget a covenant he had made (9. 16.); often manifesting the worst passions of men, in being jealous, wrathful and vindictive, and commanding the most horrid cruelties; in short, the anthropomorphism that runs through the Pentateuch and most of the books of the Old Testament, and some traces of which appear in the New? Had the great truth of God's infiniteness been recognized and fixed in men's minds, would the idea of multitudinous Deities, and the worship of dumb Idols, ever have obtained in the world? Men must have been almost incapable of reasoning, not to have seen that there can be but ONE INFINITE. And even now, were the fact of God's infiniteness in every attribute and perfection intelligently accepted by professors of Christianity, and not obscured by prejudice and foreign conclusions, and views of religion false as they are unworthy of God, their dogmas of trinity, original sin, and vicarious atonement, would pass away like the darkness of night before the beautiful beams of the Monarch of day.

And now, my friend, let us look at another portion of thy remarks: "The kind of intellectual unity which the world wants . . . is like that which science is creating in our knowledge of outward nature." "All points of belief as such must be scientifically determined." "Whoever has read our essays and editorials the last year should know that we do believe in God—that we think science will ultimately justify this belief in God." Why not say, We think science does justify this belief, in strict fidelity to its own methods, and that in this conviction we find our deepest joy? Not, as it now stands, that the justification by science of the belief and the conviction that yields thee the deepest joy are both postponed, at the option of some phase of science, to an indefinite period! The former, it seems to me, would have been the true ground, and the ground I should have expected thee to be prepared to take. Is it possible thy belief in God has no scientific basis? I can't believe it. Let us look at this matter. What is science, in the simple and natural import of the term, but knowledge of what is, in the mighty universe of matter and mind,—the knowledge of the properties, relations, and uses of things, and the laws by which they are governed. And as the domain to be investigated is vast in extent, beyond our powers of examination, we can "know" but "in part" and "prophesy" or tell, but in part. In the physical department, a pebble, a plant, an animal, a world, or some portion of the countless host of worlds, bounds our science. But still an immense and interesting field lies before us, in which, even here in the material realm, the spiritual takes precedence, by right and inherent authority.

In the physical department, the phenomena of matter, however numerous and wonderful, without mind to recognize and apply them, express nothing, and can by no possibility constitute any part of science. "Outward nature," therefore, in the attainment of science, is but the instrument and servant of the soul or spiritual nature, and could no more, by any power of its own, build up a structure of "intellectual unity," without the cognition and action of the soul, than it could build up a structure of stone or wood without the direction of the soul. It has neither thought, volition, nor action, but is wholly the passive instrument of spirit. But the soul is a positive entity, a conscious intelligent existence in itself—consciously intelligent and intelligently conscious—acting in virtue of its own properties, without matter or by and with matter. Mind is palpably a higher order of existence than matter. Scientifically, matter in all its manifestations and phenomena is dependent on mind, ("that for which a thing is such, the thing itself is more such") but the soul is dependent on its own principles and the facts of consciousness. Spiritual evidences addressed immediately to the soul, such as those relating to the being and perfections of God, are therefore a higher species of evidence, and as such more certain than evidences which come through the bodily senses. But the soul being the recipient of the evidences in both cases, each is relatively certain in conformity to "its own methods"—always supposing that the body and mind be in a healthy condition, and the points of view be well taken.

In all examinations regarding the facts of the external universe, the trust-worthiness of the senses must be admitted, or vain and worthless would be all our investigations. The same remark applies equally to the facts which lie within the spiritual domain. "The truth of the human faculties must be assumed in all arguments, and if this be admitted, we have the same evidence for spiritual facts as for the maxims or the demonstrations of geometry." (Theodore Parker.) "The idea of God is a fact given by man's nature, and not an invention or device of ours. The belief of God's existence, therefore, is natural, and not against nature. It comes unavoidably from the legitimate action of reason and the religious sentiment, just as the belief in light comes from using our eyes, and belief in our existence from men existing. The knowledge of God's existence, therefore, may be called an INTUITION OF REASON, in the language of Philosophy; or a REVELATION FROM GOD, in the language of the elder Theology." Again: "The existence of the religious element,—a sense of dependence, the sentiment of something without bounds, is itself a proof by implication of the existence of its object, something on which dependence rests. A belief in this relation between the feeling in us and its object independent of us, comes unavoidably from the laws of man's nature. There is nothing of which we can be more certain. A natural want in man's constitution implies satisfaction in some quarter, just as the faculty of seeing implies objects to be seen and a medium of light to see by." Here, then, in the action of the principles of our minds, in the facts of our consciousness, are the legitimate and only possible scientific evidence of the existence of Infinite God. I say only possible evidence, for I have shown that all evidence from the external realm comes to us only by reason of the action of our minds. Mind therefore stands at the head of all evidence, and in its own realm, abstracted from the external system of things, furnishes the highest and most conclusive evidence on this sublime and momentous subject, which true science cannot but justify, "in strict fidelity to its own methods." But this is not all. We have her sanctions as well, in the almost limitless evidences which come to us through outward nature. Nature may be said to be the garment in which God wraps himself; and hence our privilege to "look through nature to nature's God," and the rational delight with which we exercise that privilege, and the comfort we may derive from this source, if by any untoward circumstances our faith in the strictly mental evidences has become weak or wavering.

Another point presents itself in which, on scientific principles, as thou wilt see by the preceding course of reasoning, my views take issue with thine. "To say that science must govern the future belief of mankind, is not to dogmatize, but to state a universal principle or method of investigation. To say that science must teach a belief in God would be indeed to dogmatize." I ask, would it be any more to dogmatize, to say that science does teach a belief in God, than it would be to say, in reference to the solar system, that science teaches that the sun is the centre and that the earth and the other planets, in their respective orbits, revolve around the sun? Certainly not. Science vouches for both, on the principles proper and applicable to each. The facts of the latter are demonstrated by telescopic observation, geometry and kindred sciences, which mind uses. The former—a belief in God—is demonstrated by spiritual evidences, flowing from the Fountain of light and truth, addressed immediately to the conscious intelligent soul. And in addition, by all the evidences which astronomy and every department of outward nature furnish, of power, wisdom, design, and perfect adaptations, which nothing but a self-conscious, infinite Intelligence could adjust and arrange.

Look for a moment at that admirable structure, the human body, its various organs and their functions precisely fitted to design and use. The telescopic eye, with its lenses, and mirror behind them to receive the images of objects transmitted from the external world. The ear with its nicely contrived tympanum, essential to vocal-communication, and to receive the music of the human voice, and of nature's own Æolian harp, and the sweet sounds of humanly devised instruments. The sense of smell, to distinguish things appropriate to that organ, and by which we perceive the fragrance of luscious fruits, and are refreshed by the delightful perfume of flowers. The taste, so important to us, the sense of feeling, and the exquisite arrangement of it at the ends of the fingers, without which we could not pick up a pin!—the brain, with its two hemispheres and system of nerves running throughout every part of the body, through which man transmits his will-power and performs every voluntary action. Behold another wonder of design!—a system of involuntary nerves, by the action of which the blood courses through the body, and the heart and lungs perform their office—an action without which man were not, and by the cessation of which for a few minutes his earthly career would end—an action alike necessary sleeping or waking, and therefore not left to the control of man's will, but the will of the Divine Author. Here, again, it is to be noted, as of all phenomena pertaining to the eternal realm, that without intelligent mind to recognize and appreciate them, they would be no evidences at all.

Do the materialistic tendencies of any portion of imperfectly developed humanity call in question the force of abstract homogeneous mental evidences, in the realm of spiritual existence, let us bear in mind, it is but a few years since the facts in astronomy to which I have adverted were scouted, by men too filling high social and ecclesiastical positions, and a man burned at the stake for asserting them. And as to "drawing out a creed," spoken of, can there be any legitimate objection to creeds, if they embrace only universal and unchangeable principles, in harmony with the self-evident properties of the Divine and human natures, and the demonstrated facts of science? The objection to creeds, and that which constitutes the bad sense of the word, is that in general they are largely made up of merely hypothetical dogmas, in conflict with the properties and perfections of Infinite God, and those intellectual and spiritual faculties implanted in us by the Author of Being for the investigation and knowledge of truth.

I come now to some positions and explanations, which I notice with some reluctance. After stating thy belief in God as a conviction that affords thee thy deepest joy, in the latter part of thy article thou expresseth thyself in these beautiful and touching words: "The more we think and feel, the longer we live, so much the more do we believe in God. Science, as we understand it, but confirms our idea of him: the experience of life but intensifies our need of him." Now let me ask thee, with all deference, how I shall harmonize this with the following passages:—"Dear to us as is the great thought of God, the thought of loyalty to truth is still dearer, . . . and if loyalty to truth should ever demand that we surrender the thought of infinite and self-conscious Being, we mean still to be loyal to truth." The subjunctive mood implies the possibility of such a contingency, but surely thou wouldst not soberly admit that such an alternative can ever occur, while the universe stands and man exists. Again: "If science can ever prove that in all this lovely universe there is no infinite Love, farewell to many a bright hope and secret joy; but we shall find no despair where truth is. There will still be left the grand possibility of faithfulness to truth, duty and virtue. If that is all, so be it. That is at least much. And if God be truth, duty, virtue, he must at least exist so long as one human heart is left to glow with deep, passionate love for these." Why, my dear friend, take INFINITE LOVE (God and all his perfections), from the universe, and all certainty and stability would be gone forever. "Truth, duty, and virtue, would be idle words." "The serpent of Fate would coil himself about the All of things, and crush it in his remorseless grasp." A universe without a God!—a state of universal orphanage—no Father, no sustainer, no protector—man would be left to wander up and down through a trackless desert, seeking rest and finding none. But true science, instinct with God, as he is revealed in the universe of mind and matter, teaches a very different doctrine. A doctrine which turns faith into knowledge. A faith which feels God's love poured in living streams into the soul, harmonizing and exalting every faculty, and going out in fraternal love to universal humanity. The existence of God is the great CENTRAL TRUTH on which all other truths depend. It will outlive all skepticism, growing brighter and brighter in men's minds as human development progresses. Let no one fear or doubt. In the Divine administration—as the great and good Theodore Parker said, in a letter to a friend of mine—"Every thing is insured against ultimate shipwreck at the office of the infinite God. His hand is endorsed on all that is."

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

In what remains of the notice, I heartily accord with most of the sentiments expressed. On one or two points, I would like to say a word further. But the length of this article forbids. On the whole, it appears, I think, that we differ in our philosophy of reform, as to the mode of procedure and the means to be employed in the accomplishment of the great ends in view—practical goodness, and human fraternity and unity. And we differ somewhat materially—do we not?—as to the importance of the recognition of Deity in the attainment of the momentous objects to be achieved. At all events, thy philosophy begins at the merely moral, human end, working up towards Deity as a desirable possible ultimate. Mine goes all along the line, using every moral sentiment and every human impulse and affection, whatever be their origin in the opinions of mankind, yet making the recognition of a God of infinite perfection the most potent fact in giving efficiency and a right direction to the principles of man's nature, and indispensable to a perfect and permanent condition of human society.

With sincere regard, thy friend,

THOS. MCCLINTOCK.

PHILADELPHIA, 3 mo. 10, 1871.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[From the Toledo Blade.]

TOLEDO, March 10, 1871.

The undersigned request you to name the time, during the present month, when you will deliver in Toledo a course of three lectures on the subjects of Free Religion and Theology.

To Mr. Parker Pillsbury.

J. M. Ritchie,	E. P. Bassett,
A. Stephan,	H. L. Holloway,
O. White,	J. S. Norton,
A. E. Macomber,	Wm. Kraus,
Richard Mott,	C. Cone,
E. D. Moore,	T. M. Cook,
J. W. Scott,	Frank J. Scott,
M. I. Wilcox,	H. E. Howe,
C. Auchard,	F. E. Abbot,
E. Bissell,	Allen T. Stebbins,
Geo. Stebbins,	Guido Marx.

INDIANAPOLIS, March 16, 1871.

MESSRS. E. P. BASSETT, J. M. RITCHIE, ESQs., AND OTHERS.

Gentlemen:—I am truly honored by your letter. I shall gratefully accede to your proposal, though profoundly sensible of the responsibility it involves, both as respects the highly intelligent audience assured by the eminent names associated in my letter of invitation, and more especially the seriousness, the solemnity, indeed, of the subjects you ask me to present.

But supported by my own conscious rectitude of purpose to learn and to teach the highest, divinest truth revealed to or attainable by the human soul, and that only; and trusting that you will look charitably on my imperfections, I will go cheerfully to the work proposed; commencing on Tuesday evening, 28th inst., if that be agreeable.

Engagements already made will prevent my second lecture earlier than Sunday evening, April 2, or if preferred, the second and third lectures may be given on Monday and Tuesday, third and fourth of April.

With sentiment of sincerest respect, I am, gentlemen,

Very truly yours,

PARKER PILLSBURY.

The Rhine vintage for 1870 is a failure. German superstition avers that every year written with a cipher at the end is a fatal one for the vintage. The wine of 1860 was anathematized under the epithet of "Garibaldi," and that of 1870 will doubtless be cursed in the name of "Napoleon."

—"If all the subscribers to THE INDEX were so remiss in renewing their subscriptions as I have been, your bank account, I fear, would present a very unsatisfactory appearance. Such, I trust, is not the case, for I most heartily wish the greatest measure of success, not only to THE INDEX as the advocate and herald of a broader liberty, a truer religion, and a sounder morality for mankind, but also to its bold and fearless founder, who has embarked, almost single-handed, in a crusade far more formidable than that of Peter the hermit. The mixed offspring of the ancient mythologies, nursed for centuries in monasteries and fed upon the superstitions of all ages and all peoples, waxed strong and grew into such a monster that even science, with its positive and demonstrable proofs, can only gain ground slowly and inch by inch against it. True, Galileo and his followers have thrown the light of a thousand shining worlds into the dark cavern of this dragon; Martin Luther launched a missile against him, more dangerous than the ink-stand he hurled at the devil—that is, if anything can be more dangerous to error than an ink-stand properly used; Geology has piled mountains against it, yet today it is a hydra with many heads, some of them bruised, it is true, but filled with the same animus as of old, to smother and crush out freedom of thought and of speech, wherever it exists. Nearly a hundred years ago our forefathers were wise enough to divorce religion from politics and frame a constitution without a confession of faith; now we learn that this was a great mistake, and if we would be happy and prosperous, like France and Spain and Italy, we must spice our political pottage with a pinch or two of orthodox theology. Will the pious reformers succeed? If so, then may we not expect that the President who is in pinafores today will be a 'defender of the faith' for the dominant orthodoxy of the next generation? But I have no right to inflict a letter upon you, for you no doubt have quite too many of them. Let me only add that I enclose two dollars for THE INDEX for 1871, and with best wishes for success in your labors."

—"I have just finished reading the fifty-third number of THE INDEX. I trust I am none the worse—I hope I may be the better for it. I am conscious that, should I live fully up to its teaching, I should be radically improved by it. I was born and bred within the surroundings of Church influence. Still live in sight and sound of three orthodox churches. Have contributed, more or less, my mite to build them all, and have contributed to the support of one or more of them ever since, notwithstanding the stigma of infidelity has been resting on me the last fifteen years. Recently (and more particularly since I commenced reading THE INDEX), the propriety of my course has frequently rose in my mind, and as often reason has admonished me of the inconsistency of it. Some six months since I came to the conclusion that I was probably paying my last direct tax to the Church. Therefore the probabilities are that henceforth my contributions (though small they may be) will be to some cause more congenial to my convictions of right, than the popular priest-ridden institutions of the day. I send the following [five] names and addresses as subscribers, together with the funds for one year's subscription for each."

—"I have tried to get you some subscribers hereabouts, but have not succeeded. People don't love to think in unaccustomed channels much. One case that I met, it might be interesting to mention. It was a man who is quite a reader, and something of a thinker, after a fashion. He is very much preoccupied with the Bible, the prophecies particularly, in which he finds the present attitude of the nations of the earth, the existing European war, railroads, &c., clearly portrayed. I lent him some numbers of THE INDEX, and heard from time to time that he was much interested in them. Your 'Fifty Affirmations' he had believed for twenty-five years (?), &c., &c. A short time ago I called on him, and asked if he would not like to subscribe for the paper. He spoke up readily, saying, 'No, for to tell you the truth, although you will probably laugh at it, that editor is not far enough advanced for me.' If I laughed, I did it inwardly. As I left with my papers, he incidentally remarked that, if there was anything really good and strong said in the future numbers, he should like very much the privilege of seeing them."

—"I am confronted in my arguments against Christianity by the opponent in debate that Christianity did not wage the war against philosophy and science, but only the ignorant classes in those times. If the church has been and is corrupt, and not Christianity, then it might be said that Democracy is pure but the party corrupt, Republicanism is pure and the party corrupt, and so forth. If so, then why belong to a church? I hear the epithet 'Infidel' frequently. Please deliver a discourse on this word. I ask, infidelity to what? Please give a discourse on 'Total Depravity,' or 'Depravity.'" —"Will you please send me a specimen copy of THE INDEX? If it suits my views, I think I can secure several subscribers, as we are heartily disgusted with orthodox cant."

—"The bound volume of THE INDEX came to hand in good time and in good shape. I am very much pleased with the same, and hope that you will continue to bind as many volumes each year, or as many as its numerous subscribers and friends may desire. It will, with me, be quite an object to secure each year a bound volume of THE INDEX. Were I not a farmer, I might aid its circulation, and help the same more than I do. But I intend to grow up to the mark as far as is possible under the circumstances. Most of our farmers here are very ignorant, and full of superstitious ideas. They have so long been looking for what they imagine Divine authority, that they have but little faith in themselves. I want a dime's worth of those 'Modern Principles,' or rather 'Truths for the Times.' I will make them useful towards letting light into some of the darkened and obscured souls that are in need of it, as also useful to myself. I never want to forget that I am in need of light, as well as others. Send on the 'Truths.'"

—"Much joy to you and yours at this season. I hope you get on faster with your cause in Toledo than I do with mine here—that you are no more unpopular. Not that either of us is to set up complaint. I am somewhat encouraged to feel that my day of usefulness is not quite over, since I am still the subject of severe remark and criticism. I regard our movement still in the gristle, not yet meat or bone. (You may be cruel enough to suggest—just like all the Unitarian efforts; but don't you judge too hastily.) By the way, I met—and his wife at Kansas City last Winter. He is a persevering fellow, formerly an editor, I believe, thoughtful, courageous, a good speaker withal, effective of manner, and calculated to do good. So I was glad of your notice."

—"I do not expect to largely benefit by the perusal of your paper, because you will doubtless write for a class of readers not so thoroughly emancipated from the superstitions of the past centuries as I am; yet if I can aid you in the least in pulling or casting down some of these old idols, I shall feel abundantly compensated for this small contribution."

—"I cannot do without your paper. I have felt the need of it so much since it has quit coming. Please forward the back numbers immediately, and oblige an interested reader."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—Regular meetings of this Society will be held during the winter on Sunday forenoons, at 10½ o'clock, in Daniels' Block, corner of Jefferson and Summit Streets, in the hall over the U. S. Express Office. The public are cordially invited.

FREE LECTURES.—By special invitation of many citizens of Toledo, Mr. PARKER PILLSBURY will deliver three lectures on Free Religion in the above-mentioned Hall on March 28 and April 2 and 3. The correspondence on the subject will be found in another column.

RECEIVED.

A SECULAR VIEW OF RELIGION IN THE STATE, and the Bible in the Public Schools. By E. P. HURLBUT, formerly a Judge of the Supreme Court of the State of New York; author of "Essays on Human Rights," etc. Albany, N. Y.: JOEL MUNSELL. 1870. pp 55.

SIXTEENTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE Board of Directors of the St. Louis Public Schools, for the Year ending August 1, 1870. [Abstract of]. St. Louis, Mo.: PLATE, OLSHAUSEN & Co. 1871. pp 32.

THE RELIGIOUS WEAKNESS OF PROTESTANTISM. By FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, Emeritus Professor of University College, London, and formerly Fellow of Balliol College, Oxford. Published by THOMAS SCOTT, Mount Pleasant, Ramsgate. 1866. pp 45.

IT INJURES OUR BUSINESS, and, CHOOSE THE GOOD, REJECT THE EVIL—radical tracts by CHARLES K. WHIPPLE, 43 Bowdoin St., Boston. Four for Ten Cents.

LETTER FROM GERRIT SMITH ON TEMPERANCE. To the Thoughtful and Candid of the County of Madison.

THE WEST POINT MOB. By GERRIT SMITH.

THE RADICAL, Published Monthly. April, 1871. Boston: Office of Publication 25 Bromfield St. 1871. Price $3.00 a Year. Single Numbers 30 cents.

THE EXAMINER, A Monthly Review of Religious and Humane Questions, and of Literature. April, 1871. Rev. EDWARD C. TOWNE, Editor. Chicago: THE WESTERN NEWS COMPANY, 121 & 123 State St. Price $4.00 a Year. Single Numbers 50 cents.

THE HERALD OF HEALTH and Journal of Physical Culture. Advocates a Higher Type of Manhood, Physical, Intellectual, and Moral. April, 1871. New York: Wood & Holbrook, Publishers, 13 & 15 Lighthouse St. Price $2.00 a year.

THE CATHOLIC WORLD. A Monthly Magazine of General Literature and Science. April, 1871. New York: CATHOLIC PUBLICATION HOUSE, 9 Warren St. Price $5.00 a Year.

DER FREIDENKER. Monatschrift fuer Volksausklaerung, Religion, Wissenschaft und Kunst. Maerz, 1871. Inhalt: Wer ist Freidenker? Aberglaube; Religion; Panerismus und Arbeit; Sonntag. Herausgegeben von Dr. FR. LEISS. New York: Office, No. 57 Broadway. [$2.00 a Year. Single Numbers 20 Cents.]

PETERS' MUSICAL MONTHLY. April, 1871. J. L. PETERS, Publisher, 529 Broadway, New York. Price $3.00 a Year.

Poetry.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

THE PEASANT TO THE LADY.

Pass on thy gentle way, sweet saint,
Holy and pure as angels are!
Through manhood's clouds, now clear, now faint,
Soft streams the light of childhood's star.
Still, still I watch the eternal spheres,
And faith is born of hopeless tears.

Pass on, pass on! thy maiden hand
Unconscious dropped the immortal seed,
And lily leaves of love expand,
From every stain of passion freed;
Tears fall and kiss each petal fair,
And every drop enshrines a prayer.

Pass on, pass on! my skies are hoar,
I travel on through wastes of snow;
Yet still in dreams I seek once more
That strange, bright land of long ago,—
Still, still I watch thee from afar,
My Morning and my Evening Star!

1860.

ASTERISK.

The Index.

APRIL 1, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

Contributors are requested to write on only one side of each sheet.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

INDUCEMENTS.—We would invite the special attention of our friends who cannot afford to give their services gratuitously in getting subscribers for THE INDEX, to the very liberal Cash Premiums offered in our Prospectus for 1871.

Whoever collects $150.00 for 75 subscriptions, is authorized to retain $50.00, forwarding $100.00.

Whoever collects $100.00 for 50 subscriptions, is authorized to retain $25.00, forwarding $75.00; and so on.

Now it cannot be very difficult, in a town of any considerable size, to get twelve subscriptions a day for one week, if the agent uses ordinary business energy. Yet he would be paid about $8.00 a day—as much as his representative in Congress receives for work not always, we fear, so useful!

"A word to the wise." Who will canvass for THE INDEX, and at the same time earn as much as the Hon. Mr. ———? Send for "Truths for the Times," and begin at once.

"TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES, OR REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX"—is the title of a neatly-printed tract of sixteen pages published by THE INDEX Association, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. One Hundred Copies will be sent for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate—one cent a copy. Packages will be sent free to those who will circulate them, but are unable to pay for them. Here is an excellent means of helping the cause of Free Religion and THE INDEX as an organ of it. Friends of Freedom, send for as many copies as you can use, and do your part in awakening an interest in ideas worthy of American institutions and the higher civilization of the future.

The opening essay of this week's INDEX is by Mr. Thomas M'Clintock, of Philadelphia; and we depart in this instance from our custom of declining long communications because we think the subject is very important and ably handled. Next week we shall probably make a brief reply. Mr. M'Clintock presents some of the objections brought by thinkers of the intuitional school against the opinions of our late Boston lecture; and we recommend his article to the attention of all who take an interest in the issue between intuitionalism and science.

"INFIDELS" AND "INFIDELITY."

Zealous "evangelical" people take a peculiar pleasure, apparently, in calling all those who choose to do their own thinking "infidels." The epithet is a sweet morsel under their tongues. It has a delicious flavor of brimstone about it, suggestive of the future of those to whom it is applied. In fact, crying—"infidel, infidel,"—is a species of profane swearing. It is the nearest approach to cursing which is quite decorous in persons of super-eminent sanctity. It hints at damnation without directly imprecating it.

Not long ago, our honey-tongued contemporary, Zion's Herald, was at some pains to prove (we regret the article is not at hand for quotation) that "Free Religion" is "infidelity," and that "Free Religionists" are cowards and hypocrites not to avow themselves "infidels." There was a consciousness of superior holiness running through the article which was edifying in the extreme, and could not have failed to produce "conviction of sin" in any offender less hardened than THE INDEX. As it was, THE INDEX was guilty of a few insubordinate thoughts on the occasion. The musket was well aimed; but the powder flashed in the pan. The bird was not winged.

There are many free-thinkers who boldly accept the epithet as a badge of honor, and wear it in public. They regard it as expressive of free thought alone—of disbelief in mouldy and maggoty dogmas which it is a positive luxury to crunch between their teeth, as some persons take a stern joy in masticating inhabited cheese. If the name simply meant "non-Christian," as some think, it would be less difficult to tell who are the "infidels." There could then be no doubt in our mind that Zion's Herald was right. But its righteousness is not so blazingly visible.

To be sure, if it is any comfort to the Herald or any other bilious paper to call us by the name in question, we beg it by no means to desist. The epithet has been so long and unremittingly shot at us, that we have positively lost all sensation under the discharge. It does not even titillate, as seems to be the case with our free-thinking friends above mentioned. Being absolutely without either pain or pleasure under the flight of missiles, and being obliged to confess ourself in a hopelessly pachydermatous condition, we trust that Zion's Herald will not unstring its bow from motives of misguided philanthropy, or forego for a moment the luxury of evangelical sportsmanship. Exercise is good for dyspeptics.

But if any one inquires whether THE INDEX regards itself as "infidel," the answer will be a quiet no. The reason is this.

The classical meaning of the Latin infidelis, from which the English "infidel" is derived, is untrustworthy, unfaithful, faithless. Its meaning in ecclesiastical Latin is unbelieving or disbelieving. This change of meaning is not without significance. It points to a characteristic of Christianity not to be overlooked in this connection, namely, the fundamental Christian assumption that belief is a moral duty, and unbelief a violation of moral duty. To believe in Jesus is the great Christian obligation binding on all mankind, to disregard which is to incur justly the punishment due to moral faithlessness. That is the theory behind the word "infidel," which is unconsciously endorsed by him who accepts the name. One cannot be unfaithful where he owes no faith; he cannot be an "infidel" where he owes no fidelity. The really offensive thing in the application of the word is the moral accusation it carries; and this moral accusation goes openly or covertly with all its various uses.

Now while we are perfectly willing to avow our disbelief of the entire Christian scheme, we do not choose to admit—what is false—that this scheme makes a just claim on our acceptance. We make no such unguarded concession. We reject scheme and claim together. We owe no faith, no fealty, no fidelity to Jesus the Christ. These we owe to truth and goodness, to freedom, justice, love, to our own soul, to humanity, to the Infinite Reality. Infidelity is faithlessness to that which ought to be obeyed—and to that alone. Those radicals who are proud of the name "infidel" unconsciously endorse the worst part of Christianity,—its claim as rightful sovereign over human thought and life. The word they ought to prize, for the sake of the thing it stands for, is not "infidelity" but FIDELITY. Free-thinker, radical, liberal, rationalist, non-Christian, what you please; but "infidel"—never! "Infidel," like "rebel," implies treachery or disobedience to a rightful authority; and no lover of truth or freedom is either. It is the bigot and the sectary, hurling the epithet, that are the real "infidels"—infidel to kindness and justice, freedom and fellowship, charity and modesty and human rights. In the name of the higher, let us deny the lower, and plant our feet on fidelity to eternal laws. No matter by what epithet miscalled, fidelity, and not infidelity, should be the word uttered by our daily lives.

We find the following excellent and forcible statement by Mr. Alger, of Boston, in the Liberal Christian:—

"Rev. Mr. Alger, in treating of the doctrine of future punishment, gives the following significant warning to our Orthodox friends, who shrink from the full logical consequences of their creed, and who yet think to hold in some substantial way to their theological system as a whole: 'but they should beware ere they repudiate the literal horrors of the historic Orthodox doctrine for any figurative and moral views accommodated to the advanced reason and refinement of the time—beware how such an abandonment of a part of their system affects the rest. Give up the material fire, and you lose the bodily resurrection. Renounce the bodily resurrection, and away goes the visible coming of Christ to a general judgment. Abandon the general judgment, and the climatic completion of the church-scheme of redemption is wanting. Mar the whole of the redemption plan, and farewell to the incarnation and vicarious atonement. Neglect the vicarious atonement, and down crumbles the hollow and broken shell of the popular theology helplessly into its grave.'"

Our Unitarian contemporary approves this argument against liberal Orthodoxy. But it equally "shrinks from the full logical consequences" of its own creed. To give up the notions of a visible "second coming of Christ" and a "general judgment" eviscerates the gospel, and leads logically to the entire rejection of the favorite Unitarian doctrine that "Jesus is the Christ." In fact, the Unitarians are even more illogical than the "liberal orthodox;" for they surrender still more of the Christian scheme, yet cling to the Christian confession as a downing man does to a straw. How is it possible that a rational being could write the following editorial words, and yet persist in retaining the foundation of Christianity after rejecting all the superstructure?—

"Calvinism is relentlessly logical. Grant that its premises are true, and the rest of the system is legitimated and must be assented to. Discredit and reject any one portion of the compact and nicely adjusted whole, and the entire work is fatally broken and disintegrated."

Is not the Messiahship of Jesus a part of Calvinism? Does not the Liberal Christian reject Calvinism, declaring that the rejection of a part is logically the rejection of the whole? Yet does it not accept the Messiahship of Jesus?

Nothing is more painful than to see a man cutting a ridiculous figure in public; but of all the ridiculous figures ever cut on the theological platform, we have never seen one quite so ridiculous as that of Unitarian Christianity. The only relief to our excoriated feelings is the sublime unconsciousness of the actor.

STANDING SQUARELY OUTSIDE OF CHRISTIANITY.

"To reject the Christian name necessarily implies a contempt for Jesus and his religion."

Does any one recognize the above sentence? Is it not printed in the columns of THE INDEX, Vol. 1, No. 1? In view of the current criticism upon Mr. Abbot's estimate of the Christian religion and the Christian name, the question is pertinent.

But let us turn to the first number of THE INDEX and read for ourselves.

"Standing squarely outside of Christianity, THE INDEX will aim to be just to it, recognizing its excellences, noting its defects."

"To reject the Christian name does not necessarily mean to despise either Jesus or his religion."

The truth is, a large number of the opponents to Free Religion do not know and do not care to know anything about it beyond the fact that the term does not necessarily involve the Christian faith. It is enough for them to know that a man can refuse to bow the knee to their Messiah. This is the unpardonable sin.

Mr. Abbot's announcement was no new thing; he made no discovery. A score of names might be mentioned, of men who have pronounced upon the inadequacy of Christianity as a universal religion, and declared their indifference as to whether they were called Christian or Heathen. The distinction between them and Mr. Abbot, however, is marked. They have been indifferent as to the name; he has uttered a protest at once clear and unmistakable. They have been content to submit their thought to minds of their own stamp, to men and women of liberal ideas and culture. They have shot over the heads of every one under six feet in intellectual height; their teaching has been esoteric; their personality has not been felt; they lack the aggressive element.

Far be it from me to disparage or undervalue scholarly work in matters of reform. I read with profound regret the sneer bestowed upon it by Wendell Phillips. Without it society would be swamped by ignorance, cunning and pretentious folly. Such men as Emerson and Wasson furnish the balance-wheel in reform movements. They cast their bread upon the waters with abiding faith. The growth of civilization is indicated quite as much by theoretical as by practical development. Indeed the one precedes the other.

What this class of reformers lacks, Mr. Abbot in his treatment of religion has supplied. He is aggressive; he preaches to the multitude.

The Boston Radical Club has discussed the meaning of the term Christian in such a way as to lead one to suppose that the Church never had an existence in this country, or, if it had, that its adherents were an insignificant, ignorant minority, unworthy of notice. Radicals declare themselves Christians in the sense that they are Americans; and we are gravely told that Christianity has nothing to do with the worship of Jesus, or with the salvation scheme and its concomitant doctrines.

A few theorists may persuade themselves that only the grossly ignorant attach value to these things; they may construct a religion and label it Christianity, putting new wine into old bottles; but they only deceive themselves.

Go into the street and ask the question,—"what do you mean by Christianity?" and ninety-nine out of one hundred people will repeat to you the orthodox creed. Now Mr. Abbot has gone into the street; he has accepted the popular definition; he recognizes the fact that, whatever may be its historical import, the word Christian is today the symbol of a superstitious allegiance to the person of Jesus; and with a logical precision that reminds one of Garrison, he defines his position. He stands squarely outside of Christianity. The axe is laid at the trunk of the sectarian tree. The value of such directness can be appreciated by noting its effect. Such a firing of big guns and popping of side-arms has not been heard since Theodore Parker startled the Christian Church into a sense of its insecurity. Orthodox bigots howl, timid Unitarians shrink back in dismay, and sentimental Liberals hasten to disavow. The attitude of Church and clergy toward him is Mr. Abbot's sufficient vindication; and Free Religion takes a step forward.

R. P. H.

ANOTHER WORD ON DOUBT.

"Yes!" said a friend, "you Radicals are nothing but doubters. You don't seem to believe anything, except that it is wise to doubt everything. I wonder if you don't even doubt you doubt? As for me, I believe as Mrs. Stowe says in 'My Wife and I'—that 'the way to get rid of doubts in religion is to go to work with all our might and practise what we don't doubt; and that you can do, whatever your calling or profession.'"

True, said I, we ought to "practise" what we don't doubt; but does that rid you of doubt? I knew that few men practised more and at the same time doubted more than he; the remedy he prescribed for others I knew and he knew did not work with him. If doubt were something akin to a disease, chronic and incurable, then I agreed with him that his was the best treatment. What we can't cure we must endure, and if we must endure, we shall stupefy our consciousness of pain by any soporific; if work will relieve you, then up and at it with all your might!

But I assured him that one thing I believed was, that doubt was not a disease, but that generally it was a healthy symptom of mental growth and progress. The great mistake which the church has made has been in regarding doubt as a disease; a kind of religious miasma that infects with its poison whatever steps outside the charmed circle of authority. The church, in order to keep off this dreaded plague, has had her guarantees of "thus far and no farther," and all sorts of paper blockades and disinfectants; but, despite her vigilance and precaution, doubt would get in occasionally to endanger the spiritual sanity of her children. It was a desperate disease, and required a desperate remedy. When men like Bruno, Savonarola, Servetus or John Rogers were attacked by this terrible contagion of doubt, the church thought that the surest remedy was to burn their bodies, and, as they vainly hoped, the pestilence with them. The argument that the church then used was a clincher. It was well put in the words of St. Louis,—“A man ought never to dispute with a misbeliever, except with his sword, which he ought to drive into the heretic's entrails as far as he could.” This was an opiate that was very effective with the individual.

But the modern church has abandoned these cold steel and hot fire remedies, and resorted to what may be called the New School treatment, namely, medicated baths and soothing syrups. It doesn't attempt to relieve you of doubt, as formerly, by chopping off your head, but gently pats you on the head and says,—“Come, come, my dear fellow, let us go to work! The way to get rid of your doubts is to practise what you don't doubt. Here! dish out this soup for that poor, hungry woman, or take that ragged, fatherless boy to the orphan's home. Drown your doubts with your cups of cold water.”

Now I freely admit that all this work of love and charity is excellent. Radicals cannot well do too much of it. Most of us, I fear, ought to do more. I am willing to confess it for myself. I believe in works of the hand, but I believe in head-work, too. I believe neither hand nor head should flinch or shirk duty. If doubt comes in your way and looms up like a mountain before you, then dig and dig until you get a Mt. Ceniz tunnel right through it, and not throw down your pick and cry,—“what's the use, boys? Let us go back home and join some Benevolent Society, etc.”

Benevolent Societies are good in their way, and it is a noble way; but when they become the refuge of despairing minds, then the age of intellectual decline has begun. I will join your charity unions with all my heart, but I cannot with all my mind. To practise what you don't doubt is good,—good as an end always, and good as a means, when it becomes a safety-valve or balance-wheel to the high-pressure mind; but when the church makes work the scape-goat to carry off mental doubts, then the hour of her decadence has begun. She may continue to breed excellent nurses and hospital stewards, but she cannot bring forth strong-minded men. It is true, that “all work and no play makes Jack a dull boy,” and no less true that all work and no thought will do the same,—though the Jack should be a St. John. No doubt this gentle way of hushing the inquiring spirit is far more agreeable than the old method, but it may be no less fatal to intellectual progress. To cry, “never mind, never mind,” will end in never mind or no mind. It betrays, too, a consciousness of weakness and inward fear. It reminds one of the “practice” of certain savages who, to banish their fears during an eclipse, raise such a hullabaloo with shouts and sounding brass that they cannot hear themselves think—or of timid boys, who “whistle up their courage” when passing a ghostly graveyard.

Mr. Froude has observed the same spirit in England. He says:—“The ritualist conceals his misgivings from his own eyes by the passion with which he flings himself into his work. . . . He buries his head in his vestments. He is vehement upon doctrinal minutiae, as if only these were at stake. He clutches at the curtains of mediæval theology to hide his eyes from the lightning which is blinding him. His efforts are vain. His own convictions are undermined in spite of him. Only the Germans, only those who have played no tricks with their souls and have carried out boldly the spirit of the Reformation, are meeting the future with courage and manliness, and retain their faith in the living reality while the outward forms are passing away."

That is what we must do—meet all questions with courage and manliness. I can bear my own doubts as I can my sins, and I ask for no "Savior" to shoulder them. The practice of calling on work to bear your burden shows, not faith, but the want of it. Those men are the men of faith as well as doubt, who do not flinch in grappling with any problem. They may not have faith in what you consider the essentials, but they do have faith in themselves; faith in their own powers to discover what truth is good for them to know; faith in the uniformity and universality of the laws of the Universe; faith that we can think God's thoughts after him; faith that God has not hidden any truth from us forever, but only put it so deep that the sweat of the brow may sweeten the meal. It is this kind of faith and courage that we need. Then we shall not "fly the track," or patch up a truce with our doubts, or lullaby them to sleep by the nursery song of "work, work," but shall meet our doubts fairly and squarely in open field, and conquer them as the Past has done. So let us practise what we don't doubt, and master what we do doubt.

W. H. S.

The following paragraph will show that The Radical continues to publish valuable articles, which should be read by all desirous of keeping abreast with the times:—

"The Radical" for April will attract the attention of scholars and thinkers, as it will contain a paper of great length by Francis Gerry Fairfield on "The New Philosophy, in which Mill, Huxley, Spencer and Bain are critically considered as the Exponents of Modern English Thought. The "Conversations" of Goethe and Mueller, translated by C. C. Shackford, and now running through the monthly numbers of this magazine, are highly spoken of. T. W. Higginson contributes to the May issue of "The Radical" a number of "Unpublished letters from Theodore Parker."

The Syracuse Radical Club has republished in tract form Rev. Samuel J. May's excellent article in the Liberal Christian on the "Presbyterian Confession of Faith." By full quotations from the authorized "Confession and Catechism," it shows that Presbyterianism still professes belief in the most abominable features of Calvinism. It is a useful tract to give to those semi-modernized orthodox believers who declare that orthodoxy does not teach such monstrous dogmas. Price $1.25 per hundred. Apply to Mr. H. L. Green, Syracuse, N. Y.

"GOLD AND NAME," by Marie Sophie Schwartz, the Swedish novelist, is translated by Selma Borg and Marie A. Brown into idiomatic and generally very correct English. The story is well conceived, and rarely flags in interest. It evinces no small power of characterization, and individualizes the various personages with an unusual degree of self-consistency. The book is well printed in octavo form by Lee & Shepard, Boston.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

QUESTIONINGS.

CARPENTERSVILLE, ILL., Feb. 19, 1871.

F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—Of all the liberal papers published, I consider THE INDEX one of the foremost. I think your position on the religious question is very sound, as far as I can understand it; but will you permit me to ask you a question or two?

Do you believe in a personal God, in prayer, and a special interposition of Providence? Thomas Barlow intimates, in his communication, that you advocate some kind of theology. If so, what are your ideas of Deity, and why your conclusion? I hope you will not consider me impudent, but I wish for light. I want honest and experienced men's views.

I do not endorse Christianity, nor even religion, as those terms are commonly understood. Like Col. Higginson, I believe in calling things by their right names, that we may not be misunderstood by the mass.

I deny Christianity because I do not believe in its dogmas, creeds, worship, &c. For the same or similar reasons, I deny religion. If I say I am a Religionist (without a qualification), I am misunderstood. I believe our whole duty is of this earth, our obligation to our fellow man; and if that is fulfilled, what comes after will be all right. To give an odd illustration, I will quote Franklin:—"Take care of the pence, and the pounds will take care of themselves."

S. DOOLITTLE.

[Nothing could be less "impudent" than the above manly letter. But we cannot answer such questions in a brief note, so as to be understood. Not to evade, however, we reply that we believe in God as Infinite Intelligence, but not as person in the common conception of personality; that we believe in prayer as adoration, but not as beggary; that we believe in wise, universal laws of Nature, but not in "special providences;" and that we accept the word religion because we cannot get along without it, though it is, like all words, used in different senses.—ED.]

"LET JESUS REST."

LOCKPORT, N. Y., March 10, 1871.

MR. EDITOR:—

I think your paper is destined to do good and to awaken thought. But while I find here and there a new idea, something as fresh and inspiring as new and free, I find column after column loaded with the old hackneyed themes and theories that have been preached about for the last two thousand years. For instance, this everlasting talk about Jesus and his teachings frequently constitutes the leading articles of many of your papers, that only add to the ten thousand times ten thousand different changes that have been rung out to the world upon this mythical person and his reputed sayings. Now I for one do not care to hear this, and I honestly believe that I speak the sentiments of nine-tenths of your readers on this subject. Who are they in all Christendom that have not been taught "Christ and him crucified" from their infancy up? There is not a person in this country who can not in five minutes' walk on Sunday hear a lecture on Jesus after any kind of pattern he chooses, from the mother-church of Rome down to her latest-born protesting daughter. What is the utility of repeating all this? It is very well known that there is no positive proof that such a being as Jesus of the New Testament ever existed; and I challenge any person to produce anything in the form of evidence on this subject that is worth a moment's consideration. The whole story of his conception,—his mother's visit to her cousin Elizabeth, and the incidents related in connection with it, his birth, the vision of angels singing to the shepherds in the night,—is as unworthy of belief as any one of Mother Goose's melodies; and I here say that there is not one single rite or ceremony, not one single form of expression used in the worship of Jesus in our Christian churches, that has not its origin in some one of the so-called heathen ceremonies, and in the worship of the gods that were adored long before the hap-hazard date of the advent of the mythical Jesus. I know that R. H. Howard's hermit in his cabin in the lonely glen testifies that the story of Jesus is true, because "he feels him in his soul." Any old heathen will say the same thing with respect to the carved stick which he has worshipped all his life as his God. There is no connected and well defined system, either of morality or religion, taught by Jesus; his reputed sayings, experiences and acts are a heterogeneous mass of good, bad, indifferent and doubtful precepts, and so indefinite that they have given rise to a legion of religious sects who have cursed the world with oppression, cruelties, persecution and death, and still tear each other like ravenous wolves. If I had the space, I should like very much to analyze some of the sayings of Jesus. Many of them are very beautiful, and have been a comfort and a solace to thousands bowed down with grief and despair, helpless and forsaken. Others again seem repulsive, hard and harsh, and awaken very little of the better part of human nature. Many accounts of his dealings with the devil, the history of the temptation, the story of the drowning swine, seem very much like fairy tales, and appear fitted only to amuse credulous children. But I forbear pursuing this subject any farther, and will close by asking if you do not think it would be much more useful and interesting to get altogether out of the old ruts and traces that have been travelled over so long, and take humanity as we find it today, its capacities and capabilities, as a foundation to build upon, and rear a structure where all can find a pathway to happiness by fully understanding and obeying the laws which govern their physical and spiritual being? The practice of this is true worship, and leads to happiness and the brotherhood of humanity.

ISAAC ALLEN.

[The main object of THE INDEX, as expressed in the standing statement on its first page, necessarily involves considerable discussion of Jesus and the Christian religion in general; and to exclude all such discussion from our pages would simply be to change the entire purpose of the paper. In our opinion, it does much good to treat these subjects in the bold, direct manner which we are so glad to recognize in the articles of our occasional correspondents. In fact, Mr. Allen's vigorous communication is itself a proof that in one way or another these topics still retain their freshness. When the public interest in them is all gone, we shall cease to receive articles bearing on them.—ED.]

A WORD ON THE OTHER SIDE.

FORT MADISON, IOWA, March 14, 1871.

ED. INDEX:—

You are pruning away many useless twigs and parasites from the fair plant of Christianity, to the advantage of mankind. But in striving to cut up the roots of the tree, you manifest a zeal with which I do not sympathize.

I have recently read the sermon of Dr. Powers and your response to the same. Allow me to except briefly to some of your positions.

1. You regard Free Religion as founded on self-respect and on the love of humanity for humanity's own sake. And you deem Christianity to be founded on self-humiliation, and the love of man for Christ's sake.

I would say, rather, that in Christianity self-respect and humility are reconciled. I rejoice in the mental and moral powers with which God has endowed our race, indicating a destiny far grander than aught which we can imagine. Yet, as an individual, I am humbled by a sense of inferiority to my own highest ideals, and especially to Christ. Yet only the lowly aspire to "the heights."

2. You consider, I infer, that Christ commands man to love his neighbor, mainly for his own (Christ's) sake.

Christ's occasional appeal to the sentiment of personal attachment which his disciples so strongly felt was by no means exclusive nor incompatible with other incentives to benevolence. Every religious teacher naturally appeals to that class of motives which are likely to be most influential at the special time, place and circumstances in which he finds himself. But if I thought that Christ urged loving of our neighbors chiefly upon his own account, I should appeal to his example as better than his precept. Christ indisputably, I suppose, loved man as man, and not for his own (Christ's) sake. In order to understand his opinions, let us consider his deeds and the general drift of his utterances.

3. Again, you state that leaders are only requisite for common-place men.

But, my dear sir, that epithet characterizes the masses of mankind. And "followers," you say, "are not followed." Yet Socinus and Luther and the Christian Theodore Parker are followed.

With much respect yours,

D.

[1. In an essay entitled "The Humility of Free Religion," in THE INDEX No. 35, we showed (or tried to show) that true humility and true independence can meet only in one who depends on no external authority—therefore in no consistent Christian. We would refer to that essay for a reply to the first point made above.

2. Jesus did, we think, love man as man; and we see no reason to regard him as himself a Christian. But if he practised Free Religion in this respect, he preached Christianity when he said—"Whoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only in the name of a disciple [much more, then, in the name of the Master], verily I say unto you, he shall in no wise lose his reward." Free Religion would prompt to give the water in the name of the little one that needed it; and would forget to say anything about a "reward." If the life of Jesus was nobler than his religion, that is surely no argument for his religion.

3. We must admit that, so long as the man-worship of Christianity is the popular faith, the majority of men are indeed "common-place." But we meant no more reproach than would be implied in saying that men are mostly children in their religion.

Socinus, Luther, and Theodore Parker began to get followers, when they themselves stopped following and dared to innovate. Who would have ever heard of them, if they had continued to follow?—ED.]

HUXLEY—SPONTANEOUS GENERATION.

"K. N." says (INDEX, Dec. 31) that he cannot conceive the possibility of the conversion of inorganic or unconscious matter into conscious matter; and thinks that Huxley is illogical in supposing that such a conversion could take place at any period of the earth's history. Huxley believes that reason, in questions on the origin of things, cannot deduce any satisfactory answers; and as to experience on the subject, he says,—"Belief in a scientific sense of the word is a serious matter and needs strong foundations. . . . I find no record of the commencement of life, and I am therefore devoid of any means of forming a definite conclusion as to the condition of its appearance. . . . I think it would be the height of presumption for any man to say that the conditions under which matter assumes the property we call 'vital' may not some day be artificially brought together. . . . I see no reason for believing that the feat has been performed yet."

Huxley's "philosophical faith," that, if he "could look back through the prodigious vista of the past, he should be a witness of the evolution of protoplasm from non-living matter," is not shared by Mr. Wallace. Partly from his conception of atoms as minute solid bodies which do not touch each other, he cannot conceive the possibility of inorganic, unintelligent matter becoming intelligent matter. In his essay on "Natural Selection applied to Man," he says that he can comprehend the possibility of the phenomena of vegetable life being due to the extreme complexity and instability of molecular combinations of matter under the stimuli of certain forces; but, he says, it is impossible to believe that however far such combinations may be carried out, any consciousness can originate from any combination of molecules or groups of molecules. It is impossible, he says, to believe that the addition of one or of a thousand unconscious material molecules, can produce a self-conscious existence. To say that mind is a product of protoplasm, or of its molecular changes, is to use words to which we can attach no meaning.

His convictions are stated more fully in his review of Murphy's "Habit and Intelligence in connection with Matter and Force." Murphy supposes that there is an indwelling creative force in Nature working to a definite end, and realizing a definite structural plan. He says that the Creator has not separately organized every structure, but has endowed vitalized matter with intelligence under the guidance of which matter organized itself. He also says, that the unconscious intelligence that directs the formation of the bodily structures is the same intelligence that becomes conscious in the mind; and that there is a gradation from perfectly unconscious to perfectly conscious intelligence.

Wallace says, in opposition to Murphy, that he cannot conceive the possibility of his theory. Either all matter lives, or is conscious; or consciousness is distinct from matter. The latter, he says, is a more easily conceivable theory, and it is not necessarily incapable of proof. Wallace's theory is that there are various grades of conscious and personal intelligences at work guiding the forces of matter and mind for their purposes as man guides them for his.

I am of opinion that it is as easy to conceive that all matter lives or is conscious, as is perhaps indicated by its motions, as to conceive that consciousness is distinct from matter; and this opinion is expressed by Bayle, who says that Epicurus spoiled his atomic system by not retaining the doctrine of Democritus touching the soul of atoms. If, says Bayle, we suppose that atoms have a soul, or are animated, we may easily conceive that their several combinations form divers species of animals, divers manners of sensation, and divers combinations of thought, we may thereby shelter the atomic system of Epicurus from the thundering objections of Galen. I may also cite Cudworth as a supporter of that doctrine, as being more conceivable than the doctrine of Descartes, who supposed consciousness to be distinct from matter. Cudworth adopted the atomic physiology of Democritus, and made use of it to refute the Cartesians, who maintained that beasts were mere machines, had no souls, and were pushed or directed in what they do; and that God is the immediate agent in all generation and all perception. Cudworth supposed that there are plastic and vital natures, immaterial substances, endowed with a power of forming plants and animals without knowing what they do. This gave Bayle the opportunity of stating that, instead of refuting Atheism, which was the main object of Cudworth in his "Intellectual System," he had deprived the Natural Theologians of the most sensible argument for the being of a Supreme Intelligence. If, said Bayle, there are plastic natures having the power of organizing animals without knowing what they do, then the atheists may retort that the world was produced without the operation of an intelligent cause; for as Cudworth argued that unintelligent immaterialities formed all the existences and produced the admirable structure, order, and symmetry observed in the world, why may not they be the Unconditioned Primary Cause? What need to go behind them for another quite unknown cause?

I do not assert that living matter has eternally existed, or that the notion of an "Azoic Period" of the earth's history is a blunder of the geologists. I say only, the testimony to it is now an inference from Astronomy, not from Geology; and while the past eternity of the human species is not affirmed by any paleontologist, I can refer to one, De Blainville, who affirmed that the human species were among the earliest organized beings, as he said there has been but a "single and simultaneous creation." The gradual series of beings, complete at the moment of creation, subsequently "becomes incomplete in proportion as species perish by slow and ordinary causes" (see Flourens' "Memoir of De Blainville"); and I say that this, from the destructive conditions besetting terrestrial organisms and from the hindrances attending geological research, geology cannot disprove.

Respectfully,

JOHN CHAPPELLESMITH.

NEW HARMONY, Ind., Jan. 23, 1871.

ESCAPING FROM PRISON.

TIPPECANOE CITY, O., Feb. 27, 1871.

MR. ABBOT:

Sir,—Through the kindness of a friend I have been favored with the reading of a few numbers of your paper. The sentiments advanced and the objects advocated so far surpass those of Trinitarianism, that my heart leaps for joy in view of this star that has arisen, setting forth the reasonableness of freedom of thought, as a moving power in all that pertains to the dignity and prosperity of a nation. I am an apostate from the faith of my progenitors—all my early life having been embittered with the constant struggle of trying to accept as truth the (to me) horrid doctrines of the Calvinistic school. I was urged into the communion of the church at the age of eleven, with the accompanying assurance that with the discharge of this imperative duty all doubts would be removed, and an evidence of my acceptance would fill my soul with joy unspeakable. After years of watching and looking for this unspeakable joy, I resolved to extricate myself from this worse than Egyptian bondage, and think for myself. That resolve gives date to my real existence, as all prior to that had been a parasite-existence, a desperate effort to believe as taught.

The voice of nature is for freedom; and why should man's faculties be circumscribed by man? When and where did the idea of bondage and tyranny take root? Other species than man use the powers provided by Nature as suits their taste and convenience. The bird soars when and where it pleases; if he thinks a more southern clime will contribute to his comfort, he is under no necessity of consulting his superiors or inferiors. No objections are raised, no inquisition is invented to crop its wings and make it an object of dependence and sadness, when it was made to perch high or low, and fill the air with its melody. Why should we be put under the microscope and have every feeling mutilated, until we dare not give expression to our own thoughts, but are forced to accept in all silence and submission those of others? The opinions we may honestly entertain are made null and void, and we might as well have no mind, since our volition must be in subordination to another; and these intrusions have become a law not soon to be repealed unless "the man of sin" (which I take to be the usurpation of authority in matters of opinion) be put away, and his strongholds battered down by an enlightened public sentiment. If this result cannot be reached, we may look for a reign of terror equal to any the world has ever seen. Lives devoted to the most chaste and worthy objects, hands that are ready for every good work, are sacrificed in the honor of sectarian interests; which interests are to keep the largest number possible in ignorance of their own rights, that this Jungernaut or priesthood may remain in power. Many of noble aspirations are so fettered and bound that they dare not give expression to their own ideas.

With these views I rejoice in the efforts of the Free Religious Association and in the efforts of individuals, one and all, to bring into consideration the rights of humanity, exposing the assumed rights of those claiming to be "watchmen placed upon the walls of Zion,"

MRS. L. REYNOLDS.

BROKEN FETTERS.

ED. INDEX:—A kind and liberal friend has directed a copy of your paper to be sent to my address.

Truly am I rejoiced that men are learning to think for themselves without the aid of priests or books. I was reared under the "droppings of the sanctuary" by parents who did not dare to question the grim and terrible dogmas of the orthodox creed.

Verily was my soul encompassed with terrors, and my days and nights were full of bitterness.

In my dreams I stood trembling before the awful "judgment-seat of Christ," fearing to hear the dreadful sentence,—"Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels." for it was God I feared, and not Satan.

Thus my childish days, which should have been filled and brightened with God's sunshine, were clouded with the black darkness of a horrible theology.

Who more than I should hail with joy unspeakable the progress of "Free Thought" and "Free Religion," that will eventually dispel the clouds of ignorance and superstition?

That the cause of Truth may prosper, is the sincere wish of your friend and well-wisher.

C. L. MORGAN.

SYLVESTER, Greene Co., Wis.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Nature's Gifts, SCIENTIFICALLY DEVELOPED.

As mankind, from indiscretion or other causes, have been doomed to suffer from disease, so also has remedy for disease been provided. Our hills and valleys abound with roots and herbs, which if scientifically prepared and compounded, will restore health and vigor to the invalid. To find such a remedy we should seek one that has stood the test of age.

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

A
Sure Cure for Liver Complaint, Sure Cure for Dyspepsia, Sure Cure for Debility, Sure Cure for Jaundice, Sure Cure for Marasmus, And all affections arising from weakness or want of action in the Liver or Digestive Organs. The great remedy for

IMPURE BLOOD,
And all diseases arising from it. The great preventive of

FEVER AND AGUE!
It is an impossibility for any one to have fever and ague, if they will use a few bottles of this remedy each spring and fall.

$100 $100 $100
Will be given for any case of this disease that occurs to any one that uses the Bitters or Tonic as a preventive.

Those who have the Fever and Ague will find, after the chills have stopped, that by using a few bottles of the Bitters or Tonic, the disease will not return.

These remedies will rebuild their Constitution faster than any other known remedy.

The remedies were placed before the public thirty years ago, with all the prejudices of so-called "patent medicine" operating against them, but gradually their virtues became known, and now, to day, they stand at the head of all preparations of their class, with the indorsement of eminent judges, lawyers, clergymen and physicians.

Read the following symptoms and if you find that your system is affected by any of them, you may rest assured that disease has commenced its attack on the most important organs of your body, and unless soon checked by the use of powerful remedies, a miserable life, soon terminating in death, will be the result.

II

Constipation, Flatulence, Inward Piles, Fullness of Blood to the Head, Disgust for the Stomach, Nausea, Heartburn, Disgust for Food, Fullness or Weight in the Stomach, Sour Eructations, Sinking or Fluttering at the Pit of the Stomach, Swimming of the Head, Hurried or Difficult Breathing, Fluttering at the Heart, Choking or Suffocating Sensations when in a lying posture, Dimness of Vision, Dots or Webs before the Sight, Dull Pain in the Head, Deficiency of Perspiration, Yellowness of the Skin and Eyes, Pain in the Side, Back, Chest, Limbs, etc., Sudden Flushes of Heat, Burning of the Flesh, Constant imagining of Evil and Great Depression of Spirits

All indicate disease of the Liver or Digestive Organs, combined with impure blood.

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

is entirely vegetable and contains no liquor. It is a compound of Fluid Extracts. The Roots, Herbs and Barks from which these extracts are made, are gathered in Germany, all the medicinal virtues are extracted from them by a scientific chemist. These extracts are then forwarded to this country to be used expressly for the manufacture of this Bitters. There is no alcoholic substance of any kind used in compounding the Bitters; hence it is free from all the objections incident to the use of a liquor preparation.

Hoofland's German Tonic

Is a combination of all the Ingredients of the Bitters with the purest quality of Santa Cruz Rum, Oranges, &c. It is used for the same disease as the Bitters, in cases where some pure alcoholic stimulus is required.

TESTIMONY

Like the following was never before offered in behalf of any medical preparation:

HON. G. W. WOODWARD,
Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, writes Philadelphia, March 16th, 1897.

I find "Hoofland's German Bitters" is a good Tonic, useful in diseases of the digestive organs, and of great benefit in cases of debility and want of nervous action in the system.

Yours, truly,
GEORGE W. WOODWARD.

HON. JAMES THOMPSON,
Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania,
Philadelphia, April 22d, 1866.

I consider "Hoofland's German Bitters" a valuable medicine in case of attacks of Indigestion or Dyspepsia. I can certify this from my experience of it.

Yours, with respect,
JAMES THOMPSON.

HON. GEO. SHARSWOOD,
Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania,
Philadelphia, June 1st, 1868.

I have found by experience that "Hoofland's German Bitters" is a very good tonic, relieving dyspeptic symptoms almost directly.

GEORGE SHARSWOOD.

HON. WM. F. ROGERS,
Mayor of the City of Buffalo, N. Y.

I have used "Hoofland's German Bitters and Tonic" in my family during the past year, and can recommend them as an excellent tonic, imparting tone and vigor to the system. Their use has been productive of decidedly beneficial effects.

WM. F. ROGERS.

HON. JAMES M. WOOD,
Ex-Mayor of Williamsport, Pennsylvania.

I take great pleasure in recommending "Hoofland's German Tonic" to any one who may be afflicted with dyspepsia. I had the dyspepsia so badly that it was impossible to keep any food on my stomach, and I became so weak as not to be able to walk half a mile. Two bottles of Tonic effected a perfect cure.

JAMES M. WOOD.

JOHN EUTERMARKS, ESQ.,
Law Partner of Judge Maynard, Williamsport, Pennsylvania

This is to certify that I have used "Hoofland's German Bitters" for dyspepsia, and found it an invaluable remedy.

CAUTION.—Hoofland's German Bitters are counterfeited. See the signature of C. M. JACKSON is on the wrapper of each bottle. All others are counterfeit.

Principal Office and Manufactory at the German Medicine Store, No. 631 ARCH STREET, Philadelphia, Pa.

CHAS. M. EVANS, Prop'r.
(Formerly of C. M. JACKSON & CO.)

Prices.—Hoofland's German Bitters, per bottle, $1; Hoofland's German Bitters, half doz., $5; Hoofland's German Tonic, put up in qt. bottles, $1.50 per bottle, or half doz. for $7.50. Do not forget to examine well the article you buy in order to get the genuine. For sale by all druggists and dealers in Medicines everywhere.

24—cowly

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX
PROSPECTUS FOR 1871.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869, and has just closed its first yearly volume.

We deem it proper, therefore, to submit the following PROSPECTUS of Volume II for 1871, and ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if the matter was properly presented to them, and especially if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor. We cannot afford to send out travelling agents, nor would they succeed so well in getting names as persons of local influence. We therefore have determined to use the funds it would cost to get our paper before the people, in another way, namely, in the purchase of articles of value to be given as premiums to those who make up lists of subscribers; thus presenting to the friends of free thought and pure religion the double motive of doing good and getting paid for it.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two DOLLARS a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

PREMIUMS.

For Fifty Names, we will give one of PRINCE & Co's four Octave Melodeons (price $65,) or a complete copy of CHAMBERS' Encyclopedia of Universal Knowledge, in ten volumes (price $50).

For Forty Names, we will give a Wilson's Family Sewing Machine, one of the best Machines made.

For Twenty-Five Names, Webster's Royal Quarto Unabridged Pictorial Dictionary (price $12), or one of the following Chromos:

The Three Tom-Boys (Prang's), price..... $15.00
Winter in the Forest, 20x28..... 12.00
Watering the Horses, 21x39..... 12.00

For Ten Names, one of the following Chromes:
WHITTIER'S Barefooted Boy, (Prang's) price..... $5.00
The Unconscious Sleeper, 14x17..... 6.50
Mt. Blanc, 20x26..... 7.50
Or a copy of LOCKY'S History of European Morals, 2 vols 6.00
MAX MUELLER'S Chips from a German Work-Shop, 2 vols 5.00
EMERSON'S Prose Works, 2 vols..... 5.00
WEISS'S Life and Correspondence of THEODORE PARKER, 2 volumes..... 6.00

For Five Names, a bound volume of THE INDEX, for 1870. (Price $2.50.) Or a copy of one of the following works, (post paid):
DARWIN'S Origin of Species, price..... $3.00
LUBBOCK'S Origin of Civilization, price..... 2.00
Essays in Criticism, by MATTHEW ARNOLD, price..... 2.00
Tablets, by A. BRONSON ALCOTT, with portrait, price..... 2.00
Any volume of the writings of THEODORE PARKER or HENRY D. THOREAU, each..... 2.00
On the Heights, AUERBACH..... 2.00

For Four Names, a copy of THE INDEX for 1871, or one of the following books (post paid):
EMERSON'S Society and Solitude, price..... $1.75
Nathan the Wise, a dramatic poem translated from LESSING by ELLEN FROTHINGHAM, price..... 1.75
HUXLEY'S Lay Sermons and Addresses..... 1.75
Speeches and Lectures, by WENDELL PHILLIPS..... 1.50
Historic Americans, by THEODORE PARKER, price..... 1.50
A copy of The Revolution..... 2.00
Or The Woman's Journal..... 2.00

CASH PREMIUMS.

For 75 Names,..... 50 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 50 Names,..... 25 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 25 Names,..... 15 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 10 Names,..... 5 Dollars in Greenbacks
For less than 10 Names, a Cash Commission of Twenty per Cent.

Any book in the above list will be sent by us post-paid upon the receipt of price.

N. B.—Names need not all come from one post office. We will send the paper wherever directed, and let the names count as clubs. Specimen Copies sent to all who enclose a three cent postage stamp. Address

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
Lock Box 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Guardian Mutual Life Ins. Co.,

ORGANIZED A. D. 1859.

M. O. Waggoner, Gen. Supt. for Ohio, Mich. & Ind.

John H. Wood, Assistant General Superintendent.

Office No. 154 Summit Street,

E. F. MUNGER, } General Agents.
CHAS. M. LANG, }

WALTER C. SCOTT, Local Agent, 152 Summit St.

Special Agents—Kelly Bros., 23 Summit Street.
Office Hours—From 7 in the morning till 9 at night.
Medical Examiners—Drs. Samuel S. Thorn and T. J. Eaton Toledo, O. 1871

H. M. EDSON,

A. TERRY.

EDSON & TERRY,
DENTISTS,

ROOMS 8 & 9 GRADOLPH BLOCK,

TOLEDO, OHIO.

ap16 1y

IMPORTER

Fine Chemicals, Drugs, and Toilet Articles.

Brandies, Wines & Liquors for medicinal purposes only. Also Proprietor of

Toledo Tonic Bitters,

Greatest Remedy known for general debility.

L. E. MULFORD,

23 Summit Street, Corner Perry, Toledo, Ohio
18-1y

THE CELEBRATED
CRAIG
MICROSCOPE

is an optical wonder. reveals thousands of the hidden Wonders of Nature; is of permanent use and practical availability, combining instruction with amusement, and never losing its interest. It magnifies

TEN THOUSAND TIMES,

a power equal to other Microscopes of many times its cost. Reveals countless little worlds all around us, teeming with life, which to the naked eye must forever remain a sealed book—as Bells in Vinegar, Animals in Water, Cheese-Mites, Sugar and Itch Insects, Milk Globules, Claws and Hairs of Insects, Hundreds of eyes in a single eye of a Fly, Dust of a Butterfly's Wings to be perfectly formed Feathers, the much talked of Trichina Spirals, or Pork Worm, which was first discovered in America with this Microscope.

It is of infinite value to professional men, to teachers, and to students, but NOWHERE IS IT OF GREATER VALUE THAN AT THE FAMILY TABLE, within the reach of every member. It will delight yourself, your children, and your friends during the long winter evenings. It will show you adulterations or uncleanness of various kinds in food, as sugar, tea, bread, meat, etc.

It is of Inestimable Value to the Farmer

in examining insects which prey upon his crops. The power of a $50 Microscope, and so simple in its construction that any child can use it understandingly, and with appreciation.

A Beautiful Present—Elegant, Instructive, Amusing, and Cheap. Over 60,000 sold.

During the past six years its worth has been testified to by thousands of Scientific Men, Farmers, School Teachers, Students, Physicians, Heads of Families, and others.

PRICE, $3.00—Sent by Mail Post-paid.

Every instrument is neatly boxed, and handsomely labelled with full directions for use. Thousands have been sent by mail. Address, W. J. LINESS & CO., CHICAGO.

FREE! FREE!

"THE MICROSCOPE," a Monthly Journal of Information for the People the mysteries of Nature explained—interesting information on the wonders of Creation—stories, sketches, etc. Terms $1.00 per year. This Journal will be sent FREE for one year to any one purchasing a Craig Microscope at the regular price, $3.00. (Craig Microscope will be sent post-paid.) For sample copy, and our beautifully illustrated and descriptive circulars, and eight pages of testimonials of Craig Microscope, send six cents for postage to

W. J. LINESS & CO.,

Opticians, and Sole Proprietors of Craig and Novelty Microscope, CHICAGO, ILL.

AGENTS and DEALERS, this Microscope sells in every family on its merits, when exhibited. LARGE PROFITS. Send for terms. 53t:6

A NEW RADICAL BOOK.

"Origin and Development of Religious Ideas and Beliefs,"

As Manifested in History and Seen by Reason.

By MORRIS EINSTEIN.

For sale at the office of the Boston Investigator, 84 Washington St., Boston, or by the Author, Titusville, Pa.

PRICE, - - - $1.50,

64-78

or Cincinnati, O.

6-77

A Few More Agents Wanted For

THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD

A new religious work of unsurpassed interest and value. For terms, address W. FLINT & CO., No. 26 S. 7th St., Philadelphia, 5 Custom House Place, Chicago, and 176 West 4th Street, Cincinnati. 65-77

COLE'S FIRST PRIZE BAKING POWDER.

The Best in the Market.

One trial only asked. Same price as the common kinds.

Sample sent free on Application.

63-75.

ALEX. COLE, BUFFALO, N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED--($225 A MONTH.) BY THE
Machine Co., BOSTON, MASS., or ST. LOUIS, MO. 56-68

Mr. Frothingham's New Book.

CHILD'S BOOK OF RELIGION, for Sunday Schools and Homes. PART I., Worship; PART II., The Good Life; PART III., Truth. In one Volume. New and revised edition. Forwarded free on receipt of $1.00.

55-68

DAVID G. FRANCIS,
17 Astor Place, New York.

WANTED--AGENTS. ($20 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock-stitch" (alike on both sides, and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest Family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Boston, Mass., Pittsburg, Pa., Chicago, Ill. or St. Louis, Mo. 38y1

SINGLE COPIES

OF

THE INDEX for 1870

Containing the following

ESSAYS.

Will be mailed from THE INDEX office (post-paid) on receipt of

FIVE CENTS:

	No.
The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion.....	1
What is Free Religion?.....	3
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Corner-Stones, 4
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Institutions, 4
Terms of Fellowship, Social Ideal, Moral Ideal, and Essential Spirit.....	5
The Practical Work of Free Religion.....	6
Unitarianism versus Freedom.....	7
Sunday Schools.....	8
Friendship.....	9
Grief and its Compensations.....	11
The Hebrew Prophets.....	12
Capital Punishment.....	13
Human Ideals.....	14
The Essence of Religion.....	15
The Management of Children.....	16
A Quaker's Letter to a Presbyterian, R. S. D.....	17
Comparison of Jesus and Socrates. (Report from the N. Y.
Tribune).....	17
The Candle of the Lord.....	18
Public Opinion.....	19
Conscience.....	20
The Pedigree of Man.....	21
"Following Christ".....	22
The Tongue.....	23
The Golden Age.....	24
What is Truth?.....	25
The Last Battle on the Creed Question.....	26
Observance of the Sabbath, Rev. W. W. Williams.....	27
The Sunday Question.....	28
Motes and Beams.....	29
The Dove's Departure.....	30
The Bible in the Public Schools.....	31
Religious Freedom.....	32
A Plain Talk to Young Men.....	33
Noise.....	34
The Humility of Free Religion.....	35
Chaos and Cosmos.....	36
An Oration on Alexander Von Humboldt.....	37
Relation of Spiritualism to Free Religion.....	38
War and Free Religion.....	39
Religious Revivals.....	40
Mary and Martha.....	41
The Ministry of Free Religion.....	42
Success.....	43
"Repentance" and "Forgiveness".....	44
Spiritual Beauty.....	45
The Book of Daniel.....	46
The Unity of Spiritual Freedom and the Opportunity which America offers for its Development. W. J. Potter.....	47
The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition.....	47
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? Chas. Reemelin.....	47
The Work of Radicalism in Indiana. J. O. Martin.....	47
Religion in the Light of Reason and Common Sense. Isaac
M. Wise.....	47
Sunday—Its Uses and Abuses. Thomas Vickers.....	48
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? E. Peckham.....	49
Parties and Party Spirit.....	50
The Future of Religious Organization, as Affected by the Spirit of the Age.....	51
The Incarnation. A Christmas Discourse.....	52
Transient and Permanent.....	53

The Index.

VOL. 2.—No. 14.

TOLEDO, OHIO, APRIL 8, 1871.

WHOLE No. 67.

The Index.

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, OHIO.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Editorial Contributors.

FALSE AND GENUINE SANCTITIES.

[A Sermon by O. B. Frothingham.]

Let no man judge you in meat or drink, or in respect to a holy day, or the New Moon or the Sabbath, which are a shadow of things to come; but the substance is Christ.

COLOSSIANS, II, 16, 17.

How complacently people anywhere in Christendom will read these words! How vexed they are, if living apostle or disciple were to say the same kind of thing! Men do not judge one another now in meat or drink, except in the way of a Catholic Lent or an occasional excise law. Holy days are few, and are not holy days any more, but holidays. New moons are unheeded, save by lovers and excursionists. The Sabbath is not hedged about with awe and menace as it used of old to be, and though occasionally the Puritan feeling breaks out against the Germans or the Frenchmen, the ancient temper is laid. But suppose now that a living apostle were to come and say,—"Let no man judge you in regard to baptism or communion, the observance of Sunday, the reading of books, meeting-going, worship, amusements,"—would there not be trouble? Men have been burned at the stake ere now for obeying Paul's injunction. In fact, almost all those who have suffered martyrdom have met their fate simply for refusing to be judged in eating and drinking, in new moons and sabbaths; simply for declaring that the substance of all observance was Christ.

The boldness of Paul in making the statement he does in the text, and in making similar statements in many another text, is something amazing. It would be amazing at any time. No more radical or revolutionary statement is it possible to make. When Paul said "Christ," he meant precisely what we mean by principle, the heart's right purpose, the dictate of a good conscience. He meant to say:—"No matter about fasting on this day or fasting on that; no matter about praying in this place or the other; no matter about stopping work today, and beginning work the next day; no matter when you rest and when you labor. The great point is that, feasting or fasting, working or resting, playing or praying, you should keep a good conscience and be about your duty as Christian men. If you hold a day sacred, do so because it helps your virtue to do so; if you refuse to hallow the day, do so because that helps your virtue. If you join in public worship, do it because your best manhood bids you do it; and if you stay away from public worship, do that for the same reason. If you eat no meat in Lent, it is well, provided your mind is clearer for it; if you eat in Lent just as you eat at other times, it is well, provided you are consulting the welfare of your constitution. Everything is indifferent but principle. Nothing is of moment but ideas."

This is the very essence of Radicalism. No one goes beyond this. They are considered brave men who go so far. They are considered brave men who go half as far. They are considered dangerous men who venture more than a few steps in this direction which the greatest of all the apostles indicated.

From time immemorial the distinction between false and genuine sanctities has prevailed in the world. We cannot go back to the time when it began. We cannot tell where it began, or how,—with what people or under what influence. Whether it was a device of the priests, or an inevitable superstition of the multitude; whether it had a ground in some philosophical doctrine or whether it was a mere feeling, it is hard to say, and it would be unprofitable here to ask. Enough that there it is, in all religions, in all generations, under all forms of civilization. It may have come from the East, as a part of that theory of dualism which set the evil principle over against the good, body over against soul, matter over against spirit, the world over against the church, this life over against the next, and instituted opposition between the week day and the Sabbath, work and worship, clergy and laity, religion and life. But whether it had this origin or some other, the distinction is graven deep in the minds of men, and seems to be ineffaceable. With the exception of a favored spot here and there, it exists now as positively as ever. It takes as puerile forms as ever. All the original authorities are against it. The sacred books of the faith flout it, and denounce it as foolish and dangerous. The author and finisher of the faith, Jesus himself, seemed to take particular pains to show his utter disregard of it, and to outrage it on every conspicuous occasion, and in every public manner. He hurled invectives at it; he ridiculed it; he put his foot on it; he exposed its shallowness in argument and parable. Yet it lives still. Some have less of it than others. Some judge others for retaining it where they have dropped it, and retain it themselves where others have let it go. But to get rid of it entirely appears to be an achievement for the millennium to accomplish. Let us notice some of the phases which this confusion of false with genuine sanctities has assumed.

1. There is the superstition about sacred places. The church is held to be a sacred place. It is the house that contains God. Things right elsewhere are deemed wrong there; things innocent elsewhere are deemed hurtful there. To curse God in the street is a venial offence; it is done every day to spice conversation. But to curse God in the temple is blasphemy. To sit with covered head among gentlemen in a club house or a caucus is not even an impoliteness; to wear the hat in church, except for Quakers, is a high misdemeanor. To plunder widows' houses, to drive a hard bargain with a debtor, to rob women of their wages, is excusable, when done in the way of trade; but to take a silver candlestick from an altar would now be regarded as a sacrilege. Terrible have been the penalties inflicted on sacrilege; but sacrilege was nothing more than the stealing of things from a church. When Jews committed it, the Mosaic Law sentenced them to heavy fine and penance. When strangers committed it, the wrath of Jehovah was invoked on them in horrible forms. The Roman law placed sacrilege on a level with parricide. Death by the sword, by fire, by wild beasts, was not judged too severe a punishment for those who violated the sanctity of God's house. A tribe of ancient Germans, after their conversion to Christianity, revived an old pagan law which enacted that whosoever broke into a temple and took thence any sacred thing, should be taken to the sea-shore, and set in the sand as the tide was coming in; and there, having been shockingly mutilated, should be sacrificed to the God whose dwelling he had polluted. The ground of this was the holiness of the place and the holiness of the article purloined from it. The place was God's dwelling; the article was God's property. To take a holy thing from an unconsecrated place was simple theft. To take an unconsecrated thing from a holy place was simple theft. But to take a holy thing from a holy place was sacrilege. The present English law of sacrilege depends on a statute of George IV, which enacts that, "if any person shall break and enter any church or chapel, meeting-house, or place of divine worship, and steal therein any chattel, or who, having in such place stolen any chattel, shall break out of the same, every such offender, being convicted thereof, shall suffer death as a felon." The value of the article is no consideration. An article of ten times the value might be taken from a poor woman's shop, and a small fine would be punishment enough. Nay, a man well connected in society may steal half a million of dollars from a bank, and nothing very serious happen, except to those who lose the money. That only shows that, under a slight aberration of mind caused by too close application to business, a man has for a moment forgotten the distinction between what was his and what wasn't. But to steal a silver communion cup proves that the man has malignantly abolished the distinction between what was his own and what was God's.

This idea will take on ludicrous forms. A harmless dramatic entertainment was given in the room below for a beneficent object. An influential paper, speaking of it, remarked that the "sacrilege of the performance was in part excusable, on account of the benevolence of the purpose;" or words to that effect. The sacrilege of the performance! The sacrilege of having a little innocent amusement in a vestry-room! It would be no sacrilege to hold a fair in the vestry-room, for the purpose of buying an organ or a christening font, an altar cloth or a walnut pulpit. There would be no sacrilege in selling goods that nobody wants at double the price they are worth; there would be no sacrilege in graciously wheedling gentlemen out of their pocket-money by feminine art, or in making them take shares in the pleasant little lotteries called raffles; there would be no sacrilege in all the pretty tricks played with grab-bags and mock post-offices. But for a company of young men and women to dress themselves fancifully and enact parts in character, not an indelicate word spoken, not an unbecoming thing done, not a rude thing suggested,—that is sacrilege! One would think that, if anything would consecrate a house of God, charity would. So long as it is used for charity, it is well used, if used with grace and decorum. Was it sacrilege during the war to turn churches into hospitals, to have physicians there instead of priests, and nurses instead of choristers? Was not the binding-up of wounds a sacrament better than bread and wine; and the bathing of brows with pure water a rite more saving than baptism? And the low-voiced reading of the newspaper or the story to the suffering men,—was it not better than the repeating of litanies? The substance is Christ; and the Christ is mercy and truth and love. When the church is used in the interest of those graces, it is hallowed, whether the means adopted be a sermon, a lecture, a concert of music, a dramatic reading by Mr. Dickens, or an acted play. I would not turn the church into a play-house; neither would I turn a play-house into a church. But if the player sees fit to call in religion for his purpose, as the great players sometimes do, why should not the religionist call in the drama for his purpose? Each building has its use and its function. The use of the theatre is entertainment. The use of the church is charity. And if entertainment will help charity without offending goodness, let us be glad that charity has so genial a helper; and let us rejoice that the house we have built up for God's service is not shut up to one set of forms as well as one set of uses. Call it bad taste, if you will; but do not confound taste with principle, or say that God is dishonored by using an unoccupied room in any reputable way for the benefit of his children.

2. But let us pursue the foe we are hunting. I have spoken of sacred places. There are sacred times as well, sacred days and hours, when things elsewhere harmless, profitable, and even beneficent, become to the popular apprehension impious. In Massachusetts the law still prohibits travel on Sundays except for need or charity; it forbids public diversion, show, and entertainment, not because such things are evil in themselves, for all entertainments are put on a level; it lays fishing under a penalty. It does not allow inn-keepers to receive guests on the Lord's day. Intelligence is highly valued in Boston. Reading is an art universally cultivated. Libraries are numerous and noble. But the city library must be closed on Sundays, not that the clerks may have rest, but that the day may not be violated by literature. A friend in New Jersey was recently animated on severely for working in his little garden on Sunday morning; and a neighbor in New England was menaced with divine judgment because he rescued his hay crop from destruction on a Sunday afternoon. Idleness during the sacred hours is reckoned better than useful employment, though in secular hours idleness is reckoned a demoralizing vice. It is thought more pious to go to sleep over a volume of sermons than to be instructed by a volume of history or entertained by a work of fiction. To doze in meeting is counted for righteousness, when to recreate in the country would be rebuked as sin. The parent on week days loves the mirth of his children; but on Sundays the mirth must be frowned away,—not because it harms the child, not because it disturbs the neighbors, but because it violates the day!

3. The distinction runs through everything. We speak of sacred "callings," as if one calling as such was more sacred than another; as if preaching were holier than teaching, or teaching holier than trading, as if all callings were not simply modes of activity by which we served ourselves and our fellow-men! Why should the person of a priest be held more sacred than the person of a layman? Yet it always has been. The time is not long gone since it was a peculiar crime to strike, maltreat, or insult a clergyman; not because he was weaker in body than other men, not because he was a man of peace whose principles forbade violence in self-defence, but because he was a man dedicated to the service of God and the sanctuary, and therefore a peculiar person set apart from the rest, who only served God in the shop, the studio, the library, or the court-room. It was not the humanity that was sacred, but the cloth. The civil and social privileges of the minister, some relics of which linger amongst us yet, were due to the same prejudice. He was not drafted in the militia, nor forced to serve on juries; not because his time was more precious than another's, but because these temporal avocations dishonored his rank.

4. We still hear people speak of "sacred literature." The Bible is considered materially more sacred than other books. To steal it from the desk would be held specially nefarious. Were I, instead of reading it here on Sundays, to read from Jeremy Taylor or John Milton, from Channing or from Martineau, I should be criticised as doing an irreverent thing, though the chapter read contained the richest thoughts of the ripest Christian men. To read an unmeaning list of kings from the book of Chronicles would be regarded as a more pious act than to read the sublimest passage from Lord Bacon. It would not be sacred scripture. It has been mentioned as an extraordinary thing if a minister reads from the Old Testament Apocrypha. It is a great deal grander than other parts of the Old Testament; but it is not canonical. The Bible Society does not print it in its editions. The American Bible is too holy to contain the noblest specimens of Jewish literature, because Greek wisdom adorns them. Were a child in a fit of passion to tear a brother's picture book in pieces, it would be a very naughty thing to do; but were the same child to fling down the New Testament and trample on it, the offence would be worse than human parent could correct. It is not the contents of the book that are sacred. It is not the contents of the other books that are profane. It is the book that is sacred. It is the book that is profane. The one book may be unintelligible, the other may be instructive. The one may be out of all reach of mind and feeling, the other may come in and give the proper sustenance to the mind at the exact moment. No matter. It is not use that sanctifies; it is tradition. The blessing is not in the ideas, but in the letter-press and the title. Few parents would say to a boy or girl who was dozing over a Bible—"You might be better employed. Put the book down, and take a run; or if you wish to read, here is 'David Copperfield' or 'Hans Christian Andersen.'". To repeat the words of the Bible is considered more sanctifying than storing up the ideas of a book of history or science.

5. But, worse than this, the distinction between sacred and profane things is thrust into the domain of duty, as if all duty, borrowing a sanctity from the moral law, was not of the same stuff, as if duties to God could be labelled and packed up, and laid on one side for use, while duties to man must be otherwise labelled, and pigeon-holed in a different part of the obligation office! As if anything that was deserving of being called a duty to God was not from the nature of the case a duty to man! As if the cultivation of the religious affections was not pre-eminently good for daily life! As if the practice of honesty, truthfulness, fidelity, kindness, was not the best possible way of confessing allegiance to the divine Lord! As if the mere word "duty" did not strike a chord that resounded over the whole universe—a chord so dominant and commanding that, when struck anywhere on earth, in a carpenter's shop, a smithy, a cabin, by some poor woman wearing herself out to save her honor, by some poor man dying daily to pay his debts, the ring of it starts echoes in the firmament, and sets vibrating the harps of seraphs. "Secular duties!" Why not say at once "secular" justice, "secular" loving-kindness, "secular" humanity, "secular" heavenly-mindedness, "secular" sacrifice, "secular" God? You might as well divide the celestial attributes into sacred and profane, as divide thus the essential law of allegiance to those attributes. All duty is religious, for all duty confesses the bond between the individual and the universe, the personal and the absolute. All duty is rendered both to God and man. If it is of the true stuff, it is of divine stuff. If it is not of divine stuff, then it is not duty, but some miserable, creaking ceremonial device which can be shut up in a closet or a chest and produced to order in a moment, and which deludes people into the idea that they are serving heaven, when they are only posturing for effect before men.

For this distinction between sacred and profane things there may once have existed sufficient reason. There was a time, no doubt, when sanctities had to be locked up for safe-keeping. When the earth was possessed by abominations, it was something to rescue a few spots from pollution. If God could not be adored at large, it was well he should be adored in cathedrals, where symbols suggested him, and heavenly words and music touched the soul. If innocence was unprotected by law or social usage and was a prey to violence, it was well that there should be shrines where the victim of oppression might be sheltered as under the wings of God's own majesty, there sitting sleepless to protect its own. If brute passion held unchecked sway over men, it was much to make sure of a few hours, once in a while, during which the sacrilegious weapons and tools and toys must be laid aside for thoughts of immortality and God. If every other day is desecrated, there is fitness in honoring Sunday; and if the sanctity of its uses could be guaranteed only by fanciful legends and superstitions, we can simply be glad that even by such means the brutality of men was for a moment averted.

And so on. If man could not be respected as man, it was surely better than nothing that he should be respected as priest. If it was impossible to carry the thought of God into all they had to do, let people begin by carrying it into a few things, making sure that some matters, even if they were unimportant ones, were done consciously as under heaven's eye. In an age when literature was coarse and licentious, good service was rendered the world by rescuing the one noblest book in all the world from the class of literature, and saying—"This book is holy; this book is divine; to read this book is a merit; to neglect it is a crime. Let no man dare to find fault with this volume, to criticize its form or contents, to lay upon it the smallest indignity; for it is the word of God. Its very paper is hallowed; its vowel-points are set by celestial fingers; and to lay a sacrilegious touch upon it is to incur the wrath of the Omnipotent."

But this course involved a great danger; and the danger, not being guarded against, came. The distinction between sacred and profane things which at first saved sacred things from profanation, presently exempted profane things from the touch of sanctity. At first it gave a shelter to the divine attributes; at last it locked them up in a dungeon. At first it offered a sanctuary to which truth and pity could flee in their distress; at last it bolted truth and pity in the sanctuary, so that the world lost the benefit of them. The same love of religion which induced men in former times to separate it carefully from the pursuits of the earth now as imperatively bids us identify it with the pursuits of the earth.

The distinction I have been commenting on is now exceedingly pernicious; for it does more than anything to demoralize existence. By especially consecrating churches, we intimate that banks and shops and warehouses are unconsecrated. By calling Sunday the "Lord's day," it is intimated that he has no claim on the other six. By revering the Bible as the "word of God," a fling is cast at all the other products of the human mind. Science, political economy, history, fiction, philosophy, ethics, are put indiscriminately under the ban and handed over to charlatans, if charlatans care to take them. The very intellect of man is flouted; and an affront, not implied but explicit, is put upon that sovereign reason which alone receives inspiration from the highest, and is alone competent to judge of what is written.

Recognize as peculiarly sacred now the person of the clergyman, and you fasten a stigma on the merchant and the mechanic. At a critical hour in the late war, it was decreed that the clergy should be liable to draft equally with other men. A few clergymen were weak enough to urge the sanctity of their calling as a ground for exemption. But all the laity breathed more freely; they felt that the decree was less a depreciation of the minister's dignity than an elevation of their own. The law paid a tribute to the humanity which may wear a cassock or a fustian jacket, but which is neither disgraced by the one nor dignified by the other. It was a declaration of the universal sacredness of duty. It was a manifesto to the effect that liberty, loyalty, humanity, was dear to God. It was an intimation that a common necessity made a common brotherhood. The wise man today is not the man who can nicely distinguish the shade of reverence that is to be given to this thing or that, to this person or that; but the man who knows how to revere principles wherever he finds them.

"The great change for which the secret religiousness of this age pines, and which it is sorely constrained till it can accomplish, is the deliberate adoption into heavenly places of this world's faculties and affairs as God has made them." Why are politics degraded? Why is trade corrupt? Why is finance tricky and "speculative"? Why is literature trifling? Why are amusements coarse? Very largely because religion has disowned them, and deliberately made them over to passion and greed, shut them out of "sacred places," shut them out from "the Sabbath," made them inaccessible to ministers and church members, and retired to its sanctuary to pray for their conversion. It is because they have been put under a different law from that which regulates things divine. But whose business forbids his loving God and man? Whose business is always a temptation and never an opportunity? Whose day is necessarily spent less worthily than the minister's? What politician, trader, novelist, journalist, musician, artist, actor, may not, if he chooses, serve God as faithfully in his place on Monday, as the priest does in his place on Sunday? Why should not a man, on going into his factory or office,—why should not a woman, on going into her parlor or kitchen or nursery,—say:—"Lo, here is duty and opportunity; lo! God is here; and here am I in his presence. This is my place; this is my time; these are my implements. Be this hour and place sacred to me! Be it my endeavor to do well whatsoever I have to do; to deal honestly, generously, kindly with all about me; to pay what I owe, to exact no more than is my due, to set an example of industry, cheerfulness, patience, courage, and hope." Would not that be as holy as the minister's going to his church to speak the truth that is given to him, and to break the bread of communion?

I am speaking of principles. I am claiming for them alone the sanctity that has commonly been awarded to places, times, and utensils. I am saying that all these fall under one law. I do not say that principles need no especial culture, and may simply be left to take care of themselves. I do not say that the world is by this time ready to dispense with special means of keeping them alive. I do not say that special places and times are not needful any longer for the education of religious and humane feeling, or that special men are not called for to teach and illustrate the Laws of Life. I do not say that churches and Sundays and ministers should be abolished, and that business or amusement should enter in and take possession. Why should not religion have buildings of its own, as well as trade or finance? All occupations have their hours set apart, fixed and consecrated. Religion must have hers. All occupations have their rules and implements, their books and salaried officers. Religion must have hers. Even pleasure has its times and temples and votaries. But the sanctity is always in the work done. Would a merchant say—"I have a splendid store, and may therefore be idle?" Would the lawyer say—"The court sits next week; therefore I need not prepare my case. The room and the hour are so sacred that justice may not trouble herself to go in?" Will business hours do business? Will banking-houses adjust finance? No more will Sundays secure sanctity, or churches make charity. The sanctity is in the man, or it is nowhere. He is the temple. To steal from him is sacrilege; to pollute him is desecration; to violate him is impiety; to break into the house of his life or his possessions, and defraud him of the opportunities he might use or the privileges he might enjoy, to deprive his faculties of one day out of seven, by cutting off thus his means of culture through literature, science and art—this, I should say, was that crime against holy times and places which is not easily forgiven.

The grand duty of the time is to bring principles into honor; to make them so honorable that every place will be honored when they come in, and every time will be hallowed that they touch; so honorable that the highest place will add no grace to them, and the humblest place will catch from them a sweet grace from heaven; so honorable that whether they preach, play, traffic, paint, model, they are beautiful and noble.

We are far from having done this yet. But we ought to be about it. With our belief in the immanent and permanent Spirit, whose all laws, principles, and activities are—the Being who worketh hitherto and still works; with our belief in man as God's agent in mending the world; with our belief in goodness as the acceptable offering; with our belief in human nature as the organ of influence, and in human life as the field of duty,—we ought to be able to run principles straight through times and places, and to make times and places serve principles. We ought to be able to live in motives, and to feel the intrinsic worth of qualities. We ought to be able to find sanctities at home, and on office-floors a place as fit to kneel on as the pavement of St. Peter's. We ought to be convinced that the real sacraments are the duties of life. Is it asking much to ask that we shall feel so? It is asking simply that we bestow such respect as we have upon those qualities of manhood and womanhood which alone can take on any virtue, or be subject to any praise. To do that in any one particular is to do it through and through. If we truly see God in anything, we see him in all. If we have the least conception of a principle, we are initiated into all the mysteries of Principle. See the law that rounds a dew-drop, and you see the law that rounds a sun. Understand the bond which holds you to your neighbor, and you understand the bond which holds the moral universe together, and makes that brotherhood of souls which all sanctities but feebly represent.

THE DISAGREEMENT OF THE DOCTORS.

[From the Albany Morning Express.]

The action of Commissioner Van Aernam in removing from the position of Examining Pension Surgeon a practitioner of the homœopathic school of medicine, for the avowed reason that he was a homœopathic physician, has already excited considerable comment, not only in medical circles, but among people outside of the medical profession as well. As might be expected, the homœopaths are very indignant, and their several State societies have passed resolutions denouncing the action of Dr. Van Aernam, and have sent delegations to Washington to procure the reinstatement of the discharged surgeon.

The mildest view which, in our judgment, can be taken of Commissioner Van Aernam's action, is that it was ill-advised and impolitic. He has deliberately provoked a controversy in which his associates of the old school are, if they sustain his action, placed in the position of seeking to persecute a body of men having a large and respectable practice. It may be that the homœopathic theory of medicine is a false one, but the fact nevertheless is that many skillful men practise it, and that hundreds of thousands of people in the United States are believers in it. This fact is entitled to recognition, and in some way or other that recognition is likely to be forced upon the government.

Most people believe that their is but one true religion, and the faith which they profess and practise is the one. But what would be the result if officers of the Federal government were to interfere officially for the purpose of deciding between the several creeds? ⁴² The Administration which tolerated it would be swept from power, and would richly merit the fate. But if, for instance, it would be improper for the President of the United States to use his official influence to procure the discharge of all army chaplains except those of a particular religious denomination, why is it not improper for Commissioner Van Aernam to proscribe and seek to remove all medical practitioners holding official positions, who do not agree with him in theory and practice?

So far as we are concerned, we have no bias in favor of the homœopathic theory of medicine, but we believe its practitioners are entitled to fair play at the hands of the government. We had hoped that Commissioner Van Aernam's action would not be openly sustained, even if not openly denounced by his professional brethren. It seems to us that our County Medical Society has made a mistake in passing resolutions which directly sustain the Pension Commissioner in the action mentioned. There is enough bitterness in politics already, without bringing in professional or religious quarrels. If the resolutions of the Albany County Medical Society are indicative of the real feeling of its members, we may expect them to petition the Legislature to repeal the charter of the Homœopathic State Medical Society, and to order that hereafter no degree of doctor of medicine be conferred upon physicians of the homœopathic school.

[The position taken in THE INDEX more than a year ago by Dr. Horsch, of Dover, N. H., that practitioners should be perfectly free to adopt any method of treatment which approves itself to their educated judgment, and that the sectarian oppositions of the schools should be ignored in Medical Societies, is as sure to be ultimately endorsed by all liberal physicians as unsectarianism in religion is sure to be ultimately endorsed by all mankind. The proscriptive policy above described will do more harm to the "regular" Societies than any other that could be devised.—Ed.]

A DEFENCE OF SPIRITUALISM.

[By Cephas B. Lynn, in the Banner of Light.]

Looking over some back numbers of Mr. Abbot's paper, THE INDEX, the other day, we noticed the following sentence in a column headed "Voices from the People:"

"Your efforts to awaken Spiritualists out of their dreamy life, to bring them back to active individual life, and to show them that to grow is the object, and not to be slumbering under the lullaby of spirit songs, will also succeed, I hope. I should wish, though, that you should touch oftener that chord, and show them plainly the danger of giving up their brain to unknown spirits, be they in or out of the body."

We marvel that Mr. Abbot should put such a paragraph in his paper. A general reader will infer that the editor of THE INDEX endorses the sweeping statements therein made. We think differently, however.

Mr. Abbot is surrounded by intelligent Spiritualists in Toledo. They are among his most earnest friends and zealous supporters; and when he lectures, the Spiritualists always assemble to hear him. In fact, his audiences would be very small, were it not for the presence of this class, who believe all that free religionists do, and more besides.

It is from principle that our people rally to attend Mr. Abbot's lectures, rain or shine. He does not touch upon the themes that especially interest Spiritualists, viz.: spirit communion, the planes of life in the heavenly world, clairvoyance, psychometry, mediumship, etc. He is silent where spiritual lecturers draw their deepest draughts of inspiration. And the ground he does go over, most of the avowed believers in spirit communion have travelled in years gone by. They love to hear Mr. Abbot talk concerning radicalism; they applaud to the echo his satires upon bigotry, and, in reality, they are among his most appreciative auditors. And why? Because, having traversed the domain in which he is laboring, they are now prepared to see the beauty of his critical and analytical essays relative to religious progress; whereas, on the other hand, those individuals who are just budding out into free thought are not calm and self-poised enough to observe with what care the INDEX editor prepares his essays, or to note how rigid he is in logic, or even how felicitous he is in expression, or how pointed in wit and sarcasm, or how unanswerable in argument. All this is lost by the novice in radicalism. The utterance of a few bold thoughts, outside of the old routine, by a speaker, will so startle some souls, not yet free and full-orbed, that everything else is forgotten, and a few isolated statements only are remembered.

Who wrote the extract that we have here copied from THE INDEX? Mr. Abbot, we advise you to let the names of the parties whose little gems you print grace the columns of your paper.

This correspondent of THE INDEX needs attention. We propose to touch him up a little, for he represents—we judge by his words—quite an ancient type, so far as criticising Spiritualism is concerned.

Mr. Abbot has delivered one lecture on Spiritualism in Toledo, which has been published in his paper. That lecture we attentively and thoughtfully perused. We pronounce it the most superficial thing that we have ever seen from Mr. Abbot's pen. And there are ample reasons for it, too. Mr. Abbot is not familiar with the subject of Spiritualism. He admits this in private conversation. He has never attended but very few seances. While Mr. Abbot has been studying and analyzing and classifying ideas, during the past six or seven years, in order to free himself from allegiance to creed and church, Spiritualism—divine Spiritualism—has been gradually assuming definite shape out of the chaos that necessarily marked its introduction.

Now it was this lecture of Mr. Abbot's that called forth the ideas contained in the extract herewith presented. Not that Mr. A. really said anything in that lecture to warrant such unqualified statements—that is, from anybody of thought and discrimination. Mr. Abbot did say, however, that he cared less about the spirit-communion idea than anything else connected with Spiritualism. Hence we aver that he treated the subject superficially, for, according to his general line of argument, the special element in each religion is the only thing really distinctive; consequently spirit-communion, which is the special element in Spiritualism, should have been made a matter of particular consideration, and not passed by hastily, as though it were an item of minor importance, or of no importance whatever.

The nameless correspondent of THE INDEX calls pursuing such a questionable course a praiseworthy endeavor to "awaken Spiritualists out of their dreamy life." The popular prejudice is, that mediumship and revelations from the spirits produce a dull, sleepy life. Now how are Spiritualists to be resurrected into an active life? By ignoring spirit-communion and mediumship altogether, when you are talking about Spiritualism? A very singular and doubtful way, we think.

But Friend — stumbles along and says that this method of treating Spiritualism will bring Spiritualists back "to active individual life" (italics his own). It is proper to laugh right here.

Dear Friend —, Spiritualism gave us "active individual life." It quickened the latent forces of our being; it intensified our hopes; it exalted our ideals; it spiritualized our affections; it purified us through and through, and bathed the whole world in new light and glory for us. It did all this at the outset, and it is to do all this, and more, today.

This unknown correspondent of THE INDEX thinks that when Spiritualists give up spirit-communion, and thus get out of their dreamy condition and back to individual activity—as though that existed universally among mankind—then they will learn "that to grow is the object [of life], and not to be slumbering under the lullaby of spirit-songs."

More information for friend —. Spiritualists are indebted to the songs of the arisen spirit hosts for the idea that growth or progress or eternal spiritual unfoldment is the object of life. Outside of Spiritualism that idea is not a living vitalizing force—not even in free religion, for free religion has a very, very slight hope for immortality, and how insignificant this grand idea of "growth" becomes, if you confine it to this shadowy realm of earth!

"Slumbering under the lullaby of spirit songs" merits contempt, and nothing less than that. The trouble is, we are not soothed and calmed to the extent we ought to be by the delightful melodies that come to us from the higher planes of the blessed spirit-land. It is safe to say that the great majority of Spiritualists today do not have confidence enough in the words of their spirit friends. A reaction has come upon the spiritual movement, and thousands are at the present time going to greater extremes in skepticism than they ever did in credulity.

Friend — concludes by hoping that Mr. Abbot will improve every opportunity, and "show them (the Spiritualists) plainly the danger of giving up their brain to unknown spirits, be they in or out of the body." We heard a Swedenborgian clergyman say about the same thing in Norwalk, O.

"Giving up their brain"—what does that mean? "Why, being influenced by some one else," A. answers. "Yes, you lose your individuality," puts in B., who never heard of mesmerism until yesterday.

Let us see about this. Are media influenced all the time? Are they never themselves? What is their object in being influenced at all? Media subject themselves to the control of spirits as an experiment. For what? In order to demonstrate immortality. Reader, would you refuse to allow some spirit to control you, say ten or fifteen minutes, if by so doing you could satisfy some wrecked and saddened heart that eternal punishment was not the lot of that father, or brother, or friend who recently passed from earth?

How foolish to talk about not being influenced by spirits in or out of the body! How foolish to affirm that this "giving up of their brain," which characterizes, in a general sense, most of our modern media, is anything unnatural or out of the line of ordinary events!

To "give up" your brain is—what? Why, simply to become passive. This passive or negative condition is an essential element in progress. Without it, civilization falls to the ground. We listen to one another—we are influenced by one another—yea, everything we see, read or hear, exercises an influence upon us either for good or evil.

We will now dismiss THE INDEX correspondent with a smile and a benediction. We are sorry for him, or her, as the case may be. We shall continue to read THE INDEX, and the column, "Voices from the People," we shall not overlook. But we do hope that never again shall we hear such a feeble "voice" as poor — possesses.

After we have laughed over such foolish statements, we must grow calm and thoughtful and really sad over them. Yes, sad! And sad to think that after all these years of trial and struggling and prayer and analysis, Spiritualists should have such slurs cast upon them as the case in hand, and that, too, through the agency of such a journal as THE INDEX! We have taken this matter up and looked it over, in detail, and we intend to treat similar productions accordingly wherever found.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"My son paid the dollar and had the paper sent in my name. I read a few of them occasionally, and found it what I termed a half-way-house paper, and paid little more attention to them, supposing they would stop when the time expired. Your paper is decidedly a good sheet, filled with interesting matter to those who need it; and that class is very numerous. I wish you great success. It is good and nourishing 'milk for babes'; but I think I can stand a little stronger meat, having been an out-and-out Spiritualist for over twenty years, and during that time having had a multitude of personal experiences that seem to carry me a little beyond what is usually recognized in your journal."

—"We have had the old Pennsylvania Freeman and Standard for over thirty years, and THE INDEX seems to fill as important a niche in our weekly needs as the utterances of Garrison, Phillips, the Motts, Childs, Wrights, and their contemporaries, and for that reason we should (in a measure) starve without it. We are Spiritualists of long standing, and your honest dealing in this direction is so tolerant and candid, that I am ready to shake heart and hands with you cordially, while I can but pity some of the weak-kneed and narrow-minded who claim to be leaders and oracles in the ranks, and defenders of the Harmonial Philosophy."

—"THE INDEX is the only liberal paper taken at the Fort, and as a number of the officers are interested to read it from week to week, I feel it is doing good service in disseminating ideas which are entirely new to most of the community. I rejoice in the success of your work and heartily wish it God speed. Feeling that your labors will be rewarded, though I can do so little towards it, I remain, &c."

—"I formerly read in the Independent interesting extracts from your paper. As Tilton has been thrust out, and as I suppose I shall see no more there of THE INDEX, except in savage and orthodox severity of condemnation, please send me a copy or two of THE INDEX."

—"My paper of the 11th has not come to hand, and it was doubtless sent off as usual. Enclosed find a stamp to pay for another of the same date, for I don't like to lose a number. Yesterday (Sunday) had a large blank for want of THE INDEX, to 'point a moral and adorn the day.'"

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—Regular meetings of this Society will be held during the spring on Sunday forenoons, at 10½ o'clock, in Daniels' Block, corner of Jefferson and Summit Streets, in the hall over the U. S. Express Office. The public are cordially invited.

DONATIONS.—THE INDEX ASSOCIATION gratefully acknowledge receipt of the following donations:—

A. FOLSON, Boston, Mass.,	$ 8.00
J. W. SCOTT, Toledo, O.,	10.00
E. B. WARD, Detroit, Mich.,	10.00
MICHAEL NEALE, Battle Creek, Mich., (for A. KENT),	1.00

RECEIVED.

THE LIFE OF THOMAS PAINE, Author of "Common Sense," "Rights of Man," "Age of Reason," etc., etc. With Critical and Explanatory Observations on his Writings. By G. VALE, Editor of "The Citizen of the World." Boston: Printed and Published at the Boston Investigator Office, by J. P. MENDUM. 1871. Svo. pp. 192.

SOWING AND REAPING. A Sermon by Rev. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, preached in Lyric Hall, February 12, 1871. New York: D. G. FRANCIS, 17 Astor Place. 1871. pp. 23.

OLD AND NEW, for April, 1871. Published Monthly. Boston: ROBERTS BROTHERS, 143 Washington St. London: Sampson, Low, Son, & Marston. 1871. $4.00 a Year. Single Copies 35 cents.

THE RELIGIOUS MAGAZINE AND MONTHLY REVIEW. April, 1871. Rev. JOHN H. MORISON, D. D., Editor. Boston: LEONARD C. BOWLES, Proprietor, No. 3, Beacon St. $5.00 a Year. Single Numbers 50 cents.

THE ART REVIEW. A Record of Art Progress in America. March, 1871. New York and Chicago: E. H. TRAFLET, Publisher and Proprietor, 39 Park Row, New York, and 115 Madison St., Chicago. $1.50 a Year. Single Copies 25 cents.

THE YOUNG PILOT. An Original Monthly Magazine for Young People in their Teens. April, 1871. Chicago: THE YOUNG PILOT PUBLISHING COMPANY. - $1.00 a Year. Single Copy 15 cents.

Poetry.

"TO KEEP A TRUE LENT."

Is this a fast, to keep
The larder leaner,
And cleaner
From fat of veales and sheep?

Is it to quit the dish
Of flesh, yet still
To fill
The platter high with fish?

Is it to fast an houre,
Or ragged to go,
Or show
A downcast look and soure?

No; 'tis a fast to dole
Thy sheaf of wheat,
And meat,
Unto the hungry soule.

It is to fast from strife,
From old debate,
And hate;
To circumsise thy life.

To show a heart grief-rent,
To starve thy sin,
Not bin;
And that's to keep thy Lent.

HERRICK'S NOBLE NUMBERS.

The Index.

APRIL 8, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

Contributors are requested to write on only one side of each sheet.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

INDUCEMENTS.—We would invite the special attention of our friends who cannot afford to give their services gratuitously in getting subscribers for THE INDEX, to the very liberal Cash Premiums offered in our Prospectus for 1871.

Whoever collects $150.00 for 75 subscriptions, is authorized to retain $50.00, forwarding $100.00.

Whoever collects $100.00 for 50 subscriptions, is authorized to retain $25.00, forwarding $75.00; and so on.

Now it cannot be very difficult, in a town of any considerable size, to get twelve subscriptions a day for one week, if the agent uses ordinary business energy. Yet he would be paid about $3.00 a day—as much as his representative in Congress receives for work not always, we fear, so useful!

"A word to the wise." Who will canvass for THE INDEX, and at the same time earn as much as the Hon. Mr. ———? Send for "Truths for the Times," and begin at once.

"TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES, OR REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX"—is the title of a neatly-printed tract of sixteen pages published by THE INDEX Association, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. One Hundred Copies will be sent for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate—one cent a copy. Packages will be sent free to those who will circulate them, but are unable to pay for them.

The last issue of the N. Y. National Standard has the following very friendly paragraph:

"Rev. Francis E. Abbot, editor of THE INDEX, we understand, has resigned his position as pastor of the radical Unitarian Society of Toledo, and has under consideration a proposition to remove THE INDEX from Toledo to this city. Mr. Abbot is an able, conscientious, outspoken representative of free, radical religion. We hope THE INDEX may be abundantly prospered."

We expect to stay another year as speaker to the First Independent (not "radical Unitarian") Society of Toledo, and THE INDEX will stay too. Next week we shall announce an arrangement, not yet perfected in all its details, by which we hope to strengthen THE INDEX in more ways than one.

"RELIGION AND SCIENCE."

On a few points made by Mr. M'Clintock in his thoughtful article in last week's INDEX, we have something to say as briefly as possible.

1. Religion he defines as "the tie which binds the finite to the Infinite." This conception of the finite and the Infinite as standing over against each other, separated by a chasm of which religion is the bridge, must yield, we believe, to a higher conception. No such external and mechanical connection will satisfy the demand of modern thought for the recognition of absolute unity in the universe. Instead of attaching man to God as a sort of satellite revolving about its primary in a far outlying orbit, modern religion seeks to bring him into harmony with himself and universal Nature, and thus to realize the true interior relation which ought to subsist between him and the Infinite. Not two tied together, but the part finding its true place in the Whole,—that is the thought struggling to realize itself in the modern consciousness. It is the hard, numerical dualism of the popular religion which is making so many atheists.

2. But our friend doubts if a "really intelligent and thorough atheist can be found." If atheism be disbelief of Infinite Wisdom and Goodness (which Mr. M'Clintock makes essential elements in his idea of God) as anywhere existing in the universe, then we have found many such. Infinite Power in Nature few, if any, deny; but thousands and thousands believe it to be an utterly blind, unconscious, material Necessity. Would he not call that atheism? Yet justice forbids our withholding the epithet "intelligent" from such persons.

3. In reply to our statement—"We think science will ultimately justify this belief in God,"—Mr. M'Clintock asks: "Why not say, we think science does justify this belief?" With regard to a kindred statement—"To say that science must teach a belief in God would be indeed to dogmatize,"—he asks: "Would it be any more to dogmatize to say that science does teach a belief in God, than it would be to say, in reference to the solar system, that science teaches that the sun is the centre, etc.?"

The simple fact is that science, as such, at the present day, does not even entertain the question whether God exists or not; and it would be untrue to say that she now teaches his existence. By accepting the universally established method of science, and applying it to this question which science ignores, we are satisfied that science herself will in her own time come to an affirmative solution of it. Logic, in our opinion, leads that way. But there is to be a battle over this question such as the world has never yet seen. Let us abide it without fear. Out of every such furnace seven times heated comes at last the pure gold of truth.

Is Christianity a supernatural revelation of God?—that question is now agitated in millions of minds. But when it is answered, as it will be, in the negative; then must come the profounder question—is there any God to be revealed? In the absence of all universally recognized authority save that of reason rightly used, science will be compelled to study that momentous question as she alone can study it, and give to it at last such answer as shall proceed from the most highly trained intelligence of man. But while we have sought to anticipate, as best we may, the irreversible decision of science, we should count it inexcusable arrogance to say that our verdict must necessarily be hers. This distinction between the ultimate verdict of science and the present opinions of individual students of science is so fundamental, nay, so elementary, that its apparent incomprehensibility shows how little the true scientific spirit has been diffused among the people. Free Religion has no object more vital than that of diffusing it everywhere, for it is the very spirit of freedom itself.

4. "The idea of God," says Theodore Parker, "is a fact given by man's nature, and not an invention or device of ours." Mr. M'Clintock accepts this position. He starts from the existence of God as "the great central truth on which all other truths depend," and thinks we err by beginning at "the merely moral, human end, working up to Deity as a desirable possible ultimate."

Now it is a truth, hardly to be called into question at the present day, that the idea of God has a history,—beginning in the grossest forms and images, and gradually becoming more refined and elevated. As held today by philosophical thinkers, it is the most subtle and complex of all ideas. Now this truth that it has a history shows that it has been formed by the activity of man's mind, not given as a fact of his nature. It is not an original datum of consciousness. The way it has been arrived at is the way of inference and generalization,—conjecturing the unknown from the known, correcting the first crude conjectures by larger experience and riper reflection, getting rid of childish fears and imaginations, and by degrees developing out of a savage's dream the sublimest idea of the civilized man. What is this but beginning at the "human end," and "working up" towards God? Is it not the highest object of human life thus to work up? Why should it not be the highest object of human thought as well? Has any one yet learned the perfect truth? Why not accept cheerfully our manifest necessity of going from low to high, and from high to higher, in our thought as in our life? True it is that we start from the "human end;" nor do we know any other end to start from. Out of ignorance into knowledge, out of weakness into strength, out of vice into virtue, out of slavery into freedom, out of superstition into religion—that is the road humanity is still travelling; and we are not ashamed of the route. The only shame is that of lying down by the roadside, and falling asleep.

The "recognition of Deity" that we want is earnest thought and hard work and unceasing endeavor in the direction of the Perfect.

In another column we print an article by Mr. C. B. Lynn, from the Banner of Light, complaining of our publishing among the "Voices from the People" a paragraph criticising Spiritualism. Has he never noticed there the other frequent paragraphs praising Spiritualism? It is the people who write that column, not we; and we print in it very much sharper criticisms on our own opinions. Mr. Lynn thinks he has been "all over the ground" of Free Religion. With perfect good-nature, we would suggest that he has something in that field yet to learn, if he fails to understand the free spirit of THE INDEX, and its willingness to let people speak for themselves. We assume responsibility for nothing we have not personally written. Mr.

Lynn writes with kindness, which we would reciprocate; and we are sorry he should be so "sad" because we treat nothing, even our own most cherished beliefs, as above criticism.

A few errors of fact in the article we leave uncorrected. In justice to our own correspondent, we ought to add that his "voice" does not appear so "feeble" to us as to Mr. Lynn. We think it utters much wholesome truth.

LETTER FROM WM. H. CHANNING.

I am sure the readers of THE INDEX will be glad to see the following letter from Rev. Wm. H. Channing, who writes from England of things that are interesting all thoughtful minds, not only there but here. The first part of the letter is taken up with some details with regard to the circulation of the Annual Report of the Free Religious Association in England. This part is omitted as not of so general interest.

W. J. P.

... In mentioning Mr. Voysey, I refer to one of the most remarkable events in the ecclesiastical history of the year. For, as you noticed doubtless, upon his trial before the Judges of the Privy Council, he was convicted of heresy. This decision will prove to be, not the conclusion of a controversy, but the beginning of one, which may yet rend the already shattered structure of the Established Church into fragments. For immediately following the condemnation of Mr. Voysey, as the representative of the Broad Churchmen, came the condemnation of Mr. MacConnachie and Mr. Purchas, as representatives of the High Churchmen, or Ritualists. It needs only to catch some ultra-Calvinistic Low-Churchman, some "Evangelical"—and there are many such ready to exchange with Spurgeon or Newman Hall—and the three-cornered battle will be fairly joined. For it is very certain that neither the Broad-Churchmen nor the High-Churchmen will acknowledge a defeat. For the moment, of course, there may be slight seeming concessions of conformity. But each of these movements will sweep on with only added force over a wider range, till the cyclone of commingling counter-currents envelopes the nation.

Indeed, the atmosphere of speculative and religious thought in Great Britain now is overclouded and tempest-tost. The discussions in the London School Board, led by Huxley on the liberal side and by Lord Sandon and several orthodox clergymen on the conservative side; over the "Use of the Bible in the Public Schools," and the far fiercer discussions in the two Houses of Convocation as to the presence of a Unitarian among the translators of the revised edition of the Scriptures, and at the Communion Service in Westminster Cathedral, which all the revisers were invited to attend,—headed by Bishop Wilberforce in behalf of the hierarchy, and by Dean Stanley in behalf of free Churchmen,—are but slight signs of the swift coming equinoctial. The real centre of the storm is the problem of the Divine presence and agency in the development of the universe, including, of course, humanity,—which gathers around Darwin's "Origin of Species." His last book, on "The Descent of Man," especially, is the centre of the centre thus far; and the very pivot whereon the vortex whirls will finally be found to be whether "the imperious word ought in the conscience merely implies the consciousness of the existence of a persistent instinct, either innate or partly acquired, serving man as a guide, although liable to be disobeyed." And when the agitation of this question as to the moral order of the universe, and man's relation to this order as a person and as a member of society, is fairly begun upon the focal point, that in the development of the universe man is a being specifically characterized by a consciousness of Ought, there can be, as for one I think, small doubt as to the result. Modern Natural Science will find itself led by an irresistible logic, through the successive stages of latent Atheism—Nescience as to the unknown Persistent Force—the recognition of unitary and universal Force in varied evolution, the new form of Pantheism,—up to the clear re-assertion of Personality and a spiritual philosophy thence outgrowing, and finally to a new outburst of Theism, as a living communion in conscious love, thought, and joyful concert of action with the Person of persons, the Living God. The result of this tremendous disturbance in the air-currents of Christendom will be, I predict, a sublime revival of Religious Life, like a serene heaven above a renovated earth.

If only the barbarians do not meanwhile succeed in their infernal feat of uncapping the volcanoes of the hills! And I deliberately say if, because with solemn earnestness of feeling, as well as with calm scientific conviction, I am sure that men and nations, and ages of men and nations, are free to make or mar, to crush or crown with beauty their own destiny. Never so little as now in the light of latest science, confirming all tradition, is it pardonable to be a Fatalist. No! as the finest outgrowth of the universe on this planet, man is a Free Sovereign; a nation yet more Free and Sovereign; and humanity superlatively Free and Sovereign,—under the law of liberty of the one All Good and True. So, bright as in many ways is the promise of our time, yet the barbarians are free to blast this opening paradise, if permitted by their fellows. And this hideous war, the wickedest in all history, the circumstances fairly considered, has really let loose hell for a season. And I do not pretend to predict the result. At the outbreak of hostilities, like so many onlookers, I was deceived by the apparently generous uprising of the German people to defend their homes from invasion. And seeing how justly the corrupt dynasty of Napoleon III. deserved to be ground to dust, while the French people by their subservient connivance merited the humiliation of its fall, one submitted with awe and sorrow to the spectacle of the appalling judgment. But as gradually it became plain that the German military caste, with Bismarck and his cohort of intriguers, had carefully for years prepared to spring this mine, and as the whole outside of Europe recognized with a shudder that the real meaning of the cruel strife was to rear a vast central military despotism upon the fragments of ruined France, one became heart-sick at the hideous crime against the Humanity, Social Order, Historic Conscience, Ideal Hopes, and Spiritual Aims of the whole age. If the countrymen of Lessing, Kant, Fichte, Schelling, and Hegel, of Wieland, Klopstock, Goethe, Jean Paul and Novalis, of the grandest historians, critics, theologians, scientific discoverers, and artists of our race in this generation, can thus consent to see the capped crater of the French Revolution deliberately reopened, where can we look with trust? I cannot pretend to answer. The future of Europe does look very black to me. This war has left apart one fissure. Presently another great war will cause another crevice to yawn. Beneath all widens, to devour, the livid abyss of a wide-spread Social War, that threatens to swallow all existing governments, college halls, and churches in one fiery chaos.

Here is the alternative for Europe and for Christendom,—either a grand integral revival of Religion, Philosophy, Science, Art, Industry and Polity, by a new consciousness of man's relations to the living laws of the Living God, a revival which must be truly unitary and universal, or a dissolution of existing civilized societies into their elementary forces. I still hope for the former. But the experiences of the last dreadful year have taught me to trust in Human Freedom as never before,—but only when that Freedom is spiritualized, purified, refined, illumined by the sovereign will of God dwelling in Humanity. . . .

With hearty fraternal and friendly best wishes for yourself and our brethren, I am,

Very sincerely,

W. H. CHANNING.

COUNTERS AND CULTURE.

The Rev. Dr. Deems, an enterprising minister of New York, with a keen eye to business, and a shrewdness of clerical speculation that makes him remarkable in the profession, is reported to have said, in a lecture on "Money-Makers," delivered in his church, that store-keeping was superior to academic training as a means of mental culture. The opinion of Dr. Deems on such a subject may or may not be entitled to consideration. The statement is important as indicating the ground that ministers who aim at popularity permit themselves to be forced upon. Dr. Deems is not the only "sensational" preacher who discredits culture and prefers the discipline of trade to the discipline of thought. The doctrine is quite congenial to an age of money-makers, and is certain to attract the money-changers to the temple which substitutes a counter for an altar; unless, indeed, it makes them prefer their shops, where the discipline is acquired, to the temple where it is only recommended. But to the friends of intellectual culture, to all who have a sense of the value of rational training, the doctrine is to the last degree discouraging.

That a reaction should succeed the long devotion to theology, and the persistent scholasticism of sects of learning, is very natural. But we must pay this tribute to theological training, that it maintained the intellect on a high level of activity and kept alive our interest in momentous questions. It delivered people from the tyranny of mercenary pursuits, and saved them from precisely the sharpness, shrewdness, quick-wittedness, the mechanical aptness and swiftness of self-interested calculations that is fostered by the very worthy and necessary yet somewhat unennobling practices of store-keeping.

Theology is out of favor. Scholastic attainments are voted a humbug and a nuisance. But is there no alternative between the rarified atmosphere of the once popular studies and the close air of the shop? Is there no such thing as philosophy, no such thing as science, no such thing as literature, no such thing as music or art? Is the grindstone the best device for sharpening faculties, as it is for grinding axes? Or will the same kind of edge answer for all tools, those that open oyster beds, those that develop mines, and those that unlock the treasure-houses of knowledge?

The teachers of religion are supposed to be at the head of those who maintain the necessity for the highest culture of the rational powers. As a class they are the best educated men in the community; they are, at all events, the most laboriously and expensively cultivated men. It is their business to hold the popular mind to the duty of thinking on the highest themes; to put men face to face with truths of the greatest moment; and to enable them to do this successfully, education, not the education of the shop, but the education of the school, the academy, the college, has been encouraged by them. The Fathers of New England established Harvard College as a nursery for ministers of religion. They dedicated it, therefore, "to Christ and the Church."

The simple effect of this new doctrine now in vogue will be first to bring into discredit the very order to which its preachers belong. Possibly Dr. Deems and his brethren may be no sufferers by the loss of the clerical reputation for culture; but it is clear that the best part of the influence of the order will disappear with that reputation. The theological power of the clergy is on the wane, fortunately so, we think. The growth of general intelligence and the prevalence of secular knowledge have brought this about. Their intellectual prestige has not departed, need not depart, should not depart, will not depart, if they are faithful to their own best traditions of culture. But if they surrender entirely to the mercenary spirit, and exalt the already exaggerated estimate which the untrained and uncultured have of their practical intelligence, not only will the influence of the order be broken down,—there might be no great harm in that,—but the acquired supremacy of disciplined mind would be lost for a time, and would have to be painfully regained under heavy disadvantages.

It is hard enough already in our communities to stem the current of common sense which, elated by its success in the region of practical business affairs, claims right of domain in the department of philosophical and speculative truth. The storekeeper is quite ready to sit in the teacher's seat and pronounce judgment on "goods" that are not for sale in the shop. The interests of culture are none too carefully looked after; and if the teachers of religion forsake them, who will take them up?

Let nothing here said be taken as disparaging to the practical intelligence of the store and the street. The education of trade is valuable, but it is not all the education there is. Why does Dr. Deems preach? And to what purpose is his "Church of the Strangers?" Perhaps, though, he does not consider it his province to instruct people in ideas.

O. B. F.

The Examiner for April opens with an interesting discussion of Dr. Ginsburg's treatise on the Essenes and their relation to Christianity. Dr. Ginsburg fails to appreciate the importance of Hilgenfeld's views on this subject in Die Juedische Apokalypitik, though he refers to them on page 80 of his pamphlet; and Mr. Towne is apparently unfamiliar with them. The latter speaks of the "rude Galilean expectation of Messianic revolution;" whereas the Essene community was itself, according to Hilgenfeld, the natural product of that very expectation—the universal expectation of Judæa. Next follows a still longer article on Lewin's little book on Judaism, very cordial and appreciative towards the Rabbi's catholic thought, and full of generous sympathy for progressive-Judaism. Mr. Towne then proceeds in a third article to criticize Dr. Schaff and orthodoxy in general; and he does it with his accustomed vigor and fire. As a satirist, there are few who can deal keener thrusts at folly and superstition than he. In the fourth article, on Mr. Swing, he inquires—"Does rationalism have no base, when it starts from faith in the nature of man?"—the very position which we understood Mr. Towne to controvert, when he questioned our statement that Free Religion is "organized faith in man."

The fifth article is an account of the formation of the Boston Radical Club. Mr. Towne forgets that the idea of this Club, and its present name, were first suggested in a company of about a dozen young Unitarian ministers, returning in the cars from the Syracuse Conference; and that he was not the first to suggest either. This idea of a Club subsequently broadened out into that of the Free Religious Association; but it should not be left unrecorded that Mr. Potter had previously and independently conceived this broader idea, and mentioned it to Mr. Frothingham in New York on his return from the same Conference. Mr. Towne, however, is entitled to the credit of having taken the first practical steps towards forming the Free Religious Club (which at a later period voted to call itself the Radical Club), soon after the successful formation of the Free Religious Association. The real origin of both Club and Association was, not the suggestion or device of any one man, but the common thirst of the times for a purer and freer fellowship than that of organized Unitarianism. This was quickened and intensified in many minds simultaneously by the narrow denominationalism of the Conference. From the very start, the free religious movement has been thoroughly democratic; and no one person was its author, founder, leader, originator, or suggester. It is important that this should be understood, in justice to the movement itself and to all those who have taken part in it.

"A good story is told of Dean Swift's parrot, which was a great pet with the whole family. One day Polly managed to open her cage and get away, to the great consternation of the household. After a great search, some one found Polly in the garden on top of an apple tree. The welcome news was communicated to the Dean, who, with the whole of the inmates, rushed at once, accompanied by Dr. Vaughan, who, with some friends, was then on a visit to the Dean. Polly was found swinging on the topmost branch, but when she discovered the large audience below her, she looked gravely down on them and said:—'Let us pray!'"

The above story, which we find in the Investigator, is undoubtedly true. We have heard parrots make the very same remark in the pulpit.

One of our subscribers offers to return a spare copy of THE INDEX No. 2, of the first volume. We shall be under obligation to him and to any other subscribers who will be so kind as to send copies of that number in good preservation.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

THE COMPLAINT OF METHODISM AGAINST FREE RELIGION.

BROOKFIELD, March 22, 1871.

My Dear Mr. Abbot:—1. I observe, in looking over my articles, that thus far all the reply you have made to my position in that essay is to the effect that the heart is capable of being wrought up to a pitch of frenzy and made to subserve the ends of fanaticism and superstition: all which nobody denies, and all which proves nothing—no more than the assertion that, because fire and steam and gunpowder are capable of producing disaster, therefore they are not most important and beneficent agents. Because a man's appetite for food and drink is capable of being so perverted as to lead to his ruin, that does not make it out that appetite should not be ministered to. Because the sensibilities are being morbidly inflamed, that is no reason why, when normally developed, they do not signify all I have claimed for them.

2. Like the intellect and conscience, the affections in themselves are neutral. Their value and influence will depend entirely on the manner in which they are operated and developed. My charge against Free Religion is that it is not calculated to operate or inspire them at all, or but feebly and indifferently. The position taken and illustrated in my articles was, first, that it was the heart principally that wanted religion; and, secondly, that Christianity, with a few great basis facts, revealed or demonstrated to the intellect, addressed itself mainly to the heart, or the religious nature, and satisfies that nature and makes live men. This is the point I would like to see controverted. Mr. Higginson admits that the masses can only be moved by an appeal to their sympathies. Christianity really moves men because it knows how to get hold of the sympathies. It addresses, in fact, the whole man, the intellect, conscience and sensibilities. Free Religion only addresses the first. What appeal does Free Religion make to the imagination, the love of music, the devotional or worshipful nature, the spiritual, religious, Godward side of our being? It but feebly and softly touches the conscience, and ministers to the affections—the hopes and warm aspirations of the heart—not at all. How can such a religion ever be generally loved or cared for?

3. We, of course, believe your religion very dangerous in its tendencies. But we have this to console us. A system, or faith (unfaith) that thus ignores that great spring of all action, the deep and fervent sympathies of the human soul, must necessarily cut away its own grounds and defeat its own ends. It can never organize itself. It can never extend itself. Its own advocates don't care enough for it, and outsiders will not be likely generally to fall in love with it. The religion that is to take the world has got to carry men's hearts; and that Radicalism can never do. And so we really have nothing to fear, save the incidental disaster that may in the meantime be wrought from the advocacy of these systems of unbelief. Like those of the past, one after another as wave urges wave, they will disappear; while Christianity will still live on, going from conquest to conquest. Our Methodist Church alone in these United States is building churches at the rate of one for every three hours of a working day, and our congregations number 5,000,000. Does this look much as though "the coming man would not go to Church?" The next time your essayists attempt this theme, let them put down the above fact as one of their data. If we found it as hard work to maintain congregations and periodicals as the Radicals, we might well lose heart in regard to the church-going habits of "the coming man."

4. But I have been a little diverted. I was thinking of the mild and mellow light, the soft and warm coloring, our doctrines throw around scenes and circumstances of suffering and affliction, and the desolations of death, as compared with yours. You intimate that this talk about the dreary, hopeless death-beds of unbelievers is "stale." Alas! it is not "stale." The scenes denied come before us again and again. And when Hobbes said that death was a "leap in the dark," and Gibbon, the prince of Radicals, said on his death-bed that the future "looked dark and doubtful," these men expressed simply what must be the legitimate issue of your present position,—that of uncertainty and doubt.

I close by saying that to my mind the noblest manifestation of manhood is that presented where the moral sentiments are predominant and luminous.

Yours truly,

R. H. HOWARD.

[1. Mr. Howard strangely misses the point of our notes on his "Claims of the Heart in Religion." He argued from the feelings of the believer to the actual truth of his beliefs. We replied that this argument is worthless because every form of religious delusion makes the same plea; and Mr. Howard sees its worthlessness in all cases but his own. The deluded believers in witchcraft argued from their own excited feelings to the reality of witches and demons; and their testimony is good, according to him. Why not?

2. But Christianity, he says, "with a few great basis facts, revealed or demonstrated to the intellect," makes a powerful and successful appeal to the heart. So does Mahometanism, with its "facts" of Mahomet's mission, a heaven of houris, etc. The Christian "facts" referred to are such as Adam's fall, man's depravity, Christ's incarnation, resurrection, ascension, etc. These "facts" Mr. Howard very quietly takes for granted, and fancies that their influence on the imagination and sentiments is some sort of proof of their reality. Not so. It is these facts that need proving; and some better proof is required than a Methodist's "Glory to God!" Nobody denies the reality of camp-meeting deliriums; but they prove nothing beyond the mere excitability of the crowd. Facts demand evidence; and because Mr. Howard's "facts" have none, we regard them as fictions. Hallelujahs do not weigh much in reason's balance.

3. Whether Free Religion is "dangerous" or not, is not the point. Is it true? If it is true, it will thrive. If not, it will disappear. All this talk about the "heart" is whistling against the wind. Let him who hopes to overthrow Free Religion buckle down to close study and hard thinking on the points at issue. The human heart has sooner or later got to accommodate itself to the human head—not vice versa. If Christianity cannot justify itself to the intellect, its doom is sealed. If it shirks the obligation, its power over the heart will disappear because its "basis facts" are disbelieved. Methodism may build a magnificent church every second, for aught we care; but if Methodist ideas are dying, as they most assuredly are, they will only die in downier beds. And the beds will be sold to pay funeral expenses.

4. The "mild and mellow light"—"the soft and warm coloring"—of such doctrines as everlasting punishment for unconverted friends, we willingly forego. Mr. Howard, of course, believes in an endless hell for sinners, with torments unspeakable and unimaginable. At the grave of an unconverted son (and a great many sons are unconverted in these days), what comfort a Methodist mother must derive from "our doctrines!" What solace to remember that, though poor William or James is writhing in the gripe of horrid pangs forever and ever, she herself is to sing throughout eternity the praises of divine forgiveness, compassion, and love! Verily, a warm, a cheerful, a delightful religion! For one, we would rather be grilled on a gridiron than enjoy such "warmth." We do not deny that Christianity "makes live men." But the same is true of religions that Mr. Howard would call "false"—especially Free Religion. If there had been no truth in Christianity, it could never have lived so long. But it cramps and fetters the intellect, which will yet signally avenge itself for its long bondage. Free Religion addresses itself equally to the intellect, the affections, and the conscience. What we conceive to be its power over the "heart" is set forth (we could wish more adequately) in two essays on "The Warmth of Free Religion" which will soon be published.—Ed.]

AT REST.

Died, March 12, 1871, in Dayton, Ohio, Maggie R. Boyer, aged 29 years.

Mrs. Boyer was the wife of A. J. Boyer, Esq., the well-known advocate of woman's suffrage, formerly Editor of the Woman's Advocate, and at present Editor of the Nineteenth Century.

Mrs. Boyer was Mr. Boyer's assistant, adviser, and counsellor. She was one of the thousands of "silent workers," preferring to remain modestly in the sphere of her home circle, and by sympathy and help stay the hands of her husband in his more public labors for the welfare of the sex to which she belonged. They were as happy and affectionate as any couple could be. I have heard them both remark, in answer to questions respecting the peculiar felicity of their life, that it "resulted from a law of marriage much higher and diviner than any ever enacted by man, the law of love." Naught but death could have separated these happy ones.

Mrs. Boyer left a representative in a child now a year old, Stella Wyoming, named in honor of the Territory that first removed the political disabilities of its women. Mrs. Boyer's religion was the religion of humanity. The church and society called her infidel, and infidel she was to all that was wrong, absurd, and superstitious. She preferred to do good, attend to the sick and distressed, and take care of the things of this world, leaving the future to itself.

She died calmly, falling sweetly to sleep without a struggle or a murmur, and retained consciousness to the last.

In answer to a question she said,—"I am not afraid to die, although it does seem hard that we must all thus take a 'leap into the dark.'" "I know just as much of the future as any one else—that is, just nothing at all. Of one thing I am sure. If there is a future state of individual existence, I shall meet my mother and father, my sisters and brothers there, who have all gone the same road before me." A few moments after expressing these views, she died in her husband's arms, the victim of hereditary consumption.

Mrs. Mary L. Strong, a Spiritual lecturer, conducted the funeral service. She delivered a most affecting and impressive address, eulogizing the virtues of the deceased and condoling with the bereaved husband. A choir of young ladies sang with melodeon accompaniment, and four young married women were the pall-bearers. The occasion and the somewhat novel manner of conducting it, together with the large circle of the deceased's friends, drew together a great many people. The remains were deposited in the beautiful cemetery near this city.

J. W. G.

UNDILUTED ORTHODOXY.

BURTON, O., March, 1871.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

This region was one of the earliest settled in the Western Reserve, and was almost entirely owned and populated by people born in Connecticut. Their descendants now own and till the soil, and run the only two churches of which this place can boast, i. e. one Congregational and one Methodist. The Congregational is much the larger and more wealthy of the two, and has for the last sixty or more years sustained a regular orthodox preacher. Never until about three years ago did mortal man dare to preach from its sacred pulpit a sermon which did not contain descriptions of the awful wrath of an offended God, and of the eternal damnation and perdition of all humanity that did not happen to be included among the elect. It is needless to say that the man who ventured to speak common-sense and "modern principles" from this pulpit did not have an opportunity to repeat his efforts many times, before his place was supplied by a man evidently more to the taste of this "orthodox" community. And he, wishing to assure his supporters that he was all right on the doctrine of "hell-fire," and other cardinal dogmas, preached, at the outset, a credo, a few verbatim extracts from which I wish to make, to show you what abominable doctrines are even in this day of enlightenment preached in meetings to willing hearers, and taught in Sunday schools to innocent, unsuspecting children.

Out of his twenty-two articles of belief (in order to be brief), I have only selected the 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, and 8th.

3. I believe that the Scriptures reveal, as a fundamental doctrine, that there are three persons in the Godhead, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit; that these three are the one living and true God, the true Jehovah, the only proper object of religious worship. I cannot explain nor comprehend the doctrine of the Trinity, but I believe it is not contrary to reason, and is to be believed as a fact in the Divine revelation.

4. I believe that God has from all eternity fore-ordained whatever comes to pass, yet in such a manner as not to affect the accountability of man, and not to be the author of sin. I believe that God has elected some to everlasting life, while others are left to suffer the just punishment due to their sins. I believe that God has fore-ordained to eternal life those who will come unto him by Jesus Christ; and that he has determined from all eternity to remove from his favorable presence every one who so refuses finally to come to him.

5. I believe that God the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, created the world and all things therein, visible and invisible, and that he upholds the same by the word of his power. . . .

6. I believe that God created man upright, and gave him a law, as the rule of his obedience, when he said:—"Of every tree of the garden," &c. . . .

8. I believe that, enticed by the craft and subtlety of the devil, our first parents disobeyed the command of their maker, and thus exposed themselves to the penalty of God's most righteous law,—Temporal, Spiritual, and Eternal Death. I believe that, in consequence of Adam's fall, all his posterity are by nature children of wrath; and in addition to this corruption, I believe that every one who arrives at an age sufficient to distinguish good from evil, voluntarily transgresses the law of God. And I believe that God might have left our first parents and all of their posterity to perish eternally, and his justice would have remained unimpaired.

These are the doctrines which are and have been taught to the descendants of the Puritan fathers, in this "New Connecticut" town. I believe I am the only subscriber to THE INDEX here. I have richly enjoyed the reading of all its numbers from the beginning, and have handed some of them to others who have perused them with that relish which bodes future good results.

Yours for progress and light,
GEO. H. FORD.

Beecher says that men confess everything but their own besetting sins. They steer clear of these. Whoever heard a man say, "O Lord! I am so mean and stingy that 'tis only with great pain that I can unclothe my fist: make me generous."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

WOOD & HOLBROOK'S PUBLICATIONS.

HERALD OF HEALTH.

Sixty Pages.

$2.00 a Year.

20 Cts. a Number.

Three Months on Trial Twenty-five Cts.

$1 a Year to Clergymen, Teachers, and Invalids who request it. New subscribers who send $2 for 1871 will be entitled to a book of 300 pages and 100 Engravings, entitled PHYSICAL PERFECTION, or Hints towards Human Beauty, showing how to acquire and retain Bodily Symmetry, Health and Vigor, and to avoid the infirmities and deformities of age, worth $1.50. The Scientific American says, "The HERALD OF HEALTH contains more sensible articles than any monthly that comes to our sanctum."

Also—

PHYSICAL PERFECTION.—Containing Chapters on Structure of the Human Body; the Perfect Man and Woman; the Temperaments; Laws of Human Configuration; Embryology; Childhood; Effects of Mental Culture; Moral and Emotional Influences; Social Conditions and Occupations; Effects of Climate and Locality; Direct Physical Culture; Practical Hygiene; Womanhood; the Secret of Longevity; the Arts of Beauty; External Indications of Figure, etc., etc. Beautifully illustrated with 100 Engravings, and handsomely bound. Price, by mail, $1.50.

This work has been through many editions, and has given great satisfaction to thousands. A copy is given free to subscribers to the HERALD OF HEALTH, who send $2 at once.

MINNESOTA AND ITS CLIMATE, as adapted to Consumptives, Invalids, and all who wish to make the State a Home. By Ledyard Bill, author of "A Winter in Florida." Price $1.25, post paid, by mail.

This book, while a godsend to invalids and consumptives, will be found equally interesting to sportsmen and settlers, who would find a home in this fair-famed State. It contains a beautiful view of Minnehaha Falls, and also chapters on the climate of all those places which are most desirable as resorts for invalids, including Florida, Nassau, the Adirondacks, California, San Diego, Fayal, etc., etc.

MORAL, INTELLECTUAL, AND PHYSICAL CULTURE; OR THE PHILOSOPHY OF TRUE LIVING. By Professor F. G. Welch, Superintendent in Yale College. It contains over 400 pages, and is beautifully bound. Price, by mail, $2.25.

This book is the most perfect Encyclopedia of Gymnastic exercises of the most approved method known. It tells in plain language how to do everything, from the building of a gymnasium and choosing apparatus to doing the exercises. The series of exercises with the Indian clubs alone, is the best ever published. Those who want a good work on gymnastic culture should not fail to get this one. Dr. Dio Lewis says, "This is an admirable guide to physical culture."

TALKS TO MY PATIENTS.—Hints on Getting Well and Keeping Well. By Mrs. E. B. Gleason, M. D.

Woman agents wanted everywhere. Thousands are being sold. Full contents and terms of agency sent on application. Price, by mail, $1.50.

This book is designed mainly for women, of all ages. It treats principally on the diseases of women, and includes chapters on Child Bearing and the Care of Children. Harper's Magazine, in reviewing the work, says:

"Mrs. Gleason is able to say something to wives and to mothers which no man could say. There can be no difference of opinion about the value of the practical suggestions she affords, which are characterized by sound philosophy and clear, good sterling common sense. We wish the chapter, 'Confidential to Mothers,' might be published as a tract, and sent to every mother in the land."

Mrs. Dr. Sayles, after reading it, says, "I would rather have written that book than been queen of the greatest empire on this small globe of ours!"

No woman can read it without being made wiser and better, and without being better qualified for all the duties of life.

For any or all of the above works, address,

WOOD & HOLBROOK, Publishers,
67eow81 13 & 15 Light St., New York.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

Free Religious Association.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, on "The Idea of the Free Religious Association;" DAVID A. WASSON, on "The Nature of Religion;" MRS. E. D. CHENEY, on "Religion as a Social Force;" F. E. ABBOT, on "The Future of Religious Organization as affected by the Spirit of the Age;" S. JOHNSON, on "The Natural Sympathy of Religions;" RABBI WISE, on "The Universal Elements in Judaism;" COL. T. W. HIGGINSON, on "Mohammedanism;" WM. H. CHANNING, on "The Religions of China;" W. J. POTTER, on "The Religions of India;" and an abstract of a discussion on the "Relation of Religion to the Public School System of the United States."

This Report is specially representative of the principles of the Association. Price 50 cents. In packages of five or more 30 cents each. Also CHANNING'S Address on "THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA," (a careful and instructive essay, of particular interest at this time to Americans) in a separate pamphlet for 20 cents.

The ANNUAL REPORT for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cents respectively), Rev. Samuel Johnson's essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cents), and an essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by Wm. J. POTTER (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained by applying to the Secretary.

The Report for 1868 contains a letter from the celebrated Hindu Theist, KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, on the "Origin and Aims of the Brahmo Somaj," also an address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, on "Religion and Social Science," a letter from M. D. CONWAY, on "Religious Movements in England," and speeches by JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHAS. H. MALCOM, JOHN WEISS, and others. The Report for 1869 has addresses by RALPH WALDO EMERSON, D. A. WASSON, JULIA WARD HOWE, C. A. BARTOL, PROF. DENTON, HORACE SEEVER, LUCY STONE, and others.

THE FIRST VOLUME OF THE RADICAL.

Persons wishing to complete their sets of THE RADICAL by adding the FIRST VOLUME, which has been for some time out of print, can do so by at once sending me their orders. By reprinting this volume in part, I can supply 100 copies. To be able to do this, I am obliged to fix the price at $5.00. This will secure a copy, sent to any address post paid.

Volume 2, 3, 4, and 5, will be sent, post paid, for $3.50 each.

Single copies of THE RADICAL 35 cts.

The May number contains Mr. Wasson's review of Mr. Abbot's Religion.

The June number contains Mr. Frothingham's article on "What is Religion for?"

Address S. H. MORSE, office of "The Radical," Boston, Mass.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX PROSPECTUS FOR 1871.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869, and has just closed its first yearly volume.

We deem it proper, therefore, to submit the following PROSPECTUS of Volume II for 1871, and ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if the matter was properly presented to them, and especially if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor. We cannot afford to send out travelling agents, nor would they succeed so well in getting names as persons of local influence. We therefore have determined to use the funds it would cost to get our paper before the people, in another way, namely, in the purchase of articles of value to be given as premiums to those who make up lists of subscribers; thus presenting to the friends of free thought and pure religion the double motive of doing good and getting paid for it.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two Dollars a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

PREMIUMS.

For Fifty Names, we will give one of PRINCE & Co's four Octave Melodeons (price $65.) or a complete copy of CHAMBERS' Encyclopædia of Universal Knowledge, in ten volumes (price $50).

For Forty Names, we will give a Wilson's Family Sewing Machine, one of the best Machines made.

For Twenty-Five Names, Webster's Royal Quarto Unabridged Pictorial Dictionary (price $12), or one of the following Chromos:

The Three Tom-Boys (Prang's), price..... $15.00
Winter in the Forest, 20x28..... 12.00
Watering the Horses, 21x29..... 12.00

For Ten Names, one of the following Chromos:

WHITTIER's Barefooted Boy, (Prang's) price..... $5.00
The Unconscious Sleeper, 14x17..... 6.00
Mt. Blanc, 20x26..... 7.50
Or a copy of LECKY's History of European Morals, 2 vols 6.00
MAX MUELLER's Chips from a German Work-Shop, 2 vols 5.00
EMERSON's Prose Works, 2 vols..... 5.00
WEISS's Life and Correspondence of THEODORE PARKER, 2 volumes..... 6.00

For Five Names, a bound volume of THE INDEX, for 1870. (Price $2.50.) Or a copy of one of the following works, (post paid):

DARWIN's Origin of Species, price..... $2.00
LUBBOCK's Origin of Civilization, price..... 2.00
Essays in Criticism, by MATTHEW ARNOLD, price..... 2.00
Tablets, by A. BRONSON ALCOCK, with portrait, price..... 2.00
Any volume of the writings of THEODORE PARKER or HENRY D. THOREAU, each..... 2.00
On the Heights, AUERBACH..... 2.00

For Four Names, a copy of THE INDEX for 1871, or one of the following books (post paid):

EMERSON's Society and Solitude, price..... $1.75
Nathan the Wise, a dramatic poem translated from LESSING by ELLEN FROTHINGHAM, price..... 1.75
HUXLEY's Lay Sermons and Addresses..... 1.75
Speeches and Lectures, by WENDELL PHILLIPS..... 1.50
Historic Americans, by THEODORE PARKER, price..... 1.50
A copy of The Revolution..... 2.00
Or The Woman's Journal..... 2.00

CASH PREMIUMS.

For 75 Names,..... 50 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 50 Names,..... 25 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 25 Names,..... 15 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 10 Names,..... 5 Dollars in Greenbacks
For less than 10 Names, a Cash Commission of Twenty per Cent.

* Any book in the above list will be sent by us post-paid upon the receipt of price.

N. B.—Names need not all come from one post office. We will send the paper wherever directed, and let the names count as clubs. Specimen Copies sent to all who enclose a three cent postage stamp. Address

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
Lock Box 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Guardian Mutual Life Ins. Co.,

ORGANIZED A. D. 1859.

M. O. Waggoner, Gen. Supt. for Ohio, Mich. & Ind.

John H. Hood, Assistant General Superintendent.

Office No. 154 Summit Street,

E. F. MUNGER, } General Agents.
CHAS. M. LANG, }

WALTER C. SCOTT, Local Agent, 152 Summit St.

Special Agents—Kelly Bros., 22 Summit Street.
Office Hours—From 7 in the morning till 9 at night.
Medical Examiners—Drs. Samuel S. Thorn and T. J. Eaton Toledo, O. [1871]

H. M. EDSON,

A. TERRY.

EDSON & TERRY,
DENTISTS,

ROOMS 8 & 9 GRADOLPH BLOCK,

TOLEDO, OHIO.

ap16 1v

IMPORTER

Fine Chemicals, Drugs, and Toilet Articles.

Brandies, Wines & Liquors for medicinal purposes only. Also Proprietor of

Toledo Tonic Bitters,

Greatest Remedy known for general debility.

L. E. MULFORD,

23 Summit Street, Corner Perry, Toledo, Ohio
18-1y

THE CELEBRATED CRAIG MICROSCOPE

is an optical wonder; reveals thousands of the hidden Wonders of Nature; is of permanent use and practical availability, combining instruction with amusement, and never losing its interest. It magnifies

TEN THOUSAND TIMES,

a power equal to other Microscopes of many times its cost. Reveals countless little worlds all around us, teeming with life, which to the naked eye must forever remain a sealed book—as Eels in Vinegar, Animals in Water, Cheese Mites, Sugar and Itch Insects, Milk Globules, Claws and Hairs of Insects, Hundreds of eyes in a single eye of a Fly, Dust of a Butterfly's Wings to be perfectly formed Feathers, the much talked of Trichina Spiralis, or Pork Worm, which was first discovered in America with this Microscope.

It is of infinite value to professional men, to teachers, and to students, but NOWHERE IS IT OF GREATER VALUE THAN AT THE FAMILY TABLE, within the reach of every member. It will delight yourself, your children, and your friends during the long winter evenings. It will show you adulterations or uncleanness of various kinds in food, as sugar, tea, bread, meat, etc.

It is of Inestimable Value to the Farmer

in examining insects which prey upon his crops. The power of a $50 Microscope, and so simple in its construction that any child can use it understandingly, and with appreciation.

A Beautiful Present—Elegant, Instructive, Amusing, and Cheap. Over 60,000 sold.

During the past six years its worth has been testified to by thousands of Scientific Men, Farmers, School Teachers, Students, Physicians, Heads of Families, and others.

PRICE, $3.00—Sent by Mail Post-paid.

Every instrument is neatly boxed, and handsomely labelled with full directions for use. Thousands have been sent by mail. Address, W. J. LINESS & CO., CHICAGO.

FREE! FREE!

"THE MICROSCOPE," a Monthly Journal of Information for the People—the mysteries of Nature explained—interesting information on the wonders of Creation—stories, sketches, etc. Terms $1.00 per year. This Journal will be sent FREE for one year to any one purchasing a Craig Microscope at the regular price, $3.00. (Craig Microscope will be sent post-paid.) For sample copy, and our beautifully illustrated and descriptive circulars, and eight pages of testimonials of Craig Microscope, send six cents for postage to

W. J. LINESS & CO.,

Opticians, and Sole Proprietors of Craig and Novelty Microscope, CHICAGO, ILL.

AGENTS and DEALERS, this Microscope sells in every family on its merits, when exhibited. LARGE PROFITS. Send for terms. 53t-6

A NEW RADICAL BOOK.

"Origin and Development of Religious Ideas and Beliefs,"

As Manifested in History and Seen by Reason.

By MORRIS EINSTEIN.

For sale at the office of the Boston Investigator, 84 Washington St., Boston, or by the Author, Titusville, Pa.

PRICE, - - - $1.50,

64-78

or Cincinnati, O.

63-77

A Few More Agents Wanted For

THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD

A new religious work of unsurpassed interest and value. For terms, address W. FLINT & CO., No. 26 S. 7th St., Philadelphia, 5 Custom House Place, Chicago, and 176 West 4th Street, Cincinnati. 65-77

COLE'S FIRST PRIZE BAKING POWDER.

The Best in the Market.

One trial only asked. Same price as the common kinds.

Sample sent free on Application.

63-75.

ALEX. COLE, BUFFALO, N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED--($225 A MONTH.) BY THE Machine Co., BOSTON, MASS., or ST. LOUIS, MO. 66-68

Mr. Frothingham's New Book.

CHILD'S BOOK OF RELIGION, for Sunday Schools and Homes. PART I., Worship; PART II., The Good Life; PART III., Truth. In one Volume. New and revised edition. Forwarded free on receipt of $1.00.

55-68

DAVID G. FRANCIS,
17 Astor Place, New York.

WANTED--AGENTS, ($20 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock-stitch" (alike on both sides, and is fully licensed). The best and cheapest Family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Boston, Mass., Pittsburgh, Pa., Chicago, Ill. or St. Louis, Mo. 88y1

SINGLE COPIES

OF

THE INDEX for 1870

Containing the following

ESSAYS,

Will be mailed from THE INDEX office (post-paid) on receipt of

FIVE CENTS:

The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion,.....	No. 1
What is Free Religion?.....	3
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Corner-Stones, 4
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Institutions, 4
Terms of Fellowship, Social Ideal, Moral Ideal, and Essential spirit,.....	5
The Practical Work of Free Religion,.....	6
Unitarianism versus Freedom,.....	7
Sunday Schools,.....	8
Friendship,.....	9
Grief and its Compensations,.....	11
The Hebrew Prophets,.....	12
Capital Punishment,.....	13
Human Ideals,.....	14
The Essence of Religion,.....	15
The Management of Children,.....	16
A Quaker's Letter to a Presbyterian, R. S. D.,.....	17
Comparison of Jesus and Socrates. (Report from the N. Y. Tribune),.....	17
The Candle of the Lord,.....	18
Public Opinion,.....	19
Conscience,.....	19
The Pedigree of Man,.....	20
"Following Christ,".....	21
The Tongue,.....	22
The Golden Age,.....	23
What is Truth?.....	25
The Last Battle on the Creed Question,.....	26
Observance of the Sabbath, Rev. W. W. Williams,.....	27
The Sunday Question,.....	28
Motes and Beams,.....	29
The Dove's Departure,.....	30
The Bible in the Public Schools,.....	31
Religious Freedom,.....	32
A Plain Talk to Young Men,.....	33
Noise,.....	34
The Humility of Free Religion,.....	35
Chaos and Cosmos,.....	36
An Oration on Alexander Von Humboldt,.....	37
Relation of Spiritualism to Free Religion,.....	38
War and Free Religion,.....	39
Religious Revivals,.....	40
Mary and Martha,.....	41
The Ministry of Free Religion,.....	42
Success,.....	43
"Repentance" and "Forgiveness,".....	44
Spiritual Beauty,.....	45
The Book of Daniel,.....	46
The Unity of Spiritual Freedom and the Opportunity which America offers for its Development. W. J. Foltz,.....	47
The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition,.....	47
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? Chas. Reemelin,.....	47
The Work of Radicalism in Indiana. J. O. Martin,.....	47
Religion in the Light of Reason and Common Sense. Isaac M. Wise,.....	47
Sunday—Its Uses and Abuses. Thomas Pickers,.....	47
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? E. Peckham,.....	49
Parties and Party Spirit,.....	50
The Future of Religious Organization, as Affected by the Spirit of the Age,.....	51
The Incarnation. A Christmas Discourse,.....	52
Transient and Permanent,.....	53

The Index.

VOL. 2.—No. 15.

TOLEDO, OHIO, APRIL 15, 1871.

WHOLE No. 68.

The Index,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, OHIO.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Editorial Contributors.

THE INTUITIONAL AND SCIENTIFIC SCHOOLS OF FREE RELIGION.

[The Fifth Lecture in the Course of Sunday Afternoon Meetings in Horticultural Hall, Boston, delivered Feb. 5, 1871.]

"Ignorance more frequently begets confidence than does knowledge. It is those who know little, and not those who know much, who so positively assert that this or that problem will never be solved by science."

DARWIN, The Descent of Man, Vol. I, p. 4. (Introd.)

"Beyond the Nebula scientific thought has never ventured hitherto. . . . The only thing out of place in the discussion is dogmatism on either side. . . . Granting the Nebula and its potential life, the question—whence came they?—would still remain to baffle and bewilder us. . . . They [the philosophical defenders of the doctrine of the uniformity of Nature] have but one desire—to know the truth. They have but one fear—to believe a lie. And if they know the strength of science, and rely upon it with unswerving trust, they also know the limits beyond which science ceases to be strong. They best know that questions offer themselves to thought which science, as now prosecuted, has not even the tendency to solve. They keep such questions open, and will not tolerate any unlawful limitation of the horizon of their souls. They have as little fellowship with the atheist who says there is no God as with the theist who professes to know the mind of God."

TYNDALL, On the Scientific Use of the Imagination, ad fin.

"When man began to interrogate Nature, and, not content with observing, learned to evoke phenomena under definite conditions,—when once he sought to collect and record facts, in order that the fruit of his labors might aid investigation after his own brief existence had passed away,—the Philosophy of Nature cast aside the vague and poetic garb in which she had been enveloped from her origin; and, having assumed a severer aspect, she now weighs the value of observations, and substitutes induction and reasoning for conjecture and assumption. The dogmas of former ages survive now only in the superstitions of the people and the prejudices of the ignorant, or are perpetuated in a few systems which, conscious of their weakness, shroud themselves in a veil of mystery."

ALEX. VON HUMBOLDT, Cosmos, Vol. I, p. 24 (Amer. Ed.)

"That astronomers should pretend even to know the weight of the different celestial bodies, and to say how many Earths may be placed in one scale of a balance to hold the Sun in equilibrium in the other, will seem paradoxical, at all events, to many. We shall farther on show the possibility of conclusions apparently so audacious, the inquiry into which may seem to border on presumption. We must, however, in the interim invoke a sentiment which is but rarely required in science—faith in our assertions, not a faith which shelters itself under the impenetrability of the mysterious, but one which will become by future study clear and demonstrated truth."

GUILLEMIN The Heavens, p. 18 (Lockyer and Proctor's Ed.)

That the Hebrew and Christian Scriptures, in this age of the world, are no longer regarded by the majority of well-educated people as decisive authority in matters of belief, is a fact so plain that it needs no demonstration. For good or for evil, modern thought has withdrawn its confidence from the theories of God and Nature, of man's origin, history, and destiny, which underlie the precepts and appeals of the two Testaments. The Bible is no longer the book—it has become a book. However respected for what it is (and this is much), it is rapidly ceasing to be worshipped for what it is not. The strong fortress of Bibliolatry is invested on all sides, and the armies of science march by it as the armies of King William marched by Strasburg and Metz.

But the great problems whose Biblical solution has been rejected by the cultivated intelligence of mankind are still unsolved, and challenge as never before the grave and intense attention of reflecting minds. To the civilized man life is as profound a mystery as to the savage. Its beginnings and causes, antedating all human consciousness, still elude the philosopher's search. Its destiny and purpose are still shrouded by a darkness that no eye can pierce. Nature is still the eternal enigma that no human wit can read. God is still the infinite and the unknown. With all its majesty and unutterable beauty, the universe is dumb to human interrogation, and suffers human thought to play over its surface, opening its depths to none. The generations of men come and go, chasing each other over the sea of Time like billows over the boundless blue; and the arch of heaven, now flooded with beams of gold, now glowing with starry points in a canopy of black, now shut from view by a veil of earth-born clouds, spans the small world of human life with mysterious, unechoing silence. Mingled of light and shade, the great panorama of existence, a part of which we are, is unrolled before our eyes. We look; we thrill; we think.

Among those who, either by native vigor of intellect or by acquired breadth of information, have come to find in the Bible only a match struck in the dark, and who believe that the human soul must shine itself with the true light by which to read the enigmas of Nature and human life, I find two great classes or schools. They turn away from the traditions of the past with equal hunger; they look towards the discoveries of the future with equal hope; they feel with equal joy the tides of the new life of the race coursing to-day through their veins. Cheerfully and undauntedly, they alike press forward towards that El Dorado of the idealist—the "golden age" in which humanity shall come to its own, and breathe an air of freedom, truth, and love that shall make gods of men. Both classes are rationalistic in principle and conviction, and discard with equal energy the notion of infallible authority, whether lodged in Church, Bible, or Christ. To both, truth must authenticate itself, and find its only credentials in the free assent of the human mind. To both, law is universal and inviolable, Nature safe and wholesome, and the true welfare of humanity to be attained by free development and natural methods alone. Hence both classes are equally strong and pronounced in their adherence to Free Religion,—whether under that name or not, is of no consequence.

But there exists between these two classes a marked difference of attitude towards the great problems of GOD and IMMORTALITY. Alike trusting to natural solutions only of these as of all other problems, they are nevertheless conscious of a deep and apparently bridgeless chasm between their respective modes of thinking on these high themes. For the sake of convenience I will designate them as the Intuitional and the Scientific schools of modern religious thought. It is my object to say something on their character and mutual relation, and the present bearing of science on the points that divide them.

To the Intuitional school, God and Immortality are undoubted and indubitable facts. These two great problems are solved. God is a fact; the only questions concern his essence, the mode of his activity, and the nature of his relations to the universe. Immortality is a fact; the only question concerns the laws and conditions of the future state. Doubt of God and Immortality is not wrong, according to this school, but simply strange, incomprehensible, even absurd. Nay, so strong is its conviction on these two points, that it even denies real atheism to be a possibility, and holds that at heart all men believe in its own God; while disbelief of Immortality wears in its eyes the aspect of a diseased and monstrous development of human thought. Debate on these points it tolerates, having far too profound a respect for freedom of thought and speech even to wish any curtailment of it; but all such debate appears in its eyes like the disputings of blind men as to the existence of color. In short, to thinkers of the Intuitional school, God is as sure a fact as the solar system or the Milky Way,—Immortality as sure a fact as the present life of man on the globe.

The Scientific school, however, finds the existence of God (that is, as Person or intelligent, self-conscious Being) and the continued existence of man after death to be the great open questions of to-day. It finds them to be unsolved problems—problems of most absorbing interest and of inconceivable importance, but problems nevertheless. Doubt on these questions is not only not wrong, but it is not even strange or incomprehensible,—still less absurd. Atheism (by which I mean non-belief of infinite Intelligence and Goodness in the universe) is so far from being impossible, that it is one of the very commonest phases of modern thought, to be encountered by any one who meets his fellow-men with respectful sympathy instead of holy horror; a phase of thought, moreover, having no natural connection with a bad life or feeble mind, but often characteristic of the noblest natures and strongest intellects of the time. No one at all familiar with many of the ablest writers of the age can have failed to perceive the sceptical undercurrent, partially concealed, perhaps, by ambiguous phrases, which marks their thought. Doubt of God and Immortality, according to the Scientific school, is neither idiocy nor disease, but rather the inevitable result of the discovery that the old supports of these beliefs are rotten beyond repair. Are there any solid supports at all? This question the Scientific school regards as strictly legitimate, as perfectly sane, and in fact as absolutely necessary in the present stage of human development.

Thus to the Intuitional school of modern religious thought God and Immortality are SELF-EVIDENT FACTS; to the Scientific school they are GREAT OPEN QUESTIONS. On what is this difference based? What are its causes?

Before I attempt to answer these inquiries, let me say that these two classes of thinkers are equally earnest, equally honest, equally devoted to truth, equally filled with the spirit of self-consecration to the highest and best ideals. They often misunderstand, and therefore misrepresent, each other; sometimes they suffer themselves to speak of each other in terms of depreciation. But I see no reason to doubt their perfect equality in all the intellectual and moral virtues. The issue between them is one of thought, not of character; and it should be tried before the tribunal of reason, not that of prejudice. I trust that I shall speak and you listen in the spirit of justice and love of truth.

The Intuitional school, then, rests its absolute, undoubting conviction of God and Immortality on the supposed faculty of IMMEDIATE INTUITION. The human soul is claimed to possess the power of discerning the truth on these great subjects, not by any direct or indirect process of ratiocination, whether long or short, but by coming, as it were, into immediate vision of the object of belief. No argument, whether a posteriori or a priori, can prove either God or Immortality. The subtle web of logic, however finely spun or artfully woven, is too coarse to snare the prey. The slow and patient demonstrations of science, proceeding by exact observation and cautious induction of the unknown from the known, are as powerless to reach their object as were the bricks of the mythical Babel-builders on the plains of Shinar to scale the heavens. The human brain, charm it never so wisely, can but spin a cocoon for its own fancies, while the infinitude of God and the endlessness of the future life over-arch the puny toiler like the blue canopy of the empyrean. In the eloquent language of Dr. Hedge [Reason in Religion, p. 208],—

"I do not believe in any such induction. I deny the logical sequence in that argument. I deny the ability of the human intellect to construct that ladder, whose foot being grounded in irrefragable axiom, and its steps all laid in dialectic continuity, the topmost round thereof shall lift the climbing intellect into vision of the Godhead. Between the last truth which the human intellect can reach by legitimate induction and the being of God, there will ever lie—

'Deserts of vast eternity.'"

Rejecting, therefore, all the devices of cunning philosophy and plodding science, the Intuitional school teaches that the grand truths of God and Immortality are made known to man by direct revelation of infinite Being itself; that in the human soul there exists a natural faculty of intuition fitted to receive a revelation so transcendent; and that this supreme faculty, the crowning glory of human nature, which is sometimes called the "higher reason," is infinitely superior in degree and utterly unlike in kind to the mere "understanding," which deals only with the data of the senses and the inductions drawn therefrom. It teaches that logic is useful as a means of discovering truth of a lower grade, but is misused and abused, when applied to the investigation of truths that transcend the sphere of sensuous and purely intellectual experience. Thus the Intuitionist school plants itself on a revelation, direct, it is true, but yet strictly natural, made to a faculty in the human soul which is specially fitted to receive it. Revelation is thus stripped of its arbitrary and exclusive character as a boon granted only to certain favored races or favored individuals, and made a part of the universal spiritual outfit of every human being.

Now, as a necessary consequence of these ideas, the Intuitionist school is logically bound to deny the possibility of atheism; and, as I have said, it does this, holding atheism to be a merely nominal thing. It finds atheism, wherever alleged to exist, to be an incomprehensible absurdity, a state of mind which cannot in any way be reconciled with its own theory of a universal, natural revelation. Most adherents, therefore, of the Intuitionist philosophy, sacrifice the fact to their theory by denying its existence—thus following the example of so many other theorists. That any human being should be absolutely devoid of the idea of God, or, still worse, that any human being should understand it, yet deny its reality, is a phenomenon so inexplicable on the Intuitionist theory that the easiest way of escaping the embarrassing fact is to refuse it credence. If it is the special function of the "higher reason" to behold intuitively the great truths of God and Immortality,—if, furthermore, the higher reason is an integral and universal element of human nature,—then, it is clear, no being endowed with ordinary human nature can possibly deny these truths. An atheist, a disbeliever in immortality, must be practically dehumanized by his disbelief.

When confronted, therefore, with the fact that human beings, manifesting all the common faculties and powers of humanity, are either ignorant of these truths or, worse still, consciously deny them, only one escape from this fact, if admitted, is left to the Intuitionist school—namely, to maintain that every such man or woman has the higher reason in an absolutely undeveloped state. The atheist or the materialist must consequently be regarded as devoid of the crowning attribute of humanity, the power of receiving the natural revelation of the highest truths. He must be looked upon as a spiritual idiot—a moral cripple—a sort of lusus nature with whom it is impossible to associate on terms of spiritual equality.

It lies, therefore, in the inevitable logic of the Intuitionist theory to refuse fellowship on equal terms to all atheists and materialists. The absence of the intuitive recognition of supersensuous realities becomes a ground for religious disfranchisement, which can only be waived by a glaring inconsistency—by an amiable weakness of generosity overriding the dictates of strict logic. The humanity of the theorist may (as it usually does) protect him from unbrotherly conduct; but it will most evidently be at the expense of his theory. As a matter of fact, adherents of the Intuitionist school are occasionally betrayed—unconsciously, let us hope—into a tacit assumption of superiority over atheists and materialists which it is painful to witness. A lurking contempt for all who cannot confess that they have these transcendental intuitions, a certain complacent air of spiritual elevation above them, has now and then come under my own observation, and appeared as a sad offence against human brotherhood. I do not see how to eradicate from the Intuitionist theory this pride of spiritual aristocracy, based on mere belief, except by the surrender of the theory itself. If the pure "scientist" who doubts or disbelieves the veracity of these transcendental intuitions is merely a plodder, dealing with a lower order of facts by a lower order of faculties,—if the believer in them is, in consequence of his mere belief, the spiritual superior of the "scientist" as such,—I see no way logically to escape the admission that intellectual opinion is the basis of gradations in spiritual excellence. Yet to admit this is to strike a blow at the supremacy of the moral element in human nature from which, I confess, I shrink. Human worth seems to me to be so entirely dependent on moral character, and so utterly distinct from merely intellectual illumination, that I am disqualified for accepting any theory which thus reverses the true order of moral judgments. Because my philosophy of the universe and its cause differs from that of the atheist, I am not prepared to pronounce my "neighbor" spiritually "legless." If he stands on the rock of moral rectitude, I ask no better proof that he has the normal number of "legs."

The simple truth is that the Intuitionist school have imported into Free Religion some relics of the dogmatism they ought wholly to have left behind them. They have not all unlearned the orthodox habit of taking certain things for granted which they find difficult to prove, and even of looking down with some degree of superciliousness on those who think differently from themselves. Above all else they need to foster the profound humility of science, which counts nothing thoroughly or finally established until proved to the universal acceptance of all minds competent to form an opinion. It saves a world of hard and toilsome and painful thought to say that God and Immortality are first principles, guaranteed by the testimony of immediate intuition,—to say that these great ideas need no proof, all proof being the work of the mere understanding, which discharges for the higher reason the function of an humble mental. In fact, the Intuitionist theory is a marvellous labor-saving machine, doing the work of consolation for human hearts without taxing the powers of the human brain. But the great, weary, aching heart of the world cannot be thus consoled. Humanity cries for bread,—and receives a stone. It asks for light,—and receives the burnt-out lamp of Christian dogmatism. It asks for evidence,—and receives assertion. It asks for proof that there is an endless future, and an infinite Love to fill it with peace and joy; it receives assurance that to ask for proof is itself proof of a gross and carnal mind, floundering about in the bog of the "understanding" and powerless to soar upwards on the wings of the "higher reason." So the poor world sits down to the Barmecide feast spread by the Intuitionist school, chews the air, and goes away famishing. Alas! to hungry mankind, crying—"Show me that God is, and that we shall be!"—it is little better than mockery to stand up, and say—"I affirm it!" Is it any wonder that the response comes like the sound of many waters,—"Who are you? And how do you know it?" Something better than empty asseveration is wanted; "yea, yea," will not serve here. But now that the Church with its ancient and venerable dogmas no longer holds the world's impatient ear,—now that the empty affirmations of the Intuitionist school, backed by no evidence but endless self-repetition, ring out with the hollow sound of false metal,—the questions of God and Immortality rebound from soul to soul like echoes leaping from peak to peak among the mountains. And the answer tarries, and the world's heart grows sick with hope deferred.

In this hopeless failure of the Intuitionist school, manifest to every keen observer, to show itself equal to the demand in this great crisis of the world's experience, the eyes of mankind are riveted with infinite yearning on the youthful figure of Science. The whisper runs around the globe—"Is not this he that should come?" And millions hang breathless on his most trivial word. It must be confessed, I think, that the stripling lets fall much nonsense. He is still, in the one pungent phrase of the "Country Parson," in the "veal" stage. Somewhat elated and puffed up by the attention he receives, somewhat given to flippant and pert speech, somewhat too eager to show his disrespect for venerable ideas whose depth he has by no means fathomed, Science is nevertheless destined to be the world's true Messiah. At present, he is full of young blood, bent apparently on sowing his wild oats to his heart's content. But with all his occasional imprudence and shallowness and premature solutions that will not stand the test of his own riper consideration, there fall from his lips such numerous words of solid wisdom that humanity is crowning him with its most sacred hope. From him, if from any, must come the final answers to the questions that have burned themselves deep into the heart of the race. He it is that must re-kindle the light of a divine faith in the eyes of asking humanity, or glaze them with the stony look of stoical resolve. With a strength of conviction that I cannot begin to utter, I reiterate what I said years ago, that Science is weighing in his scales our human faith in God—our human hope of a life beyond the grave. It will be long before his final verdict will be rendered; and wisdom cautions you and me not to take his first crude guesses for his lasting and decisive word. But the day of dogmas and assertions without proof is gone; the day of knowledge is at hand. And when Science shall have claimed the whole of his inheritance, and learned to treat the greatest questions as respectfully and as honestly and as thoughtfully as he now treats the least, he and he alone must give their answer. A whole world waits to hear.

What, then, is the real attitude of science towards the ideas of God and Immortality? And what grounds are occupied by the Scientific school of modern religious thought?

In the first place I must say that science is not the set of opinions held by this or that scientific man or clique of scientific men. Real science is the great body of truths thus far discovered by the human mind, and established beyond dispute or reasonable doubt. It is neither more nor less than human knowledge, in all its various branches and departments. Nothing can be regarded as the assured and ultimate word of science on any subject, so long as the scientific world are divided in opinion concerning it; and even when the scientific world are agreed, it by no means follows that new discoveries may not require important modifications of accepted opinions. For science is ever increasing, without a y limits that can be assigned; and he is very rash and very foolish who pretends to set up barriers beyond which investigation is impossible. Let the distinction between science and the opinions of individual men of science be not forgotten. Nothing is more common than to hear individuals more or less versed in the knowledge of the times claiming the authority of science itself for very questionable theories, sometimes for the wildest vagaries. It is the tyro and the quack who boast; the great, wise thinkers are always modest. Neither Humboldt, nor Darwin, nor Agassiz, nor Vogt, nor Buechner, nor Huxley, nor any other, is the Pope of Science, nor claims to be. Whoever arrogates a practical infallibility either for himself or for his clique has yet to learn his first lesson in the true scientific spirit. The authority of science is the authority of Truth alone; and it rests on the fundamental principle that human reason, the universal reason of the race, is in the long run worthy to be supremely trusted.

Now I am very well aware, that the present attitude of science towards the ideas of God and Immortality is that of pure indifference. Busied with present problems, which indeed demand its first attention, science is simply laying the foundations of a great future edifice. The time has not yet come when it can leave this preparatory work for any cause. Sociology, psychology, ethics, and the allied branches, are scarcely capable as yet of a scientific treatment. Still less can we expect that branches higher still, involving the most intricate questions of philosophy, can be thus treated. For a long time to come the attention of the vast majority of men imbued with the spirit of science will be absorbed with questions that lie nearer the field of ever-widening discovery. I look far into the future, and venture to do no more than follow out present tendencies to their natural results. There is, I think, a good reason for the present indifference of science to the higher problems of thought, inasmuch as the data for their full solution are not yet gathered. But however ignored today, however impatiently thrust aside as interlopers in the province of scientific research, my conviction deepens, as the years go by, that science will at last take into its own hands interests which are now somewhat contemptuously abandoned to the care of priests. The Church is simply a "provisional government." The moral and spiritual concerns of humanity really require, more than any others, the wisdom of management that can come only from a scientific comprehension of their magnitude and importance. Hence, in the manifest irritability with which too many scientific men today turn their backs on religion, I see merely a proof that science itself is very young. When it has become more mature, it will demand to control by its own laws all human thinking on what most deeply concerns humanity.

Symptoms of this change of attitude, indeed, can be already discerned. A school of thinkers is gradually forming, devoted to the strictly scientific investigation of the highest problems. Within a few years such phrases as "the scientific study of theology," "the science of religion," etc., have become somewhat familiar to the public ear. What is called "Comparative Religion," that is, the critical study of the sacred writings and history and institutions of the various great religions of the world, is claiming a fitting place in the sisterhood of the sciences. Scholars of the highest eminence have pursued and are pursuing these investigations in the most strictly scientific spirit. None but the most ignorant or narrow minded man will sneer at their achievements. Their labors, however, are as yet bestowed mainly upon the more superficial phenomena. Not content with these outlying researches, others begin to indicate a tendency to study the substance of religion itself in the light of modern thought and according to the most rigorously scientific method. They propose to extend their inquiries to the ideas of God, of Immortality, of Duty, embracing everything that has passed under the name of religion, and subjecting it to the severest tests. In short, science is even now beginning to treat religion as within her own jurisdiction and amenable to her own laws.

The disrespect towards religion, however, which still pervades the scientific world, has been organized into a new and most curious religion under the name of Positivism, or, as it should be called, Comtism. Although its adherents are very few, its philosophy is widely diffused. Chief among its principles is this, that phenomena and their laws are the only proper subject of scientific investigation,—that all study of causes, in the strict sense of the word, is futile and pernicious. That is, all thought concerning God and Immortality and the soul is sheer waste of time, and should be discontinued to make way for profitable study. This intolerance of all religious problems, organized as it is into a system, I consider as a striking illustration of the "vealiness" which characterizes so much of the science of the day. The arbitrary exclusion of true causes from the proper subjects of investigation is an attempt to get rid, no matter how, of questions which Science is not yet prepared to discuss scientifically, and which therefore render him very uncomfortable. But it is idle, by noisy assertions of the impossibility of acquiring knowledge on subjects which yet excite the intensest interest of mankind, to seek to withdraw attention from them. What use to exclaim—"Think no longer of God or Immortality!"—when the very exclamation does but stimulate new thought on these very subjects? The Positive Philosophy, as propounded by Comte, asserts that the greatest of all questions are no questions at all; but herein it violates the true spirit of science, which refuses to acknowledge the right of any to set limits to its investigations. Dr. Lardner is said to have declared that he would eat the first steamer that should ever cross the Atlantic, so confident was he that ocean steam navigation was a scientific impossibility; and it is reported that the first printed copy of this rash vow was brought to America by the steamer itself. In my college days I heard a learned professor demonstrate the impossibility of sending communications through an ocean telegraph wire; and now who could dispense with the Atlantic cable? It is simple fatuity to mark out lives and bounds for science. There have been too many miniature Almighties, saying to the heaving sea of human thought—"Hitherto shalt thou come, and no farther; and here shall thy proud waves be stayed." They have had barely time to retreat, before the incoming tide washed out all traces of their foot-prints on the shore.

The plain fact is this. Scientific men, no less than men of the world, are divided in opinion on the profound questions of God and Immortality. One party asseverates that science settles them affirmatively; another party asseverates that science settles them negatively; a third party asseverates that science is dumb with regard to them. Which party is right? Or who can tell which party is right? Men have their private opinions; but has mankind yet pronounced an opinion? Is any fact more plain and incontestable than that, in the actual consciousness of the nineteenth century, the existence of a personal God (in any sense of those words) and the reality of a future life are subjects of deep, serious, perhaps agonizing doubt? Professor Huxley says [Lay Sermons, p. 142]:—

"As surely as every future grows out of past and present, so will the physiology of the future gradually extend the realm of matter and law, until it is co-extensive with knowledge, with feeling, and with action. The consciousness of this great truth weighs like a nightmare, I believe, upon many of the best minds of these days. They watch what they conceive to be the progress of materialism, in such fear and powerless anger as a savage feels, when, during an eclipse, the great shadow creeps over the face of the sun. The advancing tide of matter threatens to drown their souls; the tightening grasp of law impedes their freedom; they are alarmed lest man's moral nature be debased by the increase of his wisdom."

This passage fails to express exactly the nature of the feeling it describes, nor do I altogether like its spirit; but the description is substantially true. It is time to look facts squarely in the face, and drop all euphemistic disguises as to their purport. The progress of physical science has called the faith of mankind in God and Immortality into grave and most painful doubt. That is the naked, unvarnished truth. Thousand and thousands confess it in the secrecy of their own souls; and because they keep it secret, they suffer in isolation, and lose the great help that comes from sympathy. What is the use of keeping up a show of absolute certitude, if the central conviction is decayed? There is none whatever, but rather infinite mischief. Sincerity is strength; hypocrisy is weakness and cowardice.

Now the doubts which the Intuitionist school meets with absolute affirmations that hang, like Mahomet's coffin, in mid-air, the Scientific school of modern religious thought meets with frank recognition. It says,—"Yes, these doubts are real. They are rational. They are inevitable under the circumstances. They must be respected, and honestly, fearlessly treated. They are born of physical science, which knows nothing of a personal God or of Immortality. But physical science is not all; the appeal lies to universal science. By the verdict of universal science we must abide; bring the case before the court."

This is the attitude of the Scientific school in religion. It perceives (what no man in his senses can deny) that God and Immortality are today open questions in the thought of vast multitudes; and it makes no effort to evade the fact. It simply says,— and boldly proposes to push through to the other bank of the stream. The problems raised by science, it affirms, science alone can solve. The dogmas of the Church once gone, there is no reliance but on reason, reasonably used. To the queries of modern thought, the Intuitionist school can only reply by affirmation and re-affirmation, nodding everlastingly like a wooden Chinese mandarin in a tea-store; while the Scientific school proposes to take the doubting thought of the age, and try, at least, to think it through to the answer. That is the exact difference. The one school claims knowledge; the other seeks it. The one looks on doubt as an incomprehensible phenomenon, an obtuseness of perception, a mark of mental or spiritual inferiority; the other looks on it as the natural and inevitable activity of a keen intellect which has no data but those of physical science. The Scientific school admits that God and Immortality are indeed shut questions, if we have nothing to go upon but "matter and law;" but it insists that universal causative power, the intelligible unity of Nature, the "creative idea" in organic development, the moral sentiment in man, the religious affections, the spiritual instincts, sensibilities, and aspirations, the ideal hopes and struggles, the conscious freedom of the human soul considered as a part of Nature, are just as real facts, to be scientifically studied and interpreted, as any other facts,—demanding the same scientific investigation, with the same liberty to frame provisional scientific hypotheses, as the influence of dust on disease, the phenomena of fertilization, the results of deep sea dredgings, the photosphere, chromosphere and corona of the sun. The Scientific school avers that science is too modest by half, and insists that it claim control over fields which have hitherto been submissively surrendered to the Church, as if beyond its own proper province. It insists that all the facts of consciousness shall be included in the universal realm of science, and regarded as truly phenomena for scientific study as the relations of number and quantity, the processes of chemical combination, the fungoid origin of cholera, the origin of species, or the bright and dark lines in the solar and stellar spectra.

"Returning were as tedious as go o'er."

If, then, the Scientific school treats God and Immortality as open questions, it does so because they are living, momentous questions in the thought of the age, and holds that no questions which have an intellectual origin can ever find other than an intellectual solution. But it takes up these questions cheerfully, hopefully, fearlessly, knowing that reason leads to truth, and that truth alone, be it what it may, can really bless mankind. Perceiving that science as yet is ignorant of the absolutely unlimited extent of its own domain, the Scientific school would waken it to consciousness of its imperial future, and annex to the region of physical phenomena the hitherto unexplored region of spiritual phenomena. Science, it believes, can never lay claim to a true universality till this enlargement of its sphere is accomplished; and not till then will it be competent to give a trustworthy reply to questions which have their real origin in the spiritual nature of man.

In support of this conclusion, I would cite a sentence from John Stuart Mill [System of Logic, Bk. III. Ch. XIV.]—

"The ultimate laws of Nature cannot possibly be less numerous than the distinguishable sensations or other feelings of our nature; those, I mean, which are distinguishable from one another in quality and not merely in quantity or degree."

The moral law, then, known by the moral sentiment (which the keenest analysis fails to merge in other "feelings of our nature"), is an "ultimate law of Nature;" and how can science ever become universal, until it includes all such laws within the field of its investigation? Nothing will serve as foundation for a truly universal science but the totality of all phenomena; and if this be so, science is bound to consider all the problems which grow inevitably out of any class of phenomena. Thus I see not how it can escape the obligation of treating patiently and fairly questions it now postpones in a manner the reverse of patient and fair.

More than this. Not only must science so enlarge its sphere as to include the problems of God and Immortality which it now excludes, but it must approach their solution by the one universal method which is the secret of all its triumphs—the union of induction and deduction, resting on a basis of observed facts and leading to verifiable results. It will not beg the question, like the Intuitionist school. It will not take for granted the very truth to be discovered, by pleading the existence of a special faculty for intuitively knowing God and Immortality. It will not step outside of possible experience to fortify transcendental affirmations which find no basis within it; but it will so extend and enlarge the common conception of experience, that it shall cover the entirety of human consciousness, as well as the mere contact of this consciousness with the outer world, and thus include whatever mental phenomena the word intuition really stands for. Not as a special faculty cognizant of special objects, but only as a universal element in every possible act of knowledge, can the word intuition properly be used; and it is an abuse of the word and the thing to make it the support of an otherwise defenceless theory. The world sorely needs a scientific philosophy of mind. To settle the questions of God and Immortality by the appeal to intuition, when this appeal meets no response in myriads of the finest intellects and purest souls, is manifestly a mere assumption. A favored few cannot see for all mankind. The common faculties of the race must settle these great problems; and the solution must be such that any cultured mind can attain certainty for itself. The results of science always comply with this condition; for they are intelligible by any one with education enough to follow them. Its authority rests on the discovery of truth which any qualified person can verify or re-discover at his leisure. And the Scientific school relies on the scientific method alone, strictly applied to all phenomena and all facts, to attain answers to the great questions of religion.

Turning away, then, from the severe dogmas of the Church, and the milder dogmas of the Intuitionist school, the religious thought of this age is taking the direction of the Scientific school, with most earnest expectancy. It is yet too early to find a clear and decisive response. All that can be said is that science is beginning to study the great questions of God and Immortality, respectfully and patiently. In the chaos of opinions now prevailing, the Church and the Intuitionist school serve a most useful purpose in bridging the interval between the old and the new. The world is growing out of its infancy, and, being no longer able to rely undoubtedly on any mere affirmations, looks forward to the results of its own educated thought for answers to the deep, great problems that stir its heart. From the future, not the past, must the light stream.

I have thus faithfully, I think, portrayed the actual state of modern thought on the questions that move most profoundly the human soul. You ask, not without reason,—“Must we, then, wait for untold years before these vast questions of God and Immortality, on which the whole happiness of human life depends, can be answered? Are we indeed doomed, as individual men and women, to live and die in darkness?”

Friends, I must frankly meet this inquiry. Science alone must give, in its own time, the final reply to our anxious and earnest questions. Neither my reply, nor the reply of any other man, should be thrust forward as the sure verdict of the future. But for myself, having studied as earnestly as I could these momentous problems, I have become convinced that the final answer of science will but deepen, fortify, and exalt our human faith in God as intelligent, self-conscious Being, infinitely more tender and benign than our loftiest conceptions of human love; and I trust it will strengthen and purify and elevate our human hope of Immortality as continued individual existence. We must each of us work out for ourselves our private convictions, in the pure spirit of truth and in unflinching adherence to the laws of thought. Science must at last answer for the whole race; we must meanwhile answer for ourselves. And though it seems a hard thing to be thus thrown back upon ourselves, a hard thing to leave the undoubting assurances and affirmations of the past behind us, I believe that by so doing we shall fit ourselves most wisely and completely for the future life which I trust awaits us all. The only atheism and scepticism I really dread is that of unfaithfulness to truth, infidelity to the great law of duty and virtue written on our own souls. If we do but live aright, I believe deep in my inmost soul that, come what may, good and only good is in store for us, when our earthly day is done.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"For one year we have taken your paper entitled THE INDEX, for the purpose of knowing what was meant by Free Religion, so that we might be well posted, before denouncing what from the first we considered a most rash and unfounded movement on your part; and, as we thought, we have found your paper a most unchristian one. Perhaps, as you do not acknowledge the Christian name, you may feel flattered by the above appellation, but to us Christianity embodies all that is beautiful in life, and we have only read with pain and sorrow your bitter and denunciatory remarks against Christianity. If you had been able to produce a more beautiful character than Christ, to have shown us holier and more forcible teachings, in one word, to have given us a higher aim in life, we should have sustained your motives, though not wholly coinciding with them; but when your only aim has been to deride and abuse all that has been holy and sacred to us in life, then we must consider it our duty not only to stop your paper, but to use our voice against it in the strongest terms. You will therefore discontinue sending. We can only hope, Mr. Abbot, that with time you will acknowledge your great mistake that we have outgrown Christianity. Within its folds the highest freedom of thought and purpose is given; and until we attain unto the stature of Christ, we cannot look beyond. I call myself a radical Unitarian, and as such find the largest liberty given to man or woman."

—"Permit me to say that your article, in THE INDEX, of Jan. 7, on 'Modern Principles: a Synopsis of Free Religion,' is the culmination of everything the human mind has been reaching for these many, many centuries, and I do not know how a reasonable human being can differ with you. It does seem to me you have reached the top of an eminence, and a rest might be taken, at least for the remainder of the nineteenth century. We can look all the way back to Calvinism, the point from which we (I) started, and view the spiritual landscape from that point. Now I reverence all the past, because it takes all the past to make today, to bring together all those beautiful unities of which you speak. To my mind they seem like so many beautiful flowers, twined together by a master's hands and eventually their fragrance will permeate and purify humanity. Oh! how happy the thought—how I bless you for it! Go on, go on. And may the God of truth and purity guide and sustain you! When I took my pen, it was with a view to ask you to send to my husband's address 4 or 5 numbers of THE INDEX of Jan. 7, as I wish to send them to some of my friends; but I could not until I had written the above. Please pardon an old woman."

—"Like other luxuries, THE INDEX has, in one short year, become a necessity that I do not feel able to dispense with."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—Regular meetings of this Society will be held during the spring on Sunday forenoons, at 10½ o'clock, in Daniels' Block, corner of Jefferson and Summit Streets, in the hall over the U. S. Express Office. The public are cordially invited.

RECEIVED.

THE VOYSEY CASE, from an Heretical Standpoint. By MONCURE D. CONWAY. Published by THOMAS SCOTT, Mount Pleasant, Ramsgate. pp. 14.

BLAETTER FUER FREIES RELIGIOESSES LEBEN. Herausgegeben von Friedrich Schuenemann-Pott, Sprecher der "Deutschen Freien Gemeinde" in Philadelphia. April, 1871.

AMERICAN JOURNAL OF MICROSCOPY. Devoted to the Elucidation of Scientific and Popular Microscopy. E. M. HALE, M. D., Editor. Chicago: G. MEAD & Co., Publishers and Proprietors, 182 South Clark St. April, 1871. Vol. I, No. 1.

THE LADIES' REPOSITORY AND HOME JOURNAL. HITCHCOCK & WALDEN, Cincinnati, and St. Louis. April, 1871.

THE LADIES' OWN MAGAZINE. Edited by Mrs. M. CORA BLAND. Indianapolis. April, 1871.

THE PRESS. An Illustrated Journal. HORTON & LEONARD, Publishers, 108 & 110 Randolph Street, Chicago. April, 1871.

THE SONG JOURNAL. A Repertoire of Music and its Literature. Detroit: C. J. WHITNEY & Co., 197 Jefferson Avenue. April, 1871.

Poetry.

IF AT LAST.

"An Arab, journeying across a vast desert, wearily exclaimed—'I pray that, before I die, this my desire may be fulfilled, that, a river dashing its waves against my knees, I may fill my leathern sack with water!'"—SAADI.

With silent lip and unappealing eye,
And forehead bared to the unkindly sky,
I'll walk life's way, and find its burdens sweet,
Its burning sands like moss beneath my feet;

And from my heart no sob of grief shall rise,—
E'en when the fair mirage before me flies,
And I awake from weak fond dreams, wherein
I have beheld, dear love, what might have been.

Stout-hearted, I will spring to meet each day
Of dust and toil that bears me on the way;
And pain and thirst shall be unfelt, unknown,
If I may call thee, at the last, my own!

If, after patient years, I may but come
To dwell with thee in some sweet sylvan home,
And underneath life's soft autumnal sky
To live one little day before I die!

MIGNONETTE.

The Index.

APRIL 15, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

Contributors are requested to write on only one side of each sheet.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

INDUCEMENTS.—We would invite the special attention of our friends who cannot afford to give their services gratuitously in getting subscribers for THE INDEX, to the very liberal Cash Premiums offered in our Prospectus for 1871.

Whoever collects $150.00 for 75 subscriptions, is authorized to retain $50.00, forwarding $100.00.

Whoever collects $100.00 for 50 subscriptions, is authorized to retain $25.00, forwarding $75.00; and so on.

"TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES, OR REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX"—is the title of a neatly-printed tract of sixteen pages published by THE INDEX Association, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. One Hundred Copies will be sent for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate—one cent a copy. Packages will be sent free to those who will circulate them, but are unable to pay for them.

In our present issue we publish the lecture lately given in Boston, under the title—"Intuitionism versus Science; or the Civil War in Free Religion." We have altered this title, to prevent all misconstruction of our meaning. After the manuscript was in the printer's hands, we received by a pleasant coincidence (we do not regard it as a "special providence") an editorial contribution from Col. Higginson touching this very lecture; and we are thus enabled to print both in the same paper. Next week we propose to reprint several articles criticising the lecture.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

Mr. Parker Pillsbury, whose name is so intimately associated with the history of the great battle waged by a mere handful of abolitionists against the colossal evil of African slavery, and whose record is that of a true and brave soldier in the cause of human freedom, is one of the few engaged in that conflict who perceive that the fight is not yet done, but must be fought out on a higher plane. During the six months ending March 1, he lectured every Sunday to the Independent Society of Salem, Ohio; and the resolutions passed by the Society on the termination of this engagement, which were published a few weeks ago in THE INDEX, show that his services gave great and general satisfaction. Although urged strongly by his friends in Salem to renew his engagement, Mr. Pillsbury preferred to enter on a wider field of work; and he has lately given courses of lectures on radical religion in Toledo and Indianapolis, and single lectures in Cincinnati, Dayton, and Lansing, which were attended by large and attentive audiences.

For the purpose of continuing the work so successfully begun, Mr. Pillsbury desires invitations from liberal societies or committees all through the country; and is prepared either to give courses of several lectures on successive evenings, or to make engagements for single Sundays if desired. In this work, he wishes it to be understood that he is an independent lecturer, speaking for himself alone, neither committing nor being committed by any other parties whatever. He goes out to utter the truth as he himself conceives it, asking counsel of none but himself what he shall say; and of course he is not to be regarded as a "missionary" of the Free Religious (or any other) Association.

At the same time, having heard three of the lectures he has prepared, we believe that few speakers have equal ability to promote the cause of spiritual emancipation. Against his personal character we have never heard so much as a single syllable of detraction; and of his courage, wit, mastery of vivid rhetoric, earnestness of devotion to truth and justice, and power to arrest and hold the attention of a mixed audience, no one will doubt who has once listened to him.

Having thus already devoted himself to the same general objects as THE INDEX, Mr. Pillsbury has made an arrangement with its editor and proprietors by which he will make it a special object to introduce the paper as an organ of the most advanced religious thought of the times; and he will report progress through its columns as regularly as shall prove convenient and agreeable to him. He is hereby authorized to receive subscriptions, form clubs, and take whatever other measures shall be found useful in increasing its circulation. Invitations to lecture and other communications may be addressed to him at THE INDEX Office, Toledo, O., and will be promptly forwarded. For the present he expects to be at the East, but will return before long to the West, which he proposes to make his principal field of labor; and we trust our friends everywhere will make an effort to give him a hearing, for the sake of THE INDEX and (what is far more important) for the sake of the cause to which THE INDEX is devoted.

A few weeks ago there was published in Zion's Herald, of Boston, a sermon by a certain Mr. Dorchester, making violent and most bitter attacks on Thomas Paine and other so-called "infidels." The editor of the paper had the effrontery, in a prefatory note, to request THE INDEX and the Golden Age to republish this tissue of indecencies and defamations,—as if any respectable sheet would lend itself to the propagation of such a malignant libel. The writer of the sermon repeated, as authentic history, disgraceful charges made by Cheetham against Madame Bonneville and Mr. Paine, which were proved to be false and punished as slander in the New York Courts by a fine of two hundred and fifty dollars, and which were during the trial admitted to be false by the counsel of Cheetham himself. The handsomely bound reprint of Vale's "Life of Thomas Paine," just issued by Mr. J. P. Mendum, the veteran proprietor of the Boston Investigator, contains a full and circumstantial refutation of this and similar charges. If Rev. Mr. Dorchester had not evidently "given himself over to believe a lie," this book would deceive him; but the spirit of his sermon is too evident. Those who wish to know the truth about one of the most ungratefully used friends America has ever had, will do well to read this volume. For sale at the Investigator Office, 84 Washington St., Boston.

The subjoined paragraph from the Boston Congregationalist will show that Mr. Towne is logically consistent, and does not flinch from calling himself a Calvinist as well as a Christian. In truth we do not see why he is not as much one as the other. But the hard-headed and hard-hearted old fellow who burned Servetus for heresies which were tame enough by the side of Mr. Towne's, would, we fancy, be slightly astonished at receiving such an adherent:—

Our notice of the last number of Mr. Towne's Examiner has elicited from the editor a letter of considerable length, which has interested us not a little, and is remarkable for its candor. We make room for the following extract:—

"Indeed, Sir, I not only am a Christian, in my own honest belief, but I am a Calvinist, and mean some day to show that Jonathan Edwards and John Calvin saw principles which could not but result at last, as they have in me, in pure theism, sharply separated from Christism. Knowing, therefore, as I think I do, that a great burden of prophecy is directly laid upon me by the Spirit and Providence of God, and feeling day by day, as I do, that invisible agencies—I know not how, I never had any 'spiritualistic' experience—are directing many of the most important events of my life, and are doing this particularly since I undertook the Examiner, I cannot help feeling that my work is an honest work, even while I am deeply conscious of not doing it in the wisest way, and am all ready to accept defeat for now, as still necessary to teach me how best to perform the task which it is my destiny to undertake."

The Banner of Light publishes a very long but interesting account of the hearing of the petition of the American Liberal Tract Society for incorporation by special enactment, before a committee of the Massachusetts Legislature. Good reasons were urged why the petition should be granted; but the petitioners had "leave to withdraw." There is not yet enough love of liberty in the old Bay State to accord equal privileges to orthodox and unorthodox societies. The spirit of religious tyranny will never be broken, until Christianity as a system is outgrown by the people. Every such manifestation of intolerance, however, hastens the hour of emancipation, and opens the eyes of fresh multitudes to the arrogant domination of the church party. America will never be free till she is dechristianized.

See advertisement of The Golden Rule, a new paper edited in part by Rev. J. L. Hatch, the Unitarian clergyman who has been so active in distributing tracts in Boston, and who was arrested, tried, and acquitted on charges brought by "Young Christians" of that city of extremes.

CONTENTS OF THE RADICAL FOR APRIL.—1. The Problem of the New Philosophy. Huxley, Spencer, Mill, and Bain as Exponents of English Thought.—Francis Gerry Fairfield. 2. The Pioneer.—Myron B. Benton. 3. Goethe's Conversations with Mueller.—Translated by C. C. Shackford. 4. The Antiquity of Man. 5. The Fire Balls of Jerusalem.—William Williams. 6. The Radical Club. 7. Annie Beckett. A Story in Three Chapters. III. The Higher Vocation. 8. Incarnation. E. C. P. 9. Notes.—Horace Greeley's defence of the Miraculous.—"Park-Street Pulpit."—Justice one thing above and another below the sky.—Elder Knapp and his "devils."—Tremont Temple.—Mr. Hatch and his arrest for distributing "Tracts."—The "Praying Band" out West.—Communications, &c.

LOOKING SCIENCE IN THE FACE.

Anybody on board ship can perceive a dangerous rock after the vessel is on it; but to keep a look-out ahead for it, needs a man with sharp eyes. In times of intellectual change, we value that man most who has the sharpest eyes; who can see, farthest off, the rocks and shoals that we are approaching. After we are fairly among them, we all see them for ourselves.

The precise value of Mr. Abbot's "Civil War in Free Religion" lay in this, that he pointed out a divergence of opinion among us which had not yet been sufficiently developed to be put into words by any one else. The phrase "Civil War" seemed to me an unfortunate one, because it would perhaps give to profane outsiders an impression not merely of divergence, but of discord. But the divergence itself is both undeniable and encouraging. For the Free Religious Association does not exist as an end, but as a means, and we must all long for "more light yet," like John Robinson at Leyden.

I suppose that I should fall within Mr. Abbot's class of Intuitionists by nature, while yet confessing to much sympathy with the side of science. But we should all agree in the importance of having all temperaments and points of view represented in our ranks. When the constitution of the Free Religious Association was first reported, Lucretia Mott shook her head a little at the phrase "scientific study of theology," while others demurred a little at the expression "increase fellowship in the spirit." But probably we should all now agree in thinking it better to combine both, and secure for our body both a heart and a brain.

The thing I like best in Mr. Abbot's address is that it meets boldly the question—suppose the conclusions of science to be at last given against the doctrine of personal immortality or the existence of a God, what then? Cannot we meet that alternative? Mr. Abbot meets it fearlessly; and herein is stronger than the Christian theologians are wont to be. They are apt to concede with Paul, "If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable." I find no such thrill of moral exaltation in this doubtful utterance, as when Rama in the "Ramayana" dashes the tears from his eyes, and says, "I was wrong. Virtue is a service man owes to himself, and though there were no heaven, nor any God to rule the world, it were not less the binding law of life." In comparing religions, against the greater tenderness which pervades the Christian ethics there is to be set the tonic of the soul which comes from teachings like this.

I do not wish to have my faith and hope and courage depend upon the result of an historical investigation, or a chemical analysis. Is there no deeper foundation? The Hindu Rama, and the Roman Epictetus believed in virtue on firmer grounds, it seems. When a man tells us in his theological book that, "without belief in a future life, virtue were madness and folly," I count that man a craven, and his doctrine demoralizing, were he twenty times a Christian. When a man looks the science of this age in the face and says, "I believe in God and immortality; but supposing you disprove them, all will yet be well," then I count that man strong, though all the churches in the universe disown him.

Personally I have no doubts as to personal immortality, and none as to Deity—if one may be excused from definition. But I have never been able to see that atheists were worse men than other people, nor is it very apparent why they should be. It is very pleasant to believe in immortality; the thought warms and encourages one, and makes sorrow easier to bear; but should it finally be disproved (of which I have no fear), the Law of Right would be the same, and its observance would lead to the same results at least, in this world. Nine-tenths of the motives which practically influence men would remain the same, whatever the verdict of science on our origin or destiny; and for one I feel grateful to Mr. Abbot for recalling us to this firm ground, and confronting fearlessly this "pale spectre" which Dr. McCosh holds in such superfluous terror. It is refreshing to stand where no possible alternative can overthrow one's confidence in the Eternal Law.

T. W. H.

FELLOWSHIP IN SPIRIT.

The indications are not few that the era of a new religious fellowship is approaching,—of a fellowship that will be based on the natural unity of human intelligence and conscience, and that will be as broad, therefore, as humanity itself. This is what we may call unity of spirit: unity, not in belief necessarily, not in any claim to a special and exclusive revelation of truth, but in general aim and purpose, and in the common substance of religious and ethical perception. The indications are not wholly wanting even in the religious sects. Though the sects still keep their nominal lines of separation, and the principle of disintegration is still at work in some of them, and must work until right of individual freedom is established, yet they are beginning to reach out hands of fellowship across the sectarian bounds, and those that lie theologically contiguous are not infrequently forming alliances, offensive and defensive, for gaining some common advantage. The Presbyterians, who split into several fragments years ago, have of late partially reunited into a single sect.

But in religious organization the principle of creed or ecclesiasticism still dominates to a great degree, and we yet find lamentable instances of sectarian narrowness and hostility. It is outside of the organization of the church that the indications of the coming spiritual fellowship of humanity can be best discerned. One sign we may see in the political world. The tendency now is to civil unity,—to civil unity, however, not through the principle of Cæsarism, but through that of popular equality. In Germany, States and fragments of States have gravitated into one strong nationality. Prussian ambition and Hohenzollern pride may have been instruments in the work, but the real cause is the inherent desire of the German people to come out of their isolated political individualism into civil brotherhood. We have seen the same process in Italy,—the movement to unity gradually gathering strength until it has been able to withstand the entire power of the Catholic Church to take possession of Rome in the name of the sovereignty of Italy. And in our own country, our civil war was not only to put down rebellion and restore the Union, but it was to restore the Union on the basis of a larger and truer fellowship.

We may see the same tendency to unity in the province of social economy. Co-operation is the great modern word to indicate this gravitation of people to each other for the improvement of their material and social condition. The people are everywhere learning that in union there is strength. In England and on the continent of Europe, as also to some extent in America, co-operative societies of all kinds are springing up, by which the classes of people devoted to physical labor, weak when standing alone, are combining their energies in a very formidable and effective way for obtaining their ends. In these societies, common aspirations, wants, hopes, are being consolidated into efficient social force. Hands are reached across from one lowly and destitute home to another, and from the warmth and strength of the grasp, new life comes into weary hearts and new power is gained for rising out of the imbruting conditions of poverty and ignorance. In this principle of co-operation we may see perhaps the solution of the unhappy struggle between capital and labor, and the dawn of a more equitable condition of social life than civilization has yet achieved.

Again, in commerce and in the growing intercourse of nations we may note the same tendency towards a truer human fellowship. The new modes and exigencies of commerce are introducing the nations more intimately to each other. The steamship and railroad and telegraph are bringing people that have long lived apart and in ignorance of each other, into close proximity as neighbors; and the proximity is disclosing the fact that under all external differences, people belong to the same stock, and have at heart the same fundamental elements of religion and morality. The disposition grows, therefore, to open the doors more hospitably to one another, in the belief that the various countries of the globe are but homes of one neighborhood where families may dwell together in unity and mutual helpfulness and peace.

Now looking to this tendency to fellowship in its various forms, it is easy to see what is its most distinguishing characteristic. It is human equality,—every man in respect to rights the peer of his fellow-man: not, of course, equality of intelligence, not equality of material or moral condition—that is manifestly not true—but equality in respect to mental and moral and material rights.

And these tendencies will naturally lead to, and culminate in, the same democratic doctrine applied to spiritual rights. The true spiritual unity and fellowship can rest on no narrower basis than that of absolute human equality in respect to religious rights. It will admit no claim to monopolies in divine inspiration and spiritual knowledge. The nations, civilizations, and religions called pagan, instead of being superciliously commanded to sit at the feet of Christianity as if they had only to learn, will be asked to contribute the best they have to the common welfare of the whole. The new science of Comparative Theology, following in the path of the freer commercial and social intercourse of nations and races, is a significant indication of the broader base of spiritual fellowship that is gradually being established. The corner stone of this fellowship is, that the natural intelligence and conscience of every human being is worthy of respect, and has a right to the freest utterance and to the most favorable conditions for development. This principle once clearly recognized and acted upon, people will be drawn by natural sympathy and regard into true spiritual unity. Dogmatism and spiritual arrogance will drop away; sectarian lines will gradually get worn out; but reverent, truth-seeking men and women of all nations and various religious antecedents, will come together, humbly ready to welcome light from any source, and heartily desirous to know the right and to help each other to higher life.

W. J. P.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

THE "REMOVAL" OF CHARLES SUMNER.

GENESEO, N. Y., March 30, 1871.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—Although a subscriber to THE INDEX and its constant reader, I have been accidentally prevented from reading the last two numbers of it until within the last day or two. In the first of these numbers, that of the 18th instant, I meet with an article, entitled—"Personal Government," which I frankly avow has sadly shaken my confidence in both your judgment and temper. That it has appeared in the same light to a very large proportion of your most enlightened and patriotic readers, I entertain no shade of doubt. They had come to regard you as a wise and dispassionate reformer, self-devoted to the noble task of emancipating your countrymen from the degrading thralldom of a hoary superstition. With painful surprise they see you in this article exhibit yourself as a blind, vindictive political partizan. You appear to look upon Mr. Sumner as a demigod, instead of the consummate, signally heartless and unscrupulous egotist they know him to be. His associates in the Senate, chosen representatives of the States of the American Union, among whom there are not wanting men who, in every element of character which confers a title to respect, are his superiors, you seem to regard as pigmies bound to render homage to your idol. For what you erroneously phrase the "removal" of Mr. Sumner from the chairmanship of the Committee of Foreign Relations, you invoke upon them "the swiftest and most indignant rebuke." Pie! pie! Mr. Abbot. This is preposterous, as well as very spiteful. Is this the spirit of that "Free Religion" you have hitherto so persuasively and successfully taught us?

Apparently wholly unmindful of the hostile attitude so wantonly assumed by Mr. Sumner towards the President, which, in my deliberate judgment, and in that, I venture to assert, of all clear-headed and impartial men, unfitted him for re-appointment to the post he had by the favor of his peers so long occupied, you seem to imagine that it belonged to him by right, and that the majority of Senators who voted against him are little better than robbers. For my own part, I was mortified at the apparent hesitancy of the Republican members of the Senate to make the change, and at the lack of a larger majority in its favor. The scurrilous language you indulge yourself in towards the Republican party and the apparent cordiality with which you consign it to its "grave," naturally revive the memory of the terrible anathemas of his Holiness the Pope at the close of the late Ecumenical Council at Rome. I will only add, in conclusion, that I have been impelled to give utterance to these strictures far more by sorrow than by anger, for I see in your untoward article a staggering blow to the continued confidence of your readers in the soundness of your judgment and your probity. A grievous error in point no less of policy than of ethics, I would fain forget it and cherish the hope that you may repent of it.

A. C.

[If the above communication were a criticism upon a contributed and not an editorial article, our rule requiring courtesy would have prevented its publication. We allow no contributor to our columns to reflect upon the "probity" of any other contributor. We waive this rule in our own case.

Charles Sumner is no "idol" of ours. He has, doubtless, private faults—who has not?—but they are his concern, not ours. If ever a public man, however, had an unblemished public record, Mr. Sumner has it; and to stigmatize him as "unscrupulous," indicates a spirit which we decline to characterize as it deserves. The cause of our indignation at the action of the Senate has nothing to do with any like or dislike of Mr. Sumner. We should have felt it equally in the case of any other man. The sole reason offered for this action by Senators themselves was that Mr. Sumner was not in pleasant "personal relations" with the President; and if the brazen avowal of such a reason as this for re-casting senatorial committees is not enough to make Americans blush to the very roots of their hair at sight of their country's shame, it is because the fires of freedom have died out in their hearts. Whoever wants a Senate independent of Executive control,—whoever wants an Executive which shall respect this independence,—whoever wants to see the principles of Free Religion put to some better use than that of parlor ornaments,—will find no fault with the substance of what we said. These principles, not theoretical only but applied, are dearer to us than any party or any man; and we shall accept without whimpering whatever fortune they may bring us. "Dispassionate," indeed, we aim to be, but not bloodless; and whenever we feel it a duty to speak, speak we shall, though every subscriber to THE INDEX should stop his paper the next morning.

We are glad to add that the President's recent utterances have done much to re-instate him in public regard. Viewing them as indicating a renunciation of his purpose to interfere with the independence of the Senate, we trust that Senators will cease to consider his "personal relations" towards their fellows in electing their own committees.—Ed.]

THE WAR OF WORDS.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

Could not a good deal of ink-shed be saved among the Radicals, and some bad feeling and misrepresentation too, by having a definition of the terms to be used in discussions about Christianity? This word Christianity is not only capable of, but is actually understood and used in, various senses.

1. It means the religion of the Catholic Church, to the exclusion of all others. Millions so regard it; for the overwhelming majority of "Christians," that is, the professed followers of Jesus, are Catholics. Although Jeremy Taylor said there was only a paper wall between the Episcopal Church and the Catholics, still if Bishop Potter, of New York, should become converted, he would be re-baptized, and treated as if he had been a heathen all his life.

2. The term means Protestantism in general, as distinguished from Catholicism. Hence the saying—"The Bible is the religion of Protestants." But the sects of Protestantism denounce and unchurch each other as they do Catholics. The Baptist will not commune with the Presbyterian, nor the Presbyterian with the Baptist. So that Protestantism is only an imaginary term, and the sects of Protestantism, whose name is legion, for they are many, from the very fact of being sects deny the Christianity of each other.

3. Then Christianity is the religion of the Bible—Old Testament as well as New. This is an abstract idea, independent of Church organizations altogether. Hence when a clergyman or deacon gets drunk, or commits any great crime, people say—"That is not the religion of the Bible; the Bible condemns such conduct as unchristian." I say Old Testament as well as New. The most of the churches, Catholic and Protestant, believe in the plenary inspiration of the Bible, and would deny the Christianity of a man who should reject the Jewish Scriptures as decidedly as if he should reject the New Testament. To this class belong the whole Presbyterian family, who say—"The whole or none."

4. Christianity is the teachings of the Evangelists concerning the sayings and doings of Jesus. Those who take this view regard the four Gospels as records, while they understand the Epistles as simply containing the opinions and directions of the followers of Jesus. I think the Unitarians and Universalists take this view, as they find in the Epistles much that will not comport with their creeds.

5. Then there are those who regard Christianity as the undisputed teaching of Jesus when he defined the sum of religion, the whole of the Law and the Prophets, as consisting in supreme love to God and equal love to man. This being the substratum of all the old religions, and the sum total of Natural Religion, it is no wonder that Theodore Parker, and thousands of others, should regard it as the absolute religion, revealed by the Almighty to man in his works and ways, and universal in every age and country.

6. Then there are the Evangelicals with their definitions. They embrace those of every sect who repudiate all these five definitions as mere externals—mere historical faiths which the devils have as well as men, and hold that alone to be a Christianity worth having which consists in a living faith in Jesus Christ as the atoning sacrifice to the wrath of an offended God. The motive to all well-doing among these professors is gratitude to Jesus for saving them from eternal burnings. This definition is the basis of the Sunday School literature which is beginning to sit so heavily on the average religious stomach. It is the motive power of the Young Men's Christian Associations, an institution which has really taken the place of the Church as a benevolent and reforming body, leaving to the ministry the ceremonial display on the Sabbath which is called "attending to the Word and Sacraments."

Now here are at least six different conceptions of Christianity, really held by large classes of intelligent people who undertake to discuss with each other! It reminds me of what must have been the practical effect of the confusion of tongues at the Tower of Babel, when a workman who asked his fellow for a mallet was handed a saw. If either of the six definitions of Christianity, except the fifth, be correct, I am no Christian. But if the fifth be correct, I am a Christian. So have thousands of other men been who were denounced by the exclusives as Infidels.

I see no prospect of a termination of this logomachy, when men as distinguished for honesty and accurate thinking as the Radicals are keep up the war. If I were an Editor, I would allow no man to occupy my columns to make confusion worse confounded, by discussing the most important of all subjects, religion, without giving a distinct definition of the term before he begins. Some men have imaginary Christs according to their idiosyncrasies, unknown altogether to history. Others have ideal systems of religion which they baptize "Christianity," but which other judges call infidelity. Give us a nomenclature. Let us understand each other. If a druggist labels a paper of strychnine "cream of tartar," somebody will be likely soon to need a coffin. How much more important is truth than life!

BEZA.

[We have given repeatedly our own definitions of "Christianity" and "religion," as in the Fifty Affirmations and Modern Principles; nor does our valued correspondent over-estimate the importance of definition in discussion. Until people can define their ideas, they cannot be said to have definite ideas. But the question is, which of all the various definitions of Christianity offered is the true one? Discussion must continue until this point is settled; and we believe it will never be settled, until people stop burrowing in their own consciousness for the true definition of an historical fact, and consent to treat Christianity as they treat other religions. When they adopt this method, we modestly expect that our definition will be substantially confirmed.—Ed.]

DO MANKIND NEED A NEW REVELATION?

DETROIT, March 4, 1871.

THE INDEX of today contains a sermon by the Rev. Dr. Powers, of Chicago, contrasting the merits of Free Religion with Christianity, which you have slightly reviewed, and upon which I wish to offer a few comments.

The Rev. Doctor, like the followers of Jesus generally, finds in his character, his example, teachings, and history, the full measure of divine gifts to humanity. He asserts that Christianity is the panacea for every evil afflicting the human family, and that nothing ever has or ever will be so perfectly adapted to their ultimate redemption. Hence there is, as he says, no necessity for any new revelation.

If the Rev. Doctor would omit generalities and fulsome laudations concerning the teaching and history of Christ, which he states have made Christianity the crystallization of all virtues, and confine himself instead to what Christ really did say and do when on earth, it would be easily enough to show him that his character, so far from being pure holiness, was tainted with many of the faults common to men. Very many of Christ's precepts and examples would not bear repetition in our day. The gospels, though the record of his admirers, concealing as they easily might and naturally would, are still full of deeds which a perfect being could never have done or uttered.

I do not propose to question the existence of Christ. This has been done by far abler pens than mine. But if we assume that he really was one-third of the Godhead (as trinitarians claim him to be), the Triune God must be an imperfect being, if made up of imperfect parts. This we may want to consider hereafter.

I propose controverting the idea assumed by the Rev. Doctor and by the orthodox clergy generally, that in Christ the mission of mercy and redemption was so complete, that mankind can find nothing wanting,—cannot desire a loftier and more comprehensive system than that created by him. This I regard as an illusion and fiction that will not bear critical examination for a moment.

The Rev. Doctor states that God's laws, revealed through Christ and embodied in Christianity, are "most satisfying, inspiring, benevolent, divinely renewing and consoling to the human heart. We cannot exhaust its fulness. While it is passionate devotion to the person of Jesus, it has all the great moral ideas that can benefit mankind or are in the world, etc."

Dismissing all this beautiful rhetoric and idolatry (for devotion to the person of Christ is nothing less than idolatry), let us consider the real situation of mankind in 1871. The world has tried all God's plans for its regeneration since the days of Moses, over three thousand years; and for over eighteen hundred years those of the Father and Son combined. It would seem as if this was certainly time enough for any moral medicine to take effect, especially if given by a physician who never errs, and has full knowledge of the disease and the power to make his remedy sure. If he can speak the universe into existence, or make the heavens flee away as a scroll, he certainly ought to do the lesser wonders.

So far from finding the plans and purposes of this Being and those of his Son or other agents (down to the Rev. Doctor) perfect and sufficient for the world's redemption from the vices and miseries which we all too forcibly realize to cavil about, we find that less than one-sixth (perhaps not a sixtieth, or even a six-thousandth) of the human family have, after eighteen hundred years of trial, any faith in their redeeming qualities whatever. Mahomet's scheme, begun six hundred years later than Christ's, has achieved as great success, at least in point of numbers; but it is in spite of both that the world is still groping slowly and blindly onward in the direction of knowledge and civilization, with the dim light which science has furnished, and which the teachers of Christianity have most valiantly struggled to extinguish. It is by the aid of science that man has learned how to protect himself from the elements, and enjoy more of the fruits and luxuries which the earth affords.

So far as a purer morality is concerned, it is doubtful if any higher standard of virtue, mercy, or justice prevails among mankind at this day than existed two thousand years since. The teachings of Plato and Confucius and other sages are as exalted as any which Christ or any one since their day has taught.

Nor is virtue peculiar to Christian people or countries. Every traveller bears testimony to the fact that pagans teach or practise as high sentiments of morality and justice as are found anywhere in the world. The morals of the Hindus excite the admiration of Christian missionaries. The precepts of the Chinese are unsurpassed by any for high and pure tone. Even Commodore Wilkes reiterates the testimony of the missionaries that the Fiji cannibals, so far from being sunk in total depravity, indulge in their repasts from conscientious motives inculcated through their religious teachers.

The truth is, human nature has been essentially the same everywhere for ages. All countries show about the same extremes of character. Mungo Park and Dr. Livingstone testify that in Central Africa they found the sweetest and holiest affections of humanity manifested by "savages." In our country, every morning paper contains a fearful record of crime in all parts of our land—Christianized though it claims to be, with a moral police of fifty thousand ministers to protect society. Under the tallest steeple, you will find the darkest vices; and, as a rule, the more profession of righteousness, the greater reality of sin. Nowhere on our globe can greater social, moral, and political corruption be found than where the churches peal forth their sweetest tones from steeple and pulpit. Go through the houses and shops within their sound; inquire into the heart-miseries which are unseen and unknown to the world, until death or violence reveals them; and the exposure would be appalling. . . .

But the question arises, can any revelation to mankind redeem them from the sin and disease which so fearfully pollutes them? Christianity has been tried for centuries and has proved a lamentable failure. It would be blasphemous in the last degree to charge all this upon a perfect being, as God is claimed to be. Nature's efforts are too slow, and man must hasten and perfect them. There is certainly need enough for trying some better system for the world's redemption than any so far made. God's experiments have been fearful failures. Nature's may be certain, but are too slow. Hence the work is left for man.

The advocates of Free Religion think there is a scheme worth trying. If it fails, it can do no worse than its predecessors have done.

Free Religion proposes inculcating the sentiment that Humanity should stand upon its own dignity, and aim to develop the higher and nobler intuitions and aspirations for justice and righteousness which are implanted in the breast of every individual; that instead of prostrating himself at the feet of any idol, and doing homage to the authority or power of any person or being, living or mythical, it is the highest duty for each and all to cultivate earnestly the noblest and purest sentiments of truth, mercy and love, guided by the wisdom attained through knowledge and research, so as to fit us all for the duties of time, and for progressive exaltation through eternity. It therefore teaches that all should aspire to discover and obey the highest dictates of justice and righteousness, each for himself, without infringing in the smallest degree upon the rights or dignity of others. Then the necessity for any external law will be obviated. A reign of true democracy will exist. Each will be a law unto himself. Governments and injustice will be unknown. No higher authority than individual sovereignty would be recognized or known, and the millennium which every true reformer, every lover of humanity, so earnestly prays for, will be at last inaugurated.

Christianity cannot accomplish these grand results because its aims and purposes are not sufficiently exalted, but, on the contrary, are puerile, obscure and contradictory. A higher, holier and purer religion is therefore indispensable for the world's purification and regeneration. The germs of this are implanted in man's nature, are intuitively recognized, need only to be fully developed into a glorious fruition of righteousness.

All religions have admitted that the human race have been plunged in sin for many thousands of years, and, of course, needing salvation. Each one of them has claimed to be the panacea which would cure the evils and discords resulting from this sinful state of mankind; but, like the patent medicines of our day, most of them after a brief run of popularity have disappeared. Christianity has existed about eighteen hundred years, and has been the popular religion of many countries; but, as we have seen, it fails immensely short of fulfilling the great purposes that a religion ought to serve. It has never made certain to mankind a knowledge of the duties necessary to secure righteousness here, or to enlighten us as to what the future will be. On the contrary, it is nothing more than a mass of contradictory assertions and conjectures, which have divided its profes-ed believers into countless discordant sects, vehemently assailing each other and plotting each other's destruction. This would seem to be conclusive evidence that, like all the other religions which have perished, Christianity contains within itself the seeds of decay, and must inevitably become extinct. It merely represents the religious status of mankind during the period of its existence; and when the world has attained a higher and more exalted state, it will need a higher and more exalted religion, which it seems to me Free Religion alone can furnish.

GEO. B. SMITH.

FOUR QUESTIONS TO MR. M'CLINTOCK.

MR. ABBOT:—On reading Mr. Thos. M'Clintock's article criticising your "Modern Principles," I desired to ask him some questions. If his idea of a God is so essential to us all, it is important that we should clearly understand it. He does not find the idea of a "God of love"—"an infinite father and mother"—infinite in every attribute, clearly stated in them, as an object of love, trust and worship.

1. Is his God the responsible cause of suffering?
2. Is he or is he not, a "father and mother?" Does he sympathize with the sufferer?
3. Sympathy is suffering per se; and if God does sympathize with the sufferer—with his suffering children,—how can he be infinitely, perfectly, or entirely happy?

4. If he has no sympathy, no pity for the sufferer, for his or her children, why call him or her God or good?

I beg Mr. M'Clintock to make his answer to these questions so brief and plain that all can clearly understand him. They are not asked in the spirit of the caviller, but in an honest desire to understand,—to have a clear idea why the "Christian's God" should be worshipped. The emotion of worship, with no clear idea of the object worshipped, is heathenish.

EAST STOCKHOLM, N. Y.

AUSTIN KENT.

A CORRECTION.

MR. ABBOT:

A few words with your permission to friend Chapellsmith. What I said in my article of Dec. 31, seems not to be quoted with entire accuracy. Correctly stated, it is this—that I could not recognize as logical the position that intelligence results (as assumed) from the organization of matter that did not previously involve at least the principle of intelligence. Whilst chemical analysis may disclose all the elements constituting any given compound of matter, it certainly cannot discover in such compound any element which does not inhere in it as a component part; and material elements only can be thus discovered. Metaphysical analysis, however, discovers and establishes its results with equal accuracy and reliability, and is the true pioneer of physical discoveries.

In the same article I intended to suggest where the "younger and more scientific authors" could find the true basis for all reliable scientific theories; and I have nothing better to offer now. When men of science present their crude hypotheses for adoption by the unlearned (and all hypotheses are to be embraced in that category that are not proved), they ought at least to offer something congruous with the laws of thought.

Sincerely yours,

K. N.

P. S. If we cannot select two of the "exponents of English thought who think alike," what is English thought?

MARCH 31, 1871.

ORTHODOXY IN A NUTSHELL.

Two men, both elderly, met one day in the small country town of Banff, Scotland, old acquaintances but of adverse religious opinions. One was a strict Calvinist and elder of the church, well acquainted with scripture, and able to quote it glibly in support of all he said. The other was equally acquainted with the Bible, but claimed the Protestant right of private judgment, declined to believe on mere authority, and had left the church in accordance with his convenience, although many of his friends had told him he would be damned for doing so. These two had had many a stiff argument to convert one another, but without effect.

On this occasion the subjects discussed were the doctrine of original sin, and of the atonement, with the usual result. They had had a long battle; but time and tide wait for no one, and they had to part, and the elder, or the orthodox man, got this parting salute from his free-thinking brother. With a strong look of pity and sympathy for his benighted condition, he said: "Oh mon! do ye really believe that the Lord Almichty, Ruler of the Universe, wad hae sent his ain son down to this bit earth, to rove about at the carpenter business, and jist to be killed to pacify himself? Hoots! fie, man." With that he wheeled away.

F.

An Ohio man who passed around a plate at a religious meeting for contributions for the heathen, and then pocketed the money, has been acquitted of stealing by a jury of the vicinage, on the ground that he was the greatest heathen they knew, and therefore justly entitled to the money.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Nature's Gifts, SCIENTIFICALLY DEVELOPED

As mankind, from indiscretion or other causes, have been doomed to suffer from disease, so also has remedy for disease been provided. Our hills and valleys abound with roots and herbs, which if scientifically prepared and compounded, will restore health and vigor to the invalid. To find such a remedy we should seek one that has stood the test of age.

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

A
Sure Cure for Liver Complaint, Sure Cure for Dyspepsia,
Sure Cure for Debility, Sure Cure for Jaundice,
Sure Cure for Marasmus,
And all affections arising from weakness or want of action in the Liver or Digestive Organs. The great remedy for

IMPURE BLOOD,
And all diseases arising from it. The great preventive of
FEVER AND AGUE!

It is an impossibility for any one to have fever and ague, if they will use a few bottles of this remedy each spring and fall.

$100 $100 $100

Will be given for any case of this disease that occurs to any one that uses the Bitters or Tonic as a preventive.

Those who have the Fever and Ague will find, after the chills have stopped, that by using a few bottles of the Bitters or Tonic, the disease will not return.

These remedies will rebuild their Constitution faster than any other known remedy.

The remedies were placed before the public thirty years ago, with all the prejudices of so-called "patent medicine" operating against them, but gradually their virtues became known, and now, to day, they stand at the head of all preparations of their class, with the indorsement of eminent judges, lawyers, clergymen and physicians.

Read the following symptoms and if you find that your system is affected by any of them, you may rest assured that disease has commenced its attack on the most important organs of your body, and unless soon checked by the use of powerful remedies, a miserable life, soon terminating in death, will be the result.

H

Constipation, Flatulence, Inward Piles,
Fulness of Blood to the Head, Acidity of
the Stomach, Nausea, Heartburn, Disgust for Food, Fulness or Weight in the Stomach, Sour Eructations, Sinking or Fluttering at the Pit of the Stomach,
Swimming of the Head, Hurried or Difficult Breathing,
Fluttering at the Heart, Choking or Suffocating Sensations when in a lying posture, Dimness of Vision, Dots or Webs before the Sight, Dull Pain in the Head, Deficiency of Perspiration, Yellowness of the Skin and Eyes, Pain in the Side, Back, Chest, Limbs, etc., Sudden Flushes of Heat, Burning of the Flesh, Constant imagining of Evil and Great Depression of Spirits

All indicate disease of the Liver or Digestive Organs, combined with impure blood.

O

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

is entirely vegetable and contains no liquor. It is a compound of Fluid Extracts. The Roots, Herbs and Barks from which these extracts are made, are gathered in Germany, all the medicinal virtues are extracted from them by a scientific chemist. These extracts are then forwarded to this country to be used expressly for the manufacture of this Bitters. There is no alcoholic substance of any kind used in compounding the Bitters; hence it is free from all the objections incident to the use of a liquor preparation.

O

Hooiland's German Tonic

Is a combination of all the Ingredients of the Bitters with the purest quality of Santa Cruz Rum, Oranges, &c. It is used for the same disease as the Bitters, in cases where some pure alcoholic stimulus is required.

TESTIMONY

Like the following was never before offered in behalf of any medical preparation:

HON. G. W. WOODWARD,
Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, writes
Philadelphia, March 16th, 1867.

I find "Hooiland's German Bitters" is a good Tonic, useful in diseases of the digestive organs, and of great benefit in cases of debility and want

F

of nervous action in the system.

Yours, truly,

GEORGE W. WOODWARD.

HON. JAMES THOMPSON,
Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania.

Philadelphia, April 22d, 1866.

I consider "Hooiland's German Bitters" a valuable medicine in case of attacks of Indigestion or Dyspepsia. I can certify this from my experience of it.

Yours, with respect,

JAMES THOMPSON.

HON. GEO. SHARSWOOD,
Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania.

Philadelphia, June 1st, 1868.

I have found by experience that "Hooiland's German Bitters" is a very good tonic, relieving dyspeptic symptoms almost directly.

(GEO. SHARSWOOD.)

HON. WM. F. ROGERS,

Mayor of the City of Buffalo, N. Y.

Mayor's Office, Buffalo, June 22d, 1869.

I have used "Hooiland's German Bitters and Tonic" in my family during the past year, and can recommend them as an excellent tonic, imparting tone and vigor to the system. Their use has been productive of decidedly beneficial effects.

WM. F. ROGERS.

HON. JAMES M. WOOD,

Ex-Mayor of Williamport, Pennsylvania.

I take great pleasure in recommending "Hooiland's German Tonic" to any one who may be afflicted with dyspepsia. I had the dyspepsia so badly that it was impossible to keep any food on my stomach, and I became so weak as not to be able to walk half a mile. Two bottles of Tonic effected a perfect cure.

N

JAMES M. WOOD.

JOHN EUTERMARCK, ESQ.,

Law Partner of Judge Maynard, Williamsport, Pennsylvania.

This is to certify that I have used "Hooiland's German Bitters" for dyspepsia, and found it an invaluable remedy.

CAUTION.—Hooiland's German Bitters are counterfeited. See the signature of C. M. JACKSON is on the

D

wrapper of each bottle. All others are counterfeit.

Principal Office and Manufactory at the German Medicine Store, No. 631 ARCH STREET, Philadelphia, Pa.

CHAS. M. EVAN, Prop'r.
(Formerly of C. M. JACKSON & CO.)

PRICES.—Hooiland's German Bitters, per bottle, $1; Hooiland's German Bitters, half doz., $5; Hooiland's German Tonic, put up in qt. bottles, $1 50 per bottle, or half doz. for $7 50. Do not forget to examine well the article you buy in order to get the genuine. For sale by all druggists and dealers in Medicines everywhere.

24—eowly

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX PROSPECTUS FOR 1871.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869, and has just closed its first yearly volume.

We deem it proper, therefore, to submit the following Prospectus of Volume II for 1871, and ask the friends of the cause to represent to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if the matter was properly presented to them, and especially if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor. We cannot afford to send out travelling agents, nor would they succeed so well in getting names as persons of local influence. We therefore have determined to use the funds it would cost to get our paper before the people, in another way, namely, in the purchase of articles of value to be given as premiums to those who make up lists of subscribers; thus presenting to the friends of free thought and pure religion the double motive of doing good and getting paid for it.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two Dollars a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

PREMIUMS.

For Fifty Names, we will give one of PRINCE & Co's four Octave Melodeons (price $65,) or a complete copy of CHAMBERS' Encyclopædia of Universal Knowledge, in ten volumes (price $50).

For Forty Names, we will give a Wilson's Family Sewing Machine, one of the best Machines made.

For Twenty-Five Names, Webster's Royal Quarto Unabridged Pictorial Dictionary (price $12), or one of the following Chromos:

The Three Tom-Boys (Frang's), price..... $15.00
Winter in the Forest, 20x28..... 12.00
Watering the Horses, 21x29..... 12.00

For Ten Names, one of the following Chromos:

WHITTIER's Barefooted Boy, (Frang's) price..... $5.00
The Unconscious Sleeper, 14x17..... 6.50
Mt. Blanc, 20x26..... 7.50
Or a copy of LECKY's History of European Morals, 2 vols 6.00
MAX MUELLER's Chips from a German Work-Shop, 2 vols 5.00
EMERSON's Prose Works, 2 vols..... 5.00
WEISS's Life and Correspondence of THEODORE PARKER, 2 volumes..... 6.00

For Five Names, a bound volume of THE INDEX, for 1870. (Price $2.50.) Or a copy of one of the following works, (post paid):

DARWIN's Origin of Species, price..... $2.00
LUTHER's Origin of Civilization, price..... 2.00
Essays in Criticism, by MATTHEW ARNOLD, price..... 2.00
Tablets, by A. BRONSON ALCOTT, with portrait, price..... 2.00
Any volume of the writings of THEODORE PARKER or HENRY D. THOREAU, each..... 2.00
On the Heights, AUERBACH..... 2.00

For Four Names, a copy of THE INDEX for 1871, or one of the following books (post paid):

EMERSON's Society and Solitude, price..... $1.75
Nathan the Wise, a dramatic poem translated from LESSING by ELLEN FROTHINGHAM, price..... 1.75
HUXLEY's Lay Sermons and Addresses..... 1.75
Speeches and Lectures, by WENDELL PHILLIPS..... 1.50
Historic Americans, by THEODORE PARKER, price..... 1.50
A copy of The Revolution..... 2.00
Or The Woman's Journal..... 2.00

CASH PREMIUMS.

For 75 Names,..... 50 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 50 Names,..... 25 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 25 Names,..... 15 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 10 Names,..... 5 Dollars in Greenbacks
For less than 10 Names, a Cash Commission of Twenty per Cent.

Any book in the above list will be sent by us post-paid upon the receipt of price.

N. B.—Names need not all come from one post office. We will send the paper wherever directed, and let the names count as clubs. Specimen Copies sent to all who enclose a three cent postage stamp. Address

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
Loc' Box 38, Toledo, Ohio.

Guardian Mutual Life Ins. Co.,

ORGANIZED A. D. 1859.

M. O. Waggoner, Gen. Supt. for Ohio, Mich. & Ind.

John H. Hood, Assistant General Superintendent.

Office No. 154 Summit Street,

E. F. MUNGER, } General Agents.
CHAS. M. LANG, }

WALTER C. SCOTT, Local Agent, 152 Summit St.

Special Agents—Kelly Bros., 22 Summit Street.
Office Hours—From 7 in the morning till 9 at night.
Medical Examiners—Drs. Samuel S. Thorn and T. J. Eaton Toledo, O. [1871]

THE GOLDEN RULE.

A Weekly Paper Devoted to Natural Religion or Rational Christianity.

Published at 25 Bromfield Street, Boston.

L. SCOTT and J. L. HATCH, EDITORS.

"THE GOLDEN RULE" will publish each week a thoroughly Radical Discourse by Rev. J. L. Hatch, and each number will contain an interesting story inculcating rational views of Religion. The first number contains an Historical Discourse on the "Life and Labors of Elder Jacob Knapp," delivered in the Olympic Theatre, Boston, Sunday evening, March 26. Terms, $2.00 a year in advance. Specimen copies mailed (post-paid) on the receipt of two three-cent stamps.

Address, 25 Bromfield Street, Boston.

68-tf

IMPORTER

Fine Chemicals, Drugs, and Toilet Articles.

Brandies, Wines & Liquors for medicinal purposes only. Also Proprietor of

Toledo Tonic Bitters,
Greatest Remedy known for general debility.

L. E. MULFORD,

23 Summit Street, Corner Perry, Toledo, Ohio
18-1y

THE CELEBRATED CRAIG MICROSCOPE

is an optical wonder; reveals thousands of the hidden Wonders of Nature; is of permanent use and practical availability, combining instruction with amusement, and never losing its interest. It magnifies

TEN THOUSAND TIMES,

a power equal to other Microscopes of many times its cost. Reveals countless little worlds all around us, teeming with life, which to the naked eye must forever remain a sealed book—as Eels in Vinegar, Animals in Water, Cheese Mites, Sugar and Itch Insects, Milk Globules, Claws and Hairs of Insects, Hundreds of eyes in a single eye of a Fly, Dust of a Butterfly's Wings to be perfectly formed Feathers, the much talked of Trichina Spirals, or Pork Worm, which was first discovered in America with this Microscope. It is of infinite value to professional men, to teachers, and to students, but NOWHERE IS IT OF GREATER VALUE THAN AT THE FAMILY TABLE, within the reach of every member. It will delight yourself, your children, and your friends during the long winter evenings. It will show you adulterations or uncleanness of various kinds in food, as sugar, tea, bread, meat, etc.

It is of Inestimable Value to the Farmer

in examining insects which prey upon his crops. The power of a $50 Microscope, and so simple in its construction that any child can use it understandingly, and with appreciation.

A Beautiful Present—Elegant, Instructive, Amusing, and Cheap. Over 60,000 sold.

During the past six years its worth has been testified to by thousands of Scientific Men, Farmers, School Teachers, Students, Physicians, Heads of Families, and others.

PRICE, $3.00—Sent by Mail Post-paid.

Every instrument is neatly boxed, and handsomely labelled with full directions for use. Thousands have been sent by mail. Address, W. J. LINESS & CO, CHICAGO.

FREE! FREE!

"THE MICROSCOPE," a Monthly Journal of Information for the People the mysteries of Nature explained—interesting information on the wonders of Creation—stories, sketches, etc. Terms $1.00 per year. This Journal will be sent FREE for one year to any one purchasing a Craig Microscope at the regular price, $3.00. (Craig Microscope will be sent post-paid.) For sample copy, and our beautifully illustrated and descriptive circulars, and eight pages of testimonials of Craig Microscope, send six cents for postage to

W. J. LINESS & CO.,

Opticians, and Sole Proprietors of Craig and Novelty Microscope, CHICAGO, ILL.

AGENTS and DEALERS, this Microscope sells in every family on its merits, when exhibited. Large Profits. Send for terms.

A NEW RADICAL BOOK.

"Origin and Development of Religious Ideas and Beliefs,"

As Manifested in History and Seen by Reason.

By MORRIS EINSTEIN.

For sale at the office of the Boston Investigator, 84 Washington St., Boston, or by the Author, Titusville, Pa.

PRICE, - - - $1.50,

64-78

or Cincinnati, O.

CHEAP PAINTING.—100 lbs. of the PECORA COMPANY'S COLORED PAINT will paint as much as 200 lbs. of Lead, and wear longer. For circulars, send ten cents to S. BOWEN, Manager, No. 150 North 4th St., Phila., Pa. or New York.

65-77

A Few More Agents Wanted For

THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD

A new religious work of unsurpassed interest and value. For terms, address W. FLINT & CO., No. 26 S. 7th St., Philadelphia, 5 Custom House Place, Chicago, and 176 West 4th Street, Cincinnati. 65-77

COLE'S FIRST PRIZE BAKING POWDER.

The Best in the Market.

One trial only asked. Same price as the common kinds.

Sample sent free on Application.

63-75.

ALEX. COLE, BUFFALO, N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED—($225 A MONTH.) BY THE Machine Co., BOSTON, MASS., or ST. LOUIS, MO. 66-68

Mr. Frothingham's New Book.

CHILD'S BOOK OF RELIGION, for Sunday Schools and Homes. PART I., Worship; PART II., The Good Life; PART III., Truth. In one Volume. New and revised edition. Forwarded free on receipt of $1.00.

DAVID G. FRANCIS,
17 Astor Place, New York.

55-68

WANTED—AGENTS, ($20 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock-stitch" (alike on both sides, and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest Family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Boston, Mass., Pittsburgh, Pa., Chicago, Ill. or St. Louis, Mo. 38y1

SINGLE COPIES

OF

THE INDEX for 1870

Containing the following

ESSAYS,

Will be mailed from THE INDEX office (post-paid) on receipt of FIVE CENTS:

	No.
The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion,.....	1
What is Free Religion?.....	3
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Corner-Stones,.....	4
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Institutions,.....	5
Terms of Fellowship, Social Ideal, Moral Ideal, and Essential spirit,.....	6
The Practical Work of Free Religion,.....	7
Unitarianism versus Freedom,.....	8
Sunday Schools,.....	9
Friendship,.....	10
Grief and its Compensations,.....	11
The Hebrew Prophets,.....	12
Capital Punishment,.....	13
Human Ideals,.....	14
The Essence of Religion,.....	15
The Management of Children,.....	16
A Quaker's Letter to a Presbyterian, R. S. D.,.....	17
Comparison of Jesus and Socrates. (Report from the N. Y. Tribune),.....	18
The Candle of the Lord,.....	19
Public Opinion,.....	20
Conscience,.....	21
The Pedigree of Man,.....	22
"Following Christ,".....	23
The Tongue,.....	24
The Golden Age,.....	25
What is Truth?.....	26
The Last Battle on the Creed Question,.....	27
Observance of the Sabbath, Rev. W. W. Williams,.....	28
The Sunday Question,.....	29
Motes and Beams,.....	30
The Dove's Departure,.....	31
The Bible in the Public Schools,.....	32
Religious Freedom,.....	33
A Plain Talk to Young Men,.....	34
Noise,.....	35
The Humility of Free Religion,.....	36
Chaos and Cosmos,.....	37
An Oration on Alexander Von Humboldt,.....	38
Relation of Spiritualism to Free Religion,.....	39
War and Free Religion,.....	40
Religious Revivals,.....	41
Mary and Martha,.....	42
The Ministry of Free Religion,.....	43
Success,.....	44
"Repentance" and "Forgiveness,".....	45
Spiritual Beauty,.....	46
The Book of Daniel,.....	47
The Unity of Spiritual Freedom and the Opportunity which America offers for its Development. W. J. Potter,.....	48
The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition,.....	49
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? Chas. Reemelin,.....	50
The Work of Radicalism in Indiana. J. O. Martin,.....	51
Religion in the Light of Reason and Common Sense. Isaac M. Wise,.....	52
Sunday—Its Uses and Abuses. Thomas Vickers,.....	53
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? E. Peckham,.....	54
Parties and Party Spirit,.....	55
The Future of Religious Organization, as Affected by the Spirit of the Age,.....	56
The Incarnation. A Christmas Discourse,.....	57
Transient and Permanent,.....	58

The Index.

VOL. 2.—No. 16.

TOLEDO, OHIO, APRIL 22, 1871.

WHOLE No. 69.

The Index,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, OHIO.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Editorial Contributors.

INTUITION AND SCIENCE.

[By John Wetherbee, in the Boston Banner of Light of March 4, 1871.]

"Intuition and Science," or, we might write it, the hidden and visible hemispheres of Nature. I suppose the line between the two is imaginary or arbitrary, but some of the exponents of Free Religion have somewhat accented the line in treating the subject of immortality lately, and I will take it with their accent, at least, for the purposes of this article. No two men ever see the same rainbow. The intuitive man never perceives the thought or idea of anything as the matter-of-fact man does. The difference is fundamental. F. E. Abbot and W. J. Potter have lately delivered each a thoughtful discourse on the subject of immortality. The former calls his, "Intuitionism versus Science," the latter, "The Doctrine of Immortality in the Light of Science." These discourses read like the sober second thought, or the last word on this important subject from the radical standpoint, or the voice of Free Religion to thoughtful men. These discourses follow close upon one by Alger in Music Hall, to an audience gathered to hear what he had to say of the life, if any, that follows this. In the summing up of it—and snubbing Swedenborgianism, and, offensively so, the modern Spiritualists—he said there was no proof of any existence after this life's fitful fever was over. One could see by the faces in that congregation then, that the mercury fell some degrees; and the Sunday that followed, many a well-known Spiritualist face was not there—"the last link was broken."

Rationalism is to rise or fall on the one subject of immortality, and we might say, religion too. Two of the leading spirits of the free religious movement have touched the subject loudly in the able discourses referred to. We have listened to the sound; if that is all, "we must hang our harps upon the willows, when we remember Zion."

Mr. Abbot sees two classes among the free religionists "who turn away from the traditions of the past and look towards the insights of the future with equal hope." For the sake of convenience, he designates them "as the intuitional and scientific schools of religious thought"—a very good division, if we do not lose sight of the fact that we cannot draw the line. If I may be excused for a paraphrase, this explains my meaning:

"Intuitional and scientific every man must be;
Few in the extreme, but all in the degree."

These two schools could be tolerably well divided thus. Science rests on matter; the soul is the product of matter or the thinking nature of man is the bright particular flower of the material universe. Intuition rests on spirit. Spirit is real, and matter ephemeral; that the soul, instead of being (using the words of Mr. Potter) "a quality of matter which appears under certain conditions of development," that the base of all is spirit; the physical man and the material universe are but the flowering out of the spirit. I think these thoughtful men who have suggested these remarks give rather a wide field to science—more than is claimed by its exponents. They (its exponents) claim that its domain ends with matter; that science knows no spirit. True, Mr. Abbot says, "Physical science is not all; neither Darwin nor Agassiz nor any other is the pope of science. The authority of science is the authority of truth alone." That is, his science means truth. The world's definition of science is, what is known to be truth; and the definition of the four Harvard exponents, by Allen Putnam's testimony, is in substance this: what we know is truth, and what we do not know is not worth knowing.

Mr. Abbot's definition would include intuition as well as the facts proper, and his argument, and Mr. Potter's also, is—with that definition—superfluous. At the present moment science is not universal, and there are the two tolerably well defined classes referred to—the intuitional and scientific; and both Abbot and Potter recognize these divisions in their discourses, and turn their backs on intuition, and (using the words of Abbot for illustration) say, "science is to be the world's Messiah." If science means truth, there is then no question; but that is not what either of the men mean in their arguments, for they put intuition on one side of the equator of truth, and science on the other. Hear this on the point, quoting from Abbot: "Now that the empty affirmations of the intuitional school ring out with the hollow sound of base metal, the great question rebounds, and the world's heart grows sick with hope deferred. In this great crisis (the eclipse of faith) the world's eyes are fixed on the youthful figure of science; science alone must give, in its own time, the final answer to our anxious, earnest questions (immortality)." If there is truth in the words of Emerson—and I think there is—"that mankind is the flux of matter over the wires of thought," then intuition is warranted in filing a protest against this claim for science. I submit that intuition and science are two roads to the same point; and science—which Mr. Abbot says truly is in the "vealy" stage—can hardly snub, with any propriety, intuition. What it may do when it is full grown and universal, and intuition, as a matter of course, one part of it, I have nothing to say; I refer to it now, in its youthful and vealy stage, one of the two schools of religious thought, and, in behalf of the intuitional, will say, by the time that science has discovered cause, I am sure intuition will have found God.

The great question of future life, lying far this side of God and cause, has got to be discovered and demonstrated by both, or, perhaps, discovered by one, and demonstrated by the other. I think intuition has done so (quoting from Abbot) "in a revelation to a faculty in the human soul which is especially fitted to receive it." Science, which knows no such faculty, says, doubtfully, "This cannot be." Using, then, the words of Abbot, "Must we, then, wait for untold years before the question of God and immortality, on which the whole happiness of humanity depends, can be answered? Friends, I must frankly meet this inquiry. Science, whose present attitude toward God and immortality is pure indifference; science, now in its youthful and vealy stage; science alone must give the final reply to our anxious question; it will be long before its final verdict is rendered, and wisdom cautions us not to take its first crude guesses for its final word." "The empty affirmations of intuition," which makes hope spring eternal in the human breast to half a world, are nothing—"only a labor-saving machine, doing the work of consolation for human hearts without taxing human brains." No—"We must wait," say these men, "till science shall have claimed its whole inheritance, and learned to treat the greatest of questions as respectfully and honestly as it treats the least; it alone must answer. A whole world waits to hear." But referring to intuition, "the great weary heart of the world cannot be thus consoled. Humanity cries for bread, and has got a stone." I think up to this point humanity has cried to science for bread, and has got the stone. I think the world will wait a little longer, holding on to intuition.

The intuitional school has more to offer for soul sustenance than the scientific school has. We welcome the facts of science, and cry, like Oliver, "for more," feeling assured, from the nature of this subject, that they will have already been discounted by intuition, and have been appropriated by the human race in advance of science, and it finally will admit that there was "A royal road that leads to life,

And thousands walked together there,
While science found a longer way.
With here and there a traveller."

Mr. Potter asks, "Will science let us keep our faith in immortality?" If he refers to that future when science means universal science or truth, the answer will be unquestionably in the affirmative; but with their definition, there is no pertinence to the question. "Watchman! tell us of the night, what its signs of promise are." Now, while the world is looking "at the youthful figure of science," will it let us keep our faith in immortality? It answers now in the negative. I have no fears but the "unconquerable will" of human instinct will keep the sacred fire alive and burning, and man not be without his God and hope in the world.

The pious scholar, Saint Beuve, said, "Science has killed faith." That sounds well, only it is not true. Science may have killed the Bible as a special revelation, by demonstrating its authority to have been unsound in its facts, and those who rested on it for their faith may be adrift; but science has not squelched or touched intuition, or the faith born of it. Certain great thoughts have been written, and have found expression in the Bible. It is not now either scientific or rational to say God wrote them in person, or by proxy, but it was rational to have thought so with the then understood cosmogony and the then state of knowledge and definition of God. It has been the privilege of science to strip off the deformities associated with the blossoms of intuition—all thanks to it—but intuition exists to do and is doing its work. It would be wise for the exponents of Free Religion to stand firm and solid, one foot on science, and one foot on intuition; but resting their weight on only one, and that one science, as the true men seem to be doing, mankind will turn from it and them, and drink of that warmer, even if less reliable stream, whose source is in the heart, and which is responded to by the sentiments and emotions of mankind.

The human heart can live on intuition, and flourish without science, but it will starve on the facts of science divorced from intuition. The world will have both, and the accented one must be intuition, for it is heaven-born. The other is of earth; in the duality is the Emmanuel, God with us; of which it may be said, "Is not this he that should come?" I once heard Theodore Parker, at the funeral of a Spiritualist, and officiating, say: "This good brother, now dead, was happy in having the evidence that there is another life after this; but he (the speaker) needed no evidence to prove to him that the other world was a reality; he was sure of it; if he had any doubts of either, it was whether this one was real—none whatever of the one beyond." This was the voice of intuition; and because science, as Mr. Abbot says, "finds the old supports of religious beliefs rotten beyond repair," therefore Theodore Parker, who also with it denied the claims for Bibles, Christs and miracles, in his hope rests on an illusion. The common instinct of man favors Parker, not science, on this point. That great intuitive cosmopolitan soul may have felt as few can immediately, but there are thousands who know and feel the fact to be true in themselves, because he said so who was honest and plain spoken and ruggedly square; these grafts of faith having deductive power enough to know that, if Theodore Parker lives, they shall live also. Science today seems to me to be hunting for gold in the gulches of facts and paying its way; forgetting, perhaps, that the source of these facts is higher up, is not in possession yet of the implements or philosophy to detect in the original quarry the elements or stuff that become facts or gold by the developing process of time. The world of spirit and matter has lasted a long while. God and Cause never hurry. Much that is science now will pass away. The basis truth underlying the records of science, and the records of intuition, will remain and express themselves, and in their combination, feeding both heart and head. Instead of science ever killing faith, or taking the backbone out of religion, it says, as I interpret it, always and forever to religion, the child of intuition, "Daughter of Zion, awake from thy sadness!" and I trust she is now putting on her beautiful garments.

While Prof. Huxley, in his lay sermons, is getting where the partition wall is very thin, so to speak between spirit and matter—and if his intuitions were as sensitive and keen as are his intellectual perceptions, he would almost hear the hammer sounds from the other side—I feel that the opening has been made elsewhere by the workers on the other side, and Jacob's ladder, on which the angels are ascending and descending, is modern Spiritualism. Crude today and rough, as a stream it needs filtering before it is limpid and clear, but carries in it the solution of the great question, "If a man die, shall he live again?"

I am making too long a story to dwell on this point, and must stop; merely saying that to me, after careful and thoughtful investigation, it appears to be "the way, the truth and the life," and is the bridge on which intuition and science, "instinct and intellect," or "heart and head," can walk over together, making the union, so much desired, of science and religion. This is testimony; others have a right, according to their experience, to see it differently. I have tried hard to make the platform shake, and it stands firm. I should stultify myself if I attempted to choke off the evidence of my senses, and I have no desire to, knowing that I am a happier man and that I am trying to be a better one for knowing something definitely (and I claim that I do) of that other world which, using Mr. Longfellow's words:—

"Lies all about us, and its avenues
Are open to the unseen feet of phantoms
That come and go, and we perceive them not,
Save by their influence or when at times
A most mysterious Providence permits them
To manifest themselves to mortal eyes."

THE THEOLOGICAL BATTLE-GROUND.

[By "Cochituate," in the Boston Christian Register of Feb. 11, 1871.]

THE LECTURES OF MR. ABBOT AND PROF. MEAD.

One who flees from the city to "hold communion with the visible forms" of Nature would naturally choose for his rambles in the country the best and brightest day of the year. And by a similar law the dweller in the country, who is interested in the great problems of religious thought, would choose for his visit to the city the day on which he might listen to the ablest champions of opposing schools. Not, however, by such choice, but rather by a happy accident, did the pastor of the Laketown parish find himself on Sunday last in Horticultural Hall and at the Shepard Congregational Church in Cambridge. To the lectures of Mr. Abbot and Prof. Mead he would apply the reporter's commonplace words, "able and interesting." Both lecturers grappled with the real questions of the hour. Both offered solutions of the theological problems that trouble all thinking minds. Both discussed, not the non-essentials of Christianity, not any side issues of sectarian controversy or philosophical debate, but the great, vital, essential truths on which all religion rests—God, Immortality, Revelation. If to one listener, at least, neither of the lecturers gave a satisfactory answer to the questions raised, the reasons therefor will appear in the course of this report:—

MR. ABBOT'S LECTURE.

"Precisely at three o'clock!" said the advertisement of the Horticultural Hall lectures. But Free Religionists can claim no superiority over the ordinary church-goer on the ground of punctuality, and it is fully ten minutes after the hour before the audience are assembled and the lecturer appears. "Many of the audience had not heard Mr. Abbot before, and there was a hush of expectancy as he came forward." So says the report in Monday's Post. We venture to say that of the small audience present (for Free Religion is not zealous enough to fill this hall on a cold Sunday) there were very few who had not often listened to the editor of THE INDEX; while the "hush of expectancy" must have been a private experience of the reporter. The noticeable fact about the Horticultural Hall audiences is that there is here a regular congregation. As the friend who sat at our side remarked,—"You always see pretty much the same faces at all these lectures." An intelligent congregation it certainly is, though not above the average culture of a dozen church congregations in the city. Here are lawyers—one a shining light among the "rising men" of Boston, and an overseer of Harvard College—editors, three or four clergymen, several school-teachers, and on some occasions, we are told, a club of twenty Harvard students, of the radical persuasion, come in from Cambridge to attend these lectures. Of course there is always a good representation from the Boston Radical Club.—Mr. and Mrs. John T. Sargent, Edwin Morton, Miss Stevenson, Mr. and Mrs. C. K. Whipple, and many others.

But the lecturer has risen, and stands before us at the desk, looking almost as youthful as in the old college days when we sipped our claret-punch together at the sober symposia of the Magazine Club. [We never belonged to the Magazine Club, and never attended any of its symposia. It must have been our "double" with whom "Cochituate" "sipped claret-punch."—Ed.] Yet the careful observer finds many traces in those well-marked features of the mental conflict and hard brain-work of this honest thinker. The subject of the lecture is announced as "The Civil War in Free Religion; Intuitionism versus Science."

By a few vigorous statements (not all accurate or free from a partisan bias) the field is cleared of all other combatants, and there remain only the two great schools of Free Religionists, "both turning away from the traditions of the past with equal hunger, both looking toward the insights of the future with equal hope." Each of these schools "finds in the Bible only a match struck in the dark, the credentials of the truth only in the free assent of the human mind trusting to natural solutions." Yet between these two classes or schools in Free Religion there exists a marked difference of attitude towards the great problems of God and immortality. This difference is simply that one class, the intuitionists, regard God and immortality as undoubted and indubitable facts; the other class, the scientific school in religion, as Mr. Abbot calls them, regard God and immortality as great open questions. For which of these classes will Mr. Abbot plead? is the inquiry that is ready to come to our lips. Surely he has been an intuitionist, and before the lecture closes he answers for himself as to his present position, by declaring that his own conviction of these truths is firm, if not immovable. What, then, is the meaning of this lengthy and unsparing exposure of the weak points in the intuitionist's philosophy? Why this merciless ridicule of those who hold this philosophy, as if the only light which they have to offer the world is the "burnt-out lamp of Christian dogmatism," their only weapons "empty affirmations" that ring out with the hollow sound of false metal? This ruthless disparagement of the services which some of the world's best thinkers have rendered to religion reminds us of the orthodox way of disparaging all the heathen and Gentile religions of antiquity, painting them at their worst that the brightness of Christianity may be made to appear against the background of a blackened paganism. With Mr. Abbot a similar purpose seems to have prompted the dark picture which he draws of the inadequacy of intuitionism to give to mankind anything but assertion in place of proof, or to spread anything more substantial before the starving soul than a Barmecide feast at which the hungry guests chew the air and go away famishing. For, having demolished the intuitionist as effectually as he had before destroyed the church and Christianity, Mr. Abbot now bids us fix our eyes on the Messiah who is to open for a waiting world the way to an assured knowledge of religious truth. There is no other figure to be seen on the deserted battle-field, which the lecturer has strewn with the dead or dying bodies of all past systems of philosophy. And this Messiah is—SCIENCE! In "affirmations" that are hardly to be reconciled with each other, Mr. Abbot tells us first, that "Science is weighing in his scales our human faith in God, our human hope in a life beyond the grave"; and a little while afterward, that "the present attitude of science toward God and immortality, is pure indifference!"

We suspect the fact respecting Mr. Abbot's new "Messiah" to be that the "science" he is talking about is not the science most of us are thinking about; it is not a science that is, but one that is to be. But what reason does Mr. Abbot give for thus making the province of science embrace all truth? What proof has he to offer that man has not different faculties by which he apprehends different kinds of truth? By what line of argument, by what array of evidences, does he break down the well-established distinction between the higher or intuitive reason and the mere understanding? What justification does he urge for confounding together the problems of philosophy, the problems of life, and the problems of the understanding, or of science, as that word is generally received? Mr. Abbot does not answer these questions. We have at the best only his "empty assertion," his "hollow-sounding affirmation" that the day of philosophy is over, the higher reason of man dismissed as a merely imaginary faculty, the problems of thought and of life merged into problems of science, of which science alone, in its own time, must give the final solution.

The conclusion of the lecture was a frank avowal of the speaker's own most earnest conviction of the truths of a personal God and an individual immortality. Yet science alone, after untold ages of preparation for the task, can settle these questions for the race. What, then, can we do about it? One of three things. We may, if we can, work out our private convictions, or we may hold the questions in abeyance till science is ready to give its reply, or we may trust Mr. Abbot, who has given these questions deep and earnest thought, that the final answer of science will but fortify and exalt our human faith in God—will but strengthen, purify and elevate our human hope of immortality. And so it comes to this, that those who cannot wait, and who cannot themselves solve these agonizing problems, may accept an affirmative solution of them by an act of faith in Mr. Abbot! Perhaps some of us will prefer to pin our faith on something stronger than the stripling Science, and take our assurance of the Fatherly love of God and the soul's conscious immortality from the lips of an older prophet, in whom we find the Way opened, the Truth manifested, and the Life revealed. As Robert Collyer so tersely sums it all up: "If we cannot see heaven of ourselves, let us look at it through his eyes. If we cannot distinguish between fate and providence, let us rejoice that He can, and that our blindness can make no difference to his blessing."

And here we leave the "battle-ground" till another week, promising to return and report what the Andover Professor did on the other side of the field.

IMMORTALITY.

[By "Pelham" in the Cambridge (Mass.) Chronicle, of Feb. 18, 1871.]

Another professor of philosophy has recently discoursed before a Boston audience in Horticultural Hall on Immortality. This professor is the Reverend Francis E. Abbot. Fifteen years, or so, ago, Mr. Abbot was a pupil of the Latin School in Boston. He afterwards entered Harvard College, and graduated therefrom in the class of 1859. Subsequently, he was settled as a Unitarian minister in Dover, I believe; where, perceiving the light more immediately than he had theretofore done, and not having been born or bred a hypocrite, nor yet inclined to become one, he frankly told his society, as in duty bound, on one Sunday morning, what impression this new light had made on him. The society were shocked by the sermon, and dismissed Mr. Abbot. Excess of light dazzles. It was too much for the men and women of Dover. ["Pelham" is in error as to his facts. We say this in justice to the true friends who most generously stood by us, even after the adverse decision of the Supreme Court.—Ed.]

Mr. Abbot went to Toledo, in the State of Ohio, where, I believe, he still resides. I did not hear his discourse, but the report of it is quite full. Like most modern speeches, the preface is too long. Notice it because it is said to be "the best exposition yet given of the different phases of belief among the free religionists," and was received with ecclat.

Mr. Abbot says, "I find two great classes or schools, both equally pronounced in their adherence to free religion. For the sake of convenience, I will designate them as the intuitional and scientific schools of religious thought." Who compose these "great schools," who is the head, and who or where the tail of either, or whether, as I think more probable, there is neither head nor tail to either, Mr. Abbot does not say. He says he chooses his designation "for the sake of convenience;" but unless the designation truly points out or fitly distinguishes the school, there is no sense in it. More than that. It imputes to the school, if there be one, what does not belong to it. And this last, in a professor of science, is a crime. It may be simple larceny; it may be murder in the third degree. Professors do sometimes murder.

Do the terms employed mark any such distinction as is attempted? Clearly, as it seems to me, they do not. Science does not stand in opposition to intuition. On the contrary, it is perfectly consistent with it. Indeed, except in rare instances, science is the indispensable condition of intuition. The truly scientific man has, at the same time, in largest measure, the power of discerning truth immediately without the intervention of ratiocination. The cultivated mind only perceives by intuition. Spinoza terms this the third kind of intellection. And he well illustrates it. "Besides these two kinds of cognition," he says, "there is a third, as I shall presently show, which I shall entitle intuitive, and which proceeds from the adequate idea of the real essence or the attributes of God to the adequate cognition of the essence of things."

"The whole of the above considerations I shall illustrate by a single example: given three numbers, to find a fourth which shall be to the third as the first is to the second. The merchant proceeds to multiply the second number by the third and to divide the product by the first; and this he does, either because he had not forgotten what he learned from his teacher without any demonstration, or because the ratio discovered has frequently been found to hold good in the most simple reckonings, or in virtue of the demonstration comprised in the 19th proposition of the 7th book of Euclid, viz.: from the common property of proportionals. Dealing with the simplest numbers, however, no process of the kind follows or is required, for with the numerals 1, 2, 3, given, who does not see at a glance, that the fourth proportional must be 6? and this, indeed, much more clearly, because from the ratio which the first bears to the second, we conclude immediately as to the fourth."

And in another part of one of his excellent works he says: "The highest virtue of the soul is to know God, or to understand things by the third kind of intellection." And Spinoza was pre-eminently a man of science.

Let me suppose further: two men have come a long distance. The first came by balloon. He came in the day-time, in one day. The day was fine; his aerial passage was not far above the land; no vapors obstructed his view; he has arrived. The second came all the way on foot; he was several days on the way; he set out early in the morning, and he travelled until late in the evening; some of the days were fair and some were foul; he stopped at the guide-boards to assure himself of the way; he too has arrived. Is there any doubt which has had the better perspective? The second may talk of guide-boards, but the first has no need of them. They are as useless to him as one would be to point to his own door. He has not less science than the second, but more and better.

Some years ago, I remember two lawyers were associated in the trial of a civil cause. One was slow, but able. The other had suggested to him a point as of material significance. The first seemed indifferent to it. The first argued the case; and his argument was admirable. As he took his seat, he said to the second, "To be frank with you, I never saw the force of your point until I began to argue it. Then, as I went on, it became transparent to me. It is decisive of this case." And it was.

But to return to Mr. Abbot. He takes his stand, as he says, with what he calls the scientific, rather than with the intuitional school. Science, he says, is busy. Yet it is in doubt. The doubts are real. For his part, he has become convinced that the "final answer" of science will deepen our faith in God and elevate our hope of immortality. Yet it is but hope, and only to be elevated by science as hope. He belongs to the scientific school. He relies on science. Science alone can give assurance. And science is now in doubt; and to emphasize it, he says, in real doubt. Immortality is, therefore, with Mr. Abbot, a question of probability, and that without the data or the science of Laplace. And this is that best exposition of "free religion," which was received in Boston with ecclat.

For my part, as to science, if one would know the antiquity of the earth, I am content he should explore the bases of the mountains; or, if he is curious to understand the differences in fishes, that he should read Agassiz, or, what seems to me better, study the structure of the fishes. But, for one who is chiefly concerned to know the science of good and of evil, and in what life consists, and whether it is to be continued without end, I still commend him to seek to comprehend Jesus Christ.

GOD AND IMMORTALITY.

[From the Boston Investigator of Feb. 22, 1871.]

The ideas entertained of religion improve from age to age,—owing, no doubt, to the influence of free thought and free inquiry, which will eventually render it unexceptionable, or else remove it altogether. Ever since the time of the Reformation, religion has been gradually growing better, as mankind have gained intelligence and knowledge; and one of the instrumentalities which is improving it at the present day is what is called "Free Religion,"—though precisely what it is, we are not able as yet to discover, except that it repudiates the Christian name and the Divine authority of the Bible. This is gain, but it still advocates, we perceive, the idea of a personal God and also of immortality.

Mr. Abbot, one of its ablest teachers and the editor of THE INDEX, advanced the opinion in his recent lecture at Horticultural Hall in this city, that the belief in God and immortality must rest on a scientific rather than on an intuitional basis—in other words, is the product of knowledge rather than of immediate perception without reasoning. This is considerable of a heresy, and if correct, would seem to prove the two great points respecting which there has been such a long dispute. But as the premise appears to be unfounded, we have to infer that the conclusion is faulty. For what is science? Natural knowledge; but as there is no such knowledge (so far as we know) of God and immortality, how can science prove them? No doubt this difficulty was seen by the writers of the Bible, and so they invented a Revelation for the purpose of proving, as they thought, these two doctrines that were not proved by Nature, as the Free Religionists think they may be or are. It is conceded that science can demonstrate what is natural, but the supernatural requires another kind of evidence which we fail to see is obtainable in this world, if in any other.

Theodore Parker used to say that God and immortality are facts of consciousness or intuition; and if they were, everybody would believe in them. But as thousands do not have this belief, and millions on millions are in a state of uncertainty regarding it, the argument from consciousness is no more satisfactory than that of Mr. Abbot's "science." But of the two, Mr. Parker's seems the more reasonable; for while Nature gives to a child intuitive evidence of its present existence and recognition of its mother, it does not impart this knowledge of God and immortality, which are altogether acquired ideas that the child has to learn, and thus religion is entirely a thing of education.

The best theory, evidently, in regard to immortality, is that held by the Spiritualists (they are not so clear respecting God), who tell us very sensibly that we cannot know for a certainty of the fact of continued existence after death, unless the departed return and convince us that they are still living. This is the kind of evidence that Dr. Franklin desired, but could not get; and we are in the same condition. We hear, it is true, of "mediums" who pretend to be more fortunate, and whose "communications from the spirit-land" are direct, numerous, and convincing; but as we see no evidence of this theory, we shall have to wait until we are favored with more satisfactory proof of its correctness than we have at present.

THE STOPPAGE OF ADVANCED THOUGHT.

[By "Rusticus," in the Boston Christian Register, Feb. 25, 1871.]

We, in the country, are unable to attend the Horticultural Hall lectures in defence of that Free Religion which is sold at half a dollar an hour. But we read the reports with anxiety. We wish to go as far as we can with the "advanced thought" of the age, and the teachers of this doctrine assure us that this is the most advanced thought. We are, therefore, quite disturbed to find from Mr. Abbot's lecture that thought has stopped advancing, and is now obliged to wait until science has decided whether there be any God or any immortality. We are perplexed to know how science is to settle these questions. Is immortality to be detected by the spectroscope, and to appear as a new group of dark lines in the solar spectrum, or how?

I read THE INDEX diligently, impatient for the advent of this new Messiah of Science. En attendant, I noticed a paragraph concerning some minister who declared he had been excluded from a Unitarian pulpit for his radicalism. On which Mr. Abbot compares the Unitarian Church to that mediæval statue which, on being embraced, closed its arms round its lover and cut him to pieces with hidden knives. So, says Mr. Abbot, Unitarianism invites us to a Liberal religion, and then rejects us if we are sincerely liberal. But possibly the real reason why some Radicals, like many Conservatives, do not obtain parishes, is that they do not interest people by their preaching. I grieve to say that neither extreme of faith prevents a stupid man from being stupid. It is a flattering unction, no doubt, to think that I am rejected for my opinions and not for my incapacity. But we all know that every Radical who is able to preach living and earnest sermons easily secures a settlement—provided he is, in any sense, a believer in Christ. If not, Unitarians are not to blame for refusing to hear him—for they never claimed to be anything but liberal Christians. Mr. Abbot's similitude would only apply to some professedly Radical society, which should refuse a man for being radical.

INTUITIONALISM VERSUS SCIENCE.

[An editorial note in the N. Y. Independent of Feb. 16, 1871.]

Mr. Francis E. Abbot, who is recognized as a Radical of the Radicals, spoke in Horticultural Hall, Boston, last Sunday week, on "Intuitionalism versus Science." His lecture was a vigorous attack upon those Free Religionists who suppose that they have by immediate intuition a knowledge of God and immortality. Mr. Abbot confesses that he has no such intuitional knowledge, and does not believe that this is any defect of his higher reason. The Positivists, who ignore religious questions, he sharply criticised, characterizing Positivism as "the disrespect of religion organized into religion," and denying "that it shows the true scientific spirit in refusing to take cognizance of the questions of God and immortality." His belief is that science should address itself to the consideration of these great matters; and in that way he hopes that the certainty which he cannot find in the revelation of the Bible, or in immediate intuition, may be found. This confession of his faith is certainly encouraging: "But for myself, having studied as earnestly as I could these momentous problems, I have become convinced that the final answer of science will but deepen, fortify, and exalt our human faith in God as intelligent, self-conscious Being, infinitely more tender and benign than our loftiest conceptions of human love; and I trust it will strengthen and purify and elevate our human hope of Immortality as continued individual existence." This is a good thing to hope for; but it would be sad to think, as Mr. Abbot does, that long years must pass before the hope could be realized. While this brave and earnest young man is waiting for the final answer of science to his anxious inquiries—an answer that he never expects to hear—some of the rest of us, who may not have thought so profoundly as he has done, but who have certainly not been idle or cowardly thinkers, will comfort ourselves that we have already in the Bible, and the work it has done in the world, as well as in the faith faculty and the reports it brings to us, an assurance quite as sure as that for which he hopes, of the existence of God and the immortality of the soul.

Free Religion as expounded by one of its chief apostles is a very dreary sort of an affair. In a discourse in Boston recently, Rev. Francis E. Abbot took the ground that the existence of God and the immortality of the soul were still open questions which the world was still waiting for science to decide. Science, according to this modern light, is the "world's Messiah," and that alone can solve the problem of man's future destiny. Verily, the Free Religionists must be content to feed upon husks, if any such twaddle as this can satisfy the cravings of their spiritual nature.—Daily Observer (Cedar Rapids, Iowa).

PREDESTINATION ILLUSTRATED.—A Hard-Shell Baptist minister, living somewhere on the frontier of Missouri, was in the habit of saying to his family and to his church: "Friends, you need not take any unusual care of your lives; the day of your death was written before the foundation of the world, and you cannot alter it." His wife observed, when he left on Saturday to meet one of his frontier missionary engagements, that he dressed the flint of his rifle with unusual care, put in dry powder, fresh tow, and took every pains to make sure that the gun would go off in case he came upon an Indian.

It struck her one day, as she saw him in the saddle with his rifle on his shoulder, that his conduct contradicted his teachings, and she said to him:—"My dear, why do you take this rifle with you? If it was 'writ' before the foundation of the world that you were to be killed during this trip by an Indian, that rifle won't prevent it; and if you are not to be killed, of course, the rifle is unnecessary; so why take it with you at all?"

"Yes," he replied, "to be sure, my dear, of course you are all very right, and that is a very proper view; but, see here, my dear—suppose I should meet an Indian while I am gone, and his time had come, and I hadn't my rifle with me, what would he do? Yes, my dear, we must all contribute our part toward the fulfilment of the decrees of Providence."

We envy neither the head nor the heart of the man who can make the unfortunate victims of our police courts the subject of coarse wit and ribald jest. Neither do we admire the newspaper, pretending to respectability, that will, from day to day, draw pen pictures for the public to gaze at, of the filth and rags and fetid breath of the sons and daughters of intemperance; and especially when a comic shading is attempted to be thrown around them, and an appreciating public is expected to laugh at the caricatures. A person with Christian feelings would as soon think of going to our cemeteries and writing up a grotesque description of the funerals each day. It would be no more inappropriate.—Toledo Journal.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"I have just given your statement of principles a careful examination, and find much in it to which I can heartily subscribe. Indeed, if I except your characterization of Christianity (which seems to me sadly incomplete and one-sided in its treatment), and the form in which some ideas are expressed in art. 6 (e. g. the supremacy of science in matters of belief), I might say amen to the whole, especially to your noble statement of intellectual, moral and social unity. But my purpose is not to review your position. I do not feel competent for the task; it is simply to say a hurried word of God-speed to you in your chosen field of labor. With all deference to your mature thought and experience, I must see fit to differ from you in some points, but I am surprised to find in how much we agree. Sometimes I fear lest you mistakenly suppose that your truth is peculiar to yourself. I am not disposed to give you so much credit. The form of your statement I admire, and still more the personal example of loyalty to conviction which accompanies it; but the problems and solutions you are considering were household words in my preparatory training at Cambridge and Boston, and are the shibboleth of modern Unitarian thought. Here is the two dollars INDEX subscription for the ensuing year. I should lie if I said that your paper contented or in all things pleased me. It is far from doing that. But it is helpful and stimulating—suggestive of broader thought and indicative of certain currents of moral activity."

"I meant to have written you and renewed my subscription to THE INDEX before this time, but I have been limited for time and also for money. During the past year I have had bad luck in business, and lost all I had, and when I read your lecture on 'Success' in THE INDEX (No. 43), it gave me the greatest consolation of anything that I had read for a year past; for although I have not had outward success (as is spoken of), still I feel that I have had inward success, and that I count of more value than all the riches of this world, and I consider that piece alone is worth more than the subscription price of your paper one year. I think it ought to be published in tract form so that it might come cheap and be circulated by the thousand or ten thousand. Also I think the lecture on 'Repentance and Forgiveness' is worthy too, of being published in tract form."

"Permit me to say that I have been more than satisfied with your paper for the current year, and I trust it will be a permanency. I would like to say to some of your correspondents who attempt to criticize Spiritualism that, if they would really examine the matter till they know what it means, the space in THE INDEX which they sometimes waste, would be saved for something valuable. But enough."

"Enclosed please find check for $15.30, for which send THE INDEX to the following names.... Could write more, but leave the above to speak my sentiments."

"I am much pleased with your address on the relation of Spiritualism and Free Religion. It will please liberal Spiritualists generally."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—Regular meetings of this Society will be held during the spring on Sunday forenoons, at 10½ o'clock, in Daniels' Block, corner of Jefferson and Summit Streets, in the hall over the U. S. Express Office. The public are cordially invited.

RECEIVED.

SECOND ANNUAL REPORT of the State Board of Health of Massachusetts, January, 1871. Boston: WRIGHT & POTTER, State Printers, 79 Milk St. 1871. pp. 433.

A REVIEW AND CRITICISM of Mr. Darwin's "Descent of Man," by ALFRED RUSSELL WALLACE, F. R. S., etc. Reprinted from the London Academy. New York: AUGUST BRENTANO, 33 Union Square. 1871. pp. 86. Price 25 cents.

HOME AND HEALTH. A Monthly Magazine devoted to Health and the Home Circle. W. R. DE PUT & BROTHER, Publishers, 305 Broadway, New York. April, 1871. $1.50 a Year.

THE SCHOOL LABORATORY OF PHYSICAL SCIENCE. Edited by Prof. GUSTAVUS HINRICHS. Published Quarterly by the Editor. Iowa City, Iowa. $1.00 a year. Vol. I, No. 1.

FIRST ANNUAL REPORT of the Society for Promoting Life Insurance among Clergymen, etc. New York: 26 Bible House. 1871.

THE TRUTH-SEEKER. Edited by the Rev. JOHN PAGE HOPPS. London: TRUEBNER & Co, Paternoster Row. April, 1871.

CATALOGUE AND CIRCULAR of the Le Roy Academic Institute (Le Roy, Genesee Co., N. Y.). For the Fall and Winter Terms of the Seventh Academic Year, 1870-1871. Le Roy, N. Y. 1871.

THE MONTHLY MISCELLANY. Devoted to Miscellaneous Literature, Progression, Humor, and General Intelligence. North Strafford, N. H. April, 1871.

Poetry.

GOD.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

Thou art where'er the beautiful
Is heart-enshrined of Truth;
Where Trust and Knowledge, hand in hand,
Keep their perpetual youth;
Where heart and mind, with one acclaim,
Call on the glory of Thy name.

Thou art where life to Nature gives
The tribute of its love;
Where prayer in deed and effort lives,
Lip-service far above;
Where aspiration is divine,
There builds the soul Thy templed shrine.

Wherever from the earth ascends
The great deliverance song,
Thou, mighty One, art in the midst
Of all the surging throng.
It re-ascends—it came from Thee—
The triumph hymn of liberty!

Thou art within, above, below,
Around us, everywhere;
Thy impress is on human woe,
And brightens its despair.
Through wisdom, freedom, nigh to Thee,
We, soul-revealed, Thy glory see.

CAMDEN, Me., Mar. 28, 1871.

CORA WILBURN.

The Index.

APRIL 22, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES, OR REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX.—Is the title of a neatly-printed tract of sixteen pages published by THE INDEX Association, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. One Hundred Copies will be sent for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate—one cent a copy. Packages will be sent free to those who will circulate them, but are unable to pay for them.

Mr. PARKER PILLSBURY desires engagements to lecture on RADICAL RELIGION, either for Single Lectures or for Courses of Lectures on successive evenings. Address INDEX OFFICE, TOLEDO, OHIO. The following are among the Subjects of his Lectures:—1. The Popular Religion.—What will you give us instead? 2. Religious Mysteries. 3. Is the World more indebted to Christianity than to Science? 4. The Sunday Question. 5. Young Men's Christian Associations. 6. Woman—Her Rights and Responsibilities in Government and Society. 7. Labor and Capital. [Three Lectures.] 8. Lying Pretences in Church and State. These Lectures discuss, in the light of common sense and modern ideas, the theology and institutions of the Christian Church, which they treat in the boldest and most uncompromising manner. They aim to substitute for the degrading Bible-worship and Christ-worship of the churches universal reverence for Reason, Truth, Justice, Freedom, and Humanity.

Mr. PILLSBURY has concluded an arrangement with the Editor and Proprietors of THE INDEX by which he will make it a special object to introduce that paper as widely as possible, as an organ of the most advanced religious thought of the times, and will report regularly through its columns.

F. E. ABBOT, Editor,
For the INDEX ASSOCIATION.

TOLEDO, O., April, 1871.

The readers of the first volume of THE INDEX, and more particularly of the early numbers, will doubtless remember some articles of great beauty and merit, signed "Brevity." It is with very deep regret that we record the death of the noble and great-souled lady who wrote them. An intellect bold, vigorous, and free,—a heart warm with the tenderest sympathies of womanhood, and ever glowing with love for all that is lovely,—a life shadowed with much sorrow, but lived with such fidelity to truth and goodness that it commanded the reverence of all who were privileged to know her,—such was the gifted woman who, once known, could never be forgotten. She lived for others; they will hold her memory sacred. The subjoined notice is from the leading paper of Detroit:—

DEATH OF AN ESTIMABLE LADY.—Mrs. C. E. Cochran, widow of the late W. D. Cochran of this city, died, we regret to say, on the morning of the 4th. Mrs. Cochran was well known in former times as a most zealous member of the American Anti-Slavery Society, and latterly as prominently connected with the Woman's Suffrage movement, being a Vice President, we think, of the Northwestern Association. She had a warm heart and open hand for every good reform. We have rarely known a lady of more intellectual gifts, which she had heightened by much study and observation. She would, with an ambition stimulating her, have trod almost any path of mental distinction. She possessed many graces of character, conspicuous among which was a rare unselfishness. Almost her last public work was the circulation of a petition for a law to meet the case of those who had been unjustly imprisoned—or who after long imprisonment, as in the case of Edward Murphy, had been shown to be innocent. She leaves one son, Geo. B. Cochran, Esq., a member of the Detroit Bar. Her husband, the late W. D. Cochran, was one of our most philanthropic and useful citizens.

AN UNEXPECTED ATTACK.

In THE INDEX for April 1, we said a few words about "infidels" and "infidelity." Our main points were as follows:

1. That the word from which "infidel" is derived meant in classical Latin unfaithful, in ecclesiastical Latin unbelieving.

2. That this change of meaning took place because the Church taught (and still teaches) that belief in Christianity is an absolute duty, and that disbelief in it is a sin.

3. That the word "infidel" thus implies in Christian usage, not only disbelief in Christianity, but also moral guilt on account of this disbelief; and that this moral accusation always goes with the word, at least by suggestion, as used among Christians.

4. That to accept the word as a just designation of liberals is an unwary endorsement of the assumption that Christianity ought to be believed—an unguarded concession that liberals are morally guilty in disbelieving it.

5. That, as the word "rebel" implies not only a disregard of authority, but also a just claim in the authority disregarded, so the word "infidel" implies not only disbelief of the Christian scheme, but also the moral obligation of mankind to believe it.

6. That, though utterly indifferent to the epithet when hurled at us, we were not so simple as to admit we deserved it, and thus foolishly concede the rightfulness of the authority we rejected.

7. That men who obey the authority of reason, truth, justice, humanity, are faithful, not unfaithful, because they obey what really ought to be obeyed; and they are not "infidels" in fact, whatever they may be called, since the Christian scheme they reject has no just claim upon them.

8. That the pious bigots who charge liberals with "infidelity," i. e. moral unfaithfulness because of disbelief in Christianity, are themselves "infidel" to truth and kindness and brotherly love, whose authority they equally profess to accept.

Now the Boston Investigator, commenting on this article of ours, reads us a lecture for our illiberality, bigotry, unfairness, flippancy, absurdity, etc., etc. It falls into misrepresentations so gross that from any other source we should have regarded them as wilful and malicious slanders. But because we believe the editor of the Investigator to be a man of high honor and strict integrity, we conclude them to be merely blunders.

We argued that, because free-thinkers are faithful, they are not "infidels." Mr. Seaver represents as us arguing that, because they are "infidels," they are unfaithful! He says:—"We do not exactly relish the imputation that we have been treacherous or faithless to our highest ideal." To represent us as casting any such imputation, when there is not the ghost of a shadow of a reason for suspecting us of casting it, and thus to hold us up to the readers of the Investigator as joining the pack of pious persecutors and defamers of honest men, is a little too bad. Again he says:—"To say that, because we reject the fables of superstition, we are unbelievers in the virtues of kindness, justice, fidelity, charity, modesty, truth, freedom, and human rights—and more yet, 'endorse the worst part of Christianity—' is amusing, if not pitiful, considering where it comes from."

Did we say any such thing? Did we hint it? Did we even dream it? We despair of ever being understood, if such preposterous nonsense can be twisted and tortured out of plain, straightforward English. Our whole object was to show that, because such men as Mr. Seaver are faithful believers in truthfulness and uprightness and justice, and faithful practisers of these and similar virtues, it is a slander to call them "infidels," that is, unfaithful men, merely because they do not believe in Christianity. And here comes Mr. Seaver, holding us up to reprobation for accusing him of the very unfaithfulness from the accusation of which we were defending him!

This is a serious charge, and it is utterly false. If, as we doubt not, Mr. Seaver has allowed himself, through a somewhat ungenerous suspicion that THE INDEX must at heart be bigoted because it accepts the word "religion" and rejects the word "infidel," to fall into an honest misconception of very plain statements, then he will make haste to repair this injustice by a frank admission of his grievous mistake. We have made no accusations against him of any sort.

Of course we are perfectly willing that others should use the word "infidel" in their own way. We have simply given our own understanding of it. Evangelical bigots may call us what they please, without disturbing us in the least. But we shall not gratify them by accepting as appropriate a name which belies our purpose and our practice; nor shall we play into their hands by unguardedly conceding that belief in Christianity is a duty to which we are "infidel" or unfaithful.

"Infidelity," says Mr. Seaver, "as defined by infidels themselves, simply means a disbelief of the Divine inspiration of the Bible and of Christianity; and, judged by this definition, the editor of THE INDEX is himself an infidel, though sailing under the flag of Free Religion."

Of course we are an "infidel" by this definition. If we thought the definition correct, we would as soon avow ourself an "infidel" as a non-Christian. The one avowal would be tantamount to the other. But it is this definition that we think erroneous; and what is especially queer is the fact that Mr. Seaver himself thinks it erroneous too! The Investigator refutes itself. On the very same page with the above definition, though in another article, Mr. Seaver says:—"Call a man a 'Christian,' and the general inference appears to be that he is uncommonly good; but call his neighbor an 'infidel,' and the verdict against him, by the same judges, is that he is uncommonly bad. And yet the latter may be, as sometimes is the case, a better man than the former; but one has a popular name, the other an unpopular one. So the world goes; and by this false judgment many a bad man obtains credit for virtues he does not possess, and many a good man is condemned, simply because he has too much conscience to play the hypocrite."

Every word of this is true; and we quote it to show that Mr. Seaver himself distinctly perceives that the word "infidel" means more than disbelief—that it also means bad character. That is the fact; and it is because the word means bad character, as well as disbelief, that we refuse to accept it.

Mr. Seaver would say, however, that this is only the Christian's meaning of the word; that, "as defined by infidels themselves," it means disbelief only, and does not mean bad character.

True again. But we object to accepting a name in one sense which is meant in another; and we think it foolish to play fast and loose with words in this fashion. "You are an infidel," says the bigot, meaning a bad man. "Yes, I am an infidel," says Mr. Seaver, meaning a good man. Is there nothing absurd in that? Apply the same principle to a similar case. "You are a thief," says the Court, meaning one who steals. "Yes, I am a thief," says Mr. Smith, meaning one who does not steal. If the Court takes him at his word, and sends him to jail, can he complain? But because we refuse to plead guilty in this absurd way to an uncommitted crime, Mr. Seaver thinks we turn round and accuse him of it!

We ask the sensitive editor of the Investigator to point out in the columns of THE INDEX a single unkind or ungenerous insinuation against him. Let him, if he can, show a single charge made by us to parallel this most extraordinary charge of his. We have felt, and expressed, nothing but respect for his honesty, bravery and fidelity to his own opinions; nor have we thought one whit the worse of him because we think his opinions on some points behind the age. But we say frankly that, if he omits to repair the wrong he has done us, and to put us before his readers in a truer light than that of a bigoted accuser of those who choose to call themselves "infidels," we shall think very differently of his character from this time forth, and admit him to be indeed an "infidel," not merely as a disbeliever in the Bible's inspiration (which we too disbelieve), but also as one unfaithful to the obligations of common justice.

We feel sure, however, that Mr. Seaver's hasty charge was the result of a misapprehension, and that he will do what we should certainly do in his case—emphatically withdraw it.

The Christian Register gives credit to THE INDEX for a floating anecdote of H. W. Beecher, which might be fairly regarded as the common property of the press. This scrupulousness contrasts so favorably with the too frequent practice of newspapers that it deserves especial notice. But the anecdote was not "original" with THE INDEX. Considering the fertility of invention and sterility of honesty with which anecdotes are concocted nowadays, we suggest that the non-originality of this anecdote entitles THE INDEX itself to a modicum of praise.

"I have the greatest respect," says Max Mueller (Buddhaghosha's Parables, p. xxi), "for really critical scepticism; but a scepticism without any argument to support it is too cheap a virtue to deserve much consideration."

When we read these words, we were reminded of the doubts sometimes expressed as to the historical existence of Jesus.

HARVARD DIVINITY SCHOOL.

There has been some discussion in these columns whether the "coming man" will attend church. I am no prophet or son of a prophet, and won't venture a prediction. I think it wiser to wait until the coming man gets here, and then watch him on Sundays.

Nor will I predict, granting that the coming man will go to church, that the coming boy will go to Divinity Schools. It depends very much, I suppose, upon what such schools may be. "How is it that you have no Doctors of Divinity?" said one to the witty old Jacob Kruber, one of the early Methodist preachers. "Because our divinity is not sick, and does not need doctoring," replied the old man. If our Divinity Schools get sick and become nothing but a nursery for weak-headed, sentimental youths, then (I will not prophesy, but) I hope the coming boy will not go to Divinity Schools.

Whether the future preacher (taking him for granted) will be a graduate of some school of theology; or, like the first Methodist preachers in this country, be a graduate of "Brush College" and "Swamp University;" or, like the last Methodist preachers, graduate from the anvil and come forth to preach with the music and power of a whole "anvil chorus;" or whether the future preacher will be called, not Reverend, but plain Mister, like some of the men who are now supplying Rev. W. R. Alger's pulpit in Music Hall,—what the future preacher, teacher, or lecturer may be, I do not pretend to know. I think the "Coming Man" will take care of his own affairs, and that we have enough to do to attend to the wants of the present man. The present man seems to think that Divinity Schools are, on the whole, not undesirable institutions. He has more or less interest in supporting them, and in making them the best schools for the mind and morals. This interest every promoter of universal education should feel, and this is enough to justify any fair, well-meant criticism on one of the most liberal theological schools in the country. Some of our readers probably know that there is such a denomination as the Unitarian denomination, and that they have a Divinity School at Cambridge, Mass. As the Unitarians call themselves liberal Christians, we should expect to find their school a liberal school. Let us see how liberal it really is.

The Hall for the Divinity Students was dedicated in 1826, Dr. Channing preaching the dedication sermon. In the course of his remarks, he makes this declaration of the principle and purpose for which the institution was founded:—"To free inquiry, then, we dedicate these walls. We invite into them the ingenuous young man who prizes liberty of mind more than aught within the gift of sects or of the world. Let Heaven's free air circulate, and Heaven's unobstructed light shine here, and let those who shall be sent hence go forth, not to echo with servility a creed imposed on their weakness, but to utter, in their own manly tones, what their own free investigation and deep conviction urge them to preach as the truth of God."

No student, I think, could ask for greater liberty. "To free inquiry we dedicate these walls." Here is no doctrinal test whatever. Nor is there any such test in the terms of admission published in the "Catalogue of the Officers and Students of Harvard University." It merely requires that "candidates, if unknown to the Faculty, shall produce testimonials to their moral and serious character." Believe what you may, your belief will not debar you. Reading this, any one would say—surely Harvard Divinity School is free enough for any lover of free inquiry. So it appears, and so it is, if the student is not dependent upon the beneficiary fund for pecuniary aid. But suppose that the candidate for admission is poor. He is informed in the catalogue that "students who are without the means of defraying the cost of their theological education, if faithful and diligent, can receive pecuniary aid, nearly sufficient to meet the expense of tuition, room-rent, fuel and board."

A glorious institution, that excludes not the most sceptical from its privileges and even gives pecuniary support to the indigent! Provided with his testimonials to his "moral and serious character," and moreover assured that, if he is "faithful and diligent," he can receive pecuniary aid to defray much of his expense, our ingenuous young man enters the school. The coal bill and board bill and a dozen other bills are soon due, and, very naturally, our young Divinity Student becomes anxious for that promised aid. Poor innocent fellow! Little does he imagine, when he enters the school, that a good part of that beneficiary fund is in the hands of trustees who will surely exact of him a confession of faith before he will be deemed by these conscientious judges a worthy recipient. Yet this is a fact. Our unsophisticated youth, unacquainted with "ways that are dark and tricks that are vain," takes for granted, just as the Catalogue says, that, if he is "faithful and diligent," he is entitled to the fund. But he soon learns, to his sorrow, that these conscientious trustees have a very original and peculiar way of interpreting language. For instance—one of the funds, called the "Williams fund," is used to be given to "such indigent students as shall be preparing themselves for the ministry and shall be deemed most meritorious and worthy of assistance;" and provides that "no such student shall be debarred of this charity by reason of entertaining any peculiar modes of faith, it being always understood that he must be a Protestant."

Now it would seem to almost any ordinary human being that the donor, Williams, meant by "Protestant" any man who was not a Catholic. Any anti-Catholic or Protestant, no matter what "peculiar modes of faith" he might entertain, it would appear, is entitled to the fund. But this word "Protestant," in the hands of these trustees, undergoes a very wonderful metamorphosis. It means no longer one who protests against Catholicism, but one who believes in the Lordship of Jesus Christ; and so, interpreting the word in this sense, these conscientious trustees, with a scrupulosity rarely seen in this corrupt age, deem no student as "meritorious and worthy of assistance," however "faithful and diligent" he may have been, who cannot say—"I believe in the Lordship of Jesus Christ."

I do not blame these trustees as being insincere. They may be all honorable men. Some of them, I know, are men highly respected in their community. Some of them are Unitarian preachers, known as Christians, and always pronouncing the name of "Our Lord Jesus Christ" with unction. I could not deny them the name of Christian, any more that I could Philip II. of Spain. I would not impugn their honesty any more than I would his. A man may be a Christian and be honest, and at the same time be bigoted, intolerant and narrow-minded. I am willing to call them Christian and honest. They have, moreover, an unquestionable right to interpret the word "Protestant" for themselves. If they honestly think that it implies the Deity or Lordship of Jesus, Trinity of the Godhead, infallibility of the Bible, damnation of the unchurched, or any other doctrine, which the word has, no doubt, at some time included, then they are not wrong in demanding that doctrinal belief of the recipient.

Every year a committee from these trustees proceeds to Cambridge to make an inquisition into the theological belief of the young men. In 1868, the New Testament miracles and authority of Christ were the racks upon which the innocent victims were stretched. It was not a bloody ordeal, by any means. Neither were the inquisitors savage-looking men,—on the contrary, perhaps, pleasant, "with a smile that was child-like and bland." But the questions they asked were quite frightful to hear, and tempted equivocation and subterfuge on the part of the trembling student, for he thought of his term bills, long due, that were to be paid from this fund, if he were only "faithful and diligent." Alas, if his fidelity and diligence didn't lead him to the faith of his inquisitor, the Christian trustee!

Here are some of the questions put by this Committee in 1869:—"In conducting the exercises of Public Worship yourself, as a public teacher of morals and religion, should you offer your prayers in the name and as a disciple of Jesus Christ, administer baptism under the New Testament formula—"In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost,"—and administer the 'Lord's Supper' in the spirit of a memorial service?" The answers they received from, at least, two of the students, were so unsatisfactory to these trustees that the aid pledged to them in the Catalogue, if they would be "faithful and diligent," was withheld from them several weeks, to their no small annoyance and suspense of mind. What torture the sensitive conscience of these Christian trustees suffered, before they could bring themselves to look upon a Radical Divinity Student as a Protestant, the world will probably never know. One of these trustees proffered the fatherly advice to one of these students to leave the school, assuring him that he had, no doubt, ability to succeed at any worldly calling, and appealed to his conscience in these words:—"Is not preaching mere morality and mere religion under the guise of preaching Christianity a less respectable occupation than any handicraft or any calling honestly pursued?" As the student had no intention of preaching "mere morality and mere religion under any guise," he felt that he could not follow the advice of the conscientious trustee.

The same inquisitorial system is kept up to-day in Cambridge Divinity School. The students, this present year, who have applied for the "Williams fund," have been asked, before they could be deemed "meritorious and worthy of assistance," to sign the following statement of faith and purpose:—"I hereby declare that it is my intention to devote myself to preaching the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ as contained in the New Testament." I am glad to say that the students—seventeen out of twenty-one—showed that they were veritable "Protestants" by promptly sending in a protest against the demand of the theological tribunal. It seems that there was some reason for an investigation into the general purpose of those receiving the fund, for it was said that certain individuals not intending to make the ministry their profession had joined the school for the purpose of drawing the fund. This, of course, was an imposition on the school and perversion of school money. The trustees had a perfect right to inquire into the general purpose of the beneficiary—whether to enter the ministry or not; but they had no right to slip in a doctrinal test in a simple question of purpose. Herein the spirit of the inquisitor is seen. The lion's skin didn't cover the ass's ears; they were too long.

I have just learned that the trustees have finally yielded and voted the money; they have generally yielded at last. But how long, we should like to know, are they to continue to harass liberal professors and radical students by using their position, as trustees, practically to suborn witnesses to the "Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ?" I think it almost time that we hear a word of protest from some of the leading Unitarians. If not, would it not be well to blot out those words of Channing—"We dedicate these walls to free inquiry,"—and to erase from their Catalogue the pledge that "students who are without the means of defraying the cost of their theological education, if faithful and diligent, can receive pecuniary aid, nearly sufficient to meet their expenses?"

W. H. S.

The death of Prof. De Morgan ought not to pass unnoticed in our columns. His practical protests against religious tests in educational institutions deserve most honorable mention, and the necessity for them is a disgrace to the universities whose bigotry occasioned them. As the following paragraph from Nature (March 23) shows, Prof. De Morgan valued the principle of religious liberty so highly as to be willing to make sacrifices for it from which ninety-nine men out of a hundred shrink. Such practical fidelity to freedom commands our profoundest respect:—

"In the tripos of 1837 he was Fourth Wrangler, but he never proceeded to the degree of M. A., owing to his objection to subscribe to the tests, and it is sad to think that the same conscientious scruples debarred this illustrious man from a Fellowship. On leaving Cambridge he entered at Lincoln's Inn, and would have forsaken mathematics for the study of the law, but that in 1823 the London University, now University College, was founded, and he was offered the Professorship of Mathematics there, which he accepted and remained a firm supporter of the College and its principle of no tests till the year 1866, when the Council, in making an appointment to the chair of Logic and Mental Philosophy, refused, as the Professor believed, one of the candidates on account of his religious opinions. Prof. De Morgan remonstrated, but his remonstrances were disregarded. He then thought it his duty to inform them that he must forsake the College, if the College forsook its principles. But the Council turned a deaf ear; and Prof. De Morgan, who had for nearly forty years been the chief honor and ornament of their institution, left them, and, we are informed, never afterwards entered their gates."

"Mr. Glaisher is an aeronaut, and he has discovered that a woman's voice is audible at a height of two miles, while a man's voice has never been heard higher than a mile."—Toledo Blade.

It seems, then, inconsistent in doctors of old-fashioned divinity to oppose the admission of women into the ministry. If the female voice is heard twice as high as the male voice, on their own theories they have every reason to admit them.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

THE PERSONALITY OF GOD.

LOUISIANA, Mo., April 5, 1871.

MR. F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—I observe that many of your correspondents are disposed to question you as to your belief in God. You answer, and properly, that you do not believe in his personality. Is not that enough? To my mind, all the attempts to endow the Deity with human characteristics, in such form as to render him comprehensible to our finite minds, have only resulted in failure. They are vain endeavors to bring the infinite down to the comprehension of the finite. All that we can understand of Deity must be confined to the term "natural laws," and these, when scientifically examined and understood, may be fairly pronounced to be "the way in which God works." Our course must be to work "through Nature up to Nature's God." When we reverse the process and by any assumption as to what God's attributes are endeavor to work downwards, and define natural law by simple reference to God, we fail invariably. Even supposing that we could predicate justice of the Deity, we can never say beforehand that his justice will work in any particular way, unless, having observed similar facts, we have found out the natural law and understand its application.

Yours,

L. BRISTOL.

[We said we did not believe in the "personality" of God in the common conception of it; nor do we, since the common conception of personality includes much that does not properly belong to it. But we cannot here enlarge.—ED.]

WORDS, WORDS.

When we come to examine the meanings of some of the Christian Catechisms, the results are very ludicrous. It is so all through the system. It is a set of certain formulas, which are empty air when dissected. And it has struck me that the persons who write to the INDEX, and call themselves Atheists, are rather running into the same error. What is an "Atheist?" Undoubtedly one who refuses to accept the idea of a God, we say. "The idea" of a God! What idea? I do not believe in a masculine creature, size of several common-place men, holding the universe in his right hand, and delivering his judgments on humanity. My God is in my breast, in the open fields, in the breeze that fans my cheek; every noble impulse in my heart is God; every sympathy with the suffering and afflicted is God! "God is Good," and Good is God.

Now apart from belief or action, or anything, no living man or woman can be an Atheist. It is a misnomer. If a man is never totally depraved, he is never an Atheist. When—if ever that time comes—a man is totally depraved, then will he be an Atheist.

It all rests on that confounded and confounding word "belief," which I strike out of my dictionary forever.

Look out for these little words! The word would kill, if it could, but the spirit giveth—brains. Let us by all means have the spirit. I know that THE INDEX has the right spirit, for I see the brains in every line. God, by which we mean the Spirit of all Love, and Truth, and Good, speed it on its errand.

W. H. D.

INTO THE CHURCH AND OUT AGAIN.

NORTHAMPTON, MASS., March, 1871.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—I once belonged to an Orthodox Church. The story of the circumstances under which I joined it is at your disposal, if you see fit to use it.

The church claimed the right to make articles of faith to which I must submit, or else accept the disgrace of excommunication. I could not be its slave, and therefore asked for a dismissal. The church refused the request, and consequently excommunicated me because I would not be a hypocrite. For fifteen years, I had had no connection with the church, and had not attended their meetings. They had taken no notice of me in religious affairs, nor would they, I suppose, had it not been for this tongue in my mouth, which my mother had told me would some day make me trouble, because it was true to my convictions. That the church could not stand; therefore the following proceedings took place.

Mr. K. called on me for the purpose of saving my soul, by making me ask forgiveness of the Church and live a lie. Another, Deacon W., called, got mad with me, said I thought I knew more than seven men, but I was a fool, and my father before me (who was dead and gone) was a very simple man. He said I was an adulterer, not because I had committed any such offence, but because I sympathized in religious belief with one that had. The man to whom he referred had been turned out of the Church. Another, Deacon C., called on me, but accomplished nothing. The first requested me to go with him to the clergyman. The clergyman tried to convince me of my errors, by telling me what God had said in his holy word. I replied that I wished he would use self-evident arguments; that I did not think that book infallible. He said that thousands had had such an intuitive knowledge of that fact, that they knew it as well as they existed; that they were honest men, and I ought to take their word for it. I told him that thousands said they knew that they conversed with their departed friends; that they were honest, and he ought to take their word for it. He said he did. I told him I had been called a Spiritualist by some of his flock,—that I would resign in his favor, as I could not believe it. He said he did not countenance such things; that he thought those spirits that communicated were of a low order; he did not wish to associate with them; that when he died, he hoped to associate with his first wife, who had died, as all true Christians died, in an ecstasy of bliss, and with St. Paul. I replied that they that would take the highest seat must have the lowest; that I thought the Christian religion calculated to put more thorns than roses in death-bed pillows; that it was not necessary to be in the right, but only to think one was in the right, to die comfortably; that some threw themselves down under the wheels of Juggernaut and were crushed to death; that the Catholic, with his wax-candle in hand, died as contentedly as the Protestant; that Samuel was one of his Old Testament worthies, and I hoped he would not call him of a low order, and that he appeared and talked with the woman of Endor. He said he thought that was a spirit that aped Samuel. I asked if his God knew Samuel from an ape? God in his holy Word had said it was Samuel; and yet he would not believe it. Who was the worse, he or I?

That evening's conversation closed. He told Mr. K. to let my case rest for the present; he would take the trouble to talk with me more, and I should be all right. He called on me once after that. I waited upon him as well as I knew how; remarked that it was a long time since a clergyman had called on me before,—that it used to be the custom to mix up a toddy and treat the ministers when they called, but that, when a boy, I had noticed that, since this fashion had gone out of date, ministers' calls had been like angels' visits, few and far between. He left and did not call any more. I supposed he thought I was a hardshell, inasmuch as I received a letter, saying that I had denied the Divinity of the Lord Jesus Christ, the inspiration of the Bible, and the Fall of Man, and had broken the covenant in not attending on their means of grace. It requested me to meet the Church on a given time and answer to those charges; adding that the ones by whom they expected to prove those charges were the ones that called on me.

I attended the meeting. The Pastor prayed and consigned me to the regions of Pluto, unless I retraced my steps, confessed my sins to the Church, and obeyed its dictation; after which he said the meeting meant business. I arose and said that, if they meant me, that I was not there because I recognized any authority of the Church to call me there; that I could not claim the honor of membership; that the Church had made a new creed to which I could not and should not consent; that I had a paper in my hands that contained slanderous charges against me, and that I had good reason to suppose they were the authors of it; that I was there to accuse them, and defend myself from those charges. The Pastor said the Church would decide the question of membership. I wanted to see who had any better right to decide that question than myself. The Church concluded to go on with the trial. The Pastor called Mr. K. He said I had told him that I thought Christ had a human father; that I thought the Bible contained errors; and that I did not think all men were totally depraved. I asked the witness if I denied those things, or said I could not believe them? He said I could not believe them.

The Clerk, who is rich and the President of a Bank, came to the rescue. He thought he could bring me to the test, either by dignity or logic. He held his creed in his hand, and, with the grace of a saint and the dignity of wealth, he read:—"You believe in one God existing in three persons, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost?" I replied,—More than that, existing in everything."

"All are but parts of one stupendous whole, Whose body nature is, and God the soul."

He sat down in despair; but the end was not yet. The Pastor called Deacon C., but his courage had failed him. He said he could not tell what I believed and what I did not. I replied that I thought the deacon had told the truth; that I did not think he could, but I could not hold myself responsible for that fact, as I had done my best to tell him. The Pastor then called Deacon W. I arose immediately, and replied to his testimony. I said that fools were not accountable; that the witness thought me a fool, and had called me so; that a man of his cloth ought to know better than to accuse a fool. The Deacon got mad again, and sharp words ensued between the Deacon and myself. The Pastor shouted, "Order!" and told the deacon to sit down, saying he thought I was not a fool; I could have the floor, and speak for myself. I said I thought they had not made out any case against me; that I thought there had not been the slightest evidence to sustain the charges; that I was charged with denying the divinity of the Lord Jesus Christ; that I did not deny the divine in anybody or anything; that I had not denied the inspiration of anything; that there was a "spirit in man, and the inspiration of the Almighty had given it understanding;" that the history of the race spoke for itself as to their depravity; that some were born with good natures and some with bad; that I had given no opinion in regard to the Fall of Man; that, as to the covenant, that was a mutual obligation; that they had ceased to watch over me, and I had ceased to attend; in that respect they were as bad as I; that I had been poor, and had a large family; that I had owed some of them, and could not pay them as soon as I wished; that they had sued me at the law; that I had paid some of them two per cent. a month for money, although their Master had forbidden them to take usury; that I had been obliged to borrow money of the world's people, who had accommodated me without interest. The Pastor asked me if I would withdraw my request to have my name stricken from the list of members, and remain with the Church? I told him, No! He said the Church wished to be alone when they decided my case. I sympathized with them in that wish, and left the hall. Have not heard from them since in that line, officially, but have heard from outside sources that they went through the performance of reading me out of the Church.

E. T. WOOD.

MEDIUMSHIP.

QUINCY, MASS., March 27, 1871.

MR. ABBOT:

My Dear Sir,—In your reply to Mr. Towne, I find the following statement:—

"The world's various special faiths are all gradually developing the same universal ideas which are to constitute the faith of the future."

This language, I suspect, is liable to be construed in a sense not designed by its author. Surely, he did not mean to say, that the foundation of virtue and the Religion of Humanity are produced by any form of mediumistic faith; but only that Christianity did not wholly wipe out all the instincts and attributes of Human Nature, and that these "universal ideas" are now more and more spreading in despite of all the mediumistic faiths have done in retarding human progression.

Humanity is older than all creeds. Its instinctive impulses, by which it is carried forward in freedom and civilization, are older and stronger than faith in mediumistic revelations.

Christianity is crystallized credulity in mediumism. There is no God, no Jesus, no miracle, no Christianity, no salvation, without faith in mediumism! Judaism was originated by the assumed mediumship of Moses, which culminated in Christianity; and Christianity is nothing more nor less than faith in mediumism. And what Humanity now is in its aspirations and progression, it is in despite of Christianity.

All the forms of mediumship owe their origin to the want of human development. They are begotten by ignorance, credulity and fear. They have all hindered the race in its civilization. What man has most needed has been self-culture, and this has always been discouraged by mediumism. And the aspirations of Humanity, so far from being "developed" by the "world's special faiths," those faiths have, all of them, forbidden, and more or less crushed out of the human heart.

Mr. Abbot says again:—

"The core and essence of all the great religions, looked at in their universal element, apart from all their exclusive claims and special limitations, is the upward struggle of the human soul into the better, the purer, the truer—in a word, the effort of man to perfect himself, whether he is or is not aware that this effort is the universal Divine Life stirring in his heart."

This language seems to me to be open criticism. How can the living aspirations of humanity be the "core and essence" of any form of mediumism? And, moreover, it seems to me, we should not, in our forms of speech, invest alleged mediumistic revelations from another world with any one of the attributes of Humanity. Nothing that is purely human is an integrant of any revelation from another world.

And how is it that radical, thoughtful men of the present age are so slow in perceiving that it is mediumism, and nothing else, which divides them and the rest of mankind? Mr. Towne is a mediumist. He relies more or less on mediumistic revelations for what he believes of God, of Jesus, and the condition man enters after death. All are mediumists who invest alleged mediumistic revelations with any authority whatever in matters of faith or conduct. Mediumism is an authority relied upon outside of humanity, and by those who despair more or less of man. That is, they think that what man most needs is not in Humanity, but in Mediumism. They do not believe that man is himself the greatest miracle; they think the greatest wonder is in Moses, in Jesus, and the mystic rap of modern times.

But man cannot very well divest himself of his humanity, albeit an excess in his credulity is often an effort in that direction. Man existed on this earth uncounted ages before mediumism was known; and his authority for virtue he finds in the love-relations of life into which he is born. This love is older than all creeds; and it exists in despite of them. In no sense, therefore, can it be truthfully said that this authority for freedom and civilization has been developed out of any form of mediumism, ancient or modern. I beg the attention of thoughtful and progressive minds to this issue that now divides the race. It is not in respect to God, or to man's condition after death. It is not in respect to the name of Christ or Christian. But it is mediumism, nothing more, nothing less.

Mediumism stands between God and Humanity, between the living and all the dead now in their graves. It is a "royal road" to a knowledge of the incomprehensible, and the condition man enters at death.

Mediumship is self-assumed in all cases, and it is nothing without faith; and this faith is the motive power that made Judaism, Christianity, Popery, Witchcraft, Mormonism, and the movement now known under the name of Modern Mediumism, which is made wholly by faith in the mystic rap. Against this monstrous assumption of mediumship, Humanity has always uttered its indignant protest, and none the less when this, its arch enemy, "steals the livery of Heaven to serve the devil in."

LA ROY SUNDERLAND.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

WOOD & HOLBROOK'S PUBLICATIONS.

HERALD OF HEALTH.

Sixty Pages. $2.00 a Year. 20 Cts. a Number.

Three Months on Trial Twenty-five Cts.

$1 a Year to Clergymen, Teachers, and Invalids who request it. New subscribers who send $2 for 1871 will be entitled to a book of 300 pages and 100 Engravings, entitled PHYSICAL PERFECTION, or Hints towards Human Beauty, showing how to acquire and retain Bodily Symmetry, Health and Vigor, and to avoid the infirmities and deformities of age, worth $1.50. The Scientific American says, "The HERALD OF HEALTH contains more sensible articles than any monthly that comes to our sanctum."

ALSO—

PHYSICAL PERFECTION.—Containing Chapters on Structure of the Human Body; the Perfect Man and Woman; the Temperaments; Laws of Human Configuration; Embryology; Childhood; Effects of Mental Culture; Moral and Emotional Influences; Social Conditions and Occupations; Effects of Climate and Locality; Direct Physical Culture; Practical Hygiene; Womanhood; the Secret of Longevity; the Arts of Beauty; External Indications of Figure, etc., etc. Beautifully illustrated with 100 Engravings, and handsomely bound. Price, by mail, $1.50.

This work has been through many editions, and has given great satisfaction to thousands. A copy is given free to subscribers to the HERALD OF HEALTH, who send $2 at once.

MINNESOTA AND ITS CLIMATE, as adapted to Consumptives, Invalids, and all who wish to make the State a Home. By Ledyard Bill, author of "A Winter in Florida." Price $1.25, post paid, by mail.

This book, while a godsend to invalids and consumptives, will be found equally interesting to sportsmen and settlers, who would find a home in this far-famed State. It contains a beautiful view of Minnehaha Falls, and also chapters on the climate of all those places which are most desirable as resorts for invalids, including Florida, Nassau, the Adirondacks, California, San Diego, Fayal, etc., etc.

MORAL, INTELLECTUAL, AND PHYSICAL CULTURE; OR THE PHILOSOPHY OF TRUE LIVING. By Professor E. G. Welch, Superintendent in Yale College. It contains over 400 pages, and is beautifully bound. Price, by mail, $3.25.

This book is the most perfect Encyclopedia of Gymnastic exercises of the most approved method known. It tells in plain language how to do everything, from the building of a gymnasium and choosing apparatus to doing the exercises. The series of exercises with the Indian clubs alone, is the best ever published. Those who want a good work on gymnastic culture should not fail to get this one. Dr. Dio Lewis says, "This is an admirable guide to physical culture."

TALKS TO MY PATIENTS.—Hints on Getting Well and Keeping Well. By Mrs. E. B. Gleason, M. D.

Woman agents wanted everywhere. Thousands are being sold. Full contents and terms of agency sent on application. Price, by mail, $1.50.

This book is designed mainly for women, of all ages. It treats principally on the diseases of women, and includes chapters on Child Bearing and the Care of Children. Harper's Magazine, in reviewing the work, says:

"Mrs. Gleason is able to say something to wives and to mothers which no man could say. There can be no difference of opinion about the value of the practical suggestions she affords, which are characterized by sound philosophy and clear, good sterling common sense. We wish the chapter, 'Confidential to Mothers,' might be published as a tract, and sent to every mother in the land."

Mrs. Dr. Sayles, after reading it, says, "I would rather have written that book than been queen of the greatest empire on this small globe of ours!"

No woman can read it without being made wiser and better, and without being better qualified for all the duties of life.

For any or all of the above works, address,

WOOD & HOLBROOK, Publishers,

67eow81

13 & 15 Lighthouse St., New York.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

Free Religious Association.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, on "The Idea of the Free Religious Association;" DAVID A. WASSON, on "The Nature of Religion;" MRS. E. D. CHENEY, on "Religion as a Social Force;" F. E. ABBOT, on "The Future of Religious Organization as affected by the Spirit of the Age;" S. JOHNSON, on "The Natural Sympathy of Religions;" RABBI WISE, on "The Universal Elements in Judaism;" COL. T. W. HIGGINSON, on "Mohammedanism;" WM. H. CHANNING, on "The Religions of China;" W. J. POTTER, on "The Religions of India;" and an abstract of a discussion on the "Relation of Religion to the Public School System of the United States." This Report is specially representative of the principles of the Association. Price 50 cents. In packages of five or more 39 cents each. Also CHANNING's Address on "THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA," (a careful and instructive essay, of particular interest at this time to Americans) in a separate pamphlet for 20 cents.

The ANNUAL REPORT for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cents respectively), Rev. Samuel Johnson's essay on "THE REVELATION OF JESUS" (50 cents), and an essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by Wm. J. POTTER (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained by applying to the Secretary. The Report for 1868 contains a letter from the celebrated Hindu Theist, KESHUB CHUNDER SEN, on the "Origin and Aims of the Brahma Somaj," also an address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, on "Religion and Social Science;" a letter from M. D. CONWAY, on "Religious Movements in England," and speeches by JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHAS. H. MALCOM, JOHN WEISS, and others. The Report for 1869 has addresses by RALPH WALDO EMERSON, D. A. WASSON, JULIA WARD HOWE, C. A. BARTOL, PROF. DENTON, HORACE SEAYER, LUCY STONE, and others.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX
PROSPECTUS FOR 1871.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869, and has just closed its first yearly volume.

We deem it proper, therefore, to submit the following Prospectus of Volume II for 1871, and ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if the matter was properly presented to them, and especially if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor. We cannot afford to send out travelling agents, nor would they succeed so well in getting names as persons of local influence. We therefore have determined to use the funds it would cost to get our paper before the people, in another way, namely, in the purchase of articles of value to be given as premiums to those who make up lists of subscribers; thus presenting to the friends of free thought and pure religion the double motive of doing good and getting paid for it.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two Dollars a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

PREMIUMS.

For Fifty Names, we will give one of PRINCE & Co's four Octave Melodeons (price $65,) or a complete copy of CHAMBERS' Encyclopedia of Universal Knowledge, in ten volumes (price $50).

For Forty Names, we will give a Wilson's Family Sewing Machine, one of the best Machines made.

For Twenty-Five Names, Webster's Royal Quarto Unabridged Pictorial Dictionary (price $12), or one of the following Chromos:

The Three Tom-Boys (Frang's), price..... $15.00
Winter in the Forest, 20x28..... 12.00
Watering the Horses, 21x29..... 12.00

For Ten Names, one of the following Chromos:
WHITTIER's Barefooted Boy, (Frang's) price..... $5.00
The Unconscious Sleeper, 14x17..... 6.00
Mt. Blanc, 20x26..... 7.50
Or a copy of LECKY's History of European Morals, 2 vols 6.00
MAX MUELLER's Chips from a German Work-Shop, 2 vols 5.00
EMERSON's Prose Works, 2 vols..... 5.00
WEISS's Life and Correspondence of THEODORE PARKER, 2 volumes..... 6.00

For Five Names, a bound volume of THE INDEX, for 1870. (Price $2.50.) Or a copy of one of the following works, (post paid):
DARWIN's Origin of Species, price..... $2.00
LUBBOCK's Origin of Civilization, price..... 2.00
Essays in Criticism, by MATTHEW ARNOLD, price..... 2.00
Tablets, by A. BRONSON ALCOTT, with portrait, price..... 2.00
Any volume of the writings of THEODORE PARKER or HENRY D. THOREAU, each..... 2.00
On the Heights, AUERBACH..... 2.00

For Four Names, a copy of THE INDEX for 1871, or one of the following books (post paid):
EMERSON's Society and Solitude, price..... $1.75
Nathan the Wise, a dramatic poem translated from LESSING by ELLEN FROTHINGHAM, price..... 1.75
HUXLEY's Lay Sermons and Addresses..... 1.75
Speeches and Lectures, by WENDELL PHILLIPS..... 1.50
Historic Americans, by THEODORE PARKER, price..... 1.50
A copy of The Revolution..... 2.00
Or The Woman's Journal..... 2.00

CASH PREMIUMS.

For 75 Names,..... 50 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 50 Names,..... 25 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 25 Names,..... 15 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 10 Names,..... 5 Dollars in Greenbacks
For less than 10 Names, a Cash Commission of Twenty per Cent.

Any book in the above list will be sent by us post-paid upon the receipt of price.

N. B.—Names need not all come from one post office. We will send the paper wherever directed, and let the names count as clubs. Specimen Copies sent to all who enclose a three cent postage stamp. Address

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
Loc' Box 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Guardian Mutual Life Ins. Co.,
ORGANIZED A. D. 1859.

M. O. Waggoner, Gen. Supt. for Ohio, Mich. & Ind.

John H. Hood, Assistant General Superintendent.

Office No. 154 Summit Street,
E. F. MUNGER, } General Agents.
CHAS. M. LANG, }

WALTER C. SCOTT, Local Agent, 152 Summit St.

Special Agents—Kelly Bros., 22 Summit Street.
Office Hours—From 7 in the morning till 9 at night.
Medical Examiners—Drs. Samuel S. Thorn and T. J. Eaton Toledo, O. [1871]

THE GOLDEN RULE.

A Weekly Paper Devoted to Natural Religion or Rational Christianity.

Published at 25 Bromfield Street, Boston.

L. SCOTT and J. L. HATCH, Editors.

"THE GOLDEN RULE" will publish each week a thoroughly Radical Discourse by Rev. J. L. Hatch, and each number will contain an interesting story inculcating rational views of Religion. The first number contains an Historical Discourse on the "Life and Labors of Elder Jacob Knapp," delivered in the Olympic Theatre, Boston, Sunday evening, March 26. Terms, $2.00 a year in advance. Specimen copies mailed (post-paid) on the receipt of two three-cent stamps.
Address, "GOLDEN RULE,"
63-tf 25 Bromfield Street, Boston.

IMPORTER

Fine Chemicals, Drugs, and Toilet Articles.

Brandies, Wines & Liquors for medicinal purposes only. Also Proprietor of

Toledo Tonic Bitters,

Greatest Remedy known for general debility.

L. E. MULFORD,

23 Summit Street, Corner Perry, Toledo, Ohio
18-1y

THE CELEBRATED
CRAIG

MICROSCOPE

is an optical wonder; reveals thousands of the hidden Wonders of Nature; is of permanent use and practical availability, combining instruction with amusement, and never losing its interest. It magnifies

TEN THOUSAND TIMES,

a power equal to other Microscopes of many times its cost. Reveals countless little worlds all around us, teeming with life, which to the naked eye must forever remain a sealed book—as Eels in Vinegar, Animals in Water, Cheese Mites, Sugar and Itch Insects, Milk Globules, Claws and Hairs of Insects, Hundreds of eyes in a single eye of a Fly, Dust of a Butterfly's Wings to be perfectly formed Feathers, the much talked of Trichina Spiralis, or Pork Worm, which was first discovered in America with this Microscope.

It is of infinite value to professional men, to teachers, and to students, but NOWHERE IS IT OF GREATER VALUE THAN AT THE FAMILY TABLE, within the reach of every member. It will delight yourself, your children, and your friends during the long winter evenings. It will show you adulterations or uncleanness of various kinds in food, as sugar, tea, bread, meat, etc.

It is of Inestimable Value to the Farmer

in examining insects which prey upon his crops. The power of a $50 Microscope, and so simple in its construction that any child can use it understandingly, and with appreciation.

A Beautiful Present—Elegant, Instructive, Amusing, and Cheap. Over 60,000 sold.

During the past six years its worth has been testified to by thousands of Scientific Men, Farmers, School Teachers, Students, Physicians, Heads of Families, and others.

PRICE, $3.00—Sent by Mail Post-paid.

Every instrument is neatly boxed, and handsomely labelled with full directions for use. Thousands have been sent by mail.
Address, W. J. LINESS & CO.,
CHICAGO.

FREE! FREE!

"THE MICROSCOPE," a Monthly Journal of Information for the People—the mysteries of Nature explained—interesting information on the wonders of Creation—stories, sketches, etc. Terms $1.00 per year. This Journal will be sent FREE for one year to any one purchasing a Craig Microscope at the regular price, $3.00. (Craig Microscope will be sent post-paid.) For sample copy, and our beautifully illustrated and descriptive circulars, and eight pages of testimonials of Craig Microscope, send six cents for postage to

W. J. LINESS & CO.,

Opticians, and Sole Proprietors of Craig and Novelty Microscope, CHICAGO, ILL.

AGENTS and DEALERS, this Microscope sells in every family on its merits, when exhibited. LARGE PROFITS. Send for terms. 59t:6

A NEW RADICAL BOOK.

"Origin and Development of Religious Ideas and Beliefs,"

As Manifested in History and Seen by Reason.

By MORRIS EINSTEIN.

For sale at the office of the Boston Investigator, 84 Washington St., Boston, or by the Author, Titusville, Pa.

PRICE, - - - $1.50,
64-78

or Cincinnati, O.

63-77

A Few More Agents Wanted For
THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD

A new religious work of unsurpassed interest and value. For terms, address W. FLINT & CO., No. 26 S. 7th St., Philadelphia, 5 Custom House Place, Chicago, and 176 West 4th Street, Cincinnati. 65-77

COLE'S FIRST PRIZE BAKING POWDER.

The Best in the Market.

One trial only asked. Same price as the common kinds.

Sample sent free on Application.

63-75.

ALEX. COLE, BUFFALO, N. Y.

AGENTS WANTED--($225 A MONTH.) BY THE
American Knitting Machine Co., BOSTON, MASS., or ST. LOUIS, MO. 56-68

Mr. Frothingham's New Book.

CHILD'S BOOK OF RELIGION, for Sunday Schools and Homes. PART I, Worship; PART II, The Good Life; PART III, Truth. In one Volume. New and revised edition. Forwarded free on receipt of $1.00.

55-68

DAVID G. FRANCIS,
17 Astor Place, New York.

WANTED--AGENTS, ($30 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock-stitch" (alike on both sides, and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest Family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Boston, Mass., Pittsburgh, Pa., Chicago, Ill. or St. Louis, Mo. 38y1

SINGLE COPIES

OF

THE INDEX for 1870

Containing the following

ESSAYS,

Will be mailed from THE INDEX office (post-paid) on receipt of FIVE CENTS:

	No.
The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion,.....	1
What is Free Religion?.....	3
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Corner-Stones, 4	4
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Institutions, 7	7
Terms of Fellowship, Social Ideal, Moral Ideal, and Essential spirit.....	5
The Practical Work of Free Religion,.....	6
Unitarianism versus Freedom.....	7
Sunday Schools,.....	8
Friendship,.....	9
Grief and its Compensations,.....	11
The Hebrew Prophets,.....	12
Capital Punishment,.....	13
Human Ideals,.....	14
The Essence of Religion,.....	15
The Management of Children,.....	16
A Quaker's Letter to a Presbyterian, R. S. D.,.....	17
Comparison of Jesus and Socrates. (Report from the N. Y. Tribune),.....	17
The Candle of the Lord,.....	18
Public Opinion,.....	19
Conscience,.....	20
The Pedigree of Man,.....	21
"Following Christ",.....	22
The Tongue,.....	23
The Golden Age,.....	24
What is Truth?.....	25
The Last Battle on the Creed Question,.....	26
Observance of the Sabbath, Rev. W. W. Williams,.....	27
The Sunday Question,.....	28
Motes and Beams,.....	29
The Dove's Departure,.....	30
The Bible in the Public Schools,.....	31
Religious Freedom,.....	32
A Plain Talk to Young Men,.....	33
Noise,.....	34
The Humility of Free Religion,.....	35
Chaos and Cosmos,.....	36
An Oration on Alexander Von Humboldt,.....	37
Relation of Spiritualism to Free Religion,.....	38
War and Free Religion,.....	39
Religious Revivals,.....	40
Mary and Martha,.....	41
The Ministry of Free Religion,.....	42
Success,.....	43
"Repentance" and "Forgiveness",.....	44
Spiritual Beauty,.....	45
The Book of Daniel,.....	46
The Unity of Spiritual Freedom and the Opportunity which America offers for its Development. W. J. Potter,.....	47
The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition,.....	47
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? Chas. Reemelin,.....	47
The Work of Radicalism in Indiana. J. O. Martin,.....	47
Religion in the Light of Reason and Common Sense. Isaac M. Wise,.....	47
Sunday—Its Uses and Abuses. Thomas Nickerson,.....	48
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? E. Peckham,.....	49
Parties and Party Spirit,.....	50
The Future of Religious Organization, as Affected by the Spirit of the Age,.....	51
The Incarnation. A Christmas Discourse,.....	52
Transient and Permanent,.....	53

The Index.

VOL. 2.—No. 17.

TOLEDO, OHIO, APRIL 29, 1871.

WHOLE No. 70.

The Index,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, OHIO.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.

OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Editorial Contributors.

THE WARMTH OF FREE RELIGION.

[Read to the First Independent Society of Toledo, March 12, 1871. First Essay.]

"The greatest vantage for humanity
Is this, that each does everything for all,
And each in turn receives from all the same.
How little one contributes to the whole—
How much, however, one receives from all!
How true a guard humanity to each,—
How little more is needed, after all,
For concord, bliss, and peace and the unmarred
Freedom of all men, than the will of all
To seek with life itself the good of each!
'Tis with the slightest means God will effect
The greatest purposes, but through the greatest Of sentiments, through the divinest—Love."

LEOPOLD SCHREFFER, The Layman's Breviary, p. 130.

"The Koran says: 'God willeth that his law
Should be made light to men, for man is weak'.
. . . The law of God is thy law; otherwise
It could not be thy law. Be thou a law Unto thyself, and then thy life shall be Light as an eagle's pathway through the skies."

Ibid. pp. 243, 244.

"Well, there is one bliss, then, laid up for man,
Obedience to Nature, who stands fast,
Guarding and executing her own law
With more than iron inflexibility,
With still, inviolable truth, and seems Blessed herself, reposing on herself.
. . . Into this pure blue heaven there never shall
A giant stalk, nor ever with strange voice
Shall a strange law challenge the universe.
And now this ancient, glad some law of His Thou canst today believe, today embrace—
Canst at this moment wed thyself thereto,
And have Heaven's treasures all poured out on thee,
Peace and security and joy and bliss,
The sleep of childhood and a child's glad waking;
But, above all, employment in a work
Sure to be crowned with heavenly success,
Which, as thou grow'st more perfect, grows with thee."

Ibid. pp. 250, 251.

"'Tis being needed makes the father's worth;
'Tis being needed makes the mother's bliss;
'Tis being needed makes up woman's life;
And just the best resisteth not the call.
. . . Who more forlorn than he whom men need not?"

Ibid. p. 415.

"Thou hear'st Him not at all, if not in thee;
Then hear, O hear thyself, and so hear Him!"

And learn thou the one sentence in thy heart
Which runs in large, bright letters round the dome,
And ceaseless teaches and proclaims itself:
'Be godly—thou art in the House of God!
Be good—else art thou vile and miserable!
Each thing rejoices to be what it is:
O man, rejoice thou, too, to be a man!"

Ibid. p. 452.

A common reproach is brought by Christian believers against all forms of dissent from the popular religion that they are "cold" and "cheerless,"—that they expose the soul to the bleak climate of the frigid zone,—that they congeal the warm and tender sympathies of the heart, its loftier aspirations, its diviner sentiments and hopes, and drive defenceless man from the sheltering precincts of Christianity into the desolation and Arctic ice-fields of "infidelity." The intellect may be satisfied, it is argued, with barren deductions, speculations, and philosophies; but, outside of the lines of Christian fellowship, the very light of truth itself glances off from mere ideas and principles like sunlight from polar icebergs, and brings no warmth to protect poor shivering humanity from the cutting blasts that sweep unrestrained over the outlying world of the unchurched. In all the deeper experiences of life, it is said, the insufficiency of natural religion becomes painfully evident; and the human soul is frozen stiff and dead, without the divine heats of Christianity. In a word, Free Religion is "out in the cold."

Many persons, moreover, who have been trained under Christian influences and associations, but whose minds, convinced of the emptiness and unscientific character of Christian theology, accept the principles of Free Religion as intrinsically true, are conscious of a lack of adaptation to their new intellectual surroundings, and confess with a touching frankness that there is too much force in the charge of coldness brought against their new beliefs. Migrating from the tropical regions of emotional church-life to the temperate zone of radical convictions, they have not become acclimated in their new abode, and remember with a certain feeling of homesickness the sultry skies under which they were reared. The soberness of reality seems a poor substitute for the bright, glowing visions of imagination. The tame scenery of facts palls beside the remembered gorgeousness of unsubstantial fancies. Hence to many persons who are too profoundly earnest and truth-loving to shut their eyes wilfully, as so many others do, to unwelcome and disenchanting truths, there seems to be a lack of vital warmth in Free Religion which contrasts painfully with the glow of the lost faith of their childhood. Too brave to shrink, too intelligent not to see, too faithful not to follow unflinchingly whithersoever the finger of truth points, they yet tread the strange paths with a certain sadness, and make an inward sacrifice for conscience' sake little suspected by those who are noisy with accusations of "infidelity."

Now in all this there is nothing which is unnatural,—nothing, perhaps, which is not inevitable under the circumstances. Such a change always accompanies the passage from childhood to maturity. Much, however, depends on individual experience and temperament. While to some persons there seems to be a loss of warmth in passing from Christianity to Free Religion, to others there seems to be a gain, a sense of relief, a feeling of escape from hot, unwholesome, suffocating dogmas, which renders the change delightful in the extreme. The apparent coldness, therefore, complained of by the former, appears to the latter incomprehensible. But there is no end to the variety of human experiences; and he who endeavors to enlarge the sphere of his own being by entering sympathetically into all their phases, will not turn away impatiently in any case, but seek rather to say the word best suited to each.

Knowing that this inward chill of feeling which I have tried to describe is most likely to befall persons in whom the finer sentiments of humanity are most highly developed, I wish to say something concerning the real warmth of Free Religion, in the hope of suggesting the more genial aspects of ideas which, it must be confessed, clash with the venerated conceptions of Christianity. Of course, I present only my own views of these ideas, acknowledging all the while that other minds make widely different applications of the principles on which all liberals are agreed, and which I am accustomed to cluster under the name of Free Religion. All liberals, for instance, defend the liberty of thought, yet they may think very differently; they all concede the supremacy of reason above all external authorities, yet their reasonings may lead to very different conclusions. I mean, however, to present the cheerful tendencies of these common principles as I myself apply them; but if anybody chooses to run them out into dismal and doleful consequences, I admit unqualifiedly his equal right to do so, and claim no more infallibility for my own views than I concede to his. In other words, I want to present to you a few of the bright and beautiful aspects of the fundamental ideas admitted by all liberals, applied and carried out according to my private understanding of their bearings.

Let me begin with an extract from a letter, received a year ago last December, and written by a lady of high culture and radical convictions with whom I had had some previous correspondence concerning religion, but whom I did not have the pleasure of meeting until afterwards.

"I have received the prospectus of THE INDEX, and feel quite animated by the prospect of such a weekly. I am especially glad that it will 'aim above all things to increase pure and genuine religion.' The weak point in the views entertained by free, radical persons seems to be in regard to this. The preaching of many young ministers of this class seems a cold philosophical intellectuality, with nothing for the heart, nothing for the yearnings of the spirit. They pray, but at the same time acknowledge that they use the term God as a mere personification, or as standing for the Moral Ideal; thus involving an inconsistency, and, apparently, a want of honesty. Why use the form of prayer at all, when it amounts only to a species of jugglery? Then, as to immortality, when the friend most essential to our earthly happiness passes from sight, and an inexorable silence stands opposed to our longings for continued communion, they have no word to give sufficient to rest our hearts upon and restore peaceful balance to our agonized spirit."

"Here lies the embarrassment of many who are convinced that the only true and tenable ground in religious matters lies outside of the Bible and Christianity, and is to be found alone in the teachings of Nature and the instincts of our own souls. From earliest days accustomed to exercise implicit, unquestioning faith in God, Heaven, and Immortality, as taught in their churches, they feel in a great degree bereft of that which gave support under trials and an impetus to effort, and find, in comparison, a cold, barren emptiness. Life seems robbed of its stimulus. The iron clutches of despair seem about to seize upon them, and they are ready to cry out in their perplexity—'Why live any longer?' But to such as you and some others, there is a broad platform still on which to stand and act, and which affords scope for the highest aspirations.

"In a note which you were so kind as to address to me, in June of last year, and whose reception I did not acknowledge from unwillingness to trespass further upon your attention, but whose contents afforded me great interest, you say:—'With or without a God, with or without personal immortality, the intrinsic worth of spiritual excellence is, at least for me, a motive for boundless effort and self-sacrifice.' 'To live in such fashion that at every moment I may respect myself, and feel that I am helping to better the lot of humanity, is an object sufficient for limitless exertion.'"

"To those so organized that their own spontaneity furnishes them such glorious promptings, it is all well. They have nothing more to seek, but to live out their life in its natural flow. It is attended with fulness of satisfaction, and no troublesome questionings cause them to falter."

"But to others, less harmoniously constituted, such questions as these may disturb them. Of what great importance to labor for humanity as a whole, since the race is made up of individuals, each of whom lives only his little span, and then passes into unconsciousness? As it is for so brief a space, why not leave each to follow his own sweet will, in the pursuit of whatever suits his condition of development? Why disturb his tranquility by introducing those transitional periods, which always bring more or less of discomfort? If the Romanist finds satisfaction in the faith made to his hands,—if his imagination is gratified by the idea of the intercession of the blessed Virgin and all the saints, together with all the miraculous legends of his church, and his aesthetic wants are supplied by its entrancing music, its gorgeous rites and ceremonies,—why not leave him quietly in this all-sufficingness?"

"If the self-conscious individual were continued in the race as long as it exists, sharing in its advancement and elevation to higher realms of art, ennoblement of views, breadth of comprehension, and general harmony of existence, then the object would be grand, even if at some remote period an end were to come. But for the little hour of each separate, conscious existence, what matters it? These doubts would not prevent any one from living up to what was highest in his own aspirations for purity, spirituality, and knowledge. But they would, dampen his ardor in behalf of others."

"For minds in such a condition, can you not analyze and illustrate the element which prompts your own enthusiasm, so as to obviate their mental perplexities, and to bring them to the same plane of consistency with themselves? I am glad you promise to define—'What is Free Religion?' I trust you will show what scope, if any, it has beyond its exercise upon humanity, and what is the corner-stone of rest and trust for the spirit, as Jesus is in the Christian scheme."

This extract, I think, illustrates in a remarkable manner the spiritual chill caused in refined natures by the decay of faith in Christianity, before they have become entirely prepared for reception of the new faith. The rarified atmosphere of ideas is cold and weakening, at first, and distresses by its tenuity. The points raised in this letter would require several essays, instead of two, for anything like a proper treatment. For instance, to show how intimately, how indissolubly the welfare of the individual is bound up in that of the race, how impossible it is to realize the highest private good in any selfish manner, and how inspiring is that thought of a universal welfare in which the individual's welfare finds its place as an integral part, and how we have thus the double motive of a refined selfishness and a true benevolence for consecrating ourselves unreservedly to the good of universal man, would require a volume to explain. Hence I shall seek only to call attention to the beauty and soft glow of a faith which I find, in my own case at least, no less warming to the heart than instructive to the mind; and thus, in a general manner only, reply to the spirit of the extract I have read.

1. In the first place, Christianity offers to the believer, in the person of Christ, a human God, who can be conceived by the imagination, embraced by the affections, grasped by the intellect. A sort of human fellowship is thus established between God and man which is undoubtedly, to the sincere Christian, a source of great comfort and joy, to be deprived of which would plunge him into icy despair.

But a closer tie is created by Free Religion between the private soul and universal Being than can be comprehended by any worshipper of Jesus. I need not and cannot set up this human image to fall down before and worship; the very duality of him and me makes a gulf between us which I cannot span. However benign and tender he may be, he must seem distant and infinitely removed by the very fact of his outwardness. No real worshipper of Jesus as the supreme God can understand that sense of oneness with the All which brings the Infinite itself, as it were, within the very sphere of my own being. Whoever realizes in thought the omnipresence and immanence of the One Power, must have dropped all human images, and forgotten the deity of Jesus. The question between theism and atheism is a real one, I know; but my own thinking tends so entirely to the recognition of an Infinite which includes the finite and is the soul of it, that I seem not only united, but blended and identified, with universal Being. A human God is outside of me, a being distinct and separate and beyond my reach; but the God I believe in is closer to me than my own individuality, and manifests himself through the natural working of my own faculties. Whether this universal Being, of which I am myself but an individualized part, is conscious of itself in its own infinity and universality, and not conscious in its individualizations alone, is the true issue between theism and atheism; and this is the question which Science must settle, if at all, by the study of Nature as a whole. But anticipating as well as I can the conclusions of Science, I see irresistible reasons for believing that the All is at the same time self-conscious as the All and self-conscious as the parts. To me, therefore, God is the self-conscious All, of which I am a self-conscious part; and he and I are so profoundly one, that the voice of my own nature is the voice of all nature. This is modern theism, against which the crude, antiquated atheism of the past has no arguments; and it makes the lives of you and me and every human being one with the infinite life from which we sprang. So close, so near, so utterly and absolutely united are our human souls to God, that the worship of Jesus, a separate individual outside of me, seems in comparison inexpressibly cold and unsatisfying, utterly incompetent to slake my spiritual thirst for conscious oneness with the object of my worship. The tables are turned; Christianity it is that appears frigid and icy and arctic, while the sublime unity with God which Free Religion reveals to me shows warm and tender and beautiful as the very sunlight in which we live.

2. Through this thought of God, which is indeed most feebly set forth, Nature itself, which on the Christian theory is something baffling to the understanding, and dark and forbidding to the affections, becomes lit up, as it were, from within by the outshining divinity of which it is everywhere the living manifestation, the transparent veil. Matter itself, instinct with indestructible forces in endless action and reaction, is simply the visible play of the same divine power of which our human thought and love are the invisible expression. The brotherhood of Man! That, truly, would be a poverty-stricken, starved idea, were it not dignified by expansion into the brotherhood of universal Nature. Yes, we are brothers of the vast hosts of living things that swarm in the sea and fill the air and overrun the land,—brothers of the innumerable forms of vegetation that clothe the naked hillsides with stately forests, and carpet the valleys and the plains with green grass and rainbow-tinted flowers,—brothers of the very rocks, and soils, and seas, and clouds, and planets, and stars, and all that goes to form the marvellous universe that lives and throbs everlastingly in boundless space. The love of Nature—what is there purer and diviner in the human heart? Yet what is it but unconscious testimony to the profound unity and kinship of all that is? Have you never flung yourself on the lap of Mother Earth (the very phrase, born of poetic insight, tells a greater secret than reaches the dull ears of most that hear it), and felt yourself thrilled by the mysterious currents of vitality that circulate through the world of inanimate as of animate things? The true poet is he who most deeply enters into this universal life of Nature, and feels affection even for the tiny blade of grass, and the dew-drop that trembles on it, and the glistening spider's web that knits it to its neighbors. That "matter" which to Christianity from time immemorial has been a dark, dead, inert mass, the cause of sin, the soul's carnal foe, the great obstacle to spirituality and the love of virtue, is to Free Religion what Goethe called it, the "living garment of God." Instead of being imprisoned in matter, we are at home everywhere, surrounded on all sides by our own kindred; and to Nature, in all its magnificence, loveliness, and majestic grandeur, we are knit by the closest ties of consanguinity. The love of Nature is at bottom family affection. Again the tables are turned. Bright and sunny and warm are our thoughts of the world we live in, tracing the identity between the Universal Life and all its finite forms, so soon as from Christianity we turn intelligently to Free Religion.

3. Yet, fair and cheerful as are the radical ideas of Nature, it is the world of human life that glows most divinely with the warmth we need. To the churches human nature is the one accursed thing, to be suppressed and repented of and maligned and everlastingly damned. Out of it proceed sins and blasphemies alone; no one can be saved at all, who is not born again, and thus rescued from the sure damnation of a merely natural birth. What can be blacker or colder or more abhorrent, than Christian ideas of human nature and unpurged human life? The very goodness of a natural state of the heart is sin in disguise; and no real goodness is possible, until the heart is supernaturally recreated.

But how this freezing view of human life thaws out under the genial rays of Free Religion, and is metamorphosed by its influence? To us the one thing sacred is human nature, with its noble powers needing development, and its wonderful instincts and grand virtues and sweet affections and undreamed capacities. The chief end of life is to make the most of our human nature, educate it, train it, foster it, bring out of it the divine music that awaits only the master's hand to strike dumb with shame the singing spheres. The unutterable sanctity of the sympathies that make men one, and the aspirations that lead them side by side to work out their common destiny,—the home affections that create little Edens in happy households, the deep sentiments that cement noble friendships, the unselfish love that is to bind the race together with golden chains of genuine, all-embracing fellowship,—the sublime moral virtues that hold a world in awe, and fire a million hearts with the contagious enthusiasm of noble deeds,—the grave self-respect that frees from all selfish bondage and sets the crown of character on the faithful soul,—these are the outcome of human nature, beautifying and dignifying human life with ideal light, cheering and warming the weary hearts, reviving faith and hope in bruised and bleeding spirits, testifying of the real God whom outward Nature reveals in such partial and imperfect fashion. Surely, if there is anywhere warmth, it is in the ideas that Free Religion gives of human life and nature, in the enthusiasm it kindles for developing these into high excellence, in the hopes it awakens of the unbroken continuance of these sublime pursuits in a larger sphere, in the deep and tender sympathies it inspires for all men and women over all the globe.

Surely, if there is coldness in such ideas, well conceived and faithfully obeyed, there is no such thing as warmth on earth, and we may as well make up our minds forthwith to endure without complaint the piercing winds of a spiritual glacial epoch.

[To be Continued.]

ERNST HAECKEL ON THE MECHANICAL THEORY OF LIFE AND ON SPONTANEOUS GENERATION.

[From "Nature," March 2, 1871.]

In his recently published "Biological Studies," Professor Haeckel, of Jena, has briefly stated his views on the question of Abiogenesis, which is now so largely occupying attention in England. He having done more than any other observer to establish the Protoplasm theory by his discovery of organisms of the simplest conceivable structure—not even cellular (i. e., not even possessing a differentiated central nucleus)—his remarks on the present condition of the Spontaneous Generation question must possess great weight. The philosophy of Monism, of which he is the exponent, as opposed to Dualism, rests on what he calls the Carbon theory and the Plastic theory. These theories are thus set forth in weighty, but clear sentences:—

1. The forms of organisms and of their organs result entirely from their life, and simply from the interaction of two physiological functions, Heredity and Adaptation.

2. Heredity is a part of the reproduction,—Adaptation, on the other hand, a part of the maintenance of the organism. These two physiological functions depend, as do all forms of vital activity, on the character of the physiological organ through which they come into play.

3. The physiological organs of the organism are either simple Plastids (Cytods or Cells), or they are parts of Plastids (e. g., Nuclei of Cells, cilia of Protoplasm), or they are built up of numerous Plastids (the majority of organs). In all these cases the forms and actions of the organs are to be traced back to the forms and actions of the individual Plastids.

4. Plastids are either simple Cytods (structureless bits of Protoplasm without nuclei) or Cells; but since these last have originally arisen from Cytods by a differentiation of the inner "Nucleus" and the outer "Protoplasm," the forms and vital properties of all Plastids can be traced back to the simplest Cytods as their starting point.

5. The simplest Cytods, from which all other Plastids (Cytods and Cells) originally have arisen by Heredity and Adaptation, consist essentially and absolutely of nothing more than a bit of structureless Protoplasm—an albuminoid, nitrogenous Carbon-compound; all other components of Plastids have been originally formed secondarily from Protoplasm (plasm-products).

6. The simplest independent organisms which we know, and which moreover can be conceived, the Monera, consist in fact while living of nothing else but the simplest Cytod, a structureless bit of Protoplasm; and since they exhibit all forms of vital activity (nutrition, reproduction, irritability, movement), these vital activities are here clearly bound on to structureless Protoplasm.

7. Protoplasm, or Germinal Matter (Bildungstoff), also called Cell-substance or Primitive Slime (Urschleim), is therefore the single material basis (materielle Grundlage), to which without exception and absolutely all so-called "vital phenomena" are radically bound; if the latter are regarded as the result of a peculiar Vital Force independent of the Protoplasm, then necessarily also must the physical and chemical properties of every inorganic natural body be regarded as the result of a peculiar force not bound up with its substance.

8. The Protoplasm of all Plastids is, like all other albuminoid or Protein-bodies, composed of four inseparable elements, Carbon, Oxygen, Hydrogen, and Nitrogen, to which often, though not always, a fifth element, namely, Sulphur, is added.

9. The forms and vital properties of Protoplasm are conditioned by the peculiar manner in which Carbon has combined itself so as to form a highly developed compound with the three or four other elements named. Compounds devoid of Carbon never exhibit those peculiar chemical and physical properties which exclusively belong to only a part of the compounds of Carbon (the so-called "organic compounds"); on this account modern chemistry has replaced the term "organic compounds" by the more significant term "Carbon-compounds."

10. Carbon, then, is that element, that indivisible fundamental substance, which, in virtue of its peculiar physical and chemical properties, stamps the various Carbon compounds with their peculiar organic character, and in chief fashions this Protoplasm, the "matter of life" (Lebensstoff), so that it becomes the material basis of all vital phenomena.

11. The peculiar properties which Protoplasm, and the other component tissues and substances of the organism derived secondarily from it, exhibit, especially their viscid condition of aggregation, their continual change of matter (on the one hand their facile decomposition, on the other their facile power of assimilation) and their other "vital properties," are therefore simply and entirely brought about by the peculiar and complex manner in which Carbon under certain conditions can combine with the other elements.

12. The entire properties of the organism are ultimately conditioned with equal necessity by the physical and chemical properties of Carbon, as are the entire properties of every salt and inorganic compound conditioned by the physical and chemical properties of its component elements.

II.

We now pass on to the chapter in Haeckel's work headed "The Monera and Spontaneous Generation." Although, remarks Haeckel, Darwin himself states in his work that he has nothing to do with the origin of life, every thinking reader of the "Origin of Species" must ask himself whence came the simplest original living form? and no question has been more actively discussed, in consequence of Darwin's reform of the descent theory than that of spontaneous generation (Urzeugung). Abiogenesis (Urzeugung), which may be best translated as Archigenesis is, in fact a necessary and integral part of the universal evolution theory. It is the natural bridge which places in continuity Kant's and Laplace's theory of the mechanical origin of the universe and the earth, with Lamarck's and Darwin's theory of the mechanical origin of the animal and vegetal forms. When we perceive that all inorganic nature, as well as the development of organic nature from an original parent organism, is explained by the continual working of one great law of evolution, we cannot admit in explanation of the one dark point in this great causal network a supernatural act of creation. We are logically bound to seek a natural link, and this link is Archigenesis (Urzeugung), i. e., the origin of the simplest organisms from so-called lifeless inorganic material. Till recently the question of Archigenesis has been treated by most naturalists in a most unphilosophical and superficial manner. Instead of examining the bearings of the question in all directions, and discussing duly its complex nature, they have rushed into experiment, and obtained an answer without fairly putting the question. Because in highly artificial apparatus and under artificial conditions no organisms have been developed in certain fluids prepared for examination, the whole doctrine has been denied, and the totally unwarranted conclusion arrived at, "There is no Archigenesis." Such experiments as those of Pasteur and other very marvellous ones have really no value in this question, since they merely prove that in the particular case, under certain and complex conditions, no organism is formed by Archigenesis. Positive contradiction of the hypothesis of Archigenesis is impossible. Positive proof there is not yet, since no one has yet seen any organism take origin, except by Parentage.

But, thanks to our progress in biology during the last ten years, the question no longer presents the theoretical difficulties which it did. Before the discovery of those simplest of conceivable organisms, the Monera, it was necessary that from inorganic materials a Cell should be formed by Archigenesis—an organism presenting two chemically, physically, and morphologically distinct portions, the inner Nucleus and the external Protoplasm. The formation of such a nucleated Plastid by Archigenesis is difficult to conceive. But now by the discovery of Monera the matter assumes quite a different aspect. Such forms as Protophytes and Protomycetes present no definite shapes, have no individual development, but grow and multiply by division. Their growth and nutrition is purely a physico-chemical process, just as the growth of a crystal, with this difference, that the viscid cohesion of Protoplasm entails intussusception of nutriment, while the crystal grows at its surface only. The same viscid state of cohesion explains the reproduction of such Monera—which we do not observe in crystals; the cohesive power of the Protoplasm under certain conditions of nutrition is no longer sufficient to hold the body together, and fission occurs. Thus the chief vital phenomena of Monera are traced to physico-chemical causes.

Since in our chemical laboratories, with our exceedingly limited and rough methods, we have succeeded in forming many Carbon-compounds, and have good reason to suppose that we may one day synthetically produce albuminoid bodies, is it not reasonable to suppose that in the great laboratory of Nature, similar but more complex chemical synthesis may go on, such as the formation from inorganic materials of albuminoids and of living Protoplasm? If we are to call in a special creative act—superior to mere chemical synthesis—to account for the existence of Protoplasm because we have not succeeded in forming it artificially, so also must we postulate a peculiar creative act for a great variety of minerals, such as feldspar, fluor spar, heavy spar, augite, &c., since we are equally unable to build up these inorganic bodies. In this way we should divide the whole world into a Natural and Supernatural group. The former would contain such salts, gases, &c., as we can build up in the laboratory, also alcohol, acetic acid, &c. All these bodies have arisen by Archigenesis, i. e., by natural mechanical means, solely by the interaction of the inherent physical and chemical forces of their matter. The latter group would contain all minerals not yet formed in the laboratory, also all the complex Carbon-compounds. These bodies would be considered as arising by "Creation," that is, by supernatural means, through a mysterious creative force existing externally to the bodies.

To every philosophic naturalist such a view must appear as untenable as is every assumption of a "Creation." On the other hand the assumption of an Archigenesis for the first living beings from which all others have developed, is a logical postulate of the human intelligence.

It is not at all remarkable that as yet we have not observed the Archigenesis of Monera. Supposing it were taking place every day and hour, it would be very difficult to observe. Very minute particles of Protoplasm are found in quantity, both in sea and fresh water, when carefully sought for. They are generally regarded as fragments of decomposing organisms. But what proof is there of this? and how could it be clearly proved that these particles have not arisen by Archigenesis? The first commencement of a Protoplasm-granule in a fluid would be as difficult to observe as the first commencement of a crystal in its mother-liquor. And not less difficult would be the observation of the gradual growth of such an excessively minute Protoplasm-granule into the larger Protoplasmic masses of Protomycetes, &c.

Bathybius seems to be of the greatest significance for the theory of Archigenesis. For if not through Archigenesis, whence shall we derive this Protoplasmic covering of the deepest sea-bottom?

Either the Monera were once for all, at the beginning of organic life on the earth, produced by Archigenesis, and hence—since Monera still exist today—they must have reproduced in a direct line unchanged for many million years; or, in the course of the earth's history, they have been produced by recurring acts of Archigenesis, and in this case there is no reason why this process should not occur at the present time. The latter view presents the fewest difficulties and exceptions to Prof. Haeckel. In any case, the Monera still living at the present day point out to us the way to a correct understanding of the Origin of Life, and clear away the greatest difficulties which the hypothesis of Archigenesis previously presented.

E. R. L.

AN ACCOMMODATING EDITOR.—The other day an editor from out West called on Mr. Carleton, the Methodist Advertising Agent, and presented, with considerable originality, the claim of his journal for orders. "But," says the urbane Carleton, "my lists of papers are largely agricultural." "Yes," says the ready editor, "we run a large agricultural department in our paper!" "Very good," rejoins the advertising agent, "but I also have very many religious papers on my lists." Not to be put off, the editor quickly followed him up, saying, "Well, d—n it all, I'll run a religious column too!"—Amer. Newspaper Reporter.

[This throws light on the origin of the "religious column" in most "secular" papers.—ED.]

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"I have been reading THE INDEX, and in each of its articles I find something peculiarly gratifying,—a truth promulgated or a search instituted. I have long been in want of some exposition of truth and principle such as I find in it. Ever since I can remember, I have been to Church and Sunday School regularly until about twenty, after which time, I went only occasionally. I was not forced to go, but went because I wanted to, and I tried to be a good orthodox; but my want of credulity would not let me. As soon as I began to think for myself, I began to have my doubts in regard to the divine authenticity of the Bible. The point I wish to make in this is, that I had no one to talk to me who was opposed to Christianity, nor did I read anything opposed to it; in fact, my knowledge of free publications was limited to hearsay, perhaps of Tom Paine's works, or some similar work, which was always spoken of as such a disgusting thing that I would not have dared to read it if I had got the chance. However, I did not stop here, for I conceived from the start that my Creator, whoever or whatever He or it was, was not so unjust or unmerciful as to give me certain faculties, and then cast me into Hell, and there keep me forever and ever for using said faculties honestly. I will instance a case. I asked a certain individual a question—the outgrowth of a doubt that I had. I wanted to know if a man opposed the Bible conscientiously (that is, if he honestly believed it was not divine), would God punish him for doing so? The answer was,—'He is responsible for believing.' From this I went on, and found more and more to excite my attention to Bible fallacies. I know of no other way to account for my gradual wandering from Christianity, only as the result of common sense. I knew not then that I had so many friends in my faith; but declared to all that I talked with, that, rather than sacrifice principle, or practise hypocrisy by professing Christianity when I did not believe in its dogmatism and bigotry, I would lose every friend. But not long after I had made my ideas known, I found to my astonishment that there were more who believed as I did, and, what was more, they were farther advanced in the belief. I am indebted to Dr. — for a few copies of THE INDEX to read. I shall here state that I have the promise of all his papers to read, as I can hardly afford at present to take THE INDEX. The Dr. is my neighbor, and through him I get a great deal of valuable information. Please accept my unqualified desires for your success, and in the future I hope to be able to assist you a little."

"Several copies of it are taken in my parish here. One good lady, a cultivated person, almost four score, told me the other day that she read it with great interest and pleasure. Science and scientific modes of thought in our free country seem to be the fan in His hand with which the Almighty is sweeping away the chaff and preparing the way for such bearers of good tidings as THE INDEX and Radical. The poor pabulum with which the clergy are now seeking to satisfy the deepest wants of men is turning them away in disgust in multitudes. This is not the fault of human nature, but its incorruptible glory. I find men not less earnest or religious now, than they seem to have been in the past. What is called religion is nothing to many, and they think that is all and religion is played out. But there is a living word that will find them out and kindle their enthusiasm. A church, however, is a hard place to make it heard from. I didn't intend to say this, but let it go."

"Please place to my credit the enclosed two dollars for THE INDEX for 1871, and keep right on hammering at old 'total depravity' and 'infant damnation,' till all humanity shall scorn these twin monsters, the legitimate progeny of superstition and ignorance, and embrace a free, pure, and rational religion, which neither insults God, Man or the Devil. (Poor fellow, I always did pity him, because men always blame him for all their mean acts, many of which any decent devil would blush to think of.) If you think this letter not orthodox, you must remember I have been reading THE INDEX one year, and listened to Mr. Gannett's preaching one year (one of nature's noblemen—modest as brave); but he has gone and left us. He has returned to the 'Hub.' And now I am an humble member of Rev. Rowland Connor's congregation. Isn't he a rouser? 'Tis the mind that forms the stature of the man."

"My church here is the grand old forest, the sea-waves make the anthem, the wind gives the responses; all tell me, God is Love and Justice. And I am not worried by seeing men and women arrayed in their best, worshipping the Supreme Goodness in churches no poorly dressed brother or sister can enter. Out upon their fables and their pagan belief, their forms without a soul! and God bless THE INDEX, and speed the day of true and righteous Liberty."

"If I could have had such a publication thirty years ago, it would have been a great help."

"I notice that you have delivered lectures on 'The Place that Christianity Holds among the True Causes of Civilization.' You have not published them and I want to see them. How can I obtain them? Free Religion has many friends in the west, and it is pre-eminently the place to hold your conventions. For instance, Chicago, St. Louis, Omaha, and Sioux City. The people want an introduction, and the conventions open the way for future work. I am satisfied they would do the cause an incalculable amount of good. Whatever I can do for our cause and THE INDEX will be cheerfully and gladly done. I find that prejudice is one of the most formidable obstacles to be overcome by us. I know some personally who renounce in toto the doctrine of total depravity, but still haven't the independence and self-reliance to come out in favor of free religion. Please excuse the remarks. I intended only to subscribe, but the subject is an interesting and inexhaustible one, and I didn't resist the temptation to say a word."

"THE INDEX has proved not only an exceedingly interesting but very valuable paper to me. The real progress made in allowing reason to exercise even partial sway in matters of religion has most alarmed our Doctors of Divinity. Yet their ignorance of the real state of enlightenment and freedom from the old bondage is evidenced by the open pride they seem to take in setting up men of straw representing 'free religionists,' and then toppling them over by the old and stale arguments of the theological seminaries. Your paper presents with great clearness the real and present issues, and I with great earnestness wish the Editor a 'Happy New Year' and that the happiness shall be largely owing to a successful prosecution of the work in which he takes so effective an interest."

"Allow me to say, as regards the 'negro' you are not posted. While a kind father may love his children ever so well, this love, as well as humanity, makes him keep 'edge tools' out of their hands. The vast majority of the negroes South are no more than children. Although I was a slave-owner, it never blunted my humanity. The right of suffrage so universally conferred has done the race harm and will work harm to the present generation. How it does harm I have not time to show. Sufficient to say it will not do well to advance children too rapidly at school. Those who have been raised North can hardly imagine how grown up negroes can still be children. Privileges should have been gradually conferred upon the liberated slave. This two-thirds of the former slave-owners were willing to do, and would have done."

"My year's subscription, I believe, expired the 1st of January, and since that time, having been engaged here as —, the copies have not reached me—if sent at all—and I had made up my mind to discontinue it entirely. But the longer I am without it, the more I want it. I believe it strikes the real heart-strings of a greater number of people than anything else ever published; and as long as there is an INDEX and I am able to read, I cannot well do without it."

"I send you the money for some more INDEX. I have access to a good many papers, and don't always have time to read yours through. But almost every time I glance at it, I find something I need. Your Christmas sermon was worth more than the subscription. THE INDEX is a good thing for every thoughtful person to have handy."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—Regular meetings of this Society will be held during the spring on Sunday forenoons, at 10½ o'clock, in Daniels' Block, corner of Jefferson and Summit Streets, in the hall over the U. S. Express Office. The public are cordially invited.

RECEIVED.

HANDBOOK OF PROGRESSIVE PHILOSOPHY. By EDWARD SCHILLER. New York: J. S. REDFIELD, Publisher, 140 Fulton Street. 1871. 12mo. pp. 216.

GREAT AND GRAVE QUESTIONS for American Politicians, with a Topic for America's Statesmen. By EBORACUS. New York: C. S. WESCOTT & Co.'s Union Printing House, 79 John St. 1865. pp. 122.

THE IMMORTALITIES OF MAN. A Discourse by Rev. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, preached in Lyric Hall, April 9, 1871. New York: D. G. FRANCIS, 17 Astor Place. 1871. pp. 27.

THE RIGHT OF WOMEN to Exercise the Elective Franchise under the Fourteenth Amendment. Speech of A. G. RIDDLE, in the Suffrage Convention at Washington, Jan. 11, 1871. Revised Edition. Washington, D. C.: JUDD & DETWEILER, Printers. 1871. pp. 16.

AN APPEAL to the Women of the United States, by the National Woman's Suffrage and Educational Committee, Washington, D. C. Hartford: CASE, LOCKWOOD, & BRAINARD, Printers. 1871.

THE NEW CHURCH INDEPENDENT AND MONTHLY REVIEW. WELLER & METCALF, Publishers. Laporte, Indiana. April, 1871.

THE CATHOLIC WORLD. A Monthly Magazine of General Literature and Science. May, 1871. New York: CATHOLIC PUBLICATION HOUSE, 9 Warren St. Price $5.00 a Year.

Poetry.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

THE ALCHEMIST.

No eager sorcerer that doth nightly tend
His seething cauldrons, while his greedy soul
Seeks to turn dross to gold; or strives to blend
His secret simples in some potent whole
That shall ensure the boon of endless days!
My Alchemist pursues no occult ways,
But takes the dullest things of this dull earth,
Corroding cares, hopes withered at their birth,
And, by the magic of her purer art
(A deeper alchemy than I can trace),
Pours from the crucible of her warm heart
A precious coinage, bearing on its face
Her soul's impress, and strews the golden shower
Abroad, till all do homage to her power.

DEERE HARTE.

The Index.

APRIL 29, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 73 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

"TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES, OR REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX"—is the title of a neatly-printed tract of sixteen pages published by THE INDEX Association, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. One Hundred Copies will be sent for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate—one cent a copy. Packages will be sent free to those who will circulate them, but are unable to pay for them.

Mr. PARKER PILLSBURY desires engagements to lecture on RADICAL RELIGION, either for Single Lectures or for Courses of Lectures on successive evenings. Address INDEX OFFICE, TOLEDO, OHIO. The following are among the Subjects of his Lectures:—1. The Popular Religion.—"What will you give us instead?" 2. Religious Mysteries. 3. Is the World more indebted to Christianity than to Science? 4. The Sunday Question. 5. Young Men's Christian Associations. 6. Woman—Her Rights and Responsibilities in Government and Society. 7. Labor and Capital. [Three Lectures.] 8. Lying Preferences in Church and State. These Lectures discuss, in the light of common sense and modern ideas, the theology and institutions of the Christian Church, which they treat in the boldest and most uncompromising manner. They aim to substitute for the degrading Bible-worship and Christ-worship of the churches universal reverence for Reason, Truth, Justice, Freedom, and Humanity.

Mr. PILLSBURY has concluded an arrangement with the Editor and Proprietors of THE INDEX by which he will make it a special object to introduce that paper as widely as possible, as an organ of the most advanced religious thought of the times, and will report regularly through its columns.

F. E. ABBOT, Editor,
For the INDEX ASSOCIATION.

TOLEDO, O., April, 1871.

"ABIogenesis."

On our second and third pages will be found an exceedingly valuable summary of recent researches by Prof. Haeckel into the origin of living forms. It will abundantly repay the most thoughtful perusal. That the doctrine of Spontaneous Generation (Abiogenesis, as Huxley terms it) is destined to become in some shape an unquestioned truth of science, we have not a shadow of doubt, since it offers the only conceivable refuge from the absurdities of supposed supernatural intervention. But that this doctrine has necessarily a "materialistic" bearing, we see as yet no reason to believe. The problem of the perpetuation of consciousness after death, if it is to be negatively solved, must be argued on broader than merely physico-chemical grounds. We shall hold "materialism" to a much stricter logic than it is wont to use. If it proves its point, none will be quicker than we to admit the fact; but by the same warrant that Haeckel pronounces "positive contradiction" of "spontaneous generation" impossible, we too are authorized to pronounce "positive contradiction" of immortality impossible.

The great argument of "materialism" seems to be as follows:—

No form of consciousness is possible without nervous organization.

All nervous organization is destroyed at death.

Therefore no form of consciousness is possible after death.

The first premise is what logicians call a sophisma fictæ universalitatis; that is, a "fallacy of unreal generality," as Sir W. Hamilton translates it. Who can venture to say that no form of consciousness is possible without nervous organization, unless he can show that he is acquainted with all forms of consciousness? Yet this can be shown by none—and asserted by none who realizes the vastness of the universe. Would such an assertion be entitled to any more respect than the equally dogmatic assertions of Catholic priests? On all such points, as Krug well says [Hamilton's Logic, p. 328], "Experience alone can instruct us."

We consider, then, that the doctrine of "spontaneous generation" is no more unfavorable to immortality than that of "special creation." But even if it is, that is no reason for shutting our eyes to facts. It is moral and intellectual cowardice to turn away from any truth because of its supposed consequences. The choice here lies between "miracle" and "spontaneous generation." Be consequences what they may, we believe the latter must be accepted.

"SENTIMENTALISM."

"The arguments adduced in its favor in the debates [referring to the Ku-Klux bill] have been of the usual kinds, deductions from certain abstract notions of justice, fitness, and what not, of about as much bearing on the case as snatches of poetry. The reliance of all its advocates on brute force as a remedy for deep-seated social disorders seems to be about as strong as that of old Haynau or Radetzky, and their contempt for the lessons of history even deeper. Few or none of them make any mention of amnesty or conciliation, or any other civilized cure or palliative. An amnesty bill has, however, been introduced by Mr. Hale, who cleverly anticipated Mr. Butler with it, and has passed the House, which removes everybody's disabilities, except those of officers who left the army of the United States to engage in the rebellion, representatives and senators who resigned their seats for a similar purpose, and the members of state conventions which voted ordinances of secession. This is very good as far as it goes, but it still leaves disfranchised a large body of the most influential men at the South, whose assistance in restoring order is of the last importance. The continuance of their disqualification at this late date can only be prompted either by a desire for vengeance—which is no basis for civilized legislation—or by the hope that it will deter them from doing the like again. But no rational man supposes that the fear of being disfranchised if it did not succeed, would now prevent any Southern man from engaging in another rebellion. The true test of the goodness or badness of all legislation about the South at this moment, supposing it to be constitutional, and therefore not dangerous to the rest of the country, is its tendency to pacify the disturbed States. Any measure that has this tendency is good; any measure that has it not is bad. It is, however, ridiculous to suppose that the denial of political rights to a body of greatly respected and influential men in every State, can have any such tendency, or can produce anything but irritation. Most of our proscriptive legislation has been more worthy of an old Aulic councillor, advised by an old archduchess, an old Dominican monk, and a colonel of dragoons, than the legislature of a free people, which owes its greatness and strength most of all to kindness and confidence in human nature."

The New York Nation, in the above paragraph, again satirizes what it is wont to call "Sentimentalism," i. e., regard for "abstract notions of justice" and similar absurdities, which it represents as the peculiar weakness of certain gushing reformers like Wendell Phillips. We have a right then to expect some stern and practical suggestions from the Nation. On the contrary, it wants to "conciliate" the Ku-Klux, and thinks it quite Haynau-ish to put a stop to their riot of murder by a few well-aimed bullets from United States muskets. It wants to let Jefferson Davis and his gang of dyed-in-the-wool rebels get control of the South again, and have a fair chance to "fire the Southern heart" into a second rebellion. It wants to give a "kiss for a blow," and win over these political and social desperadoes by "kindness." If this is not "Sentimentalism" with a vengeance, a perfect deluge of philanthropic mush and milk, we are quite incompetent to recognize the article when we see it. What the Ku-Klux and their "greatly respected and influential" instigators and backers need, is to be suppressed like any other rioters in arms, and taught that political brigandage is a game in which death on the spot is the penalty of defeat. While the N. Y. Nation wastes its sentimental commiseration on the Ku-Klux, we would have the American nation protect their wretched and defenceless victims. The first duty of any government is to keep the peace, and put down promptly all attacks by ruffians on the life, liberty, or property of any class of the people. The policy which would "conciliate" such highway robbers and murderers as the Ku-Klux is "sentimental" mawkishness of the most nauseating type.

"The Index, Toledo, does not like to be called infidel. It even claims to be faithful, or believing. It compares itself to the South, which didn't like to be called rebel; but it was so called, notwithstanding. Infidel is a short word, an honest word, and expresses the exact difference between a believer in Christ, and those who, as The Index asserts it does, 'stand squarely outside of Christianity,' to whom Christ is no more than other men, nor quite as much; that are unbelievers in Christ, that is, infidels. We had no idea that Mr. Abbot's skin was thin enough to feel such a word as a blow. As Mr. Frothingham exalts it, and canonizes its saints, Voltaire, Paine & Co., Mr. Abbot must not let his New York brother get ahead of him. He has hitherto kept the front in this race to the abyss of anti-Christianism. The speech of Mr. Frothingham, for boldness and impiety, puts him again on the lead. May we even hope that a drop of his ecclesiastical, ancestral blood and name has begun to move disquietly within him, and that this objection to a title perfectly consistent is the precursor of an abandonment of the same. So may it be."

Zion's Herald must try again. It has made a very creditable effort to understand us; but the effort was too severe for its brain, which gave out a little too soon. "Does not like to be called an infidel." We said we did not care whether we were called an "infidel" or not. "Compares itself to the South." We said nothing of the sort. "Claims to be faithful or believing." We said we were faithful in disbelieving. "Skin thin, etc." We said we were pachydermatous. And so on. The Herald must go back to its seat, and study its lesson longer. We dare say it will do better next time. Don't be discouraged. May yet become President of the United States.

The Golden Age is certainly one of the most interesting papers published. Mr. Tilton and Rev. W. T. Clarke (formerly editor of the Liberal Christian) bring great skill and familiarity with the business to the management of the paper. Now and then a comical misprint occurs, to save the Golden Age from the dangerous reputation of typographical perfection. Mr. Towne's article on the "Essenes" was made to be on the "Essences;" and in the last number Prof. Morse is made to "put a gridle round the earth in forty minutes," which is certainly "hurrying up the cakes" with astounding celerity.

August Brentano, 33 Union Square, New York, has reprinted from the London Academy Mr. Wallace's admirable condensation of Mr. Darwin's "Descent of Man." It is well worth reading, especially by those who cannot purchase the latter work itself. Pamphlet, price 25 cents. For sale in Toledo at H. S. Stebbins's, 115 Summit St.

ACTIVE PIETY.

The difference between rational and "evangelical" piety was pleasingly illustrated at a recent meeting of the Methodist Preachers' Association, in New York. The discussion was on the following question:—"What is our duty as Ministers concerning fashionable pleasures and amusements?" Rev. Mr. Harris declared himself opposed to operatic and dramatic performances, dancing and card-playing. "What about croquet?" asked a brother. Mr. Harris "had never played that childish game," and gave no reply. Mr. Gorse, whose name carries with it an aroma of the country, asked for advice on the subject of croquet. It was clear about dancing and going to the play (city vices mainly), but croquet gave him concern. Rev. Mr. Weed, another symbolical name, inquired of Mr. Ferris (Ferret?) his views on the influence of money as a cause of demoralization in the Church. Mr. Ferris considered it a live question which the Church should consider. Mr. Smyth never went to a theatre, or played cards or checkers, and even disapproved of chess as a parlor game. Mr. Shaffer never attended an opera, never smoked a pipe or cigar, never chewed tobacco, and was a total abstainer from all kinds of spirituous drinks. But (fatal admission!) "he did keep a piano in his house for the amusement of his children, and he occasionally danced in the parlor with them."

"Did you open the dancing with prayer?"
"I did not."

"Did you dance to sacred music?" "I did not; I don't know how."

"Well, then, God help you!"

Mr. Shaffer gently defended himself on the ground of the privacy and the limited character of the amusement. But the exclamations of dismay were repeated, and Mr. Ferris, shocked and humiliated, "with the utmost kindness and in no spirit of disrespect to Mr. Shaffer," was of opinion that, if discipline was to be enforced, the case to begin with was before them. Mr. McClean (how pertinent these gentlemen's names are!) reminded the company of the danger of inviting the devil to tempt them. But Mr. London "could not altogether condemn such amusements, if they were practised in the spirit of religion." If a person could dance or go to the theatre in the spirit of religion, it was within the rules of the Book of Discipline.

At this point the discussion ceased for the time, and was adjourned to another occasion.

It would be easy to turn this scene into ridicule, but it was very serious to the men who took part in it. On such gross matters as horse-racing, drunkenness, fashionable and vulgar dissipation, they heartily agreed. They all recognized the devil in his dark dress, palpable caudal appendage, and protruding horns. The discussion turned on his identity when these noticeable peculiarities were concealed. These gentlemen were trained to suspect the "world." This was the soul of their ministry. And if their type of piety be accepted, if piety be conceded to be a devotion to things unseen and eternal, a state of mind withdrawn from earthly cares, interests, and pleasures, a life in God, a fixed desire to escape entanglement in temporal vexations and carry perfect innocence to the abodes of the blessed, the debate above mentioned was reasonable, just in tone, and pointed in argument.

If the world is a hostile camp and we are aliens, strangers, enemies, compelled to pass through it and obliged to glide on swiftly and noiselessly in order to escape detection, then Mr. Shaffer was at fault in dancing with his children, and was right in asking the benefit of his brethren's prayers. No caution can be excessive. The amusement that cannot be enjoyed in a religious spirit must be abstained from. The dance that cannot be performed after prayer and to the music of a lively hymn tune must be discountenanced. Better a stupid home than a godless one. Better children who have no fun here than children who have no pleasure hereafter. Mr. McClean was right in saying that the old-fashioned Methodist ways were the best.

The two theories cannot be confounded. The rationalists distinguish between use and abuse, commending use as beneficent. The "evangelicals" really make no such distinction, but, on the ground that the use always leads to abuse, discourage use. The former employ all innocent means to enliven, cheer and incite the active powers. The latter, fearing the consequence of such exercise, prescribe the Bible in place of literature, psalm tunes for songs, Sunday School processions for dances, and we don't know what for checkers, backgammon and chess. The one develops, the other represses. The development is sometimes too reckless, headlong and confident; the repression is too absolute and stubborn.

There may be excess on either side; but, however modified and shaded, the principles do not run into one another. The rationalist's first emotion on reading a discussion like the foregoing will be contempt. The "evangelical's" first emotion on reading such comments as these will perhaps be abhorrence. The rationalist charges the "evangelical" with being a visionary. The "evangelical" charges the rationalist with being a worldling. The rationalist thinks the position of the "evangelical" wholly absurd; the "evangelical" thinks the position of the rationalist extremely dangerous. Let each work out his own theory, and work it out in earnest; for each requires all the earnestness he can command. The Methodist Preachers' Association do well to hold their church members sternly to their standard of piety while they pretend to have one, and the "liberal" ministers, instead of mocking their squeamishness and timidity, will do well to prove that their own theory of freedom creates men and women who are sweet and serviceable for every day uses. The qualities of consistency and courage we are never tired of praising. If the Methodists hold to their standard of piety, let them promulgate and enforce it in the face of an unbelieving and deriding world. If that theory be mistaken and mischievous, as we profoundly believe that it is, the way to expose and undermine it is to make amusements profitable to society, to demonstrate their wisdom and justify their practice as helps to rational life.

O. B. F.

The guilt of schism may be on him who least thinks it; he being rather the schismatic who makes unnecessary and inconvenient impositions, than he who disobeys them because he cannot do otherwise without violating his conscience.—Jeremy Taylor.

We commend the above to the attention of the Unitarian leaders who blame the schismatic tendencies of young radicals, and feel deeply injured when they leave the National Conference on account of the "preamble."

"SLEEP IS AN OPINION."

Samson, the famous French actor, went to sleep while a young tragedian was reading a tragedy for his judgment. On being waked up by the indignant reader, and asked of what value his opinion would be under such circumstances, he answered—"Monsieur, in such a matter, sleep is an opinion."

There is constant complaint from all conservative religions of the indifference of the heretics. Roman Catholics charge it upon Protestants, Trinitarians upon Unitarians. For our Irish domestics there are no stormy Sundays. Their church is always full. Martin Luther's wife was quite troubled to find how much less she and her husband cared about religious ceremonies than before they left their original faith. In the same way I heard some Unitarian young ladies debating the probable position of a certain lawyer of their acquaintance. "Is he a Unitarian?" asked one. "I suppose so," said another; "he never goes to church."

It is not to be wondered at that Unitarians themselves make this complaint of those who have ceased to be attracted by that form of worship. Dr. Bellows, for instance, lately complained of the difficulty of interesting the Harvard professors in any form of organized religion. He does not seem to perceive that their sleep is an opinion.

One obvious reason why this diminution of interest takes place is in the fact that the churches have hitherto been filled not merely by love but by fear; and when you take away the fear, you take away much of the inducement to attend church. The basis of all missionary enterprise is the hope of saving souls from hell-fire; but when one ceases to believe in that, it is not possible to put an equal amount of zeal into saving people from the mere dread of it. It is the duty of an honest opponent, Gilbert Haven for instance, to strain every nerve to save all radicals from the fearful doom which awaits them, on his theory. He ought to spend all his substance, give all his life to that work. But why should they take the same amount of interest in saving him, when they do not believe in any such eternal danger? We see that he is in danger of much narrowness and bigotry, and we are not indifferent to that; and if we believed him to be in danger of hopeless perdition, we should work harder to save him, I think, than he has yet worked to save us. So long as we do not, it is enough simply to give an opinion upon his doctrines; and that opinion is apt to come in the form of indifference, or of sleep.

If we lived in a time of positive persecution, heretics would doubtless have to bestir themselves; but that time has passed. The greatest bigots now let heretics alone, or at most turn them out of their reading-rooms, which is but a mild form of torture. Naturally they are let alone in turn, and this letting-alone, on the part of heretics, becomes chronic. If they support THE INDEX and the Radical and the Free Religious Association, it is not primarily from a love of fight, or from the desire to save souls, but from the love of good sense and independent thinking. But the Advance and the A. B. C. F. M. are supported by a belief that men's souls are perishing eternally, for want of them. We who believe that God takes better care than that of the souls whom he has created, have no motive so pungent as this. Where a man grows weary of the forms and doctrines of the churches, he has a very easy remedy by simply staying at home. It does not seem a very heroic form of protest, but it does its work in the end.

One of the best passages in Lecky's "History of Rationalism" (a book that seems to me unequal and overrated) is that in which he shows that civilization does not so often destroy false opinions by conflict as by neglect. "They perish by indifference, not by contempt. They are relegated to the dim twilight land that surrounds every living faith; the land of the unrealized and the inoperative." And a Frenchman has said the same thing more tersely before, pointing out that the withdrawal of persecution and the substitution of indifference are the doom of every sect. "Nulle persecution, beaucoup d'indifference et d'oubli, c'est la mort de toutes les sectes."

T. W. H.

[The omission of the accents in the above French quotation is due to the lack of foreign type in our publishing office.—Ed.]

The Free Congregational Society of Florence, Mass., is prosperous, and successful in the best sense of the word. Mr. Charles C. Burleigh, who set the Unitarian Conference at New York in an uproar by saying in perfect good faith that "the Lord Jesus Christ" meant in the New Testament only "Mr. Jesus Christ," has been its regular speaker for several years; and now Miss Elizabeth M. Powell (sister, we believe, of the devoted editor of the N. Y. National Standard) is to be his co-laborer. The report of the Executive Committee, signed "Seth Hunt, Chairman," and published in the Northampton Free Press, is both witty and wise, as the following extract will show:—

"In reporting from year to year the doings and prospects of the Free Congregational Society, your committee find themselves in an anomalous position. Other societies, or churches, measure their success by the number they put into the fold; we by the number let out. They pen up, we take down the bars. While, therefore, we are busy showing men how to get out, it is to be feared the reports of the churches show, in more senses than one, how many get taken in. Although we do not seek to arouse the fears of the young and timid, by giving false alarms of fire unquenchable, nor by resorting to other common methods of stirring up religious excitements, yet we can truly assert that every one of our gatherings has been an 'inquiry meeting.'"

It is pleasant to find the articles with which our friends favor us noticed appreciatively by the press. We think that the praise bestowed by the New Jerusalem Messenger of April 12 on an essay we lately published, is entirely deserved:—

"THE INDEX ON SWEDENBORG.—The Toledo INDEX, the organ of Free Religion, publishes, in its number for March 18th, a most excellent synopsis of the teachings of the New Church. The article was written to be read before a reading Club in Northampton, Mass. We should be glad to know something of the author. If the New Church could always receive such treatment from the religious press in the statement of its belief, it would have no cause to complain. The article is long, but it is so clear and excellent a statement of the main points of our belief, that we venture to give nearly the whole of it, omitting the introductory sketch of Swedenborg's scientific career and a few unnecessary paragraphs."

The following anecdote is sent to us for publication. A little Sunday School scholar had committed to memory the text—"He will come as a thief in the night," and was asked—"How will Christ appear?" The child innocently replied—"As a burglar!" It is dangerous sometimes to translate the Bible into plain English.

A friend in Indianapolis writes:—"The Radical Club here is a great success. Hall crowded, and discussions most animated."

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

SCIENCE AND SPECULATIVE PHILOSOPHY.

QUINCY, ILL., April 16, 1871.

F. E. ABBOT, Esq.:

Dear Sir,—I have something to say to you about your essay published in No. 64. You say there are two schools of Free Religion, the "Intuitive School" and the "Scientific School;" and go on to show the different attitudes which the different schools assume toward the questions of God and Immortality. In this class you may include the Speculative Philosophers as belonging to the "Intuitive School;" but if you do, you have certainly given a statement of their attitude towards the great question mentioned, which I believe they would repudiate. I am myself a mere novice in Speculative Philosophy as compared with you; but I cannot help thinking, until my reason is convinced otherwise, that Speculative Philosophy does not "beg the question;" that it "approaches their solution by the one universal method,"—"the union of induction and deduction;" that it furnishes a "solution such that any cultured mind can attain certainty for itself;" that its results "are intelligible by any one with education enough to follow them;" and that "its authority rests on the discovery of truth which any qualified person can verify, or re-discover at his leisure." I cannot see why it may not be as true that Reason transcends Understanding, as that Understanding transcends Simple Apprehension.

Yours respectfully,

SAM. H. EMERY, JR.

[It was no part of our purpose to deal with Speculative Philosophy as such, which could not be handled in a popular lecture. Still less can we enter here on any such treatment of that subject. It must suffice to say that in our opinion Speculative Philosophy is to be as thoroughly revolutionized by science as is religion. As to the nature of this revolution we entertain very distinct, though only partially developed, ideas; and it is a hope we cannot yet relinquish that the future will give an opportunity to unfold them. But we find it not wise to dwell too much on what might have been. Today we have another task to do, and we must resist the temptation to enter on the fields to which our correspondent invites us.—Ed.]

FREE MEDICINE.

[We print the following letter by special permission. It was not designed for publication, and we regret we cannot append the name of the writer.—Ed.]

BOSTON, April 8, 1871.

MR. F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—I see by a paragraph in THE INDEX of this week, that you are endeavoring to get hold of No. 2, of Vol. 1. If your object is (as I hope) to supply subscribers who file their paper, and who are without the number mentioned, will you consider me as hungering and thirsting after the righteousness of that particular issue.

I fear you are "all abroad" regarding the relations of the regular physicians and the homœopaths. It seems as hard to make people understand this subject, as it is to make plain the object of the Free Religionists. May I whisper a word in your private ear?

The belief of the regular or rational physicians is that all systems in medicine are false, and that true eclecticism is the only true basis of practice. (Please not confound true eclecticism with the system known popularly as the Eclectic, the adherents of which are botanic physicians.) Whenever the regular physician learns or finds that a drug, or a means of treatment, is capable of producing a good effect in diseased conditions of the body, that remedy or that means he adopts; and he employs the remedy in as small a dose as will produce the effect desired. Allopathy, homœopathy, hydropathy, electropathy, &c., are systems, and are all wrong. At the same time the rational physician employs electricity and water, where experience has shown that they are beneficial. If he finds that the homœopathist has a remedy which he himself has not employed, which will produce a given desired effect, he is glad to avail himself of it. This would not make him a believer in electropathy, hydropathy, or homœopathy.

The popular impression that the regular physicians are allopathists has done much to perpetuate the false idea I refer to. The name was coined by the homœopaths, but it has never been accepted by the regular physicians, so far as this term implies the practice of a system. They do not practise allopathy nor any other pathy.

The plan of uniting all the schools in one organization is very well. The "Old School" would have been glad to have had the investigation of the system question continued under the maternal roof. Read the resolutions of the homœopaths in the letter of Dr. Horsch to which you refer, if you desire to know the feelings of one of the sects as to a reunion. [See INDEX No. 36.]

A word as to the action of Dr. Van Aernam. Would you, a believer in universal religion and in a never-ending search for truth, aid in electing to a position where his creed would gain in popular favor, a person who insisted that all the diseases of the moral nature were only to be cured by means of his creed? Do you, a free religionist, conceive that the progress of the universal element of religion would be in any degree stayed by electing the editor of Zion's Herald a member of the School Committee?

Would you think it just possible that, if he were alone with one of the pupils, examining him for a school of a higher grade, he might slip into his hand a tract informing him that he was destined to everlasting punishment, unless he believed that Jesus was the Christ? If you were satisfied that Mr. Frothingham was as well qualified intellectually, would you, if you had the power, remove Mr. Haven and appoint Mr. Frothingham, even if you had no evidence with regard to the tract? Again, what would you think of the mental calibre of a man who would call you a conservative old fogey? Not that you care for epithets, but do you think a person with so little conception of what constitutes real progress worthy a responsible position where it would appear that he was recognized by you as a capable and honest observer?

As to the future I have as much faith that sectarianism in medicine will be done away with, as you have that it will cease to exist in religion. Eclecticism, that is, free medicine, is true because it is free, and is progressive because it is free. All of the sects in medicine are in chains. If in the constant search for the truth the rational physicians find it in the system of homœopathy, they will become homœopaths.

I hope you see where the regular physicians stand. I will only finally call your attention to some resolutions passed by the Lynn (Mass.) Medical Society, and published in the Boston Medical and Surgical Journal of March 16, in which Dr. Van Aernam's action is approved, as being justified towards "all the sectarian schools of medicine." The resolutions also express sympathy towards Dr. Van A. on account of the misrepresentations to which he is subjected. It is not true, namely, that the Pension Surgeon has been removed because he was a homœopath, but because Dr. Van Aernam deems the progress of true medicine would be, no matter how little, obstructed by the recognition in any way of a sectarian.

I am yours very truly,
— M. D.

[A subsequent letter contained the following additional statements, which we add as a postscript.—Ed.]

The pathies are wrong, not simply because they are systems, but because the systems are wrong. I am not saying that all systems are wrong, but only that all [existing] systems in medicine are wrong. One after another, as these various systems have been suggested, have they been impartially investigated by careful, intelligent physicians, yearning for better means of benefiting their fellow-men. Not one of them but has been found false, while few have been found from which something has not been taken, with a "God be thanked." Medicine can scarcely yet be called a science. It may, perhaps, be called an uncertain science.

[So long as "regular" physicians refuse to consult with other physicians, equally able with themselves to pass the strictest examinations, simply because they adopt a different theory of medical treatment,—so long as the former refuse to admit the latter into their Medical Societies for the same reason alone,—it can hardly be held that the "Old School" is free from sectarianism. The existence of this proscription is a fact, as we presume no one will deny. Yet practically it makes the "Old School" as much a sect as the Eclectics, the Homœopaths, the Hydropaths, etc. The "Old School" thus seems to occupy in medicine the ground occupied by the Catholic Church in religion. The Catholics deny that they are a sect, applying this term exclusively to the various Protestant bodies. But in point of fact they are themselves a sect, since they exclude all Protestants from their communion, and jealously maintain a dividing line. The Romanists claim to be the only true Church, as the "regulars" claim to be the only true school. In each case we seem to see the same exclusiveness. Are we in error? Would it not be better to recognize as "regular physicians" all who can pass strict and searching examinations, and to extend to all such equal privileges in all respects?

We ought to add that we confess our entire incompetency to decide between the conflicting theories of medical treatment, and that we have no more partiality for one than for another. Our interest in the matter arises solely from the fact that Free Medicine is a particular application of Free Religion.—Ed.]

LIBERAL SPIRITUALISM.

LOCKPORT, ILL., April 12, 1871.

MR. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—If there is one thing above all others I most admire, it is fair and honest dealing with those with whom we differ in opinion; and if there is aught I most dislike, it is concealed egotism.

Since the advent of THE INDEX with your "Fifty Affirmations," there has necessarily been a great deal of opposition and agitation. Opposition and misrepresentation were to be expected from those directly interested in sustaining the Christian system and more particularly from that numerous body belonging to the popular creeds.

It gives me great pleasure to learn that there are a few included in the latter class who are imbued with a spirit of liberality and kindness, that puts to shame many who claim exemption from the tyranny of creeds, but who still cling to the Christian name as essential.

After reading carefully your "Affirmations," and by previous knowledge understanding the position of Higginson, Frothingham, and others of similar tendencies, we gave you a cordial greeting, feeling assured that the path you had marked out, was one hitherto untrod, though destined to command increasing attention in the various efforts for human advancement. Your name was not familiar to me. I knew little of your antecedents, and for this reason (not a very plausible one) watched very closely to see what fairness and ability you would bring to sustain your averments.

A year and over has added its links of history to the past, and still THE INDEX lives. Its early promise has been ably fulfilled. Ability, candor, and liberality have adorned its pages and marked its course; and though I am one of the early Spiritualists, and as yet one of its earnest friends, I am not among that class who take exception to the course of THE INDEX, or who imagine it only a "half-way-house-paper," "furnishing milk for babes," but not food strong enough for those believing in and seeking to diffuse the principles of Spiritualism. Neither am I in that too numerous class among Spiritualists who believe that Spiritualism (as now taught) contains all the truth necessary for mortals to know in a religious direction. I am well satisfied, and quite as well pleased, that Free Religion numbers among its advocates many to whom I am indebted for useful knowledge which I have not been able to obtain from other sources.

The "Works of Epictetus," translated by Col. Higginson, are of great value, and as a Spiritualist I should feel that, if such works and their authors were silent, and the utterances of the Radical Clubs only heard in secret, the cause of mental and spiritual freedom would receive untold injury.

Spiritualism has done and is doing much good. Its phenomena have convinced vast numbers of the truth of continued life after the spirit "shuffles off this mortal coil." It has been and still is a constant balm of consolation to the afflicted in mind and body. Its promises are rational and (as we think) natural, inasmuch as they are in harmony with our purest emotions, and do not violate what seems to us the working of natural law.

Of this I am confident, that, while the popular church drove off many of the best hearts and minds into a blank denial of every religious claim, Spiritualism brought a large number back to a knowledge that earth-life was only rudimentary, and that under future and better conditions we could work out the grand problem of human destiny.

As regards the progression of the race, its rights and duties, Free Religion and Spiritualism occupy nearly the same relations, both seeking to place humanity in the most favorable condition for culture and happiness. The simple fact that spirit-communication is such an essential with us, is no reason why we should declaim against Free Religion, which is working heartily with us to eradicate the tyranny of all authority that cramps the mind in its aspirations for the highest good. The object of both is the elevation of man, not the "glory of God" as commonly understood.

We would make human nature self-reliant and free, assured that in the paths of right and duty can be found the only redemption and salvation necessary. Therefore as Spiritualists we should be just, and not forget that most of the principles we teach are as old as some of the best minds of the earlier civilization.

Progress is very slow. As Wendell Phillips said, it took over sixty years to make John Brown. Let none of us expect that a great multitude will step out of the ranks of creed-worship, in less than twenty-five years. Thirty years ago the writings of Priestley and Channing were very radical; and though today they seem conservative, we had better not imagine that we have outgrown half they uttered, for in some directions they are still our teachers.

Theodore Parker in many respects is head and shoulders above most of us; and yet my sensitive Spiritual friend calls him an old fogey.

Looking back over the history of the past forty years, I seem to see the reason for our position today. Starting with the Anti-Slavery movement, and the Boston Liberator, which gave form to the grandest moral movement of the age, its advocates were brought face to face with tyranny in many shapes. Their long conflict with the Church, in order to enlist it on the side of freedom, convinced the Abolitionists that Church and State were in league against humanity. Thirty years in this school developed many facts in relation to the danger from creeds and priestcraft; and while the Abolitionists were seeking to strike the shackles from the limbs and souls of the slaves, they were doing quite as much for themselves in a religious direction.

The Universalists, Unitarians, and Materialists were steadily undermining by their logic the strongholds of time-honored superstitions. Two direct results of the Anti-Slavery Reform were the organization of Progressive Friends and the recognition of the rights of women. The first of these in spirit was very similar to the position of THE INDEX, with the exception of being inside of Christianity. In the same general direction, the Washingtonian and Physiological Reforms were seeking to benefit the race; and while these various influences, and the principles of Fourier and Owen were agitating the people, the "Raps" were heard at Hydesville and Rochester. Now it is very clear to my mind that, previous to the rappings and other phenomena connected with Spiritualism, the various Reforms had prepared the way for what by us is termed the Harmonical Philosophy; and, therefore, for these reasons, as well as others of similar import, I take exception to the position of Cephas B. Lynn and others that Spiritualists have travelled over the ground of Free Religionists years ago. The simple truth is, that Free Religion is the last phase in religious reform, and is the natural outgrowth of progressive tendencies. Therefore I for one would say, let us be more modest; and while we cling with earnest tenacity to the beautiful truth of spirit-communication, and welcome with loving hearts the visits from loved ones that have gone before, let us not forget that there are brave hearts and spirits in the body, though pursuing a somewhat different road, that are laboring as earnestly as ourselves to bring about that condition of harmony, that shall make "This world a world of beauty,

As other worlds above."

Yours for truth and justice,

GEORGE LYNN.

THE NEED OF PERSONAL DEVELOPMENT.

PORTLAND, ME., April 12, 1871.

F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—The unnecessary sensitiveness shown by Mr. Lynn prompts me to send a word of encouragement for the able manner in which you have conducted your paper. As a Spiritualist, and one well known to the readers of various Spiritualist papers during the past five years, I would emphatically endorse and reiterate the sentiment of your correspondent who unconsciously stirred up Mr. Lynn.

We do want more of just such labor as you are giving to the cause, and not dreamy platitudes on "the planes of life in the heavenly world," more earnest endeavor to induce men to "develop" their own powers, to rely on their own judgment, to follow their own reason in preference to that of another, whether it comes over the signature of Benjamin Franklin or some lamented grandmother. If "the great majority of Spiritualists today do not have confidence enough in the words of their spirit friends," yet they have more confidence in their own spirit,—a faith sadly in need of culture, however.

Trance-speaking, with its frothy eloquence and dearth of ideas, may serve many yet; but those who think, who are interested in the great problems of the day, in scientific and theological fields, will appreciate your labor and heartily wish you success.

Yours truly,
DYER D. LUM.

ANNEXATION OF SAN DOMINGO.

TIPPECANOE CITY, O., April 17, 1871.

MR. ABBOT:—I was pleased with the firm and manly reply to the strictures of A. C. on an article of yours touching the removal of Mr. Sumner from the position he held on the Committee of Foreign Relations. It was of the true grit—the kind of independence we need in editors; for there was much of the thumb-screw spirit of the politician in A. C.'s remarks.

But, permit me to say, Mr. Sumner has for a long time been a favorite of mine. Still, I think, even "a friendly eye" could not fail to see in his speech on the annexation of Hayti an acrimony towards the Administration not commendable in him, and undeserved by Gen. Grant. I by no means shared with the President the strong convictions he expressed as to the great utility of such annexation; but the recommendations of the Executive are always entitled by other departments of the Government to a careful, candid, and respectful consideration.

When the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations can so far forget himself as to impugn the motives of the Executive in any suggestions he may make in his official or private capacity, it is time the official relations of those functionaries should cease.

Am I mistaken in seeing in Mr. Sumner's speech a condemnation of the objects of the President in this matter? Had I been in Gen. Grant's position, I should have felt that Mr. Sumner charged me with corruption, and I would have asked of my friends, so far as it was in their power, to relieve me from unnecessary official connection with him. It is proper that I should add here—what was contrary to my expectations—that the Commission sent to examine into the propriety of annexation have fully sustained the President.

EDWARD L. CRANE.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Nature's Gifts,
SCIENTIFICALLY DEVELOPED

As mankind, from indiscretion or other causes, have been doomed to suffer from disease, so also has remedy for disease been provided. Our hills and valleys abound with roots and herbs, which if scientifically prepared and compounded, will restore health and vigor to the invalid. To find such a remedy we should seek one that has stood the test of age.

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

Sure Cure for Liver Complaint, Sure Cure for Dyspepsia, Sure Cure for Debility, Sure Cure for Jaundice, Sure Cure for Marasmus.
And all affections arising from weakness or want of action in the Liver or Digestive Organs. The great remedy for

IMPURE BLOOD,
FEVER AND AGUE!

It is an impossibility for any one to have fever and ague, if they will use a few bottles of this remedy each spring and fall.

$100 $100 $100
Will be given for any case of this disease that occurs to any one that uses the Bitters or Tonic as a preventive.

Those who have the Fever and Ague will find, after the chills have stopped, that by using a few bottles of the Bitters or Tonic, the disease will not return.

These remedies will rebuild their Constitution faster than any other known remedy.

The remedies were placed before the public thirty years ago, with all the prejudices of so-called "patent medicine" operating against them, but gradually their virtues became known, and now, to day, they stand at the head of all preparations of their class, with the indorsement of eminent judges, lawyers, clergymen and physicians.

Read the following symptoms and if you find that your system is affected by any of them, you may rest assured that disease has commenced its attack on the most important organs of your body, and unless soon checked by the use of powerful remedies, a miserable life, soon terminating in death, will be the result.

H

Constipation, Flatulence, Inward Piles, Fullness of Blood to the Head, Acidity of the Stomach, Nausea, Heartburn, Disquiet for Food, Fullness or Weight in the Stomach, Sour Eructations, Sinking or Fluttering at the Pit of the Stomach, Swimming of the Head, Hurried or Difficult Breathing, Fluttering at the Heart, Choking or Suffocating Sensations when in a lying posture, Dimness of Vision, Dots or Webs before the Sight, Dull Pain in the Head, Deficiency of Perspiration, Yellowness of the Skin and Eyes, Pain in the Side, Back, Chest, Limbs, etc., Sudden Flushes of Heat, Burning of the Flesh, Constant imagining of Evil and Great Depression of Spirits

All indicate disease of the Liver or Digestive Organs, combined with impure blood.

O

HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS!

is entirely vegetable and contains no liquor. It is a compound of Fluid Extracts. The Roots, Herbs and Barks from which these extracts are made, are gathered in Germany, all the medicinal virtues are extracted from them by a scientific chemist. These extracts are then forwarded to this country to be used expressly for the manufacture of this Bitters. There is no alcoholic substance of any kind used in compounding the Bitters; hence it is free from all the objections incident to the use of a liquor preparation.

O

Hooiland's German Tonic
Is a combination of all the Ingredients of the Bitters with the purest quality of Santa Cruz Rum, Oranges, &c. It is used for the same disease as the Bitters, in cases where some pure alcoholic stimulus is required.

TESTIMONY

Like the following was never before offered in behalf of any medical preparation:

HON. G. W. WOODWARD,
Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, writes Philadelphia, March 16th, 1897.

I find "Hooiland's German Bitters" is a good Tonic, useful in diseases of the digestive organs, and of great benefit in cases of debility and want

F

of nervous action in the system.
Yours truly,
GEORGE W. WOODWARD.

HON. JAMES THOMPSON,
Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania,
Philadelphia, April 23d, 1896.

I consider "Hooiland's German Bitters" a valuable medicine in a case of attacks of Indigestion or Dyspepsia. I can certify this from my experience of it.

Yours, with respect,
JAMES THOMPSON.
HON. GEO. SHARSWOOD,
Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania,
Philadelphia, June 1st, 1898.

I have found by experience that "Hooiland's German Bitters" is a very good tonic, relieving dyspeptic symptoms almost directly.

L

GEO. SHARSWOOD.

HON. WM. F. ROGERS,
Mayor of the City of Buffalo, N. Y.,
Mayor's Office, Buffalo, June 22d, 1899.

I have used "Hooiland's German Bitters and Tonic" in my family during the past year, and can recommend them as an excellent tonic, imparting tone and vigor to the system. Their use has been productive of decidedly beneficial effects.

A

WM. F. ROGERS.

HON. JAMES M. WOOD,
Ex-Mayor of Williamsport, Pennsylvania.
I take great pleasure in recommending "Hooiland's German Tonic" to any one who may be afflicted with dyspepsia. I had the dyspepsia so badly that it was impossible to keep any food on my stomach, and I became so weak as not to be able to walk half a mile. Two bottles of Tonic effected a perfect cure.

N

JAMES M. WOOD.

JOHN EUTERMARKS, ESQ.,
Law Partner of Judge Maynard, Williamsport, Pennsylvania.
This is to certify that I have used "Hooiland's German Bitters" for dyspepsia, and found it an invaluable remedy.

CAUTION.—Hooiland's German Bitters are counterfeited. See the signature of C. M. JACKSON is on the

D

wrapper of each bottle. All others are counterfeit.
Principal Office and Manufactory at the German Medicine Store, No. 631 ARCH STREET, Philadelphia, Pa.

CHAS. M. EVANS, Prop'r.
(Formerly of C. M. JACKSON & CO.)

Prices.—Hooiland's German Bitters, per bottle, $1; Hooiland's German Tonic, half doz., $5; Hooiland's German Tonic, put up in qt. bottle, $1.50 per bottle, or half doz. for $7.50.

Do not forget to examine well the article you buy in order to get the genuine. For sale by all druggists and dealers in Medicines everywhere.

24-cowly

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX

PROSPECTUS FOR 1871.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869, and has just closed its first yearly volume.

We deem it proper, therefore, to submit the following PROSPECTUS of Volume II for 1871, and ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if the matter was properly presented to them, and especially if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor. We cannot afford to send out travelling agents, nor would they succeed so well in getting names as persons of local influence. We therefore have determined to use the funds it would cost to get our paper before the people, in another way, namely, in the purchase of articles of value to be given as premiums to those who make up lists of subscribers; thus presenting to the friends of free thought and pure religion the double motive of doing good and getting paid for it.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two DOLLARS a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

PREMIUMS.

For Fifty Names, we will give one of PRINCE & Co's four Octave Melodeons (price $65,) or a complete copy of CHAMBERS' Encyclopedia of Universal Knowledge, in ten volumes (price $50).

For Forty Names, we will give a Wilson's Family Sewing Machine, one of the best Machines made.

For Twenty-Five Names, Webster's Royal Quarto Unabridged Pictorial Dictionary (price $12,) or one of the following Chromos:

The Three Tom-Boys (Prang's), price..... $15.00
Winter in the Forest, 20x28..... 12.00
Watering the Horses, 21x29..... 12.00

For Ten Names, one of the following Chromos:

WHITTIER'S Barefooted Boy, (Prang's) price..... $5.00
The Unconscious Sleeper, 14x17..... 6.00
Mt. Blanc, 20x26..... 7.50
Or a copy of LECKY'S History of European Morals, 2 vols 6.00
MAX MUELLER'S Chips from a German Work-Shop, 2 vols 5.00
EMERSON'S Prose Works, 2 vols..... 5.00
WEISS'S Life and Correspondence of THEODORE PARKER, 2 volumes..... 6.00

For Five Names, a bound volume of THE INDEX, for 1870. (Price $2.50.) Or a copy of one of the following works, (post paid):

DARWIN'S Origin of Species, price..... $2.00
LUBBOCK'S Origin of Civilization, price..... 2.00
Essays in Criticism, by MATTHEW ARNOLD, price..... 2.00
Tablets, by A. BRONSON ALCOTT, with portrait, price..... 2.00
Any volume of the writings of THEODORE PARKER or HENRY D. THOREAU, each..... 2.00
On the Heights, AUERBACK..... 2.00

For Four Names, a copy of THE INDEX for 1871, or one of the following books (post paid):

EMERSON'S Society and Solitude, price..... $1.75
Nathan the Wise, a dramatic poem translated from LESSING by ELLEN FROTHINGHAM, price..... 1.75
HUXLEY'S Lay Sermons and Addresses..... 1.75
Speeches and Lectures, by WENDELL PHILLIPS..... 1.50
Historic Americans, by THEODORE PARKER, price..... 1.50
A copy of The Revolution..... 2.00
Or The Woman's Journal..... 2.00

CASH PREMIUMS.

For 75 Names,..... 50 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 50 Names,..... 25 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 25 Names,..... 15 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 10 Names,..... 5 Dollars in Greenbacks
For less than 10 Names, a Cash Commission of Twenty per Cent.

Any book in the above list will be sent by us post-paid upon the receipt of price.

N. B.—Names need not all come from one post office. We will send the paper wherever directed, and let the names count as clubs. Specimen Copies sent to all who enclose a three cent postage stamp. Address

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
Loc' Box 38, TOLEDO, OHIO.

NEW TRACTS,

Intended to Teach Religion Without Superstition.

The Church and the World: An Exposure of the "Young Men's Christian Association" (so called).
I am an Honest Man: Do loud Professions show us very much about Character?
The Bible Vindicated: Against Infidels on one side, and Idolaters on the other.
The Wisdom of Jesus: How misrepresented by those who call themselves his followers.
God's Justice and Mercy: Not antagonistic, but working together for the Welfare of all.
Infallibility: No better founded in Orthodox Protestantism than in Popery.
Rationalism: A Plea for the Co-operation of Reason with Faith, as God intended.
Prayer: Suggestions to a Child who has been taught to be afraid of his Father.
Learn by Experience: One of the Lessons greatly needed by Pious People.
What Becomes of Sin? Another Lesson greatly needed by Pious People.
Fulton on Dickens: An exposure of one of the professional tricks of a Clergyman.
Love to God: Written on the supposition that Love means Love, and not Fear.
The Negative Party in Religion: Showing who are specially distinguished by not believing.
Five for 10 cents; all for 25 cents.

ALSO,

The Two Doctrines of the Bible on Sabbath-keeping: showing from the Bible that there are two, and what they are.

Answers to Questions Concerning Sabbath-keeping: Urging the advantages of keeping Sunday free from ordinary Business and Labor, as well as from Superstition.

"It injures our Business:" Is that a Right Business which is damaged by free discussion?

Choose the Good, Reject the Evil: Believe in God, but be sure to have Him a good God.
These four for 10 cents.

Address CHAS. K. WHIPPLE,
70tf 43 Bowdoin St., Boston.

OPPORTUNITY AND RECIPROCITY.

A Convention will be held under the auspices of
THE NEW ENGLAND LABOR REFORM LEAGUE,
In New York City,

May 6th, 7th and 8th, commencing with a discussion on "Trades Unions" in COOPER INSTITUTE, FRIDAY EV'G, MAY 5TH.
Albert Brisbane, Horace Greeley, Mrs. E. C. Stanton, Thos. J. Durant, M. M. Pomeroy, Josiah Warren, S. P. Andrews, Mrs. V. C. Woodbull, John Orvis, J. W. Browning, S. S. Foster, Mrs. E. L. Daniels, L. K. Joslin, Edward Palmer, M. Drury, Susan B. Anthony, Charles Moran, E. H. Heywood, William West, John Siney, Wm. Hanson, and other speakers are expected.

Admission to all the Sessions, Free.

The Convention will meet at 2½ and 7½ o'clock P. M. Saturday the 6th, and at 10½ A. M., 2½ and 7½ P. M. Monday the 8th, in Cooper Institute; at 10½ A. M. and 2½ and 7½ P. M. Sunday the 7th, in Tammany Hall Opera House.

It is desired to give free utterance to all phases of Labor Reform, and a national impulse to movement in the right direction. Contributions towards expenses of continuing these discussions, and communications of opinion, may be sent to E. H. HAYWOOD, Princeton, Mass.

70-71

THE CELEBRATED CRAIG MICROSCOPE

is an optical wonder; reveals thousands of the hidden Wonders of Nature; is of permanent use and practical availability, combining instruction with amusement, and never losing its interest. It magnifies

TEN THOUSAND TIMES,

a power equal to other Microscopes of many times its cost. Reveals countless little worlds all around us, teeming with life, which to the naked eye must forever remain a sealed book—as Eels in Vinegar, Animals in Water, Cheese Mites, Sugar and Itch Insects, Milk Globules, Claws and Hairs of Insects, Hundreds of eyes in a single eye of a Fly, Dust of a Butterfly's Wings to be perfectly formed Feathers, the much talked of Trichina Spiralis, or Pork Worm, which was first discovered in America with this Microscope.

It is of infinite value to professional men, to teachers, and to students, but NOWHERE IS IT OF GREATER VALUE THAN AT THE FAMILY TABLE, within the reach of every member. It will delight yourself, your children, and your friends during the long winter evenings. It will show you adulterations or uncleanness of various kinds in food, as sugar, tea, bread, meat, etc.

It is of Inestimable Value to the Farmer

in examining insects which prey upon his crops. The power of a $50 Microscope, and so simple in its construction that any child can use it understandingly, with and appreciation.

A Beautiful Present—Elegant, Instructive, Amusing, and Cheap. Over 60,000 sold.

During the past six years its worth has been testified to by thousands of Scientific Men, Farmers, School Teachers, Students, Physicians, Heads of Families, and others.

PRICE, $3.00—Sent by Mail Post-paid.

Every instrument is neatly boxed, and handsomely labelled with full directions for use. Thousands have been sent by mail.
Address, W. J. LINESS & CO.,
CHICAGO.

FREE! FREE!

"THE MICROSCOPE," a Monthly Journal of Information for the People—the mysteries of Nature explained—interesting information on the wonders of Creation—stories, sketches, etc. Terms $1.00 per year. This Journal will be sent FREE for one year to any one purchasing a Craig Microscope at the regular Price, $3.00. (Craig Microscope will be sent post-paid.)

For sample copy, and our beautifully illustrated and descriptive circulars, and eight pages of testimonials of Craig Microscope, send six cents for postage to

W. J. LINESS & CO.,

Opticians, and Sole Proprietors of Craig and Novelty Microscopes, CHICAGO, ILL.

AGENTS and DEALERS, this Microscope sells in every family on its merits, when exhibited. LARGE PROFITS. Send or terms. 58246

A NEW RADICAL BOOK.

"Origin and Development of Religious Ideas and Beliefs,"

As Manifested in History and Seen by Reason.

By MORRIS EINSTEIN.

For sale at the office of the Boston Investigator, 84 Washington St., Boston, or by the Author, Titusville, Pa.

PRICE, - - - $1.50.

64-78

or Cincinnati, O.

6-77

A Few More Agents Wanted For

THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD

A new religious work of unsurpassed interest and value. For terms, address W. FLINT & CO., No. 26 S. 7th St., Philadelphia, 5 Custom House Place, Chicago, and 176 West 4th Street, Cincinnati. 65-77

COLE'S FIRST PRIZE BAKING POWDER.

The Best in the Market.

One trial only asked. Same price as the common kinds.

Sample sent free on Application.

63-75.

ALEX. COLE, BUFFALO, N. Y.

THE GOLDEN RULE.

A Weekly Paper Devoted to Natural Religion or Rational Christianity.

Published at 25 Bromfield Street, Boston.

L. SCOTT and J. L. HATCH, - - - EDITORS.

"THE GOLDEN RULE" will publish each week a thoroughly Radical Discourse by Rev. J. L. Hatch, and each number will contain an interesting story inculcating rational views of Religion. The first number contains an Historical Discourse on the "Life and Labors of Elder Jacob Knapp," delivered in the Olympic Theatre, Boston, Sunday evening, March 26. Terms, $2.00 a year in advance. Specimen copies mailed (post-paid) on the receipt of two three-cent stamps.

63-75

Address, "GOLDEN RULE,"
25 Bromfield Street, Boston.

WANTED—AGENTS. ($20 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock-stitch" (alike on both sides, and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest Family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Boston, Mass., Pittsburgh, Pa., Chicago, Ill. or St. Louis, Mo. 38y1

SINGLE COPIES

OF

THE INDEX for 1870

Containing the following

ESSAYS,

Will be mailed from THE INDEX office (post-paid) on receipt of FIVE CENTS:

The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion,.....	No. 1
What is Free Religion?.....	3
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Corner-Stones, 4
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Institutions, 5
Terms of Fellowship, Social Ideal, Moral Ideal, and Essential spirit,.....	5
The Practical Work of Free Religion,.....	6
Unitarianism versus Freedom,.....	7
Sunday Schools,.....	8
Friendship,.....	9
Grief and its Compensations,.....	11
The Hebrew Prophets,.....	12
Capital Punishment,.....	13
Human Ideals,.....	14
The Management of Children,.....	15
A Quaker's Letter to a Presbyterian, R. S. D.,.....	17
Comparison of Jesus and Socrates. (Report from the N. Y. Tribune),.....	17
The Candle of the Lord,.....	18
Public Opinion,.....	18
Conscience,.....	19
The Pedigree of Man,.....	21
"Following Christ,".....	22
The Tongue,.....	23
The Golden Age,.....	24
What is Truth?.....	25
The Last Battle on the Creed Question,.....	26
Observance of the Sabbath, Rev. W. W. Williams,.....	27
The Sunday Question,.....	28
Motes and Beams,.....	29
The Dove's Departure,.....	30
The Bible in the Public Schools,.....	31
Religious Freedom,.....	32
A Plain Talk to Young Men,.....	33
Noise,.....	34
The Humility of Free Religion,.....	35
Chaos and Cosmos,.....	36
An Oration on Alexander Von Humboldt,.....	37
Relation of Spiritualism to Free Religion,.....	38
War and Free Religion,.....	39
Religious Revivals,.....	40
Mary and Martha,.....	41
The Ministry of Free Religion,.....	42
Success,.....	43
"Repentance" and "Forgiveness,".....	44
Spiritual Beauty,.....	45
The Book of Daniel,.....	46
The Unity of Spiritual Freedom and the Opportunity which America offers for its development. W. J. Potter,.....	47
The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition,.....	47
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? Chas. Reemelin,.....	47
The Work of Radicalism in Indiana. J. O. Martin,.....	47
Religion in the Light of Reason and Common Sense. Isaac M. Wise,.....	47
Sunday—Its Uses and Abuses. Thomas Pickers,.....	48
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? E. Peckham,.....	49
Parties and Party Spirit,.....	50
The Future of Religious Organization, as Affected by the Spirit of the Age,.....	51
The Incarnation. A Christmas Discourse,.....	52
Transient and Permanent,.....	53

The Index.

VOL. 2.—No. 18.

TOLEDO, OHIO, MAY 6, 1871.

WHOLE No. 71.

The Index,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, OHIO.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.

OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Editorial Contributors.

THE WARMTH OF FREE RELIGION.

(Read to the First Independent Society of Toledo, March 19, 1871. Second Essay.)

"If thou workest at that which is before thee, following right reason seriously, vigorously, calmly, without allowing anything else to distract thee, but keeping thy divine part pure, as if thou shouldst be bound to give it back immediately; if thou holdest to this, expecting nothing, fearing nothing, but satisfied with thy present activity according to Nature, and with heroic truth in every word and sound which thou utterest, thou wilt be happy. And there is no man who is able to prevent this."

THE PHILOSOPHY OF M. AURELIUS ANTONINUS, III, 12.

"There remains that which is peculiar to the good man, to be pleased and content with what happens, and with the thread which is spun for him; and not to defile the divinity which is planted in his breast, nor to disturb it by a crowd of images, but to preserve it tranquil, following it obediently as a god, neither saying anything contrary to the truth, nor doing anything contrary to justice. And if all men refuse to believe that he lives a simple, modest, and contented life, he is neither angry with any of them, nor does he deviate from the way which leads to the end of life; to which a man ought to come pure, tranquil, ready to depart, and without any compulsion perfectly reconciled to his lot."

Ibid. III, 16.

Since my essay of last week on the "Warmth of Free Religion," we have all had the pleasure of reading in THE INDEX a very brilliant article by Mr. Frothingham, entitled "The Chill of Radicalism." Mr. Frothingham boldly meets the charge of coldness so commonly brought against liberalism, admits its justice to some extent, declares that the sentimental softness and warmth of the old forms of faith are enervating, and with an electric appeal to our courage summons us to inure ourselves to the more bracing and invigorating atmosphere of ideas. His closing paragraph has the clarion-ring of a call to arms:

"We want no sluggards, and therefore we promise no ease. Let none come to us who are fond of siestas, or are so fearful of taking cold that they will not encounter the surly wind of a spring day. The preaching of hardness is not yet obsolete."

There is great need of this tonic, and I am especially glad that Mr. Frothingham has administered it while I am speaking to you on the same general subject. With what he says I entirely agree, and I conjecture that he would also agree with the main drift, at least, of what I said to you last Sunday and shall say to you today. There is a glow and warmth resulting from vigorous exercise in the crisp air of a winter's day, when the mercury is down to zero, which is in every way better for the health than the flush and perspiration caused by the heat of the dog-days. This is the kind of warmth we need; and there is no lack of it in Free Religion. We do not want the softness of effeminacy, the heat of over-stimulated emotion, the relaxation of muscle and diminution of nerve-force that come of luxurious dreaming; but we do want the exhilaration of great ideas, the inspiration of duty that carries us triumphantly through temptations, the strength of victorious will that is born of fixed purpose and high thought and inward devotion to something nobler than comfort or ease. While the soul is degenerating in the Capuan climate of sentimentality,—losing its stern courage in the heats of orthodox "experiences" and relaxing its energies in the fervors of delirious revival excitements,—too often a fatal chill strikes in upon the moral nature, and weakens conscience by underrating moral effort. Orthodoxy habitually preaches the failure of what it calls "mere morality" to save the soul, and relies on a white-heat of feeling, a spasm of love for Jesus, to take its place. While it fires the heart, even to the extent of evaporating the intellect, it freezes the conscience. While I should thus concede the greater warmth of orthodoxy in some respects, as compared with radicalism, it produces disease by a too unequal distribution of heat. In fact, orthodoxy is spiritual "chills and fever"—chills of conscience and fever of emotion; while radicalism, equalizing the temperature of the system, reduces the fever, it is true, but drives away the chills.

Admitting, therefore, the comparative coldness of Free Religion in some respects, when contrasted with Christianity, I claim for it, nevertheless, a more equal diffusion of heat throughout our whole nature, a more vigorous development of all our faculties in due proportion, and a better influence on our spiritual health in general. Moreover, I claim for it a greater warmth, a superior power to inspire adult humanity, when its leading ideas are set side by side with the chief tenets of the Christian system. Last Sunday I tried to show that the Christian notion of a human God was inadequate to meet the demands of enlightened minds, as compared with the idea of God immanent in universal Nature; that the conception of the brotherhood of man, even taught as the New Testament teaches it, is inadequate until expanded into a sense of unity with universal being; that the Christian doctrine of human nature, making it intrinsically evil and therefore needing a supernatural re-creation by the Holy Spirit, is false and cold, compared with the radical reverence for humanity with all its multi-form activities. I now pass on to specify a few other points in which I believe the new faith may fairly claim a superiority over the old in the power to warm and to inspire.

1. To the Protestant Christian, nothing is more precious than the Bible. Here he finds the sure revelation of God's will concerning man, and of the conditions of salvation. Starting with the belief that it is his great object in life to save his own soul, he finds in this book directions for achieving the end he aims at, and submits to them as to the absolute commands of God. The Bible is thus the supreme law of his life, paramount to every other law without or within; and it becomes thus invested with an authority which overrides not only the dictation of other men, but also the doubts of his own reason, the protests of his own conscience, the insurrections of his own heart. What the Bible says, no matter how abhorrent to right thinking or right feeling, must be accepted as absolute truth, and obeyed as absolute duty; and if ever a conflict occurs between this outward law and his own secret inclinations or thoughts, the believer must not, on peril of his soul, hesitate to sacrifice himself to the Word of God.

Now I do not and cannot believe that this sort of idol-worship is a very cheerful thing. I very much doubt the genial warmth of this slavery, so terrible and crushing to every free instinct of the soul. There is a sort of self-protective dishonesty by which men evade oppressive laws they do not dare to break; and the forced interpretations so commonly put upon Bible texts for the sake of dodging the unbearable duty of literal obedience comes under this head. Enough ingenuity has been spent on inventing and defending preposterous interpretations of Scripture, to flood the world with works of genius of every kind. Commentaries by the cart-load can be found in our old college libraries, out of which you can defend by names of high authority almost any exegesis of tough texts, however whimsical or ridiculous. Men who profess to accept the Bible as an unquestionable Divine revelation,—men who would burn you and me alive, if the incoming tide of knowledge and common sense had not put out the smouldering faggots,—resort to trickery that puts the vilest pettifogger to shame, in order to break the force of passages that oppose their pet doctrines. In fact, the genius for squirming developed by the long practice of theologians ought, on Mr. Darwin's theory, to produce by and by a new species of ecclesiastical earthworms, capable of twisting themselves into any required attitude towards any given text, and, if necessary, of turning themselves inside out on three minutes' notice.

Now this universal unwillingness among Christians to surrender their own conflicting opinions, and their invincible determination to get these opinions out of the book which they imagine to be their only legitimate source, cannot be a very cheerful state of mind. To be under an inflexible law of belief which is an iron bit in the mouth of reason must make thinking people unspeakably wretched at times; and I cannot wonder that reason sometimes takes the bit in her teeth and drags them over the roughest of roads. A conflict, sometimes very painful, is caused in every active mind which thus feels the galling pressure of intellectual restraint; and revelations of inward wrestling and perhaps of agonizing self-expostulation would be made, if we could get at the secret experience even of those who loudly exhort us to faith in the Bible. The unwritten history of believers themselves,—the struggle they so often have to go through before they can succeed in "humbling their pride," as they call it, though "degrading their intellect" would be a truer name for the process,—would show plainly enough that Bible-worshippers take a hard taskmaster to themselves, and cannot without a painful (though suppressed) protest cut the throat of reason at his command. This Bibliolatry is not so warming and consolatory a faith as it professes to be. Gloom of mind and secret protestation must perforce, in the case of every intelligent person, precede the acceptance of its dark dogmas; and the coldness of death settles on many a soul that in despair schools itself to submit. The promises of the Bible to the believer himself cannot, in any case, shield his unbelieving friends from its threats; and he who can enjoy a delightful warmth over his own salvation when his best-beloved are doomed to perdition, is a moral beast whose sensations of heat and cold are of very little consequence to mankind. He would toast his shins with comfort before a burning house full of women and children.

But Free Religion, tied to no Bible-worship, is emancipated from this insufferable thralldom to an outward law. It finds the law of God in every true, noble, pure, sweet instinct of the human soul. The promptings of conscience, commanding to preserve a high integrity and unsullied purity in all emergencies of life, are the voice of Nature speaking in the private soul the universal law of all souls; and the voice of Nature is the voice of God. True, Free Religion also has her interior struggles; but her struggles are always against the lower tendencies, never against the higher. Unlike Christianity, she never requires the sacrifice of reason on the altar of belief; but bids reason create belief. She encourages no quarrel among the faculties, no insurrection of credulity against intelligence, no tramping out of benevolence under the heels of logic; but, on the contrary, she creates harmony in the whole being of man, and reconciles man with Nature by showing the intrinsic folly of combating Nature's laws. Wherever Free Religion rules, Reason, Conscience, and Love are the rulers; and if these are cold, then she is cold. But the freedom from all outward laws, and the reverent recognition of the inward law which is not private but universal, leave human nature at its normal temperature. They fail, it is true, to super-heat the heart with ecstatic frenzy or rapturous delusion; but they also fail to congeal the conscience by injurious and unnatural contempt of "mere morality." The outward law of the Bible, with its tempting reward of a beatific Heaven, may fire the imagination with the lust of celestial delights; but it binds the soul to a hard, strict servitude, forbidding her free motions lest she wander into damning disbelief. The inward law of humanity glows in the heart with the calm, eternal beauty of a star, creating no dreams of reward and kindling no conflagration in the blood; but Nature maintains the vital heat at the true temperature, and life moves onward, free, cheerful, and serene.

2. Another point in which Christianity is superseded by some to be far warmer than radicalism, is in the doctrine of a special Providence. It is thought that God is a "hearer of prayer" in the sense of being moved by human entreaty to suspend or change the course of natural laws, and thus to afford a special protection to those who seek it. Like a vast machine, Nature by this theory is relentless and cruel in the steady ongoing of her laws; and if a believer is caught in her gearing, and destruction seems instant and sure, all he has to do is to pray the prayer of faith, and Providence steps up to rescue him from his peril. The unbeliever, it is true, gets no such favors; but he is of "no account." The doctrine of changeless laws seems frightfully cold to those who thus take refuge in special providences, and they congratulate themselves on the warmth of their religion.

But consider. If Nature is thus set over against God as separate from him, as a vast machine operating in some way by its own independent forces, with which God interferes only at special and urgent request, then the vast majority of our days are spent within the domain of an alien power, undivine, unconscious, terrible. Only at rare intervals, when in some emergency God condescends to exert his omnipotence in our behalf, can we feel ourselves under his protection. Throughout our ordinary life a great chasm is thus opened between him and us, which we cannot bridge, and which he never deigns to bridge unless we tumble into some terrible pit-fall of danger. Our daily life is thus "without God in the world," and, singularly enough, Christianity becomes pure atheism except in the rare interferences of a special Providence.

Now I confess that the atheistic theory of the universe seems indeed cold and cheerless. If that is what Free Religion is really tending to by its principle of absolutely untrammelled thought, I must indeed travel to that dreary terminus, for I see no escape from the road; but I frankly own that my journey would be pursued with deep sadness of soul. Stoical endurance I should cultivate, as my only safeguard from demoralizing terror; but the chief sweetness and cheerfulness and warmth of my religion would indeed go out in darkness. When, therefore, I find Christianity identifying itself with atheism to so vast an extent as to make human life outside of divine protection in all except rare emergencies,—when only in special providences, which by the very theory must be of infrequent occurrence, do I really come into living contact with the divine presence,—it appears to me that no belief could well be more cheerless and cold. Human existence would be passed under a perpetual cloud, with only now and then a ray of light bursting through a rift to illumine the desolation of its path.

From this real coldness I am saved by my belief that Nature is no such independent entity, devoid of God, but rather the very life of God himself. Her laws are to me the ideas, her processes the continuous operations of Omnipresent Mind,—the only Power in the universe. From these laws and processes I need and seek no protection, no interference of a special providence. Whatever happens is of God; and if I fall into danger, no real evil can overtake me, though I am called to encounter pain and even death. The only real evil is that of my own making. So long as I love virtue and make my daily life the outward expression of interior goodness and obedience to right, I am protected from all disaster, and can trust my fate without fear in the hands of infinite Beneficence. No special providence could bring God any nearer to me, or increase my confidence that all is well; and if I thus dwell within the perpetual control of absolute wisdom and absolute power and absolute goodness, prayer for the suspension of natural laws would be not only an absurdity, but at the same time folly and irreligion. It is natural laws which ensure the stability of order in the universe; and to ask for their suspension is to ask for the introduction of disorder. I prefer to accept with fortitude whatever comes, rather than thus to be guilty of a cowardly and foolish distrust. All that happens is to me the doing of God; and so far from wishing to change his ways into mine, I would seek in all things to conform my ways to his. This, if I rightly reason, is true religion; and I am sure it is not cold and cheerless, but beautiful and warm. "The belief in a constant nearness to God in my daily life is far sweeter, far more consoling, than the hope of securing an occasional nearness in hours of peril by convulsive importunity. Herein is Free Religion a comforting faith—not red-hot with enthusiastic reliance on special providences, but yet warm with calm reliance on universal, natural, changeless laws.

3. Lastly, Christianity claims a peculiar warmth in its views of death. It promises a sure immortality in a heaven of boundless bliss to all who believe in Jesus and accept his salvation. But it also threatens endless misery in hell to all who trust to themselves alone for salvation.

Now I say with deliberation that the absolute certainty of annihilation would be to me a more cheering belief than this. Even though I were myself sure of heaven, it would be ink-black infamy, could I be happy there while countless millions of my fellow-beings were shrieking in the fires of hell. Materialism is indeed, in my opinion, cold and forbidding in its general influence on the mind; but it is at least not inhuman and diabolical, like the Christian doctrine of immortality. If materialism is true, or if I am ever convinced it is true, I shall accept it without flinching, and say so, too; for the truth is infinitely better than any lie, however gilded. But I cannot honestly admit that materialism has proved itself to be the truth. It seems to me now to be assumption where we know absolutely nothing with certainty. And I wait patiently until knowledge comes,—if here on earth, well and good, but if not, I have no cause to complain.

Be the fact what it may, I see enough in life as it is to make it worth living well. Hope is strong; and if God is good, I cannot see why he should have planted it in the human breast for nothing. Provided existence after death is among the possibilities of Nature (and they have not yet been fathomed), I think that we shall find our hope not in vain. Virtue is, at least, worthy of immortality; and it would indeed be strange if she failed at last to get her deserts. In many directions, I see grounds for a cheerful outlook into the future; and though it would vastly lessen the pangs of parting with dearly beloved friends to know beyond a doubt that we should surely meet them again hereafter, I do not think life poisoned by our uncertainty. Sure I am that all is well,—that the best that is possible will happen to us in the end. Sure I am that Nature, in her whole economy, seems bent on the largest possible happiness for all her sentient children; and if pain and separation and death find place in this economy, I still see no reason for letting the exception reverse the rule. And thus, with a calm and modest hope, I leave my own future in the hands of One who will as surely govern it as he now governs my present.

But if our hope is realized, the life to come cannot be a degradation of this. Enlarged, not narrowed, being, we have a right to expect; vaster knowledge, grander virtue, purer and intenser affections, nobler fields of activity and life, reunion with those we love and with those of past ages we have learned to reverence,—this is my hope, though under what conditions I am not presumptuous enough even to imagine. Goodness rules—and I trust it. That suffices. I ask no more.

To me, at least, these ideas are far enough from being cold or disheartening. They yield me ample motives for living, and for living well; and if they are warm with calm hope rather than with dazzling, enthusiastic, burning assurance, they are at least more lovely than the horrible doctrine of the churches, that a stiff, formal, Puritan heaven is forever serenaded with the yells and shrieks of countless millions in a hell of unending torment.

TOLEDO EVENING SCHOOLS.

[From the Toledo Blade of April 20.]

The Standing Committee on Evening Schools report that, needing such assistance as would come of increased numbers, pursuant to the authority of the Board under the date of December 6th, 1870, your committee attached to their organization the members of a special committee appointed by the citizens, and thus secured the experienced and enthusiastic aid of Messrs. Abbot, Holloway and Marx, and Miss H. J. Angier, Mrs. H. E. Howe and Miss L. R. Robbins, who, with a few other persons, efficiently sustained the Free Evening School during the winter of 1869-70. Said Special Committee also brought to the work $75 in money, raised to buy new books, and placed that amount, six dozen slates, and a large collection of second-hand books, remaining from the preceding winter, at the disposal of the General Committee. The members of the Special Committee were not only faithful and attentive to all committee duty, but five of them served in the corps of Evening School instructors regularly on the evenings to which they were assigned, during the whole term.

In submitting the report of Superintendent De Wolf, herewith, your committee feel compelled to say that its range of statistics does not meet our expectation. The committee furnished blanks, approved by all of the Superintendents, which contemplated thoroughness in the department of statistics, but the service of teachers being all voluntary, and a frequent change of teachers inevitable, more complete returns may have been almost impracticable.

From the appropriation of $500, made by the Board in aid of Evening Schools, expenditures were made for objects and to the amounts following:

For Class Tables,	$115 08
Chairs,	77 50
Book Cupboards,	40 00
Gas Fixtures, and work on same,	33 95
Gas,	40 49
Drayage,	13 50
Janitor's Services	69 40
Stoves and Pipe,	36 87
Other contingencies, except wood,	19 41
Total from the $500 appropriation	$446 20

Fuel was obtained from the Day School supply. The quantity used is not known, but its value would scarcely equal the unexpended balance of the appropriation.

By voluntary contributions of philanthropic men and women of the city, the general committee, early in the term, received additional sums, so as to amount in all to $542.51 with which to supply indigent pupils in the night schools with the necessary books and stationery. This fund the general committee endeavored to administer so as to accomplish the object of the donors, as fully as possible. Whatever was needed was purchased at wholesale rates, and all had the use of such books as they needed. Sales at wholesale rates were made to pupils who could buy, and at the end of the term, half of the money so received from pupils after the 24th of January, was refunded to them. In that way $3 43 was refunded to the girls, and $14 48 was refunded to the boys.

There is now on deposit at the Northern National Bank, to the credit of the General Committee, after paying all book and stationery bills, the sum of $228.64 of this Book Fund; and, exclusive of second-hand books from the committee of citizens, the general committee have books and stationery in store of their own purchases as follows:

134 Quackenbos' Prac. Arithmetic	$100 50
63 Anderson's History,	56 70
25 DeWolf's Spellers,	4 75
22 Grauert's English Course,	13 20

12 Small Grauert's do.,	3 60
14 McGuffey's 1st Reader,	2 10
39 " 2d	11 70
37 Writing Books,	5 55
4 Mayhew's Book-keeping,	61
133 Slates,	15 96
Slate pencils,	70

Total of Books, &c., at cost on hand, $215 39

The furniture on hand, at cost prices, invoices as follows:

20 Class Tables, at $5.65 each,	$113 00
210 Chairs,	77 50
4 Book cupboards,	40 00
Stoves and pipe,	30 05
Gas fixtures,	33 70
	$294 25

Your Committee think the people have reason to be gratified with the Evening School effort of the last two winters, but there is little probability that voluntary teaching will be so generously supplied another winter, and if it could be, proper success, as in the Day Schools, would imperatively require regular teachers, and every practicable step in the way of classifying scholars. The experience acquired and the means on hand will be of great advantage in the next effort, and enable the Board to attain much greater success in the future.

The Committee recommend that they be authorized to have the Evening School property stored by the Overseer of Buildings, wherever they may deem proper.

CHAS. W. HILL,
M. SHOEMAKER,
VALENTINE BRAUN,
Standing Committee.

April 19, 1871.

Report of the Superintendent.

To the Committee on Evening Schools.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,—My absence from the city part of the time since the closing night of the evening schools is my apology for the delay of this report for the winter. On the evening of December 13th, 1870, about 140 young men and boys assembled in the room of the United States Express office, the use of which was furnished free of rent by said company. On the Friday evening following, six young ladies and girls met in a room in Campbell's Block, also furnished free by the proprietor, and fourteen in a room in Hank's Block on Cherry street, owned by J. W. Scott, Esq., who donated its use. A few teachers also met in a room placed at their service in the Oliver House. As too small a number of pupils presented themselves in this last mentioned place, no school was organized there. In the other rooms schools were kept up on Monday, Wednesday and Friday evenings until March 17th, 1871, making thirty-eight sessions in the boys' department and thirty-seven in each of the other rooms.

The whole enrollment in the boys' school was	310
Do. in the Cherry Street Girls' School,	39
Do. Jefferson Street School,	35
Total,	885

The average attendance in the Boys' School,	153
Do. in Cherry Street Girls' School,	23
Do. in Jefferson Street Girls' School,	18
Total,	194

The pupils ranged in age from 13 years, the age of admission, to 30 years, a few being still older than this. The average age in the boys' school was 17, and in the girls' 19½ years. All the females studied English exclusively, and all the males except 38—these pursued German a part of the time and English a part.

The following named persons assisted in the work of conducting these schools, the figures indicating the number of evenings each was in attendance:

Boys' School—A. T. Stebbins, Principal, 38; H. L. Holloway, Librarian, 33; F. E. Seagrave, 13; Alice Wagner, 37; Clara Marx, 30; Betty Marx, 36; Katy Welker, 24; Libby C. Williams, 12; August Wolfert, 30; Emma Powell, 12; Julia Clarkner, 29; John Klagg and sons, ten evenings each, 30; Avery S. Hill, 13; Ella Beatty, 33; Mary Beatty, 36; Addison White, 27; Belle Young, 20; Alex. Young, 15; R. A. Owens, 36; Sarah Smith, 8; Thos. Cone, 12; Mary Cone, 12; Josephine Cook, 10; W. S. Jackson, 25; Ella Hall, 25; Annie E. Nicholas, 8; Antoinette Nicholas, 2; W. H. Eager, 10; Rebecca Williams, 10; Mont. Campbell, 20; Boland, 25; Jennie Brownell, 16; Amelia Horton, 10; John Lyman, 10; J. J. Hakios, 13; S. P. Flagg, 23; Miss Pomeroy, 10; Mrs. Winthrop, 15; Miss Commager, 11; Mrs. Plympton Buck, 10; Mr. Richards, 29; Mr. Witstein, 10; D. Y. Howell, 5; A. D. Howell, 9; John Barton, 10; Arthur M. Stem, 9; A. A. McDonald, 8; Mr. Faulkner, 10; C. H. Gorrell, 6; Abbie Eastman, 52; Ezra Harnett, 12; Mrs. David Ketcham, 5; Maggie Gilchrist, 9.

At Cherry street, the following persons served as teachers: R. M. Streeter, Principal, Monday evening, 13; Miss H. J. Angier, Principal, Wednesday evening, 15; George B. Brown and A. R. Seagrave, Principals, Friday evenings, 6 each; Josephine E. Bruce, 11; Miss Law, 13; Mrs. R. M. Streeter, 12; Mary Jacquith, 13; Florence Hooper, 6; Elva Phelps, 7; Lucy Bevier, 11; Miss Buck, 11; Nellie Baldwin, 15; Sarah Smith, 2; Eva St. John, 1.

At Campbell's Block, Miss L. R. Robbins, Miss E. W. Fitch, Mrs. S. R. L. Williams, Principals, each 13; Mrs. A. E. Howe, 11; Laura Kraus, 12; Addie Wheelock, 4; Mrs. E. M. Field, 10; Charlotte S. Forsythe, 4; Clara Harberger, 4; Annie Mott, 13; Mrs. J. T. Newton, 10.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

—"Popular errors on all subjects are numerous; but I know of no error that is so thoroughly rooted in the public mind as the idea that Christianity is the author of modern civilization. But it is easy to see how this ignorance has obtained; the report of a battle is always colored by the partizanship of the reporter. What is chronicled by the victor as a 'great victory' may be reported by the vanquished as a 'change of base.' For the same reason, the literature of every country always magnifies its own people, its own customs, its own institutions, both political and religious; and since literature has hitherto been controlled by persons having great reverence for Christianity as an institution, it has fallen into the habit of adulation, and has not allowed the public mind to see that anything good could come 'out of Nazareth.' Hence I welcome the article headed 'Christianity and Civilization' in No. 56 of THE INDEX. Many will doubtless say that this popular error is harmless, and not worth the trouble of dissipating. But it is axiomatic with me that all error is injurious, and I feel compelled to combat against it, without caring to specify how it is injurious in any particular case, though the sequel never fails to reveal numerous ways."

—"Please send me a copy of THE INDEX. If it pleases me, I will subscribe. I am an infidel, but I am not satisfied with it, because it has made no organized effort to reform the many wrongs with which our land is cursed. It cannot or will not make this organized effort. Why I am not able to explain. Could Free Religion identify itself with the many reforms so much needed in our land, its success would be assured. I believe in the One only and true God, God the Universe is all you see, and all you do not see. God the Universe is the only infinite absolute, infinite in duration, infinite in power, infinite in wisdom, and infinite in justice and mercy. The laws of God the Universe are the laws which govern His own being. They are immutable, and unchangeable. Prayers will not change them, nor tears and repentance soften their rigor. His mercy is in being just, for justice is the only true mercy. No sin ever was or ever will be forgiven, and if a single prayer of mine could alter this immutable law of God the Universe, I would not offer it up. He can be neither pleased nor displeased. Praise and adoration, prostrations and slavish attitudes or costly sacrifices, move Him not, but debase the man."

—"I had been expecting to pay up arrearages and discontinue THE INDEX, as I have other papers to read and thought I could not afford it. But after reading the number 5, containing the lecture of President White on 'The Battle Field of Science,' I felt so much interested and instructed that I have resolved to continue THE INDEX another six months. Enclosed please find one dollar. Your paper does me much good and increases my hopes for the elevation of humanity, when men will dare to think, speak, and act, each for himself, without being bound to any priest, sect, or creed. God bless you in your noble efforts. Yours in the cause of religious freedom. P. S. I live in a very bigoted community, where orthodoxy rules, and infidels are greatly despised. I thank God, the world moves, and light is dawning. Let us labor for the right and 'hope on, hope ever.' I intended to renew my subscription for six months and enclose one dollar, as I wrote on the first page, but on looking for the dollar to enclose, I had not a dollar then to spare. Enclosed please find two dollars. Four cents per week is but a trifle to pay for so much rich mental food as I find in the INDEX."

—"At dinner, today, at a home where I have been boarding for a few weeks, I fell into a conversation with my next neighbor, which showed that he was religiously very much upon the basis of 'Free Religion,' although he had never heard of an organization by that name. I gave him some little history of the movement, and introduced to him yourself and THE INDEX. It resulted in his handing me two dollars, as a subscription for your paper, to be sent to the address of the card, both of which I enclose. From leading rather a wandering life this winter, I cannot depend upon getting my INDEXES at the particular place where I may be, and therefore let them go as before, to —. I miss their weekly messages very much, but I shall see them by and by all together. A friend who heard you in Boston, sent me a report in the Commonwealth. She has always been troubled by a want of faith in God, and she writes me that the last part of your discourse 'thrilled her with hope.' My thought has been fully with yours, that science must give the answer to those deep questions of the human intellect and heart."

—"I have become quite interested in your conflict with the superstitious element of mankind; but that element being organized, I have no faith that Reason will be able to eradicate it. And besides, men as a race are not reasonable beings, and a reliance upon their being so,—except so far as reason is identical with instinct,—must be inevitably disappointed. However, by the inclosed I renew my subscription to THE INDEX, to attest my hope that you will not faint in your efforts to reveal the gospel of Nature to a priest-ridden world."

—"Your paper is well liked by those who (and I have been one of them for fifteen years) long to see the world rid of priestly domination; but I am of the opinion that it will run out for want of patronage, unless you take a wider range of thought, and a more radical stand in favor of the rights of the working man than you have yet taken. The toiling millions are the men and women who are to renovate the world; and a religion that does not take a bold stand for their right to all they earn will not be very attractive to them, whether it be called Free or Evangelical. 'Thou shalt not sell the land, forever; it is the Lord's,'—and—'Thou shalt not lend him thy money at usury, nor thy goods at increase'—were wiser and juster words than ever Jesus uttered; and the world will adopt them yet! The battle for the abolition of chattel slavery was only the first campaign in the great struggle for the emancipation of labor from its creature, capital! You will laugh at me, but I was laughed at for ideas, forty years ago, that are respectable now."

—"I dislike to trouble you, but I did not receive THE INDEX containing your comments on the action of the Senate in the removal of Charles Sumner from the chairmanship of the Committee of Foreign Relations. I am exceedingly sorry not to know all your sentiments on that most disgraceful affair. As we turned sorrowfully away from the Senate Chamber on that sad day, a friend said,—'Oh cousin, cousin, we have witnessed the death of the Republican party!' I answered,—'It now deserves to die.' I sat afterwards for seven hours, and heard Sumner completely vindicate himself, whilst his paltry foes heaped senseless invectives upon him. You notice that Howe has retracted what he then said. I saw Fred Douglas yesterday, for the first time since his return. We met in —'s parlor, but I had no opportunity of saying what I wished about his recreancy to Sumner. Charles Sumner must be our next President."

—"Although I have been a subscriber to the Boston Investigator for many years, and am an Atheist, I do not approve of Mr. Seaver's article in reference to THE INDEX. I think you are entirely in the right. Mr. Seaver is a little too sensitive, and this failing has been somewhat increased by the treatment he has received from Christians. I really think he feels friendly to you and THE INDEX. I am sure he will acknowledge his mistake. Mr. Seaver is an honest, brave, and noble-hearted man, and it grieved me exceedingly to see differences of this nature arise between you. Don't allow anything to dishearten you; but go on with the noble work that you have so ably commenced. I will help you all I can."

—"Enclosed find two dollars for the renewal of my subscription to THE INDEX. Although I shall be beyond its reach for the next six months, I wish it sent to me as heretofore, for I must have a complete file of your valuable paper. I enjoy it heartily myself, and welcome it as a powerful agent for the dispersion of superstition and error."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—Regular meetings of this Society will be held during the spring on Sunday forenoon, at 10½ o'clock, in Daniels' Block, corner of Jefferson and Summit Streets, in the hall over the U. S. Express Office. The public are cordially invited.

RECEIVED.

ALONE TO THE ALONE: Prayers for Theists, by Several Contributors. Edited, with a Preface, by FRANCES POWER COBBE. WILLIAMS & NORGATE, 14 Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London; and 20 South Frederick Street, Edinburgh. 1871. 12mo. pp. xi, 107.

ABSTRACT OF COLENSO ON THE PENTATEUCH: A Comprehensive Summary of Bishop COLENSO's argument, proving that the Pentateuch is not historically true; and that it was composed by several writers, the earliest of whom lived in the time of Samuel from 1100 to 1060 B. C., and the latest in the time of Jeremiah, from 641 to 624 B. C. To which is added an Essay on the Nation and the Country of the Jews. New York: Sold by the AMERICAN NEWS COMPANY. 1871. Pamphlet, pp. 48. Price 25 cents.

THE IMMORTALITIES OF MAN. A Discourse by Rev. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, preached in Lyric Hall, April 9, 1871. New York: D. G. FRANCIS, 17 Astor Place. 1871. pp. 27.

THE RADICAL, Published Monthly. May, 1871. Boston: Office of Publication 25 Bromfield St. 1871. Price $3.00 a Year. Single Numbers 30 cents.

OLD AND NEW, for May, 1871. Published Monthly. Boston: ROBERTS BROTHERS, 143 Washington St. London: SAMPSON LOW, SON, & MARSTON. 1871. $4.00 a Year. Single Copies 35 cents.

THE HERALD OF HEALTH and Journal of Physical Culture. Advocates a Higher Type of Manhood, Physical, Intellectual, and Moral. May, 1871. New York: WOOD & HOLBROOK, Publishers, 13 & 15 Laight St. Price $2.00 a year.

PETERS' MUSICAL MONTHLY. May, 1871. J. L. PETERS, Publisher, 529 Broadway, New York. Price $3.00 a Year.

THE CATHOLIC WORLD for September, 1870.

THE NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD: Its Route, Resources, Progress and Business. The New Northwest and its Great Throughfare. Issued by JAY COOKE & Co., Financial Agents of the Northern Pacific Railroad.

These schools have been supported by the generous, unpaid efforts of the teachers named, all of whom deserve well of our city, and well of the great Republic. There never was a time when the necessity to educate was more imperative in our country than now. What is of higher importance is the fact that at no time was the sum of individual happiness and improvement so much increased by education as it is in the present. The means of usefulness, of culture, of moral elevation, of enjoyment, were never so abundant and cheap to those who possess the rudiments of knowledge and the habits of investigation necessary to turn these means to account. Without these rudiments, in vain are all the wealth of knowledge, all the refinement and excellence attainable by contact with the minds of men so richly endowed and so beautifully furnished as are the minds of Tennyson, Ruskin, and a thousand others through whose instrumentality a kind Providence is seeking to provide for all classes the purest sources of pleasure. Certainly no work can be more praiseworthy than the unselfish effort to lift up to the possibility of this happiness and this excellence, those who, without help, must grovel in darkness and stupidity, the subjects of temptation, the victims of error and prejudice.

With some means of observation, I know of no evening schools that have been so successful as these on an exclusively voluntary basis. I can not help saying that I think the very pivot of this success has been the prompt and untiring labor of the Principals named. This statement does not detract from the equally untiring efforts of the teachers. Besides those named above, the superintendents have devoted time as follows: E. W. Lenderson, nineteen evenings, Guido Marx and the subscriber each twenty-one.

Whether the schools can be maintained another winter on the voluntary system or not, I think all will agree that they should most certainly be maintained. It is cheaper to find employment and instruction for youth in these schools than to stem the tide of vice which the neglect of them would occasion. Besides it is infinitely more humane to the individuals, and more safe to the community.

Respectfully submitted,

D. F. DEWOLF,
Superintendent for Monday Evenings.

MR. FROTHINGHAM'S SOCIETY.—The Third Unitarian Society (Rev. Mr. Frothingham's) held their annual meeting at Lyric Hall on Monday evening. The attendance was large and those present showed a good deal of interest in the business of the meeting and the affairs of the society. Mr. Oliver Johnson presided, and from the report made we learn that the society has $55,000 invested in Government bonds, and that its income last year was $ 00 more than its expenses. The trustees are earnestly looking for an eligible site for a new church edifice which can be purchased on reasonable terms. The address of Rev. Mr. Frothingham was exceedingly happy. Admitting the increase in attendance and the eminently prosperous condition of the society, he spoke of some of the drawbacks of their position, growing out of the fact that it was not closely organized and knit together, but merely a congregation gathered about the preacher, who had things pretty much his own way, without so much as being asked to give account of his stewardship. There was a committee on charity, consisting of one, of which the pastor is chairman! The committee on publications consists of two, the pastor being chairman, and always printing his own sermons. In short, he was the James Fisk, Jr. or Wm. M. Tweed, of the establishment. It would be better for the society if he were got rid of, so that the people would depend upon themselves and do what they now left him to perform; but he had no intention of withdrawing, at which announcement there was hearty and prolonged applause. The remainder of the evening was spent in delightful social reunion, with singing, dancing, reading by Mr. Frothingham and by Mrs. A. D. Richardson—whose elocutionary effort was of the highest order of merit, and elicited universal praise, closing with a collation, when everybody went home pleased with the entertainment, and still more pleased at the excellent condition and encouraging prospects of the society.—Liberal Christian.

A NEW PATRON FOR THE ROMISH CHURCH.—The London Tablet says,—“Our readers will remember the petition which left England some months ago, signed by about 150,000 Roman Catholics, and directed to the Sovereign Pontiff while presiding over the General Council. It was to the effect that the glorious Patriarch, St. Joseph, Spouse of Mary Immaculate, and Adopted Father of the Incarnate Word, might be solemnly declared Patron of the Universal Church. Behold, our prayers, and those of Catholics throughout Christendom, have been heard. On the festival of the Immaculate Conception, the Holy Father was pleased to issue a decree declaring St. Joseph to be Patron of the Universal Church. We rejoice, and all Catholics will rejoice, in this new relation in which the Church is placed towards St. Joseph. We look forward with an assured faith and hope to the proofs of his most powerful protection.”

A laughable thing took place at a revival meeting somewhere in Mississippi not long since. The minister noticed a seedy looking chap in one of the seats, looking as though he needed religion or a good square meal. So he stepped up to him and asked him if he were a Christian. “No, sir,” said he; “I am editor of the Democratic paper in this place.” “Then, in the name of God, let us pray,” replied the devoted minister.—Exchange.

Poetry.

THE MYSTERY OF NATURE.

The works of God are fair for naught,
Unless our eyes, in seeing,
See hidden in the thing the thought
That animates its being.

The outward form is not the whole;
But every part is moulded
To image forth an inner soul
That dimly is unfolded.

The shadow, pictured in the lake,
Of every tree that trembles,
Is cast for more than just the sake
Of that which it resembles.

The dew falls nightly, not alone
Because the meadows need it,
But on an errand of its own,
To human souls that heed it.

The stars are lighted in the skies
Not merely for their shining,
But, like the looks of loving eyes,
Have meanings worth divining.

The waves that moan along the shore,
The winds that sigh in blowing,
Are sent to teach a mystic lore,
Which men are wise in knowing.

The clouds around the mountain-peak,
The rivers in their winding,
Have secrets which, to all who seek,
Are secrets in the finding.

Thus Nature dwells within our reach,
But though we stand so near her,
We but interpret half her speech,
With ears too dull to hear her.

Whoever, at the coarsest sound,
Still listens to the finest,
Shall hear the noisy world go round
To music the divinest.

Whoever yearns to see aright
Because his heart is tender,
Shall catch a glimpse of heavenly light
In every earthly splendor.

So, since the universe began,
And till it shall be ended,
The soul of Nature, soul of Man,
And soul of God are blended.

ANONYMOUS.

The Index.

MAY 6, 1871.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

"TRUTHS FOR THE TIMES, OR REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX"—is the title of a neatly-printed tract of sixteen pages published by THE INDEX Association, containing the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," together with an advertisement of THE INDEX. Twelve Thousand Copies have been struck off. The tract is designed for gratuitous distribution. One Hundred Copies will be sent for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate—one cent a copy. Packages will be sent free to those who will circulate them, but are unable to pay for them.

Mr. PARKER PILLSBURY desires engagements to lecture on RADICAL RELIGION, either for Single Lectures or for Courses of Lectures on successive evenings. Address INDEX OFFICE, TOLEDO, OHIO. The following are among the Subjects of his Lectures:—1. The Popular Religion—"What will you give us instead?" 2. Religious Mysteries. 3. Is the World more indebted to Christianity than to Science? 4. The Sunday Question. 5. Young Men's Christian Associations. 6. Woman—Her Rights and Responsibilities in Government and Society. 7. Labor and Capital. [Three Lectures.] 8. Lying Pretences in Church and State. These Lectures discuss, in the light of common sense and modern ideas, the theology and institutions of the Christian Church, which they treat in the boldest and most uncompromising manner. They aim to substitute for the degrading Bible-worship and Christ-worship of the churches universal reverence for Reason, Truth, Justice, Freedom, and Humanity.

Mr. PILLSBURY has concluded an arrangement with the Editor and Proprietors of THE INDEX by which he will make it a special object to introduce that paper as widely as possible, as an organ of the most advanced religious thought of the times, and will report regularly through its columns.

TOLEDO, O., April, 1871.

F. E. ABBOT, Editor,
For the INDEX ASSOCIATION.

The latest innovation in the English language is probably the word "horizontability,"—used by W. de Fonvielle in Nature for March 9. Mr. Sumner might call this a "preposterosity."

ADVERSE CRITICISMS.

One of the most earnest, generous, and indefatigable friends of THE INDEX, in a recent letter, dropped a remark which furnishes us a good chance to explain one feature of our editorial course that has been quite generally misunderstood. It is as follows:—"I can't understand your excess of magnanimity which makes you publish so many adverse criticisms."

The implied compliment is undeserved. There is no "magnanimity" in the case. We print adverse criticisms from principle, not impulse. There is no particular merit in being indifferent to such criticisms in their personal aspects, though we should consider it a great misfortune, and a serious disqualification for true editorial usefulness, not to have acquired a stable mental equilibrium. Vigor of thought and force of character are certainly impaired by its absence; and perhaps the best influence of radicalism consists in directly fostering a calm self-possession under all circumstances. He is but half a man who is flattered by praise or offended by blame,—puffed up by friendly or stung by unfriendly criticisms. The radicalism of mere opinion is of very little value, until it makes men measure their own thoughts and acts by interior and universal standards, quite regardless of the misunderstandings of others, and find their chief encouragement and highest satisfaction in the consciousness of duty done for duty's sake. He cannot have learned to judge his own life by the inner law who is thrown off his balance by anything that others can say of him or do to him. Neither can he be such an editor as radicalism requires who publishes adverse criticisms of his own articles only by an exercise of "magnanimity."

With this preliminary disclaimer, made not at all in affectation of modesty but in serious conviction of what should be the rules governing such editorial work as ours, we would reply to this remark of a true friend publicly rather than in private, because it touches the very pith of our purpose in editing THE INDEX.

1. Our chief aim is not negative, but positive. We have never sought to destroy for the sake of destroying, nor do we respect the merely destructive spirit. Above everything else we seek to deepen the love of virtue, knowledge, and freedom, and stimulate the desire of usefulness; to do what we can towards lifting men out of a selfish immersion in their private concerns, and showing them the higher claims of universal interests; to kindle in their hearts the passion for truth and wisdom and spiritual liberty. Whatever incites men to think on profitable themes is a priceless benefit; whatever deadens their thinking powers and makes them intellectual sluggards is the curse of all curses. This conviction is the root of our deep discontent with Christianity; this it is which has led us out of the Christian Church; this it is which urges us to spend the best years of our life in giving every energy to the cause of Free Religion. Without thought there can be no comprehension of great ideas, no possibility of that sublime character which results from the free self-government of private life by universal law. Thought first, thought last, thought all the time—that is the supreme object of THE INDEX, as an agency of reform. Above all else it wants to make men think—not because thought is itself virtue, but because it is the only road to the highest and noblest forms of virtue.

2. With this distinct purpose to set people thinking, and make them utterly offended with the pious thoughtlessness which Christianity produces by its deep-seated hostility to freedom of thought, it becomes to us an altogether subordinate concern whether people think just as we do or not. We do not toil to establish any new ism, but to make the world superior to all isms. The age swarms with isms, each seeking to crowd its rivals out of existence and to proselytize mankind; but if Free Religion were one of these, we should leave it most severely alone. What we mean by those words "Free Religion" is something better than a bundle of fixed opinions which we are to convert the world to. On the contrary, they stand to us for large and limitless principles which forbid men to accept any opinions until subjected to the most searching analysis and the severest testing by experience. The truth on all subjects, be it what it may (whether as we think it, or not, is of no consequence), is what we would help men to; and instead of desiring to put our own thoughts into their minds ready-made, we strive unceasingly to help them make thoughts of their own. The comparison of conflicting opinions, and the independent judgment of their respective claims to acceptance, are the indispensable means of forming thoughts that shall have permanent value; and the mental discipline that results from a habit of close analysis thus acquired is worth more than even a knowledge of truth itself passively gained and held. Christianity would give people the absolute truth, but kills their minds lest they distort it; Free Religion would point out the road to truth, and invigorates their minds that they may travel it freely.

3. By this time our readers doubtless anticipate our meaning. We publish adverse criticisms on our own articles to set people thinking. After giving our own thoughts, we are glad to give the thoughts of others on the same subjects; nor do we care at all whether they agree with us or not. It is due to truth itself that all sides of every question should be presented, if possible; and it is due to our readers that they should hear the objections brought against what we have said, provided these objections have any intrinsic value. What a man says has more weight with intelligent persons, if he is manifestly not afraid to give those who think differently as fair a hearing as he asks for himself. The worst trait of our "religious press" is its mingled cunning and cowardice in presenting only the views of those who manage it; and there is a great temptation (to which we sometimes cannot help yielding) to feel a hearty contempt for the insincerity thus manifested. He who has strong convictions based on reason trusts them. He is not afraid to set them side by side with counter-convictions, and let reason judge betwixt the two. THE INDEX has been criticised sharply enough; but we do not remember that it has ever been accused of unfairness. We intend to give no excuse for any such accusation, but to show the strength of its cause by affording a fair chance to those who oppose it to betray the weakness of their opposition. Not that we never make mistakes, for we doubtless do; not that others always think us in the right, for they doubtless do not. But since we think truth of vastly more consequence than our own opinions, if these chance to be erroneous, we are glad to receive strong counter-statements to articles of ours—the stronger, the better. And if we ever omit to print them, it is either because we have no room, or think them too pointless or irrelevant to occupy what room we have.

That is why we publish so many adverse criticisms.

AN IRRECONCILABLE CONFLICT.

A real difference, with no middle ground, is the present conflict between the so-called Radical and Conservative in religious thought. It is very often said by a well-meaning class, whose amiability is to be called rather "goodness" than goodness, that it is all a war of words, and that at bottom the opponents are at one. But no one can be searching for unity wisely who is not also on the lookout for differences; and it is specially the differences between opinions and theories which should be brought into vivid light, because it is the discussion and comparison of these which is useful in the progress of truth. I maintain that there is no possibility of reconciling the two views of religion now contending together, save by leaving out of view all that is worthy and dignified in both. I will try to state this irreconcilable difference.

We have before us the phenomena of Nature, including the phenomena of human nature, or history; with regard to this, all parties alike seek some interpreting principle, and all desire and seek, also, some grounds of mental and moral confidence and peace. The views that result are all naturally distributed into two classes, separated by the irreconcilable difference before referred to. One class seeks its principle of interpretation and its grounds of peace in the very bosom of the changing order of Nature itself; the other class declares that in this shifting scene there is no stable principle either of interpretation or of dependence,—that all things in the current move with it, and that we must lay hold of some sure support outside of Nature's regular order, and far above it. One class looks solely to Nature and the order in which we find ourselves, affirming that, if there be any immutable principle, it must be the basis of this very order uniting its diversities into a grand unity, and that, if this immutable principle can be known, it must be solely by means supplied by and in this self-same order; the second class affirms that the general order, as we see it, is insufficient unto itself,—that accordingly it has been marked from time to time by some interventions or special dispensations and enlightenments, necessary to disclose the true grounds of confidence and peace, which the "unassisted light of Nature" could never have discovered. Now it is plain that these two views are absolutely opposed and mutually exclude each other, and that one of them, as being contradictory, must be true. They are called at present the Radical and Conservative views, or the Naturalistic and Supernaturalistic, or the Rationalistic and Authoritative. One of these views, I say, must be true; but I do not mean that the views of any one radical or conservative must be true because they are opposed to each other; for in many details each might hold views which would be contrary without being contradictory, admitting of a third or a fourth view different from either. I mean that, in that ultimate difference aforesaid which makes one radical and the other conservative, and which will be found dividing all radicals from all conservatives, the two sides are absolutely contradictory of each other, and one or the other must be in the right. Either the changing order is sufficient for itself and able out of itself in the simple process of development to reveal its own interpreting principle and the true grounds of hope and peace, as the radical says; or it is not thus sufficient and able, as the conservative says. Either a special dispensation is necessary to give rest and truth, as the conservative says; or it is not necessary, as the radical says. There is no middle ground, no third alternative. One is altogether in the right and the other totally in the wrong, in respect of this fundamental difference.

In this matter, every one must judge for himself; and, so far as I can see, without supernatural aid, since it is the very question of such supernatural aid which is at issue. So judging, it appears to me plain above all things that the mental independence which must perforce begin the race, cannot be vanquished by itself in the end. If any teaching of the Bible (supposing this venerable book to stand for authority in general) comes before my mind, I must either believe it or disbelieve it, or have no opinion concerning it. If I believe it, then for that reason I accept it; my conviction of its truth constitutes for me its sanctity and authority; and it seems no better because it stands in the Bible, but the Bible seems much better for containing it. If I disbelieve it, then to assent to it is simply to be false and lying. If I have no opinion concerning it, then to assent to it without thought and examination is to be unfaithful, supine, and unworthy of my intellectual nature. Let no man be blamed for holding conservative opinions. But let every man, of whatever opinion, be heartily blamed, if he is unfaithful to the spirit of truth, violates the sanctity of thought, and enthrones custom, habit, or prejudice instead of rectitude and truth-seeking. For no man can always find the truth; but every man can always seek it. "It is not incumbent on thee to complete the work," said an ancient Jew; "but thou must not therefore cease from it."

J. V. B.

RADICALISM AND HISTORY.

The Liberal Christian, greeting the early sheets of Mr. Weiss' new book on American Religion, expresses a wish that "in place of metaphysical subtleties and over-strained refinements of thought, those who attack the Christian faith of our day would subject the history of the Christian Religion, its sacred books and its earlier victories, to some careful reconsideration." Is it discourteous to suggest in reply, that the author of this paragraph and his friends might profitably subject to careful reconsideration the literature which the new school of thought has produced in each of the departments he specifies? It is copious, if not exhaustive, and able, though inspired simply by love of truth. It covers every inch of ground, and even explores by-ways that criticism has never before ventured to traverse.

With the new school of Biblical criticism all scholars are acquainted. The peculiarity of that school is its historical character. It is in fact known as the "historical school" in contradistinction to the older schools, which were dogmatical, explanatory, or apologetic. It sprang up in Germany thirty years ago, and now flourishes with great vigor in Europe and England. The names of Baur and Zeller, of Schwegler and Hilgenfeld are not so familiar as they might be; but the names of Nicolas, Reville, and Renan are pretty well known even to careless readers, and they are unrefuted. "With twenty mortal murders on their crowns" they reappear and push the orthodox expositors from their seats. Radicalism feels perfectly sure of its ground in regard to the "sacred scriptures."

The younger Coquerel has written a history of the "Apostles' Creed" which makes quite clear the natural process of its construction. Reville's "History of the Dogma of the Divinity of Jesus Christ," a little book entirely free from "metaphysical subtleties or over-strained refinements of thought," tells a simple story of that achievement of the speculative mind. Reuss' "History of the Canon in the Christian Church," shows conclusively that supernatural influences had no part in the work of collecting and choosing the inspired Scriptures, and renders further reconsideration of that subject unnecessary. One of our own finest scholars, Samuel Johnson, with a rare combination of genius and learning, has dealt with perhaps the most delicate and difficult historical problem of all,—the question how Jesus, being what he actually was, a Jewish enthusiast and reformer, came to be an object of worship in the Roman Empire,—in a manner that secures for him the praise of every student. This "Worship of Jesus," a little book of ninety-two pages, performs what very few have had the courage to undertake, what none have had the ability to execute,—and performs it in a manner so firm and graceful, so persuasive and convincing, that the radicals are justified in feeling that that point has been disposed of. No miracle was needed to effect the translation of a mortal to the skies. The action of ordinary intelligence explains it all, neither calling in nor allowing place for the intervention of the "Holy Spirit."

As to the victories of the Christian faith, Gibbon remains to this day unanswered; not because answers were not prepared, but because they were more easily refuted than he was. The historians of the Roman Empire since Gibbon's time have strengthened his general positions and made it evident that the stream of history, instead of tumbling over a precipice from the high level of Judæa to the lowlands of Greece and Italy, flowed evenly on, the waters of Palestine mingling with the Gentile streams and taking color and direction from their flow. Lecky, in his "History of European Morals," seriously diminishes the splendor as well as the number of the "Triumphs of the Cross," leaving it in some respects doubtful whether the new religion was on the whole the gainer or the loser from its intercourse with the western world, making it absolutely certain that it was in no respect conqueror.

The remarkable chapter in Renan's "Apostles" on the condition of the world towards the middle of the first century, throws a flood of light on the causes that secured the easy diffusion of Christianity, and among those causes the divine interference is not found.

These are only two or three of the most popular and accessible works on the outward and inward history of the church. There are many others, fully as convincing if not altogether as brilliant, which the Liberal Christian may be excused for not having read.

The plain fact is that radicalism rests on history. Its foundations were laid in history. There is its stronghold. When it shall be driven from that, it will be time for it to fall back on philosophy. At present, the guns it plants on that fortress suffice not merely to keep the enemy at a distance, but to threaten seriously his camps.

O. B. F.

NOTES FROM THE FIELD.

JEFFERSON, OHIO, April 24, 1871.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—My life is too short and crowded, and so are your columns, to admit of preliminary or apology. My "Notes" must be few and brief in my correspondence with your paper, in the future as well as today. While none will accuse me of undervaluing the great anti-slavery struggle inaugurated by Mr. Garrison more than forty years ago, the new enterprise of spiritual emancipation appears to me the most sublimely important of all committed to man in at least eighteen hundred years. So what have I or you to do with apologies, or even formal introductions?

Of my six months in Salem, your readers are informed. And yet I owe it to myself, as well as to the excellent men and women of the Free Society there, young and old, to say that no half-year of my life was ever so crowded with just those experiences which make pleasant memories ever afterwards, and must while memory lasts.

I worked hard; the calling was new to me; but I determined to give my best, too poor at that, for so noble a people. And no one ever had or could desire a more indulgent or appreciative audience. I surely did not need the very complimentary resolutions unanimously adopted by the Society at the close of my engagement, nor the earnest invitation extended to me to renew it for an indefinite period, to assure me how truly and highly my services were valued. Were my actual deserts equal to their expressions of satisfaction and approval, what more could I desire? They have given me new motive and inducement, as well as encouragement, to fidelity and constancy, in my new field of labor during the few years that may yet remain to me of life. Really to merit the favor and friendship of such as they, would in itself be a religion indeed.

My recent lectures in Toledo, and Cincinnati, Indianapolis, and Lansing, certainly left little to be desired either as to attendance or attention; or extent and accuracy of newspaper report, or fairness of comment.

Yesterday I gave two lectures in the Congregational Church in this town; the residence and burial place of the late Hon., and rightly honorable, Joshua R. Giddings. In the evening the house was crowded. Mr. Howells, of the Sentinel, replied to me at more length than purpose; forgetting, however, to say that his own religious faith (Swedenborgianism), should he unfold it as fully as I did mine, would be quite as distasteful to the conservative Congregationalists and Methodists, as any sentiment advanced by me.

Mr. Howells paid the audience the compliment of being the largest, the most interested and attentive of any he had seen in that house for a long time, even on the most extraordinary occasions. A compliment, I was assured, not in the least undeserved.

This evening, Monday, I lecture in Ashtabula, and shall then make my way into New York and New England, for such service as offers there.

Faithfully and fraternally yours,
PARKER PILLSBURY.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

THE CHRISTIAN ERA.

DELTA, O., April 7, 1871.

MR. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—I cannot sufficiently express my joy and gratitude for the light and truth that have come to me in the columns of THE INDEX. I am not a subscriber, but have it to read through the kindness of a friend. It has confirmed my faith in humanity, my hope for the world. The first thirty years of my life my highest aim was to be a Christian in the true orthodox sense of the term; but I never felt satisfied in my own mind with my attainments in that direction. During the last fifteen years I have been seeking for truth. I have cared not where I found it, whether on Christian or Pagan ground; and now in my forty-sixth year I feel that I have almost within my grasp the pearl of great price. At least, I feel willing to sell all that I have to obtain it, or in other words give up all my preconceived opinions and prejudices that I may know the truth; and I find much to satisfy my longings in the free religious ideas advanced in THE INDEX.

I want to ask a question. How, why, and when did the present era commence? Do we count our years from the birth of Christ, or from his death, or how was the thing done, anyhow? He was such an humble individual in his time, his followers were all so meek and lowly,—how could they influence the whole world to begin anew to count the year One? Is there any history, sacred or profane, that tells of the origin of the Christian Era?

HANNAH J. HUNT.

[In THE INDEX No. 52, which has been sent to our correspondent, the desired information is given.—ED.]

PROF. T. B. TAYLOR.

The above named gentleman has recently been forced into a position of notoriety far beyond his own desire by the action of the Methodist Episcopal Church in expelling him from her ministry and membership on a charge of heresy. Being familiar with the facts, I will briefly give them.

Prof. Taylor has for twenty years held a prominent position in the Methodist ministry. Most of his time he has filled pulpits in the large cities of both the East and West, and the remainder has been spent at the head of Methodist institutions of learning. All this time he ranked as one of their ablest and most learned men, whom the Bishop as well as the laity loved to honor. During the last two or three years, he has caught the spirit of progress with which the country is rife to a degree that has led him up to a plane of thought so much broader than that occupied by the most advanced Methodists, that his sermons lost all their sectarian features and became food for the most utilitarian thinker. This drew to his church all the best-minded among all classes, including of course the radicals. But it displeased the old thinkers of his congregation, who complained that he ceased to preach the old-fashioned gospel. These complaints finally reached the Conference in the form of a charge of heresy. During the past year he has been in charge of the first M. E. Church of Fort Scott, Kansas, where his church (the largest in the city) has been crowded to overflowing up to the last day of his ministry in it.

The Conference met at Paoli on the seventeenth of March, and he was expelled on the nineteenth for heresy, the specifications being that he denied physical resurrection of the body and said that the book of Job was not reliable as a book of authority. The news of his fate was telegraphed to the daily papers of Fort Scott immediately, and on his arrival at home next day he found a most enthusiastic movement on foot (participated in by nearly all the leading men and women of the city, including a large majority of his old congregation) for the organization of an independent church. This move rapidly became a great success, and Prof. Taylor is now installed as pastor of the First Independent Society of Fort Scott, on a salary nearly twice as large as he received last year. The meetings are held in McDonald Hall (the largest in the place), which is not over half large enough for his congregation. The Professor writes me that he thinks he is two inches taller, and feels as gay as a bird since his bonds were cut. The question is, which party is the joke on, Prof. T., or the Conference?

B.

A GREETING FROM THE OLD DOMINION.

SNOWVILLE, VA., March 13, 1871.

FRIEND ABBOT:—Permit me to give you and, if you please, the readers of THE INDEX, a brief description of Snowville, if it is not already known to all the world, like Jerusalem and Babylon of old.

It is a village of thirty houses on Little River, a tributary to New River, in Pulaski County, Virginia. It has shops, stores, etc., common to all such places. It has a good-sized church, where all the devout believers in one God and Alexander Campbell regularly meet to worship the God that orders belief in Jesus Christ and Baptism as all that is necessary to salvation.

I came to this place last October, and preached three nights; but not mentioning baptism as alone necessary for future happiness, I found the cold shoulder turned towards me.

I began to give out THE INDEX to such as would read it. I gave out the Religio-Philosophical Journal, of Chicago, and the Banner of Light, of Boston. Lastly I got your "Truths for the Times," and brother Potter's tracts upon the Sabbath, Infallibility, &c. That made me a great sinner, an infidel of the blackest dye, direct from hell. A brother preacher, Holly by name, quoted from one of my books and from the papers enough to make a gospel sermon to preach on the Sabbath, but took especial pains to misrepresent them all, denouncing me as one from the infernal region, while he was preaching for Christ's sake. In three weeks again Father Bullard, the high priest and successor of Campbell, raked me and the papers I had given away over the coals.

The result is I have sent you ten dollars for five subscribers to THE INDEX, and some for other papers. I find a demand for reform books, both of a religious and a scientific character, and repeated calls to go out to lecture upon science and preach. I have the Methodist churches open to me, and other churches over the country, and I always find a good turn-out, a house-full. The intelligent, educated part of the people are not only ready to hear, but to think independently of a priest.

I am confident I can send you ten dollars more for THE INDEX before the year is out.

Yours truly,
J. M. BARNES.

SACRED AND SECULAR.

A learned M. D. recently gave the opinion, when called upon to define insanity, that it was a very difficult matter even for those of the medical profession to tell exactly where insanity began or where it ended.

This appears to be the case with modern Christianity and its regard for things "sacred and secular," which when people undertake to define, they are as greatly puzzled as the medical man, to tell where the "secular" leaves off and the "sacred" begins. Thus many who profess and call themselves Christians manifest great opposition to opening to the public on the Sabbath day libraries and reading rooms, considering the doing so in the light of a trespass of things wicked and secular upon things holy and sacred. The question then naturally arises,—is it "secular" for the working man or working woman, whose daily toil for necessary maintenance absorbs all physical and mental strength, to go one day in seven to a well-lighted, cheerful reading-room, and enjoy that refreshing rest of soul, that mental improvement by the perusal of books, papers, and periodicals, of which want of time and want of money have deprived him or her during the six week days? And it is "sacred" for thousands of persons who are blessed with abundance of worldly wealth, with happy homes and time for the elegant leisure work of life, to clothe themselves in the costly purples and fine linens of the god Fashion, and ride in elegant carriages or horse-cars to fashionable churches? Is it "sacred" to ride on Sunday, when the fourth commandment forbids all manner of labor to the ox, the ass, the man-servant and the maid-servant, or are the coachmen who drive elegant carriages and the drivers of horse-cars and the horses excluded from the category? Or why is the reading of the Abolition of Egyptian Slavery three thousand years ago "sacred," and the history of the United States and the liberation of its four million bondmen "secular"? Or the perusal of Nebuchadnezzar's sin and its punishment "sacred" reading and Humboldt's Cosmos "secular"? Does the story of Ruth and Boaz teach a better moral to the uneducated daughter of toil, or appeal more to her sympathies, than that of pure, patient Jenny Wren?

Every intelligent mind, untrammelled by prejudice, will answer—"No, a thousand times No!" The opening of a public library which contains a large selection of religious books, periodicals, journals, biographies, histories and pleasing works of fiction is no sin against God. And those who are denied its advantages during the week may often derive more benefit therefrom than from a prosy sectarian sermon. Real, true, bona fide Christianity is a spirit of love, and always prompts us to do for our neighbors as we would be done by, if in the same place or position of life. Therefore, this secularism of the rich who possess every advantage, or of the stupid, self-satisfied ones who desire none and would deprive those who do of the privilege, is pure selfishness, whose overstrained tendency produces an inevitable reaction which causes the Sabbath to be more disregarded, and more recklessly violated than it would be without the reign of such pharisaical religious pedantry. It is manifestly the duty of people of all creeds and denominations to unite in their efforts, not only to open all public libraries upon the Sabbath, but also (where they exist) galleries of art. Free concerts of sacred music, free lectures and schools for young people and adults, would greatly aid in building up public religion and a universal church whose aim would be spiritual, moral and intellectual life, taking hold of the great needs of the day and combating with the evils of ignorance and superstition which are the cause of at least half of the sin and vice from which the children of the earth suffer. In all the larger cities of the Union, the doors of saloons and liquor-shops and even more infamous places than these are open on Sunday, enticing the young to walk in and take lessons in sin and immorality. And the way effectually to fight these temptations is to create a counteracting influence, more attractive through the benefits which it confers. "But," replies the strict Sabbatarian, "our churches and religious exercises offer all that is needed in this direction." And we answer, facts prove that they do not. Thousands never enter a church from the first of January to the last of December; and therefore Satan must be fought outside as well as inside of church walls. Opportunities for mental improvement are effectual weapons. And, since churches have thus far been unable to meet the wants of the great laboring masses, they ought not to oppose a movement which takes them up, and seeks to elevate them through other agencies, when they have so manifestly failed. Culture is the twin sister of morality, and with its growth the taste for the gross gratifications of the senses dies out. In order to aid moral growth, more opportunities must be afforded and more advantages must be extended to the working classes, when they have the leisure to embrace them.

TOLEDO, April, 1871.

S.

A CROSS-EXAMINATION OF THE BIBLE.

BUFFALO, Feb. 23, 1871.

F. E. ABBOT, ESQ.:

Sir,—In your paper of Feb. 11, you have an article from the Milwaukee Index. (I have not seen your article on orthodoxy, or "Repentance and Forgiveness," to which it refers.) The writer wishes to get at the truth. That is what we are all anxious to find, for he is free whom the truth makes free. I believe that many good men have lived blameless lives of all creeds, for belief or unbelief has nothing to do with a man's future state. If you know a thing to be true, you believe it; but you can hardly claim a reward for so doing. No one will ever be damned for unbelief; for if he should believe a lie, then the merit would lie in unbelief.

Your critic wants the creeds of the New Lights. I cannot give him that, but I can give him what I believe.

I believe in one God (not three), the Creator of this and all other worlds; in the immortality of the soul, and in a state of happiness beyond this life. I do not believe the Bible to be written by the commands of God, for God's works, if perfect, cannot be imitated, while the Bible can be and has been surpassed by men who lay no claim to inspiration. The church-creed is all built on the Bible as the Word of God. If it is the Word of God, we are all interested in knowing it; if it is not, the whole fabric falls. If God is the author, it will stand investigation, as his works look better under the microscope than to the naked eye. To commence, let us have at least the same or as good proof as we should require in a court of law. The first chapter of Genesis and the first three verses of the second chapter give an account of the creation of the world. The second verse says the earth was without form and void. That is impossible, as nothing can be without form. From the third to the thirteenth verse is the account of a vigorous vegetation, without either sun or heat. The sixteenth verse describes the creation of the sun and moon, and all the fragments in the shape of stars are thrown in as of no value. Four days and nights without a sun!—a thing impossible. Verses 20–26 describe the creation of beasts, birds, fishes, etc.; then man and woman are created. Male and female created he them, and gave them dominion over every living thing, with the whole world for an inheritance, and the fruits thereof, without restriction. The second chapter gives another account of the creation, where God made man and gave him a garden to dress and keep. It could not have been a very large one that one man could attend to without tools. He was forbidden to use the tree of knowledge. If there had been such a tree, it is the one God would have ordered him to use. The Church might have forbidden its use, as it proclaims—"Ignorance is the mother of devotion." All created beings were brought before Adam to be named. How about the microscopic world? Animalcules are as much the work of God as animals. It will hardly be claimed that Adam named them all, yet the Bible says he named every living creature.

In the twenty-second and third verses we have the creation of woman out of a rib (a little phosphate of lime). After Adam had got started in business, the third chapter gives an account of their family trials. Eve takes the wonderful oratorical powers of the snake as a mere matter of course. The fourth chapter gives us the names of some of his children and grandchildren, Cain as the oldest, Abel, and their wives. They were so numerous as to found cities, and Cain was afraid that men might slay him, so there must have been quite a population. In the fifth chapter we have the genealogy of the patriarchs, from Adam to Noah; and it is stated that Adam's oldest son is called Seth.

Now here we have two accounts of the creation, both different. Both cannot be true, as they both give a history of the same event. One says man and woman were made together,—had all the world, fruits, etc., without conditions. The other says man was made alone; all other things that had life were male and female. He had only a garden. On a second thought, God made woman with restrictions as to what they might use. One of the accounts must be a fable. Which is it, the first or second?—if either of them is true. God never inspired the writing of them. I think the Milwaukee Index is the one guilty of the blasphemy in calling the Bible the Word of God; for the first chapter contradicts the second, and the second the first. It is so to the end.

As regards the "Blood Bath," spoken of so often, I don't think God delights in blood or suffering. We can do nothing to demand admittance to heaven, as we can buy a railroad ticket and demand a ride. God needs no service from us. He is above our assisting him. The only service we can do him is to assist his creatures here, and obey his laws. The laws of nature are the laws of God. I believe that men can be virtuous and good for the sake of virtue and goodness. The orthodox creed is not love to God; it is more fear of the devil. Men who are good or honest for fear of punishment if they are not, will bear watching. I have taken too much of your time now, or would write more.

Yours,

ALEX. COLE.

A GOOD DRUMMER.—An Iowa paper says: "At the funeral of a young man in Des Moines, recently, the services for the dead took place at the dwelling of the parents. After a most pathetic address, which brought tears from all the young ladies present, the minister inquired if any of the dear friends of the deceased wished to say anything on this solemn occasion. A stranger here stepped forward, and after expressing sympathy with the friends of the deceased, remarked that the way of Providence was inscrutable, and, in this connection, he wished to mention that he was the agent for a first-rate article of Hair Vigor for the State of Iowa. The corpse had used it for years with great advantage, and he confidently recommended it, especially to the minister and undertaker present, as he perceived they were both bald. 'Shake the bottle, gentlemen, and rub the matter well in with a stiff brush,' said he. At this stage of the proceeding a slight disturbance occurred, and the Hair Vigor man disappeared."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

INSTITUTE OF PRACTICAL CIVIL ENGINEERING, SURVEYING, AND DRAWING, Fits Students for R. R. Field-Work in Three to Six Months, Through Course One Year. For Circular address
A. VAN DER NAILLEN, Principal.
71-75, Room C, Reynolds' Block, Chicago.

A RARE OFFER.

THE LADIES' OWN MAGAZINE

Will be sent on trial the balance of this year (7 months) for ONLY FIFTY CENTS.

THE LADIES' OWN MAGAZINE

Is an Original, Literary, and Progressive Monthly.

"It is the most charming, the most instructive, and in every way the most popular publication in the West."—Indiana Journal.

"I am perfectly delighted with it."—Olive Logan.

"It sparkles among other ladies' Magazines, like a real diamond among pinchbeck jewelry."—Illinois Statesman.

"It is a sensible woman's paper, and we hope there are sensible women enough to give it a wide circulation."—Advent Herald, Boston.

"It has the largest corps of regular contributors of any Western Magazine, and is really a most charming publication."—Country Gentleman.

Good Agents clear from $5.00 to $10.00 a day canvassing for it.

MRS. M. CORA BLAND,

Editor and Publisher, Indianapolis.

70-73.

Mr. Frothingham's New Book.

CHILD'S BOOK OF RELIGION, for Sunday Schools and Homes. PART I., Worship; PART II., The Good Life; PART III., Truth. In one Volume. New and revised edition. Forwarded free on receipt of $1.00.

DAVID G. FRANCIS,
17 Astor Place, New York.

SERMONS

By Rev. O. B. Frothingham.

Forwarded free on receipt of five cents for each.

What is it to be a Christian?
Taking God's Name in Vain.
The Issue with Superstition.
Infernal and Celestial Love.
The Sin Against the Holy Ghost.
Pilate and Jesus.
The Dying and the Living God.
The Foes of Society.
The Living Spring of Water.
Elective Affinity.
Religious Irreligion.
Experience and Hope.
The Radical Belief.
The Eternal Gospel.

DAVID G. FRANCIS,
17 Astor Place, New York

4913]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

WOOD & HOLBROOK'S PUBLICATIONS.

HERALD OF HEALTH.

Sixty Pages. $2.00 a Year. 20 Cts. a Number.

Three Months on Trial Twenty-five Cts.

$1 a Year to Clergymen, Teachers, and Invalids who request it. New subscribers who send $2 for 1871 will be entitled to a book of 300 pages and 100 Engravings, entitled PHYSICAL PERFECTION, or Hints towards Human Beauty, showing how to acquire and retain Bodily Symmetry, Health and Vigor, and to avoid the infirmities and deformities of age, worth $1.50. The Scientific American says, "The HERALD OF HEALTH contains more sensible articles than any monthly that comes to our sanctum."

Also—

PHYSICAL PERFECTION.—Containing Chapters on Structure of the Human Body; the Perfect Man and Woman; the Temperaments; Laws of Human Configuration; Embryology; Childhood; Effects of Mental Culture; Moral and Emotional Influences; Social Conditions and Occupations; Effects of Climate and Locality; Direct Physical Culture; Practical Hygiene; Womanhood; the Secret of Longevity; the Arts of Beauty; External Indications of Figure, etc., etc. Beautifully Illustrated with 100 Engravings, and handsomely bound. Price, by mail, $1.50.

This work has been through many editions, and has given great satisfaction to thousands. A copy is given, free to subscribers to the HERALD OF HEALTH, who send $2 at once.

MINNESOTA AND ITS CLIMATE, as adapted to Consumptives, Invalids, and all who wish to make the State a Home. By Ledyard Bill, author of "A Winter in Florida." Price $1.25, Post paid, by mail.

This book, while a godsend to invalids and consumptives, will be found equally interesting to sportsmen and settlers, who would find a home in this far-famed State. It contains a beautiful view of Minnehaha Falls, and also chapters on the climate of all those places which are most desirable as resorts for invalids, including Florida, Nassau, the Adirondacks, California, San Diego, Fayal, etc., etc.

MORAL, INTELLECTUAL, AND PHYSICAL CULTURE; OR THE PHILOSOPHY OF TRUE LIVING. By Professor F. G. Welch, Superintendent in Yale College. It contains over 400 pages, and is beautifully bound. Price, by mail, $2.25.

This book is the most perfect Encyclopedia of Gymnastic exercises of the most approved method known. It tells in plain language how to do everything, from the building of a gymnasium and choosing apparatus to doing the exercises. The series of exercises with the Indian clubs alone, is the best ever published. Those who want a good work on gymnastic culture should not fail to get this one. Dr. Dio Lewis says, "This is an admirable guide to physical culture."

TALKS TO MY PATIENTS.—Hints on Getting Well and Keeping Well. By Mrs. E. B. Gleason, M. D. Woman agents wanted everywhere. Thousands are being sold. Full contents and terms of agency sent on application. Price, by mail, $1.50.

This book is designed mainly for women, of all ages. It treats principally on the diseases of women, and includes chapters on Child Bearing and the Care of Children. Harper's Magazine, in reviewing the work, says:

"Mrs. Gleason is able to say something to wives and to mothers which no man could say. There can be no difference of opinion about the value of the practical suggestions she affords, which are characterized by sound philosophy and clear, good sterling common sense. We wish the chapter, 'Confidential to Mothers,' might be published as a tract, and sent to every mother in the land."

Mrs. Dr. Sayles, after reading it, says, "I would rather have written that book than been queen of the greatest empire on this small globe of ours!"

No woman can read it without being made wiser and better, and without being better qualified for all the duties of life. For any or all of the above works, address,

WOOD & HOLBROOK, Publishers,
67cove81 13 & 15 Light St., New York.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

Free Religious Association.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1870, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains addresses by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, on "The Idea of the Free Religious Association;" DAVID A. WASSON, on "The Nature of Religion;" Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, on "Religion as a Social Force;" F. E. ABBOT, on "The Future of Religious Organization as affected by the Spirit of the Age;" S. JOHNSON, on "The Natural Sympathy of Religions;" RABBI WISE, on "The Universal Elements in Judaism;" COL. T. W. HIGGINSON, on "Mohammedanism;" WM. H. CHANNING, on "The Religions of China;" W. J. POTTER, on "The Religions of India;" and an abstract of a discussion on the "Relation of Religion to the Public School System of the United States." This Report is specially representative of the principles of the Association. Price 50 cents. In packages of five or more 30 cents each. Also CHANNING's Address on "THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA," (a careful and instructive essay, of particular interest at this time to Americans) in a separate pamphlet for 20 cents.

The ANNUAL REPORT for 1868 and 1869 (at 40 and 50 cents respectively), Rev. Samuel Johnson's essay on "THE WORKS OF JESUS" (50 cents), and an essay on "REASON AND REVELATION" by Wm. J. POTTER (40 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained by applying to the Secretary. The Report for 1868 contains a letter from the celebrated Hindu Theist, KESHU CHUNDER SEN, on the "Origin and Aims of the Brahmo Somaj," also an address by WENDELL PHILLIPS, on "Religion and Social Science;" a letter from M. D. CONWAY, on "Religious Movements in England," and speeches by JAS. FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, CHAS. H. MALCOM, JOHN WEISS, and others. The Report for 1869 has addresses by RALPH WALDO EMERSON, D. A. WASSON, JULIA WARD HOWE, C. A. BARTOL, PROF. DENTON, HORACE SEEVER, LUCY STONE, and others.

THE FIRST VOLUME OF THE RADICAL.

Persons wishing to complete their sets of THE RADICAL by adding the First Volume, which has been for some time out of print, can do so by at once sending me their orders. By reprinting this volume in part, I can supply 100 copies. To be able to do this, I am obliged to fix the price at $5.00. This will secure a copy, sent to any address post paid.

Volume 2, 3, 4, and 5, will be sent, post paid, for $3.50 each. Single copies of THE RADICAL 35 cts.

The May number contains Mr. Wasson's review of Mr. Abbot's Religion.

The June number contains Mr. Frothingham's article on "What is Religion for?"

Address S. H. MORSE, office of "The Radical," Boston, Mass.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE INDEX
PROSPECTUS FOR 1871.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869, and has just closed its first yearly volume.

We deem it proper, therefore, to submit the following PROSPECTUS of Volume II for 1871, and ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if the matter was properly presented to them, and especially if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor. We cannot afford to send out travelling agents, nor would they succeed so well in getting names as persons of local influence. We therefore have determined to use the funds it would cost to get our paper before the people, in another way, namely, in the purchase of articles of value to be given as premiums to those who make up lists of subscribers; thus presenting to the friends of free thought and pure religion the double motive of doing good and getting paid for it.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two DOLLARS a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

PREMIUMS.

For Fifty Names, we will give one of PRINCE & Co's four Octave Melodeons (price $65,) or a complete copy of CHAMBERS' Encyclopædia of Universal Knowledge, in ten volumes (price $50).

For Forty Names, we will give a Wilson's Family Sewing Machine, one of the best Machines made.

For Twenty-Five Names, Webster's Royal Quarto Unabridged Pictorial Dictionary (price $12), or one of the following Chromos:

The Three Tom-Boys (Prang's), price..... $15.00
Winter in the Forest, 20x28..... 12.00
Watering the Horses, 21x29..... 12.00

For Ten Names, one of the following Chromos:

WHITTIER's Barefooted Boy, (Prang's) price.....$5.00
The Unconscious Sleeper, 14x17..... 6.00
Mt. Blanc, 20x26..... 7.50
Or a copy of LECKY's History of European Morals, 2 vols 6.00
MAX MUELLER's Chips from a German Work-Shop, 2 vols 5.00
EMERSON's Prose Works, 2 vols..... 5.00
WEISS's Life and Correspondence of THEODORE PARKER, 2 volumes..... 6.00

For Five Names, a bound volume of THE INDEX, for 1870. (Price $2.50.) Or a copy of one of the following works, (post paid):

DARWIN's Origin of Species, price.....$2.00
LUBBOCK's Origin of Civilization, price..... 2.00
Essays in Criticism, by MATTHEW ARNOLD, price..... 2.00
Tablets, by A. BRONSON ALCOOTT, with portrait, price..... 2.00
Any volume of the writings of THEODORE PARKER or HENRY D. THOREAU, each..... 2.00
On the Heights, AUERBACH..... 2.00

For Four Names, a copy of THE INDEX for 1871, or one of the following books (post paid):

EMERSON's Society and Solitude, price.....$1.75
Nathan the Wise, a dramatic poem translated from LESSING by ELLEN FROTHINGHAM, price..... 1.75
HUXLEY's Lay Sermons and Addresses..... 1.75
Speeches and Lectures, by WENDELL PHILLIPS..... 1.50
Historic Americans, by THEODORE PARKER, price..... 1.50
A copy of The Revolution..... 2.00
Or The Woman's Journal..... 2.00

CASH PREMIUMS.

For 75 Names,.....50 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 50 Names,.....25 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 25 Names,.....15 Dollars in Greenbacks
For 10 Names,..... 5 Dollars in Greenbacks
For less than 10 Names, a Cash Commission of Twenty per Cent.

Any book in the above list will be sent by us post-paid upon the receipt of price.

N. B.—Names need not all come from one post office. We will send the paper wherever directed, and let the names count as clubs. Specimen Copies sent to all who enclose a three cent postage stamp. Address

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
LOCK BOX 88, TOLEDO, OHIO.

NEW TRACTS,

Intended to Teach Religion Without Superstition.

The Church and the World: An Exposure of the "Young Men's Christian Association" (so called).
I am an Honest Man: Do loud Professions show us very much about Character?
The Bible Vindicated: Against Infidels on one side, and Idolaters on the other.
The Wisdom of Jesus: How misrepresented by those who call themselves his followers.
God's Justice and Mercy: Not antagonistic, but working together for the Welfare of all.
Infallibility: No better founded in Orthodox Protestantism than in Popery.
Rationalism: A Plea for the Co-operation of Reason with Faith, as God intended.
Prayer: Suggestions to a Child who has been taught to be afraid of his Father.
Learn by Experience: One of the Lessons greatly needed by Pious People.
What Becomes of Sin? Another Lesson greatly needed by Pious People.
Fulton on Dickens: An exposure of one of the professional tricks of a Clergyman.
Love to God: Written on the supposition that Love means Love, and not Fear.
The Negative Party in Religion: Showing who are especially distinguished by not believing.
Five for 10 cents; all for 25 cents.

ALSO,

The Two Doctrines of the Bible on Sabbath-keeping: Showing from the Bible that there are two, and what they are.
Answers to Questions Concerning Sabbath-keeping: Urging the advantages of keeping Sunday free from ordinary Business and Labor, as well as from Superstition.
"It Injures our Business:" Is that a Right Business which is damaged by free discussion?
Choose the Good, Reject the Evil: Believe in God, but be sure to have Him a good God.
Five for 10 cents.

Address CHAS. K. WHIPPLE,
43 Bowdoin St., Boston.

OPPORTUNITY AND RECIPROCITY.

A Convention will be held under the auspices of THE NEW ENGLAND LABOR REFORM LEAGUE, In New York City, May 6th, 7th and 8th, commencing with a discussion on "Trades Unions" in COOPER INSTITUTE, FRIDAY EV'G, MAY 6th. Albert Brisbane, Horace Greeley, Mrs. E. C. Stanton, Thos. J. Durant, M. M. Pomeroy, Josiah Warren, S. P. Andrews, Mrs. V. C. Woodhull, John Orvis, J. W. Browning, S. S. Foster, Mrs. E. L. Daniels, L. K. Jordan, Edward Palmer, M. Drury, Susan B. Anthony, Charles Moran, E. H. Heywood, William West, John Siney, Wm. Hanson, and other speakers are expected.

Admission to all the Sessions, Free.
The Convention will meet at 2½ and 7½ o'clock P. M. Saturday the 6th, and at 10½ A. M., 2½ and 7½ P. M. Monday the 8th, in Cooper Institute; at 10½ A. M. and 2½ and 7½ P. M. Sunday the 7th, in Tammany Hall Opera House.
It is desired to give free utterance to all phases of Labor Reform, and a national impulse to movement in the right direction. Contributions towards expenses of continuing these discussions, and communications of opinion, may be sent to E. H. Heywood, Princeton, Mass.

THE CELEBRATED
CRAIG
MICROSCOPE

is an optical wonder; reveals thousands of the hidden Wonders of Nature; is of permanent use and practical availability, combining instruction with amusement, and never losing its interest. It magnifies

TEN THOUSAND TIMES,

a power equal to other Microscopes of many times its cost. Reveals countless little worlds all around us, teeming with life, which to the naked eye must forever remain a sealed book—as Eels in Vinegar, Animals in Water, Cheese Mites, Sugar and Itch Insects, Milk Globules, Claws and Hairs of Insects, Hundreds of eyes in a single eye of a Fly, Dust of a Butterfly's Wings to be perfectly formed Feathers, the much talked of Trichina Spiralis, or Pork Worm, which was first discovered in America with this Microscope.

It is of infinite value to professional men, to teachers, and to students, but NOWHERE IS IT OF GREATER VALUE THAN AT THE FAMILY TABLE, within the reach of every member. It will delight yourself, your children, and your friends during the long winter evenings. It will show you adulterations or uncleanness of various kinds in food, as sugar, tea, bread, meat, etc.

It is of Inestimable Value to the Farmer in examining insects which prey upon his crops. The power of a $50 Microscope, and so simple in its construction that any child can use it understandingly, and with appreciation.

A Beautiful Present—Elegant, Instructive, Amusing, and Cheap. Over 60,000 sold.
During the past six years its worth has been testified to by thousands of Scientific Men, Farmers, School Teachers, Students, Physicians, Heads of Families, and others.

PRICE, $3.00—Sent by Mail Post paid.

Every instrument is neatly boxed, and handsomely labelled with full directions for use. Thousands have been sent by mail.
Address, W. J. LINESS & CO., CHICAGO.

FREE! FREE!

"THE MICROSCOPE," a Monthly Journal of Information for the People—the mysteries of Nature explained—interesting information on the wonders of Creation—stories, sketches, etc. Terms $1.00 per year. This Journal will be sent FREE for one year to any one purchasing a Craig Microscope at the regular price, $3.00. (Craig Microscope will be sent post-paid.)
For sample copy, and our beautifully illustrated and descriptive circulars, and eight pages of testimonials of Craig Microscope, send six cents for postage to

W. J. LINESS & CO.,

Opticians, and Sole Proprietors of Craig and Novelty Microscope, CHICAGO, ILL.

AGENTS and DEALERS, this Microscope sells in every family on its merits, when exhibited. LARSEN PROFITS. Send for terms.

A NEW RADICAL BOOK.

"Origin and Development of Religious Ideas and Beliefs,"

As Manifested in History and Seen by Reason.

By MORRIS EINSTEIN.

For sale at the office of the Boston Investigator, 84 Washington St., Boston, or by the Author, Titusville, Pa.

PRICE, - - - $1.50,
64-78

or Cincinnati, O.

CHEAP PAINTING.—
100 lbs. of the DECORA COMPANY'S COLORED PAINT will paint as much as 200 lbs. of Lead, and wear longer. For circulars, send ten cents to S. BOWEN, Manager, No. 150 North 4th St., Phila., Pa.
POST LEAD. or New York.

A Few More Agents Wanted For
THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD

A new religious work of unsurpassed interest and value. For terms, address W. FLINT & CO., No. 26 S. 7th St., Philadelphia, 5 Custom House Place, Chicago, and 176 West 4th Street, Cincinnati. 63-77

COLE'S FIRST PRIZE BAKING POWDER.

The Best in the Market.

One trial only asked. Same price as the common kinds.

Sample sent free on Application.

63-75. ALEX. COLE, BUFFALO, N. Y.

THE GOLDEN RULE.

A Weekly Paper Devoted to Natural Religion or Rational Christianity.

Published at 25 Bromfield Street, Boston.

L. SCOTT and J. L. HATCH, EDITORS.
"THE GOLDEN RULE" will publish each week a thoroughly Radical Discourse by Rev. J. L. Hatch, and each number will contain an interesting story inculcating rational views of Religion. The first number contains an Historical Discourse on the "Life and Labors of Elder Jacob Knapp," delivered in the Olympic Theatre, Boston, Sunday evening, March 26. Terms, $3.00 a year in advance. Specimen copies mailed (post-paid) on the receipt of two three-cent stamps.
Address, "GOLDEN RULE," 25 Bromfield Street, Boston.

WANTED.—AGENTS. ($20 per day) to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock-stitch" (like) on both sides, and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest Family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK & CO., Boston, Mass., Pittsburgh, Pa., Chicago, Ill. or St. Louis, Mo. 83y1

SINGLE COPIES

THE INDEX for 1870

Containing the following

ESSAYS,

Will be mailed from THE INDEX office (post-paid) on receipt of FIVE CENTS:

	No.
The Genius of Christianity and Free Religion.....	1
What is Free Religion?.....	3
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Corner-Stones, 4
Christianity and Free Religion contrasted as to Institutions, Terms of Fellowship, Social Ideal, Moral Ideal, and Essential spirit.....	5
The Practical Work of Free Religion.....	6
Unitarianism versus Freedom.....	7
Sunday Schools.....	8
Friendship.....	9
Grief and its Compensations.....	11
The Hebrew Prophets.....	12
Capital Punishment.....	13
Human Ideals.....	14
The Essence of Religion.....	15
The Management of Children.....	16
A Quaker's Letter to a Presbyterian, R. S. D.....	17
Comparison of Jesus and Socrates. (Report from the N. Y. Tribune).....	17
The Candle of the Lord.....	18
Public Opinion.....	19
Conscience.....	20
The Pedigree of Man.....	21
"Following Christ,".....	22
The Tongue.....	23
The Golden Age.....	24
What is Truth?.....	25
The Last Battle on the Creed Question.....	26
Observance of the Sabbath, Rev. W. W. Williams.....	27
The Sunday Question.....	28
Motes and Beams.....	29
The Dove's Departure.....	30
The Bible in the Public Schools.....	31
Religious Freedom.....	32
A Plain Talk to Young Men.....	33
Noise.....	34
The Humility of Free Religion.....	35
Chaos and Cosmos.....	36
An Oration on Alexander Von Humboldt.....	37
Relation of Spiritualism to Free Religion.....	38
War and Free Religion.....	39
Religious Revivals.....	40
Mary and Martha.....	41
The Ministry of Free Religion.....	42
Success.....	43
"Repentance" and "Forgiveness,".....	44
Spiritual Beauty.....	45
The Book of Daniel.....	46
The Unity of Spiritual Freedom and the Opportunity which America offers for its Development. W. J. Potter.....	47
The Battle of Free Religion with Dogmatism and Superstition.....	47
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? Chas. Reemelin.....	47
The Work of Radicalism in Indiana. J. O. Martin.....	47
Religion in the Light of Reason and Common Sense. Isaac M. Wise.....	47
Sunday—Its Uses and Abuses. Thomas Vickers.....	47
Will the Coming Man Attend Church? E. Peckham.....	49
Parties and Party Spirit.....	50
The Future of Religious Organization, as Affected by the Spirit of the Age.....	51
The Incarnation. A Christmas Discourse.....	52
Transient and Permanent.....	53

The Index.

VOL. 2.—No. 19.

TOLEDO, OHIO, MAY 13, 1871.

WHOLE No. 72.

The Index,

A WEEKLY PAPER DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

PUBLISHED BY

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, at TOLEDO, OHIO.

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR.

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love.

The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, Editorial Contributors.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

THE THEOLOGICAL WORKS OF THOMAS PAINE.

On seeing in the New York Semi-Weekly Tribune some time since an abstract of Mr. Frothingham's discourse at Boston on the "Beliefs of the Unbelievers," I resolved to do what I ought to have done a quarter of a century ago—read the works of Thomas Paine for myself. I accordingly sent for the volume and have given it a fair and honest perusal.

I must confess, however, my entire disappointment in the character of the work. Mr. Paine has not made so wide a departure from orthodoxy as some of the authors of our times, whose works are found everywhere in the houses of church members. Darwinism is five hundred leagues further away from the Bible than Thomas Paine's theology. Scientific men now, disgusted as I suppose with the nauseous cant and hypocrisy of the age, seem to ignore altogether the claims of "religion." Mr. Darwin, in his works, treats the Bible with less consideration than the Priest and Levite did the wounded man near Jericho; for they at least looked at him before they passed by on the other side. But Mr. Darwin does not even look at the fact, much less care, that his theory of the "Origin of Species" and "Descent of Man" ploughs through the Bible from beginning to end. It is a real relief to the orthodox heart to come back from the cold and dreary scepticisms of modern philosophy to the cheerful doctrines of Thomas Paine. In reading his address to the Theophilanthropists of France, where he proves the existence of God from the argument of motion, and contends that science, being a divine revelation, should be studied religiously, and not as a mere accomplishment, one feels nearer to God a great deal than he does in walking back over the track of the past with Mr. Darwin an hundred million of years to find his progenitor. If this address of Mr. Paine, so logical and so devout, could be republished today as the inaugural to a series of scientific discourses to be delivered by some Professor in some German University, the church people, if ignorant of its origin, would applaud it to the echo.

As to Mr. Paine's theological criticisms, I find them to be the basis of all the modern works of the kind which I have seen. There is not a clergyman in the United States or in England who has studied the Bible so carefully, and is so well acquainted with its contents, as Thomas Paine was. He has seized upon the strongest arguments in existence against the idea of this or any other written book being, as is claimed for it, the word of God, and has presented them to the reader with overwhelming force. In reading the volume the second time, and in looking at the date of its publication, I found myself pausing in wonder a score of times, and asking why this argument had not produced a mightier effect than it has done on the religious world. After much reflection I account for it in this manner:

1. The author mingles with his argument a great deal of wit, which is entirely out of place on so grave a subject. It rasps the raw places of orthodoxy till the blood and the tears both flow. He never submitted his writings, before publication, to the examination of his friends; or, had they been judicious, they would have struck out a good deal of what was not necessary to the argument, but which must inevitably outrage the reader, if he were inclined to be orthodox, and throw up a mountain of prejudice which would prevent him from seeing, much less appreciating, what the author had to say on the subject in hand. Mr. Paine was one of those men who, when they see anything that is ridiculous, and have a chance to crack a joke at it, cannot resist the temptation to do so, even if it were at their own mother's funeral. He made the tremendous mistake of supposing that religious prejudices can be removed by naked ridicule. Mark Twain, in his "Innocents Abroad," has used the same weapon, but in such a peculiar way that, like a gun-shot wound in battle, the stroke is inflicted, and does its work, before the victim feels the smart of it.

Believing as I do in fair play, and that truth is always in order to righteousness, and that we have no interest in believing a falsehood, I mourn with a grievous mourning and lamentation, that an author so able and honest as Mr. Paine was should hamstring his own argument, and defeat the very purpose he had in view, by ridiculing subjects around which cling the most delicate and sensitive tendrils of human faith. This is the reason why every allusion to Mr. Paine's works in the pulpit and the religious press is accompanied with the charge of scurrility, ribaldry, blasphemy, and coarse invective. I have noticed that, with the exception of Bishop Watson, no attempt is ever made to meet the arguments he advances. They are not so open to objection as the faults I have spoken of, and it has always been easier to prevent an author from being read by getting up a hue and cry against him than by fairly meeting and answering his arguments. This is the first reason, I think, why the "Age of Reason" was followed, as it was preceded, by an age of credulity. Other theistical writers have learned a lesson of prudence, and hence their works are not under the ban as Mr. Paine's are.

2. All the great men who took part with Mr. Paine in laying the foundations of the government of the United States, with very few exceptions, held the same theological sentiments. The character of the Constitution, so unlike in its principles of government to anything the world had ever seen before, proves this to be the case. But they all belonged, in this respect, to the order of Saint Nicodemus, who did not divulge his faith in the day-time, but cherished it by night. I do not blame them for this. One war at a time was enough. Very few men are qualified to fight in two wars on different issues, especially when they stretch over long periods of time. Besides, they felt that the Republic of North America, which was the truly begotten, and the only begotten, child of their sentiments, would tell its own history in future times in the ears of the whole world, and thus illustrate the truth of Natural Religion in its benign influence upon men. Hence, while they agreed with Mr. Paine in his theological views, they did not publicly identify themselves with him in his attacks upon the Church and its religion.

Yet such was the tremendous logical power of Mr. Paine's works that, with all the drawbacks I have mentioned, they would have completely revolutionized the sentiments of the American people on the subject of religion but for the influence of George Whitefield and John Wesley. These two Englishmen, the one the most eloquent man of his age, the other the wisest founder of a sect, crossed the seas, and began their career of evangelization in this country. Whitefield got up "revivals," as they were called, prophesying over the dry bones in the orthodox valleys of vision, and soon inoculated the existing churches with the fervor of his zeal. Wesley, by an organized itinerancy, the very perfection of wisdom, which the Radicals ought to imitate, went out into the highways and hedges, and gathered in the lame, the halt, and the blind, and constituted them into what has become the most powerful sect in American Christendom. These two men started the evangelical wave at the close of the last century, and it rolled on, overwhelming the "Age of Reason" and everything else of the kind, till it reached its height; which it did ten years ago. It then began to recede. The affiliation of all the churches with the system of American slavery (the quintessence and embodiment of all that was wrong and polluted) opened the eyes of millions of people, and destroyed their old reverence for the church and their confidence in its character. Every intelligent man knows that the slaveholders' rebellion was a religious movement for the establishment of human slavery as a divine institution. Although a monster in all its horrible aspect and proportions, the American Church was its mother; and the Northern half of the church never denied their share of its parentage, until they saw that they were in danger of being devoured by it themselves.

In this grand struggle of ideas the spirit of free inquiry, taking advantage of the situation, girded its loins for the work it is now doing. The battle with authority and credulity began, and he has been a careless observer of events who does not see that more progress in the world's enlightenment has been made during the last decade than in a previous half century.

The church organization, however, is still powerful. It has immense wealth, and much respectability; but the spear of Ithuriel is ranking in its heart, and death has begun at the citadel. We have revivals of religion now, but the converts are chiefly Sunday school scholars and grown-up weaklings. The theological seminaries are crowded with candidates for the ministry, but they are generally charity students of the "come to Jesus" kind,—Micahs—eight hundred dollar men, who will by and by wander up and down among the vacant churches, as the same class are doing now, saying,—“Put me, I pray thee, into the Priest's office, that I may have a piece of bread.” Young men of talent and self-respect who have outgrown the childish garments of the creed, and cut their eye-teeth, go into other professions. Thirty years ago it would have been considered discreditable among evangelical churches to hire their music at all, much less from the theatre. Congregations then came to hear the gospel, and did their own singing. Now the music is conducted on the proxy-principle and costs in many instances as much as the preaching. The Cross, the Gospel, has lost its attractiveness, and music is now the main power in our cities for getting the people out to church. The best musical performances draw the largest congregations. I myself have seen an assembly of evangelicals, after yielding sweetly to the soporific influence of the sermon, rousing themselves up at its close, when the professional singers came in from a neighboring saloon, reeking with the odors of whisky and tobacco-smoke, to perform the concluding hymn of the service. Those in the ministry who have taste enough to read our modern literature, and ability enough to comprehend the propositions of science, have become so infected with the prevailing scepticism that they have lost their evangelical fervor, which was the secret of their former success in building up the church; and the people who are pious mourn over the preacher's coldness, draw damaging contrasts between now and the olden times, but do not suspect the cause. Things are in a transition state. There is a growing demand for radical works; and the writings of Thomas Paine, emerging from their long and dark imprisonment, are appearing in a new and beautiful edition, to take their place with other works of the same kind in the libraries of reading men.

Every one acquainted with American history knows that Thomas Paine by his political writings had much to do in giving success to the army of the Revolution, and in originating the government of the United States. On this account the national gratitude caused his portrait to be placed, with those of the other heroes and benefactors of their country, in the Hall of Independence at Philadelphia. I could almost swear that I saw it there thirty years ago. But it is not there now. Who removed it? By what authority was it done? Will not Edward M. Davis, or some other gentleman like him in Philadelphia, make inquiry on this subject, and let the public know? If the portrait was originally there, and if it was removed, the time draws on for celebrating the hundredth anniversary of the nation's birth, when justice ought to be done to the memory of Thomas Paine, by compelling the foul hand of bigotry which took it away to restore it to its place. I care nothing for his dust, which William Cobbett removed from the grave and carried to England. It has by this time mingled with the universe. But the radicals of the United States should require the portrait of Thomas Paine to be restored to its place in the Hall of Independence, on or before the fourth of July, 1876.

VINDEX.

A GENEROUS ANSWER.—The Oriental philosopher, Lokman, while a slave, being presented by his master with a bitter melon, immediately ate it all.

"How was it possible," said the master, "for you to eat so nauseous fruit?"

Lokman replied, "I have received so many favors from you, that it is no wonder I should once in my life eat a bitter melon from your hand."

The generous answer of the slave struck his master to such a degree, that he gave him his liberty.

GOD'S GOODNESS.

[From John Stuart Mill's "Examination of Sir William Hamilton's Philosophy," pp. 98-105.]

Let us now pass from Mr. Mansel's metaphysical argumentation on an irrelevant issue, to the much more important subject of his practical conclusion, namely, that we cannot know the divine attributes in such a manner as can entitle us to reject any statement respecting the Deity on the ground of its being inconsistent with his character. Let us examine whether this assertion is a legitimate corollary from the relativity of human knowledge, either as it really is, or as it is understood to be by Sir W. Hamilton and by Mr. Mansel.

The fundamental property of our knowledge of God, Mr. Mansel says, is that we do not and cannot know him as he is in himself; certain persons therefore, whom he calls Rationalists, he condemns as unphilosophical, when they reject any statement as inconsistent with the character of God. This is a valid answer, as far as words go, to some of the later Transcendentalists—to those who think that we have an intuition of the Divine Nature; though even as to them it would not be difficult to show that the answer is but skin-deep. But those "Rationalists" who hold, with Mr. Mansel himself, the relativity of human knowledge, are not touched by his reasoning. We cannot know God as he is in himself (they reply); granted: and what then? Can we know man as he is in himself, or matter as it is in itself? We do not claim any other knowledge of God than such as we have of man or matter. Because I do not know my fellow-men, nor any of the powers of nature, as they are in themselves, am I therefore not at liberty to disbelieve anything I hear respecting them as being inconsistent with their character? I know something of Man and Nature, not as they are in themselves, but as they are relatively to us: and it is as relative to us, and not as he is in himself, that I suppose myself to know anything of God. The attributes which I ascribe to him, as goodness, knowledge, power, are all relative. They are attributes (says the Rationalist) which my experience enables me to conceive, and which I consider as proved, not absolutely by an intuition of God, but phenomenally by his action on the creation, as known through my senses and my rational faculty. These relative attributes, each of them in an infinite degree, are all I pretend to predicate of God. When I reject a doctrine as inconsistent with God's nature, it is not as being inconsistent with what God is in himself, but with what he is as manifested to us. If my knowledge of him is only phenomenal, the assertions which I reject are phenomenal too. If those assertions are inconsistent with my relative knowledge of him, it is no answer to say that all my knowledge of him is relative. That is no more a reason against disbelieving an alleged fact as unworthy of God, than against disbelieving another alleged fact as unworthy of Turgot, or of Washington, whom also I do not know as Noumena, but only as Phenomena.

There is but one way out of this difficulty, and he adopts it. He must maintain, not merely that an Absolute Being is unknowable in himself, but that the Relative attributes of an Absolute Being are unknowable likewise. He must say that we not know what Wisdom, Justice, Benevolence, Mercy, are, as they exist in God. Accordingly he does say so. The following are his direct utterances on the subject; as an implied doctrine, it pervades his whole argument:

"It is a fact which experience forces upon us, and which it is useless, were it possible, to disguise, that the representation of God after the model of the highest human morality which we are capable of conceiving, is not sufficient to account for all the phenomena exhibited by the course of his natural Providence. The infliction of physical suffering, the permission of moral evil, the adversity of the good, the prosperity of the wicked, the crimes of the guilty involving the misery of the innocent, the tardy appearance and partial distribution of moral and religious knowledge in the world—these are facts which no doubt are reconcilable, we know not how, with the Infinite Goodness of God, but which certainly are not to be explained on the supposition that its sole and sufficient type is to be found in the finite goodness of man." In other words it is necessary to suppose that the infinite goodness ascribed to God is not the goodness which we know and love in our fellow-creatures, distinguished only as infinite in degree, but is different in kind, and another quality altogether. When we call the one finite goodness and the other infinite goodness, we do not mean what the words assert, but something else; we intentionally apply the same name to things which we regard as different.

Accordingly Mr. Mansel combats, as a heresy of his opponents, the opinion that infinite goodness differs only in degree from finite goodness. The notion "that the attributes of God differ from those of man in degree only, not in kind, and hence that certain mental and moral qualities of which we are immediately conscious in ourselves, furnish at the same time a true and adequate image of the infinite perfection of God" (the word adequate must have slipped in by inadvertence, since otherwise it would be an inexcusable misrepresentation), he identifies with "the vulgar Rationalism which regards the reason of man, in its ordinary and normal operation, as the supreme criterion of religious truth." And in characterizing the mode of arguing of this vulgar Rationalism, he declares its principle to be that "all the excellences of which we are conscious in the creature, must necessarily exist in the same manner, though in a higher degree in the Creator. God is indeed more wise, more just, more merciful, than man; but for that very reason, his wisdom and justice and mercy must contain nothing that is incompatible with the corresponding attributes in their human character." It is against this doctrine that Mr. Mansel feels called on to make an emphatic protest.

Here, then, I take my stand on the acknowledged principle of logic and of morality, that when we mean different things we have no right to call them by the same name, and to apply to them the same predicates, moral and intellectual. Language has no meaning for the words Just, Merciful, Benevolent, save that in which we predicate them of our fellow-creatures; and unless that is what we intend to express by them, we have no business to employ the words. If in affirming them of God we do not mean to affirm these very qualities, differing only as greater in degree, we are neither philosophically nor morally entitled to affirm them at all. If it be said that the qualities are the same, but that we cannot conceive them as they are when raised to the infinite, I grant that we cannot adequately conceive them in one of their elements, their infinity. But we can conceive them in their other elements, which are the very same in the infinite as in the finite development. Anything carried to the infinite must have all the properties of the same thing as finite, except those which depend upon the finiteness. Among the many who have said that we cannot conceive infinite space, did any one ever suppose that it is not space? That it does not possess all the properties by which space is characterized? Infinite space cannot be cubical nor spherical, because these are modes of being bounded; but does any one imagine that in ranging through it we might arrive at some region which was not extended; of which one part was not outside another, where, though no body intervened, motion was impossible; or where the sum of two sides of a triangle was less than the third side? The parallel assertion may be made respecting infinite goodness. What belongs to it as Infinite (or more properly as Absolute) I do not pretend to know; but I know that infinite goodness must be goodness, and that what is not consistent with goodness, is not consistent with infinite goodness. If in ascribing goodness to God I do not mean what I mean by goodness; if I do not mean the goodness of which I have some knowledge, but an incomprehensible attribute of an incomprehensible substance, which for aught I know may be a totally different quality from that which I love and venerate—and even must, if Mr. Mansel is to be believed, be in some important particulars opposed to this—what do I mean by calling it goodness, and what reason have I for venerating it? If I know nothing about what the attribute is, I cannot tell that it is a proper object for veneration. To say that God's goodness may be different in kind from man's goodness, what is it but saying with a slight change of phraseology, that God may possibly not be good? To assert in words what we do not think in meaning, is as suitable a definition as can be given of a moral falsehood. Besides, suppose that certain unknown attributes are ascribed to the Deity in a religion the external evidences of which are so conclusive to my mind, as effectually to convince me that it comes from God. Unless I believe God to possess the same moral attributes which I find, in however inferior a degree, in a good man, what ground of assurance have I of God's veracity? All trust in a Revelation presupposes a conviction that God's attributes are the same, in all but degree, with the best human attributes.

If, instead of the "glad tidings" that there exists a Being in whom all the excellences which the highest human mind can conceive, exist in a degree inconceivable to us, I am informed that the world is ruled by a being whose attributes are infinite, but what they are we cannot learn, nor what are the principles of his government, except that "the highest human morality which we are capable of conceiving" does not sanction them; convince me of it, and I will bear my fate as I may. But when I am told that I must believe this, and at the same time call this being by the names which express and affirm the highest human morality, I say in plain terms that I will not. Whatever power such a being may have over me, there is one thing which he shall not compel me to do: he shall not compel me to worship him. I will call no being good, who is not what I mean when I apply that epithet to my fellow-creatures; and if such a being can sentence me to hell for not so calling him, to hell I will go.

Neither is this to set up my own limited intellect as a criterion of divine or any other wisdom. If a person is wiser and better than myself, not in some unknown and unknowable meaning of the terms, but in their known human acceptation, I am ready to believe that what this person thinks may be true, and that what he does may be right, when, but for the opinion I have of him, I should think otherwise. But this is because I believe that he and I have at bottom the same standard of truth and rule of right, and that he probably understands better than I the facts of the particular case. If I thought it not improbable that his notion of right might be my notion of wrong, I should not defer to his judgment. In like manner, one who sincerely believes in an absolutely good ruler of the world, is not warranted in disbelieving any act ascribed to him, merely because the very small part of its circumstances which we can possibly know does not sufficiently justify it. But if what I am told respecting him is of a kind which no facts that can be supposed added to my knowledge could make me perceive to be right; if his alleged ways of dealing with the world are such as no imaginable hypothesis respecting things known to him and unknown to me, could make consistent with the goodness and wisdom which I mean when I use the terms, but are in direct contradiction to their signification; then, if the law of contradiction is a law of human thought, I cannot both believe these things, and believe that God is a good and wise being. If I call any being wise or good, not meaning the only qualities which the words import, I am speaking insincerely; I am flattering him by epithets which I fancy that he likes to hear, in the hope of winning him over to my own objects. For it is worthy of remark that the doubt whether words applied to God have their human signification, is only felt when the words relate to his moral attributes; it is never heard of in regard to his power. We are never told that God's omnipotence must not be supposed to mean an infinite degree of the power we know in man and nature, and perhaps it does not mean that he is able to kill us, or consign us to eternal flames. The Divine Power is always interpreted in a completely human signification, but the Divine Goodness and Justice must be understood to be such only in an unintelligible sense. Is it unfair to surmise that this is because those who speak in the name of God, have need of the human conception of his power, since an idea which can overawe and enforce obedience must address itself to real feelings; but are content that his goodness should be conceived only as something inconceivable, because they are so often required to teach doctrines respecting him which conflict irreconcilably with all goodness that we can conceive?

I am anxious to say once more that Mr. Mansel's conclusions do not go the whole length of his arguments, and that he disavows the doctrine that God's justice and goodness are wholly different from what human beings understand by the terms. He would, and does, admit that the qualities as conceived by us bear some likeness to the justice and goodness which belong to God, since man was made in God's image. But such a semi-concession, which no Christian could avoid making, since without it the whole Christian scheme would be subverted, cannot save him; he is not relieved by it from any difficulties, while it destroys the whole fabric of his argument. The Divine goodness which is said to be a different thing from human goodness, but of which the human conception of goodness is some imperfect reflection or resemblance, does it agree with what men call goodness in the essence of the quality—in what constitutes its goodness? If it does, the "Rationalists" are right; it is not illicit to reason from the one to the other. If not, the divine attribute, whatever else it may be, is not goodness, and ought not to be called by the name. Unless there be some human conception which agrees with it, no human name can properly be applied to it; it is simply the unknown attribute of a thing unknown; it has no existence in relation to us, we can affirm nothing of it, and owe it no worship. Such is the inevitable alternative.

To conclude: Mr. Mansel has not made out any connection between his philosophical premises and his theological conclusion. The relativity of human knowledge, the uncognoscibility of the Absolute, and the contradictions which follow the attempt to conceive a Being with all or without any attributes, are no obstacles to our having the same kind of knowledge of God which we have of other things, namely, not as they exist absolutely, but relatively. The proposition that we cannot conceive the moral attributes of God in such a manner as to be able to affirm of any doctrine or assertion that it is inconsistent with them, has no foundation in the laws of the human mind; while, if admitted, it would not prove that we should ascribe to God attributes bearing the same name as human qualities, but not to be understood in the same sense; it would prove that we ought not to ascribe any moral attributes to God at all, inasmuch as no moral attributes known or conceivable by us are true of him, and we are condemned to absolute ignorance of him as a moral being.

THE GRACE OF DISINTERESTEDNESS.

[From the Christian Radical, Pittsburg, Pa.]

There is nothing more beautiful than a disinterested life. And there is nothing that is so powerful, so convincing and full of argument. For such life disarms all prejudice in the proof that it gives that it has no thought for itself, that it is and suffers for others. But we have need to understand what the true rational disinterestedness is. We think the following, from the Toledo INDEX, utterly misconceives it as it made itself manifest in the history and religion of Jesus Christ:

"Jesus did, we think, love man as man; and we see no reason to regard him as himself a Christian. But if he practised Free Religion in this respect, he preached Christianity when he said—'Whoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only in the name of a disciple [much more, then, in the name of the Master], verily I say unto you, he shall in no wise lose his reward.' Free Religion would prompt to give the water in the name of the little one that needed it; and would forget to say anything about a 'reward.' If the life of Jesus was nobler than his religion, that is surely no argument for his religion."

This reminds us of the old adage that "a drowning man will catch at a straw." It does not look well in the Reformer to make capital for his cause in such a small way. THE INDEX strains itself unduly to raise an objection against Jesus and his religion. An honest, great-hearted, sunny-souled man will smile in pity at this weak but bitter fling at the Son of God.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

The attempt to interpret the Scripture in hand so as to prejudice men against the ethics and gospel of Christ is neither shrewd nor forcible. Even a manly enemy of Jesus will read it with a feeling of contempt.

We give now the passage at which THE INDEX quibbles. We say quibble, for so it seems to us, and in a spirit as little as that of the most shrivelled orthodoxy. But the Scripture: "And whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only in the name of a disciple, verily I say unto you, he shall in no wise lose his reward."

That THE INDEX should object to a man doing a deed of tenderness and charity in the name or for the sake of Jesus Christ does not amaze us. For it has no remotest sense of the worthiness of Christ nor of the eternal significance of Christianity. When once we come to say that Christianity has no scope beyond Buddhism, and Christ has no authority over Socrates, as THE INDEX does, it is easy enough to deny their right to ask us to do aught for their sake. But spite of the assumptions and the dogmatism of THE INDEX on this question, we are at least right when we say that this question is still in controversy. And if at last it come to be seen that the Christ is the Truth and that Christianity is the universal religion, in the consciousness of which Jesus lived and spoke, it will not seem strange or unethical that he should ask men to do and suffer for his sake. For that will mean no less than to say that a man shall do this or that for Truth's sake—which is the loftiest motive, because the highest duty that can stir and burden a soul.

Jesus is the generic man. He is also the true Divine Cause. We do nothing touching men that does not touch Him. We do nothing touching matter or souls that does not involve the eternal Cause. He says, therefore, inasmuch as ye did it (this or that thing) unto these, ye did it unto me. And inasmuch as ye did it not unto these, ye did it not unto me. By virtue of his substances and sources of character he becomes test of all thinking and all doing. By virtue of his centralness to all existences, material, mental, moral, we do it in recognition of him. Christ, in spite of THE INDEX's jejune conceit and self-constituted authority, has set up a higher and more rational test of moral agency than itself. If Jesus Christ be the Truth, He can do no less than ask men to do truth for Truth's sake. That He is the Truth He affirms. THE INDEX says no, we are aware. Up to this point, however, our opinion is the former has the weight of the argument on his side.

But the particular matter that excites the moral jealousy of THE INDEX, and awakens its zeal in the defence of religion is, that Jesus promises a reward to him who does the good deed. With most wonderful wisdom and self-assurance it says: "Free Religion would prompt to give the water in the name of the little one that needed it; and would forget to say anything about 'a reward.'"

Well, may be it would. Free Religion, as revealed in THE INDEX, forgets to say many things it would be good for it to say. It has in some directions a poor memory. But [neither] Christ nor Christianity is responsible for this failing.

